1006. But surely that would not in any way diminish the general expense, because then you would need to have a larger staff of clerks at the Foreign Office?—Yes, but if a secretary is absent for two months in the year one clerk might fill the places of six absentees, whereas otherwise you might have to keep six second horses, so to speak, at the different legations.

1007. Do you think that any reduction could be made in the number of consulships in the Levant, which, as I gather, are about 39?—I was asked in the Foreign Office to report upon that subject a few months ago, and I did suggest one or two possible reductions.

1008. Mr. Frederick Stanley.] With reference to your suggestion, that clerks from the Foreign Office should take the place of a secretary during his absence, supposing that there was only one where there are now two, do you think that persons coming out in that manner for the time being would be able to take up the thread of the business in the same manner as a person who was resident upon the spot?—I think so, for any legation where there was only one secretary must manifestly be a very small one, so that I do not think that there would be any difficulty in a clerk making himself master of the business there.

1009. Viscount Sandon.] I think you said in your printed paper that you thought a university degree, accompanied with honours, would do away with the necessity for any examination, but I do not quite understand, from what passed to-day that you adhere to that?—I rather incline to the opinion which I have already expressed, that you might nearly dispense, if not quite dispense, with an examination for young men first coming into the service. I think I said in that report that I should like any university degree, but at all events a degree in honours, to be held as sufficient qualification without further examination.

1010. In that case you only meant that remark to refer to the first examination?—Yes, not to the second at all. I should make the second severe, and then, to counterbalance that, I would very largely increase the pay of the second secretaries; I would make it worth people's while to pass that examination creditably, and remain in the service afterwards. I should increase the pay of the first secretaries also.

1011. I think you said that you thought the number of the subordinate members of the missions might be diminished, because a smaller number might carry on the work of the office; is it not the fact that a very important part of a young diplomatist's duty lies outside the office?—Certainly a good deal ought to be done outside the chancery, but I do not think that the work would be so heavy as to prevent him from going into society and doing the work of the office also. But as I said before, for every different mission the proper person to judge of it is really the head of that mission; I speak vaguely, and of a state of things that may have very much changed since I was acquainted with them.

1012. You did not confine your ideas of his duties to the chancery?—No.

1013. He ought to mix largely with society?—Yes.

1014. In fact, to be the eyes and ears of the ambassador?

Right Hon. Sir H. G. Elliot, G.C.B.

ambassador?—To be aware of all that was going on.

1015. With regard to the question of leave, do you feel that it is important for the general service that the younger diplomatists, as well as the leading members of the profession, should often come to England?—I think it is very important; I think what you want is to keep your diplomatic servants as English as you can keep them; the tendency of all of us, from living abroad, is to lose our English feelings; we really do not know on many subjects what the feelings are in England.

1016. It is a matter of national importance that all members of the profession should frequently come to England?—I think, very decidedly.

1017. With regard to the question of a private secretary being allowed to the chief of a legation, outside the diplomatic circle, would not that tend rather to diminish the intercourse between the chief of a mission and the subordinate members?—I do not think that it ought to do so.

1018. To go to another subject, as to the consuls in the East, do you think it important that they should be frequently changed?—That is a very difficult question; there is a good deal to be said on both sides. I do not know that I could lay down any rule with regard to that.

1019. The consuls in the Ottoman Empire have more of a political character attached to them than our consuls have elsewhere?—They are totally different from what they are anywhere else. It is very important to have good men in the East.

1020. There have been cases where the whole peace of a district has depended upon the consul?—Yes, he has a good deal of power both for good and for ill.

1021. I should be right in supposing that our consuls, as a general rule, meddle less with political affairs in the East than those of other nations?—I think that our consuls are quite aware that the feeling, both at home and at the embassy at Constantinople, is that they should meddle as little as possible.

1022. I suppose that many cases have arisen when you have received very important information from the consuls?—Yes.

1023. And the necessity for retaining a consulate is a political matter as well as commercial?—Yes, it is a political matter as well as a commercial one.

1024. Have you any opinion with regard to the emoluments of the consuls in the Ottoman Empire?—The consuls are highly paid according to the scale on which consuls are paid in Europe. But I think it is quite necessary that they should be. Their position is judicial in many respects. They have to keep up their dignity (which is not a word I like to use, but still it is so in the East), and appear on terms of equality with the governors and the pashas that they have to deal with. If they could not do that, I am quite sure that they would very much lose their influence and the power of being of use to their countrymen.

1025. Most of the foreign consulates, I believe, have much larger office allowances than our consuls?—I believe they have, but I cannot speak to it with any certainty, 1026. Mr. Butler-Johnstone.] You said that there was a greater distrust in the profession of the Secretary of State now than there used to be formerly; what has led to the change?—I think that it is owing to the greater interest that the public have shown in the profession of late years.

1027. Would not that rather increase the trust in the Secretary of State?—I was alluding to the fact that formerly a Secretary of State promoted an attaché or secretary over the heads of a great many others, and nothing was said or thought of it; but now if that takes place, you immediately see a number of indignant letters, comparing the services of the man who has been promoted, with the services of somebody else, who is higher on the list; and it is always assumed that the Secretary of State has not done it for the sake of the public service, but for some object of his own.

1028. But if a man were promoted because his merit in the profession was recognised, there would not be any distrust in the profession at his promotion, would there?—In the profession generally I do not think there would be any dislike to more selection. I am quite sure that the good men would like it; I do not mean to say that there would not be some who would think that it would tell against them.

1030. In regard to the examination which you recommended for the second secretaries; supposing that examination to be a very strict one, would it not rather lead those in the profession, who had got the post by examination, to expect to be promoted merely according to the examination instead of being promoted for other qualities not tested by examination?—I would not enable one man to compare his work with that of another. I should make it a pass examination; but I should wish to mend his position as second secretary when he passed, and to give him a very considerable increase of salary both immediately on his promotion as second secretary, and when he became secretary of legation.

1031. Then it would be a mere test examination?—A mere test examination; but whatever the examination was, I should wish it to be real, not a cram examination, as at present.

1032. If any one learnt Turkish in England, and went out to Turkey, having a good grammatical knowledge of the language, how soon could he learn the colloquial language?—It would depend upon the man; some men might pick up a colloquial knowledge of a language in a few months; it would depend also upon his mode of life; if he threw himself entirely into Turkish society he would pick it up quickly.

1033. In two or three months?—I think you must give him a longer time than that; it would be more likely to be two or three years.

1034. In case of private secretaries being appointed to ministers unconnected with the embassies, which you seem rather to recommend, would it not be rather hard if those chiefs of embassies who had already private secretaries attached to the embassies had to change their private secretaries?—I would not recommend that a change should be made in such cases, because my only object was to reduce the staff, and as these men are now in the profession, there would be no object in preventing them from being private secretaries.

1035. Is not being private secretary to the chief of an embassy a very good training for a young attaché?—Yes, I should say that it is.

1036. And training, which, perhaps, it would be unwise to dispense with; is it not better than the routine work of the chancery?—No, I do not see that it is; but it would also depend very much upon the mode in which the minister happened to conduct his business.

1037. We have been told that about 600 l. a year is about the minimum expenditure of a young attaché at one of the large courts; would not a private secretary, being in the same position as an attaché, have to incur an equally large expenditure?—I presume that a private secretary could live in the minister's house. I think that most ministers would be able to find some young man of whom they knew something, who would be glad to come for 300 l. a year.

1038. Could all the chiefs of embassies put up with a private secretary in their house without inconvenience?—There might be inconveniences, but it was a suggestion that I made rather with a view of trying to keep the regular staff as low as possible.

1039. With respect to the responsibility of our ministers being diminished by the existence of the telegraph, surely, as you have told us that sometimes the Secretary of State acts on imperfect information, and sends a telegram to one of our ministers, based on the imperfect information which he has received, the responsibility of our ministers abroad is increased by having to act, it may be, contrary to their instructions?—It sometimes is. It has happened to me to have to act on a telegram which said exactly the contrary of what I felt sure it meant to say. Fortunately the mistake was so palpable, that I had no doubt on the matter.

1040. But not only might a telegram say the contrary of what it was intended to say, but it might say the contrary of what the Secretary of State, or a more perfect understanding of the case might have ordered?—Probably it would have been one's own fault in such a case if it was any information which the Secretary of State got from that same legation, in not having laid it clearly before him.

1041. But the information on which he acted might come from another source?—Yes.

1042. You would not say, on the whole, that the post of the minister was less responsible now, in the sense that inferior men might be employed to those formerly employed?—No; I used the word "responsibility" in the sense of coming to decisions of the line to be followed on important emergencies.

1043. You had no reference to the abilities required?—None at all; I think the position is quite as difficult now as it was before.

1044. With reference to the Foreign Office clerk who might be sent to fill up a gap during the leave of an attaché or secretary, there is illness as well as leave to be considered, is there not?—There is, of course, that to be considered.

1045. If you were to reduce the staffs quite to the minimum, you might in a crisis be really in serious difficulties in the event of a sudden illness?—You might occasionally be in a difficulty; but then the question is, on the other hand, if you do not reduce your staffs very much, how you are to provide a fair chance of promotion for the men whom you have invited into the service.

1046. In fact, it is a question of balance requiring a great deal of nice consideration?—Yes; I should personally like to keep the staffs at their present number, and if the House of Commons would recommend the older ones who have served long being pensioned off liberally, then the difficulty would be got over.

Right Hon. Sir H. G. Elliot, G.C.B.

1047. And you would recommend, in the abstract, such a plan?—I should be delighted to see the pensions freely given to the older ones, so as to be able to bring forward your younger men.

1048. Mr. Arthur Russell.] You said that you wish to guard against the evils of cramming for the examination; I did not quite understand how you would effect that?—The only way in which I think you can guard against the evils of cramming is to give the persons about to be examined no notice of the time when the examination is to take place. If you say that you expect a man to be promoted to the position of second secretary at the end of 10 years, let it be known that after eight years every third secretary is liable to be called upon to come home and pass his examination without notice; he would not be able to cram for the examination, and then you would find out what he knew.

1049. His reading would extend over several years you mean?—Yes; I do not want to make the examination unfairly severe; you may limit it as much as you like, but make it bonâ fide, if you possibly can.

1050. Do you think that if the ambassador at Constantinople were deprived of his house at Therapia, with a view to economy, he would sink in the estimation of the Turks?—If the house at Therapia was taken from him it would be absolutely necessary for him to get one somewhere on the Bosphorus out of his own pocket, because all his colleagues and all the pachas live there.

1051. He would be put in a position inferior to the Austrian, the French, and the Russian ambassadors if deprived of that house?—Certainly.

1052. Mr. William Cartwright.] Have you drawn out any kind of scheme for the sort of examination that you would suggest?—No, I have not.

1053. There is no particular point in the existing examinations which you would point out as defective?—I think that the existing examination would be too severe if it were not a cram examination; I think if you were really to call upon any man unprepared to go through that examination with credit it would be found rather severe.

1054. But the idea, if I understood you rightly, which you suggested was to facilitate the first entering the service, and then to impose a difficult and hard test examination, which would secure promotion?—Yes, that was the idea, because if men come in as formerly for eight or ten years, and do the work of the embassies without intending to follow the profession, I think that is all gain.

1055. According to your experience a great deal of cramming is practised at present?—Cramming is naturally practised; when a young man gets his nomination of course he prepares for his examination.

1056. Is that very objectionable?—I think that it does away with a great part of the advantage of the examination.

1057. You mean that it is superficial?—Yes; that what they have learnt quickly they forget almost as quickly.

1058. I think I understood you to say that, according to your calculations at the present rate of seniority in the service, no young man in the service could hope to be a minister under the age of 65?—I calculated that by the time men would become the heads of missions they would be 65.

24 March 1870.

1059. That is in consequence of the block?—That is in consequence of the block.

1060. But there always was a block?—Yes; but the prospects were never so bad as they are now.

1061. But I think you have quoted cases where the people have remained for 10 years unpaid attachés formerly?—Yes; but a great many were passed over their heads then.

1062. Then it is the present system of seniority which is blocking the profession?—Yes.

1063. And with a view to relieving that block, you would suggest a reduction in the staff?—I see no other way of reducing it, except by allowing as many as were disposed to do so to go into the consular service.

1064. But that would be a very slow process?—It would necessarily be a slow process. There might, however, be a few who would prefer a consulate.

1065. Then how could a reduction be made?—Anything that I suggest would not relieve the present block; it would only prevent its continuing.

1066. Would it not be the best course, then, to check nominations?—That of course mustdepend upon the knowledge that the Secretary of State has of the requirements of the different posts, which I suppose he must gather from the reports which he gets from the ministers.

1067. You could not get rid of the present men without giving them pensions?—You cannot get rid of the present men without giving them pensions or offering them other service.

1068. And that claim to pensions has increased of late in consequence of their getting commissions much earlier?—Yes; but the pensions coming under that last regulation are according to the Civil Service system, and they are not entitled to ask for them, I think, till they are 60 years old.

1069. The only practical means would be to draft them into the consular service?—Yes.

1070. You were saying just now that there was a very distinct line of demarcation between the consular and diplomatic services?—Yes; the line of demarcation is more distinct as between the consular service and the diplomatic service, than as between the diplomatic and the consular, if you understand what I mean.

1071. You mean a diplomatist can make a good consul sooner than a consul can make a good diplomatist?—I mean that we have a good deal more commercial business than they ought to have political business.

1072. And in the East, most of those consuls who are under you are in reality subordinate diplomatists?—In many cases they are.

1073. Among those men I suppose there are many who have had long experience of the East, and are very conversant with the language?—Yes, I should think about half of them.

1074. Could you not find amongst them recruits for the post of dragoman?—Then you must make your dragoman's service more profitable than the consular.

1075. Which it is not at present?—It is not; on the contrary, we find our dragomans are anxious to go into the consular service.

1076. You were mentioning that the dragomans do not really stand in that sort of relation that would enable them to take charge of the mission in the absence of the chiefs; is not that mainly due to the fact of their being Levantines?—I think it may arise partly from that; but I think it is partly owing to the character that their position has in the East.

1077. Their connection with the lawsuits, and so forth, you mean?—It must be remembered that every interpreter is called a dragoman; every commissionaire at the hotels, who goes about to interpret for travellers, is a dragoman, and naturally makes his little gains in the way those people generally do; and the name does not ring well.

1078. You were mentioning that the Austrians had only appointed an ambassador within the last two years?—Yes, he was an inter-nuncio.

1079. What is that equal to?—He had the rank of envoy extraordinary.

1080. Mr. William Henry Gladstone.] I suppose that the present block is a good deal owing to there having been too many nominations to attachéships in former years?—I am not able to say that there were too many nominations, for there may really not have been more than the requirements of the service demanded; though, as I have said, I think it would have been better to have worked them rather harder, and had fewer. I must also repeat, that I cannot answer for a great many of the legations where they may not have been at all over-manned.

1081. The number of these nominations to attachéships seems to have diminished recently; in 1861 there were 42 unpaid attachés nominated, and in 1869 there were 17?—The third secretaries should be included in that last number, because they are a new creation, taken from the unpaid attachés.

1082. Do you consider that the block has injured the service?—I think it has injured the service by rendering men discontented; I do not think it has in any other way.

1083. It has not deteriorated the class of men sent out?—No.

1084. Could you tell me what these rules are which are thus alluded to in your letter to Lord Clarendon: "If the rules laid down by the Foreign Office circular of November 1860 respecting the duties of the secretary of embassy and legation were more commonly observed, it would facilitate the reduction"?—It was a circular giving the secretaries more distinct work than they generally performed. There are a great many places now where the secretary of legation, the first secretary, does literally nothing except when the minister is away, and that was not contemplated originally. If he did more work, then I assume that there would be less for the others to do.

1085. I see it is stated somewhere that the secretaries of legation are almost entirely occupied in collecting information for reports?—Yes, that I know; but at the same time the circular distinctly says that these reports are not to interfere with their regular duties.

1086. Do you think that if the reductions you have suggested were carried out there would be a financial saving?—No. What I have suggested with regard to Constantinople would certainly make a great saving at that embassy; but in general I should strongly recommend an increase of pay to the second secretaries and to the first secretaries.

1087. Have you formed, in your own mind, any idea of the proportion that you think the salaries of the secretaries ought to bear to the salaries of the ambassadors, or the ministers?—I think it must depend a good deal upon the place.

1088. Is living at Constantinople very dear?—For many things it is; living for an ambassador is much dearer in comparison than it is for the young men; because they have the advantage of being lodged, and (what may perhaps be an advantage) they have very few inducements to spend money in theatres, and so on. Then for an ambassador, or anybody who keeps a large establishment, it is very expensive because of servants. A common Levantine servant is more expensive than an Englishman. If you take English servants out they cost you 15 l. or so to bring out, and then if they do not suit you they cost 15 l. to send them back again. And everything else is very dear; everything you buy is dear.

1089. Food and house-rent?—Yes; and in a large establishment the servants' liveries. I have all my cloth sent from England, the lace, the buttons, and all the rest of the things, but the simple making-up of those things costs more in Constantinople than it costs to buy the things made up entirely here.

1090. To what extent is French spoken in communications with the Turkish ministers?—I think that about half the Turkish ministers speak French at present.

1091. Is that practice growing now?—Yes; they select, by preference, people who can speak French.

1092. You consider that those who enter your service now are better up in French than formerly?—Decidedly, very much better up.

1093. But you do not attribute that at all to the system of examinations, do you?—Yes; I think that it is partly owing to the system of examination, and then we must also say that the general system in England is that men learn a great deal more French than they used to do 30 years ago; the system of education is a great deal changed in that way.

1094. But you think that you have got as much good as you can get out of the principle of examination?—I think so.

1095. Mr. Holms.] Is it not the fact that our abandonment of the protectorate of the Ionian Islands has led to a considerable diminution of work in our embassy at Constantinople?—Yes.

1096. Is it not the case that the great majority of those claiming protection in the Levant were Ionians?—They formed a large proportion of them.

1097. The expenditure on our embassy at Constantinople last year was 20,331 l.; is there any reason which you can assign why it should be more than the expenditure of the Russian Embassy, which appears to be 13,521 l.?—I have very great distrust of a great many of the returns of the expenditure of foreign diplomatic servants; there is not the strict control over all expenditure in their services that there is in ours, and there are a great many things that do not appear in the returns.

1098. Then you do not think that the return given from St. Petersburgh is correct as to the expenditure of that embassy?—There may be other things added in some roundabout way that we are not at all cognizant of.

1099. Do you believe that their expenditure is as high as our own?—I have very little doubt that the Russian Government spend at Constantinople at least as much as our own; with regard to the sort of expenditure which the Russian Government are ready to incur, I may state that they have got a very fine house there, and I was told that they spent in the decoration of one room this last year 3,000 l.; I do not think that at any time we have had anything to show like that, although our house has also cost a great deal in its way.

1100. Are there any fees taken at the embassies?—There are none taken by us. It is very possible that they may be taken at the Russian Embassy and deducted from the return.

1101. There is a large sum received for judicial fees at Constantinople, what becomes of that?—That is a distinct account kept between the consul general, who is also the judge, and the Foreign Office. I have nothing at all to do with that; but it is accounted for to the Foreign Office.

1102. It is apart from you altogether?—It is apart from me; the consul general is under me; but I do not see the details of that account.

1103. I think it is your evidence that, in your opinion, the diplomatic and consular services should be kept as distinctly separate as possible at Constantinople; do you hold the same opinion with reference to St. Petersburgh and Vienna?—I was speaking generally, and not of Constantinople alone, when I said that they should be kept distinct.

1104. Do you apprehend that there would be any difficulty whatever in obtaining an audience of the Sultan if you were placed in the position of minister instead of ambassador?—I think that an English minister would always be able to get an audience by favour, but it would be intimated to him that it was by favour; and also I am not at all sure that an occasion might not arise where the Turkish Government might not be in a very good humour with us, and when they would put forward some excuse, and say that the Sultan was not able to see the minister.

1105. But on the whole you do not seriously think that there would be any real difficulty at all in conducting the business which you are required to conduct at Constantinople, if you were in the position of minister instead of ambassador?—I could certainly conduct the business, but I am quite sure that with an Oriental people I have infinitely more power and influence with my additional rank as ambassador.

1106. Nevertheless you believe that you would get all that you required to get, even if you were only a minister?—No, it would not be all that I required to get if I believed that I could have got more as an ambassador.

1107. Mr. William Cartwright.] In a moment of emergency you might be at a disadvantage if you had not the rank of ambassador?—I am sure I should; I should not be listened to in the same way as if I had that rank; and it would have this effect also: they would say, "The English Government have always maintained an ambassador here; now, because they wish to show either less interest in the Turkish Government or less confidence in their own representative, they have reduced his rank to a secondary one." That is the argument that they would certainly use.

1108. Sir Charles Wentworth Dilke.] Do you think that the Russian Government possess now at

Right Hon. Sir H. G. Elliot, G.C.B.

at Constantinople (to use your own words) infinitely more power and influence than they had four years ago?—Well, that is a very difficult question to answer, it may depend upon so many different circumstances.

1109. But there is no definition, I think, of what constitutes an ambassador with regard to salary or the expenses of his mission; it is merely a matter of commission, is it not?—There is in reality a difference in the expenditure that he is put to; there is no question that there is a scale observed by every tradesman and every person that you pay anything to, and you pay according to your supposed rank; there is no fixed price for anything there, but you pay according to your supposed position.

1110. When the Russian and the Austrian legations were raised to embassies, do you think that a similar rise was made in their expenditure?—I should think so, probably.

1111. But otherwise, supposing that it were desirable or possible to reduce the expenditure, the expenditure might still be reduced, and the rank of ambassador preserved?—I think it would certainly diminish your influence if you in any way lowered the position of your representative from that which the people have been accustomed to see; I think that, with an Eastern people, that point does not admit of a question.

1112. As far as the one point, of audience, which you take up chiefly is concerned, you would not be affected by such change?—I think, generally speaking, that the representative of England, of whatever rank he was, would be able to obtain an audience of the Sultan, but he would not be able to ask it as a matter of right; and, certainly, circumstances might arise, and exactly the circumstances under which it would be most essential for him to have an audience, in which there would either be a refusal or an evasion.

1113. But if he had the position of ambassador he might ask that audience as a right, whatever the amount of his salary or the expenditure of the mission?—Yes. The Turkish Government have nothing to do with the salary that the English Government pay their representative; that they know nothing about.

1114. With regard to keeping the archives, would it not be possible to limit the amount of time for which the papers are retained?—That of course would be possible, but the archives when once put away cause very little disturbance; after they are deposited in their cases, there is no trouble involved by allowing them to stay there.

1115. I think you made use of the word "fortunately," with reference to a fire that occurred?—I meant "fortunately" for those connected with the chancery, who profited by the simplification resulting from the destruction of many old documents.

1116. We have had evidence before us that in Paris the accumulation of documents is enormous; that is not within your knowledge, perhaps?—No.

1117. With reference to appointments to the diplomatic service, you said that, with regard to their being thrown open to competition, the chief objections which struck you were that you would not secure the possession of an income sufficient to allow people to live on the small salaries that they now get, and also that you would not secure their being gentlemen?—Yes, you would have those two drawbacks.

1118. Do you think that you have absolute security for the latter now?—You have not absolute security certainly, but you have the responsibility of the Secretary of State for every person that he admits.

1119. Do you not think that a similar responsibility might in some way be secured, if in addition to competition you made him still personally responsible; might not a system of certificates, say, from the universities, or some other public bodies, be introduced?—You mean to limit his choice to persons possessing a certain certificate. If there were a sufficient number of men found to make the selection from, it might be so, but it is impossible for me to guess what sort of persons would be likely to present these certificates for him to select from. If only two or three came forward when he had various vacancies to fill up, he might be driven by that rule to select people who would not otherwise be taken.

1120. With reference to the point of income and salary, do you think it a good principle to employ people in a service which paid at all if that which is not sufficiently paid for them to live on the pay?—I think generally that all unpaid service is objectionable. But at the same time I think that it would be very difficult to pay young men in the diplomatic service at the rate it would be necessary to pay them at. I scarcely think that you could ask that a young man of 21 should [receive the 600*l.* or 700*l.* a year that it is necessary for him to have to live on at some of these expensive courts.

1121. It would turn to some extent upon the reduction of the numbers?—I should be well content, in their case, to allow it to repay itself in expectation. I would pay all the superior grades, dating from a second secretary, better, that is to say, the second secretaries, the secretaries of legation and of embassy, and I would pay the others by expectations, in the same way that a man beginning by being a curate, hopes to repay himself by becoming a bishop hereafter.

1122. Would not that conflict with what you said with regard to the severe examination, the second examination in your supposed system?—No, I do not see that it would interfere with it. If you take a man in with a moderate or very light examination at first, and then make him go through a severe examination before he is second secretary, and reward him for going through that examination by a very material increase of salary, I think that those who felt confident of being able to pass would be encouraged to go on receiving little or no pay.

1123. But what about a man who did not feel confident?—He would leave the service without becoming second secretary when it was not too late for him to turn to some other employment.

1124. But would not his unpaid service be of the kind you were deprecating just now?—But I also said that, during my experience, I have never seen any difference between the work of the paid and that of the unpaid attachés. I said that the unpaid have done their work very well.

1125. Mr. Kinnaird.] What is your precise relation with the large body of consuls in the Turkish Empire; are they directly under you?—They are directly under me. The general way in which they carry on the business is to write write to me, and at the same time to send a copy of that despatch to the Foreign Office, if it is anything that does not require immediate decision, instructions can be sent from the Foreign Office upon it; if it is anything requiring immediate decision, I send instructions to the consul, and at the same time write home to let them know the steps that I have taken.

1126. That gives you a very general knowledge of the efficiency of that body?—Then, too, I have perfect knowledge of everything that they write; it passes through my hands, and a great deal of the consular business is done direct between the embassy and the consul, and never goes home at all. That is one advantage of keeping the consuls under the Foreign Office; if it went to a different office the business would be very much retarded; whereas now, between ourselves, the English Embassy, and the consuls, there is a constant interchange of correspondence, and nine cases out of ten are settled without reference to the Foreign Office.

1127. Several changes were made after the Committee that inquired into the consular service in 1858; have you found benefit resulting to the service from those changes?—The chief benefit that resulted was the giving of commissions to the second and third secretaries.

1128. And has that worked well?—Nobody has reaped anything from it as yet, because they have not served long enough for it to come into operation.

1129. Are you at all cognisant with the working of the French consular system in Turkey?—No, I am not. They appoint their consuls more directly from France than we do; we have taken Levantines or travellers, people who have made themselves known in the East in some way. The French appoint pure Frenchmen, more than we do pure Englishmen.

1130. Do you think that the national benefit is greater from that mode, or would you continue our own?—We have got some very good men indeed from our own system, but, on the whole, I am not at all sure that the French is not the better one of the two.

1131. And they promote afterwards from the consular service into the diplomatic?—Yes, they do more than we do.

1132. That is not a bad school for learning?—The eastern consuls are political officers, more or less; very much so in many places, but, as a rule, I do not think it is good to promote from the consuls much, though I never would like to have our Secretary of State debarred from doing it if he sees a person that will make a good minister.

1133. On the whole, you consider that our consular service in Turkey is creditable, and that the country does derive the advantage which it may expect from it?—We have a mixed service. We have some very admirable consuls, and we have some whom it might be as well not to have, as is the case in all services.

1134. But with a view to improving it where it is ineffective, do you report home on the efficiency or non-efficiency of a particular consul coming under your notice?—If any particular case were to occur, I should certainly report it home.

1135. But not the mere want of efficiency?—If a man's character was not exactly what I should like it to be, I should not make it the subject of an official report, unless it became something notorious.

1136. You have no suggestion to make with a view to improving the consular service?—No; you are divided between the wish to get, on the one hand, people who can speak the language, which is no doubt a great advantage, and the wish to get real Englishmen on the other hand, and it is very difficult to combine the two.

1137. You would be glad to have that last point secured?—I hold very much to the advantage of having an Englishman; that is my own feeling very strongly both in regard to the consular and in regard to the diplomatic service.

1138. And could nothing be done to train a large number of Englishmen in the Eastern languages?—You must either be ready to pay a large number of young men for educating themselves, or be prepared to hold out greater hopes of promotion and advancement than I think you could well do. You must pay them, because you could not say, "Now if you will go out and work and study so many years, you shall have a consulate worth so many hundreds a year." Some of these men would certainly turn out incompetent, but you must either name them to consulates, or else you must throw over men who have gone out to the East on the faith of your engagement to find an appointment for them.

1139. You have nothing to suggest as to the consular service?—No, nothing, except the greatest possible care in the appointments.

1140. And those appointments rest entirely with the Secretary of State?—Entirely with the Secretary of State.

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE EDWARD PLEYDELL BOUVERIE, IN THE CHAIR.

The Right Honourable JAMES HOWARD, Earl of Malmesbury, attending by permission of the House of Lords; further Examined.

1141. Mr. Rylands.] I THINK last week you stated that, in your opinion, the smaller missions in Europe ought to be maintained, as they were the eyes and watch dogs of the Foreign Office?—I think that they have been of great use in that way.

1142. The object of this Committee being to inquire as to whether the smaller missions might not be reduced to save expense, I should like, if you please, to ask you whether in connection with obtaining information, the opportunities which are now afforded through the press, by means of the discussion of legislative assemblies abroad, are not a more safe means of judging of public events abroad than the information obtained through the smaller missions?—That would only apply to facts which had already happened, not to circumstances that were likely to occur.

1143. But is it not the fact that, in judging of the course of events, you are able to judge rather from the course of public opinion in foreign countries than from specific information which you may obtain as to the inclination of any particular individual?—I do not think that you can always judge in that way. There are many things that are not publicly discussed in the assemblies, to which, if I understood you, you allude, as to which information might be sent to the Foreign Office, and that information would anticipate those discussions.

1144. Of course I am only alluding to constitutional governments where there is generally a discussion in relation to any events in progress?—I should like to know what is meant by "smaller missions"; it is a relative term.

1145. I mean by smaller missions, all the missions in Europe besides the seven or eight very large missions, which are known to everybody as being the important missions in Europe; Austria, Prussia, France, Spain, Russia, Turkey, would of course be important; then the smaller missions would be Sweden, Denmark, Wurtemburg, Bavaria, and the other smaller German courts; the question which I wished to put, was in relation to the conduct of affairs in the large and important Governments; whether you would not usually obtain better means of judging of the probable course of events than the information obtained from the smaller missions of Europe, through the press and through the debates in legislative assemblies?—I do not think that you would; I think the press would very often mislead you, of course not purposely.

1146. Your Lordship was good enough to inform us in support of the opinion in favour of smaller missions, that the two most important pieces of information that you ever received, while you were at the Foreign Office, came from the smaller stations, one from Hanover and the other from Switzerland?—Yes.

1147. In answer to another question, your Lordship stated that they were both authentic pieces of information, and that they were given a long time before any of the larger missions knew anything about either of them; I wish to ask your Lordship whether that answer is correctly given?—It is correct; but I do not wish to say how the information was obtained.

1148. It is correct to say that these two important pieces of information were given a long time before any of the larger missions knew anything about either of them?—It was an accident that gave me part of that information, but the statement is correct.

1149. Does it not occur to your Lordship as a remarkable circumstance that, having important embassies at Paris and Vienna, with a considerable staff on the spot, where these events were being discussed and decided upon, the Foreign Office should not obtain from those embassies any information about these events; I am asking your Lordship that question upon the statement that these authentic pieces of information were obtained from the smaller missions long before the larger missions knew anything about either of them; and I am putting it to your Lordship whether, under those circumstances, it would not seem remarkable that with our ambassadors at Paris and Vienna, and a large staff at the embassies, bassies, we were not able to get from those embassies information considered important in reference to those affairs?—I do not think it was remarkable, because you often find that there is great discretion at one court, and accidentally very little at another; that is why you obtain information from one that you do not from another.

1150. Would it not appear to your Lordship that when two important embassies of that character are kept up at such a large expense, the Foreign Office might naturally expect that information of this important character should be obtained through their instrumentality?—I think it only proves that the officials at those larger states were more discreet than others; they did their duty better to their Governments in keeping such information secret.

1151. May I ask how long it was that this information was obtained before the larger missions knew anything about it?—I cannot answer exactly, because I do not recollect.

1152. In reference to Austria, must we understand from your Lordship's evidence on the last occasion, in answer to Question 727, that the information at the Foreign Office obtained from Hanover was that the Austrians had "broken through everything, and crossed the Ticino," or "that they had determined to cross the Ticino"?—That they had determined to cross the Ticino; they had not yet moved.

1153. Your Lordship says in that answer, "It was when we thought that we had prevented the Italian war; the French Emperor had induced Cavour to disarm, and we thought that it was all going to be settled amicably." With regard to the Congress, I think that I am correct in stating that Cavour never did commence disarming at all; there was no disarming on the part of Italy?—It was not done, but it was agreed upon on condition that they should all disarm.

1154. May I ask your Lordship what was the advantage of this information, or in what way did it affect the action of Lord Derby's Government in controlling the current of events?—Lord Derby's Government was unfortunately unable to control the current of events; that was not the result of that information, nor would it have been the result of any information at all; the three powers were desirous of going to war, and they did go to war, and we could not prevent it.

1155. I am quite aware that Lord Derby's Government exerted themselves very much to prevent their going to war; but I want to get at this, how this important piece of information that the Austrians intended to go to war affected the course of Lord Derby's Government?—It enabled us immediately to press still more upon the Austrians to have a Congress, and settle the question in that way.

1156. You did press their doing so previously to that information?—And of course, much more, when we were given to understand that they had determined to go to war.

1157. You recollect that the Austrian troops crossed the Ticino on the 25th of April 1859. Perhaps I may call to your Lordship's recollection that on the 18th of April 1859 Lord Derby stated, in the House of Lords, that it was uncertain whether the Congress would meet or not, and that he looked upon the course taken by the different hostile Governments as trifling; but I quite understand your Lordship to say that practically the line of policy of Lord Derby's Government was in no way altered by the information obtained in reference to the probability of the Austrians going to war?—We still maintained the same wish and exertions to prevent war if possible.

1158. I think that I may recall to your attention that at that time it was the common belief in Europe for weeks before the Austrians going to war, that the Austrians would go to war; it was the common expectation and belief in Europe that peace would be broken, was it not?—I do not know.

1159. May I refer to the other important piece of information in reference to Savoy, which your Lordship said was obtained from Switzerland; did not the intelligence come, on the 1st of May 1859, from Admiral Harris?—It came from him; I do not remember the date.

1160. Can your Lordship state whether it was not the fact that in the course of that month, or about the time of this information coming, there was a general rumour in the principal capitals of Europe that the intention of the Emperor was to annex Savoy?—No, I am not aware of that.

1161. I think I may ask your Lordship whether the effect of that information coming to you from Switzerland was not to induce your Lordship to instruct Lord Cowley to ask Count Walewski whether the rumour, that there was a treaty between Sardinia and France, was correct?—I cannot charge my memory exactly with what passed, but of course I transmitted the information immediately to Lord Cowley.

1162. I have referred to the despatch and I see that Count Walewski denied the existence of such a treaty; and subsequently, when Lord Russell succeeded your Lordship, the matter was again brought before the French Government and they again denied it?—Yes, very likely.

1163. The circumstance of this important piece of information being received in reference to Savoy occurred nine months, I believe, before the actual event; the event occurred in February 1860?—It occurred long before the event.

1164. I think I may ask you this very generally, whether your Lordship, from recollection, is not aware that for several months prior to the annexation of Savoy there was a general European belief of the intentions of the Emperor, and that that belief was not shared in by Her Majesty's Government until, in fact, the annexation had actually taken place?—There may have been that impression in Europe, but the first authentic information, information worth relying upon, was given in the way that I have said of the intention of the Emperor, under certain circumstances, to annex Savoy.

1165. But the Emperor denied that, and the Government accepted his denial?—You must accept what you hear. With respect to what are called small missions, I should not like to be supposed to agree with your definition of small missions, if you include in them Brussels and the Hague and Sweden and Denmark. I think that they are very important missions, and can hardly be called, in that sense, small.

1166. You would exclude them from the smaller missions as compared with Wurtemburg, Stuttgardt and the smaller German missions?—Yes.

1167. I must now trouble your Lordship in reference to another matter; your Lordship, in reply to Mr. Arthur Russell, stated that if one war (that is any war in Europe) were prevented in a generation, this country would have an ample return for the money expended in the diplomatic service; I may fairly ask whether the converse is not correct, namely, that if the errors of diplomacy produced war, the great expenditure arising therefrom may very fairly be set against the beneficial action of diplomacy?—I am not aware that diplomacy can be accused of creating a war; it may be accused of omission in not preventing a war which might have been prevented if the diplomacy had been properly conducted; but I should think one can hardly say that diplomacy has ever been the cause of a war.

1168. Except in the sense of failing to take the measures to prevent a war?—It may have been from error, or perhaps, as in the case you mentioned this morning, when it could not be helped.

1169. Mr. Hammond has laid before the Committee a list of the principal political events in Europe, and I should like to ask your Lordship whether in reference to the three principal wars in which this country has been engaged of late years, namely, with Russia, China, and Abyssinia, your Lordship is not of opinion that considerable diplomatic blunders have been made in connection with those transactions; I will take Russia first, and ask whether your Lordship is not of opinion that the Russian War might have been prevented if the diplomatic action of this country had been different from the actual course taken?—No, I am not prepared to say that.

1170. I think your Lordship is of opinion that the Russian Government, in consequence of the course taken by our diplomatic agency, were misled diplomatically as to the intentions of Great Britain in relation to Turkey?—I am not aware of the fact.

1171. I mean to ask your Lordship whether you do not think that if a different line had been taken by our diplomatic representatives in the first instance, and they had intimated to the Russian Government that any action in relation to Turkey would lead to war, that line of policy would have prevented the Russian War?—I think that perhaps if Sir Hugh Rose's view of the case had been followed up, when he wished us to send a fleet to the Dardanelles, it might have had that effect.

1172. I think that your Lordship, in reference to China, was of opinion that if Mr. Bruce had not acted in a precipitate manner that war might have been prevented?—I should not like to give any opinion upon facts of history which are long gone by, and the details of which are not fresh in my memory.

1173. Your Lordship said in the House of Lords, "In my opinion Mr. Bruce's fault, and his only one, was his not waiting for the reply to the despatch of the Commissioners who had forwarded his ultimatum to Pekin. I think he exhibited too much precipitancy;" and your Lordship implied that a more considerate course might have prevented the war in China?—No doubt I said that at the time.

1174. The other war was with Abyssinia, and I think I may ask your Lordship whether it is not the fact that the presence of a diplomatic agent and consul, namely Mr. Cameron, at Massowa, was the proximate cause of the Abyssinian War?—I can give no opinion on that.

1175. I think I am right in assuming that during your Lordship's administration, the policy of non-intervention in affairs in Europe was more observed than had been the case in previous Governments?—I thought that, no doubt, the best policy for England to pursue as a great principle.

1176. And in the case of very important events, namely, the wars between Italy and Austria, and Austria and Prussia, and the Luxembourg difficulty, I think the course pursued by Lord Derby's Government was that of non-intervention?—Yes.

1177. With regard to Denmark, I may just ask you whether, in connection with that Schleswig-Holstein question, there was not a considerable amount of diplomatic interference calculated to embroil this country in Europe; I mean diplomatic interference in connection with Denmark and Germany at Copenhagen, at the early part of the events before the war broke out, when certain promises of support were given to Denmark as against Germany?—I was not in office then, and I cannot answer that.

1178. Your Lordship is not prepared to adopt the opinion that that diplomatic policy was a "meddling and muddling" policy?—I give no opinion as to that.

1179. I will now, if you please, ask your Lordship a question in relation to the position of the Parliamentary Under Secretary of State; I wish to ask you whether, in your judgment, it would not be desirable for the Parliamentary Under Secretary of State to have a position in the Foreign Office of a more important character in connection with the Permanent Under Secretary than he has at present; I find that in the arrangement of the business of the Foreign Office, the most important missions in Europe are under the regulation of the Permanent Under Secretary, not under the direction of the Parliamentary Under Secretary; is not that the fact?—When I was there, the whole was under the direction of the Secretary of State—all the foreign appointments.

1180. And then with regard to the distribution of European business, a certain class of the business connected with our missions abroad was under the direction of the Permanent Under Secretary, and a certain portion under the direction of the Parliamentary Under Secretary; was it not?—I can only say that when I was Foreign Secretary nobody was promoted, and no move ever took place, without my knowing it and approving of it.

1181. With regard to the nomination of attachés, your Lordship expressed an opinion against open competition; but would you not be prepared to alter the present system, so far as to give a larger amount of competition than at present exists; might there not be a certain amount of competition brought to bear in connection with the nomination of attachés?—I do not think that a large competition would be desirable.

1182. What would your Lordship think of this plan, that the Civil Service Commissioners should once every year hold an examination open to all British subjects who are desirous of entering the diplomatic service; that the Civil Service Commissioners should then certify to the Foreign Secretary the names of the 12 candidates who had distinguished themselves most highly in such examination, and that from these 12 the Foreign Secretary should select persons to be appointed to o attachéships during the next 12 months?—I do not think that that would answer; I think that the diplomatic service is a very peculiar one, and, as I have said before, the persons who enter it ought to be chosen from a particular class, men of a certain kind of education, and who have been accustomed to go into society, and also who have got a certain fortune.

1183. But with respect to the fortune, your Lordship would not regard that so much if the unpaid service were done away with and attachés were paid in future?—I am afraid that they would never be paid enough to live comfortably if they had nothing of their own.

1184. Would you consider that the nomination by the universities of a certain number of eligible candidates for the service might be a proper means of introducing persons as attachés?—I do not think so; because the university might very likely recommend a man who was a very clever man in his way, but a mere bookworm, who would not be suited to the diplomatic line; but I think that a degree at the university should always be a recommendation.

1185. I see that your Lordship, in reply to Question 718, said that even if the heads of missions were strangers, it would never do to have perfect strangers appointed to the lower posts; but if secretaries of legation had been for some time at the missions, would it not be perfectly practicable to appoint strangers over their heads without any disadvantage to the public service?—And that has often been done.

1186. Does your Lordship see any reason why that should not be the case, having regard simply to the public interest, and not to the personal feelings of the individuals?—I think myself that the service can be perfectly well performed and the country perfectly well served at the permanent missions from the body of men who are looked upon as professional men in the service without going out of the service for others. At the same time there may be circumstances which would render it desirable that a particular person should be sent to a particular place, although he is not in the profession. But there is another objection to the system (if it is that which you allude to), of changing the minister or ambassador with the change of Government at home, and it is this, that it would increase the expense very much in the way of outfits. You must have an outfit every time you change a minister, and an expensive outfit; if you change an ambassador in Vienna, Paris, Russia or Constantinople there is a very large sum always alowed for outfit.

1187. That, of course, would, as a matter of economy, entirely depend upon the amount of salaries paid to the minister or ambassador, and also upon the proportion which the outfit was arranged to bear to the salary?—I assume that they are now paid no more than they ought to be paid with the obligation which they have of representing this country honourably.

1188. But does not your Lordship think that if public men of mark, and of political position, were appointed as heads of missions, they might probably be in a position to exercise greater influence abroad than men simply connected with the diplomatic profession?—There might possibly be circumstances in which such might be the case. Under certain circumstances, when such a man as the late Duke of Wellington were sent he might have an influence which an individual less great would not possess; but if you speak generally of the principle of conducting the diplomatic service, and are supposing that it would be better served by introducing strangers in that manner with a change of Government, or at any other time, I think you assume that there are not to be found men now in the service who are fitted to fill those posts; and my decided opinion is that in the service you will always find men perfectly fit to fill those posts without going outside.

1189. Yet your Lordship is quite aware that during the last few years several occasions have occurred on which special missions have been appointed, and men of influence have been sent over from here to undertake important negotiations over the heads of the ministers abroad?—But that was only a temporary superiority. It may be of advantage to send a special man for a special purpose, but that is only a temporary business.

1190. Mr. William Lowther.] With regard to special missions, are there very often special missions for such purposes as giving the Garter, and so forth?—Yes.

1191. It would never do to take a minister from his post, and send him on a special mission in such a case?—No, certainly not; they are complimentary missions.

1192. I daresay you know cases of outsiders being taken and made heads of missions; without specifying them exactly, do you think that on the whole they have been successful as heads of missions?—No, I do not think so; my experience is against it.

1193. You say, in answer to Question 703, "I think that the chief cause of the block is the fact that the Secretaries of State have appointed too many attachés, and filled up the service too rapidly. I think it might be relieved now in this way: I have no doubt that there are some of the attachés who would be glad to accept consular missions rather than wait many years for a diplomatic one, and some of those might be named as soon as consular posts were open; and, at the same time, the block might be relieved by checking the creation of new attachés, in fact, acting as you would in the army or navy;" now, on referring to the Foreign Office list, I find one ambassador who has never been attaché, ten ministers who have never been attachés, six ministers who have never been paid attachés, six ministers who have not been secretaries of legation; do not you think that the block is very much caused by putting in people who have nothing whatever to do with the profession?—It would certainly cause a block if you put a stranger over the head of all the attachés.

1194. Because, now, I think an attaché is compelled to go through an examination?—Yes.

1195. He is obliged also to have a certain amount of fortune?—He ought to have it.

1196. It is necessary, I mean, that he should have a certain amount of fortune?—Yes.

1197. He invests his talents and his money for a certain number of years in that profession?—Yes.

1198. And when he comes to be very near one of the great prizes to which he has been looking for the last 20 or 30 years, he suddenly sees it taken away from him by the introduction of a perfect stranger?—I disapprove of that.

1199. With regard to foreign ministers entertaining people abroad, I think there are very often often applications to the Foreign Office for letters of introduction, well known under the name of "soup tickets"?—Yes.

Right Hon. the Earl of Malmesbury.

1200. Those are given to Members of Parliament and to friends of Members of Parliament, and when taken to ministers living abroad they are presented and honoured in the shape of a dinner; do you know that to be a fact?—Sometimes they are.

1201. Generally?—I do not know that; sometimes they are.

1202. A gentleman when he enters the Foreign Office as a clerk receives a salary at once?—Yes.

1203. An attaché only receives it after four years?—Yes.

1204. Why should not an attaché be paid at once on entering the diplomatic service?—I see no reason at all why he should not, if he does his work like the others.

1205. I think your idea is that the responsibility of heads of missions is diminished now when compared with what it was, we will say, 30 years ago?—In consequence of the telegraph.

1206. But do not you think that the work has considerably increased?—It does not diminish a minister's work at all, it rather increases it.

1207. And while increasing his work does it not increase his responsibility?—That does not follow.

1208. I suppose that there are very often negociations going on, and escapes from wars and bad feeling, between Governments, that the public in England knows nothing of at all?—No doubt, many.

1209. And it is not advisable that they should know about them?—It is better that they should not.

1210. Where are consuls generally taken from?—I think from the middle class very much, and men who have some acquaintance with mercantile matters and other business.

1212. I think the deduction from the minister's pay begins the moment that he leaves his post to come on leave?—From the very day.

1213. And do you not think that that is right?—No; I think that it is extremely unfair upon him, and, as I have said before, a very clumsy way of paying the chargé d'affaires.

1214. When do you think the deduction ought to begin?—Not till his full leave is passed, and the time has come when he ought to be at his post again.

1215. You would not deduct any pay at all from him?—I would not; it is the only service in which such a thing is thought of.

1216. Now, secretaries coming on leave have nothing deducted from their pay?—No.

1217. With regard to the smaller missions in Germany, you would be in favour of retaining them?—Those that are now in existence.

1218. Are you aware that very often information can be obtained more easily from those small courts of what is going on in the large courts than can be obtained at the large courts themselves?—No doubt; there is less discretion.

1219. And in regard to Coburg, there are a great many of the so-called German ideas which come from there?—Yes.

1220. Supposing that there were no mission at Dresden (there is now, I believe, a chargé d'affaires), who could attend to the claims of the British subjects in Dresden, of whom there is a large number?—I do not know whether there is a consul there or not; there ought to be somebody, certainly; it is quite an English colony.

1221. With regard to leave of heads of missions, you are in favour of their coming continually to England?—Yes; and that is the opinion of the last Committee that sat upon this subject.

1222. Mr. Otway.] You have been asked many questions about the admissions to the diplomatic service, and also to the Foreign Office; is it not a fact that by the necessary management of diplomatic and Foreign Office business, young men are in possession, constantly, of very important information?—Certainly.

1223. As far as your experience goes, that confidence has never been betrayed, or at least I will put it that the confidence reposed in these young men is well deserved?—I will say more than that; I never knew a case when I was in the Foreign Office of anyone betraying the confidence of the office.

1224. Could you feel that confidence that your experience of the office has given you if the young men appointed to that office came into it on competition of any sort, and you had not the means of knowing their antecedents and their general character?—I should, personally, certainly not have the same confidence in men of that description as in the class that now enter it.

1225. Is it not conducive to the advantage of the public service, that the Secretary of State presiding over such an office, and over diplomacy generally, should feel that the young men employed in transmitting information of so confidential a character are thoroughly trustworthy; is it not almost essential?—Certainly.

1226. You have been asked some questions as to information of an important character, which you stated to have been given while you were Secretary of State; I presume that it is important at all times to get the earliest information of any political event?—No doubt.

1227. And on this occasion you did get information from Hanover of a very important circumstance, which afterwards turned out to be correct?—Yes.

1228. And therefore that information had the value, at the least, of being early intimation of an important event?—Yes.

1229. Your Lordship has been asked some questions with regard to the expense of young men living abroad, and Mr. Lowther asked you just now whether you did not think it desirable that an attaché, on entering the service, should be placed upon the same footing as a clerk in the Foreign Office; do you consider that the pay of 100 l. a year, which is the pay of a clerk in the Foreign Office, would be of any real importance to a young man living in St. Petersburg, Vienna, Paris, or Washington, as an attaché, and that he could live in any way on that pay?—He could not live upon it; but I have a great objection to public servants acting as volunteers, and that 100 l. would always be an object to a man if he had only 400 l. a year; it is a retainer, in fact; he is thoroughly then enlisted in the service of his country; and I think it is an objectionable plan, and nothing can be pleaded for it except economy, for this country to accept the services of those men gratis.

1230. Your Lordship is opposed to unpaid service, vice, like many others; but is it not a fact that an attaché may be paid, and has been paid, by more advantageous arrangements, which have been made with regard to his pension; no doubt your Lordship is aware of the regulation by which now an attaché gets his pension very much earlier than he would have obtained it under the former regulations?—I have heard so.

1231. I will ask you a question in consequence of one put by Mr. Rylands, which seemed to me to point to an impression on his part gathered from some remark at some time made by your Lordship, that Mr. Bruce had been the cause of the China War; and he deduced from that, as I understood him, the fact that the existence of diplomatists in China had caused the war; but I presume that the war would have been caused whether Mr. Bruce had been there or not; your Lordship never meant to say that the fact of a diplomatic agent being at Pekin was the cause of the war?—No; if I recollect rightly, the cause was an outrage committed upon a British ship.

1232. I wish to ask if your Lordship's attention has been directed of late years to the anomalous state of our representation in Rome?—My attention always was directed to that.

1233. Is your Lordship of opinion that it is satisfactory that a country like this, looking to the numerous Roman Catholic subjects of the Queen, should be represented in what I may call a surreptitious manner?—I have always regretted that what is called the Eglinton Clause was passed in the House of Lords.

1234. Chairman.] Do you think it would be for the public interest that that clause should be repealed?—I think that it would be an advantage to this country if the Pope were represented here, and, vice versâ, we at Rome.

1235. Mr. Otway.] I do not know whether it would be a fair question to ask you, but I should like to ask whether you do not think that so great a change has taken place in public opinion of late years in these matters, that the feeling manifested on that occasion in regard to the Eglinton Clause would no longer be shown on the subject?—I could not answer as to that; but my own opinion is that we ought to have a representative at Rome, and the Pope one here.

1236. You have stated that you think that there should be no deduction from a minister's pay on his coming on his regular leave of two months; but does it not appear to you that from some missions it is absolutely necessary, as a matter of justice, that a mnister should have the power to come for more than two months, at least to run their two years' leave into one; I will refer to South America, for instance, where the whole time of the leave would be taken up in the voyage?—No doubt.

1237. Your Lordship's opinion is that it is necessary, in justice, that some alteration should be made with regard to the leave of ministers, that they should be allowed to take four months, two years' leave, at one time?—Yes; cumulative leave of absence.

1238. Chairman.] With regard to the applications for admission into the Foreign Office, as compared with the applications for attachéships, do you find much greater pressure to get into the Foreign Office than to get into the diplomatic service, or vice versâ?—There are more applications for the attachéships, because there is no limit as to them. There are no applications for the other; there may be prospective applications, but it is not often that there is a vacancy.

1239. But as I understand, there is a considerable pressure, even with the disadvantages of the service in a pecuniary sense, to get into the diplomatic service?—Certainly.

1240. Did you hear Sir Henry Elliot's suggestion about having a strict examination upon entering into the position of a second secretary of legation, as a mode, to a certain extent, of relieving the block in the service?—Yes, I did. I think it is a good one.

1241. Do you think that that would work satisfactorily?—I think it would.

1242. Mr. Cameron.] With regard to Mr. Bruce's conduct in China, I wish to ask your Lordship whether it was not perfectly well known, not only by the Foreign Office, but by everyone who had taken an interest in public affairs in the East, and by those who had followed the course of our policy in China, that at the time of the rupture and the affair of the Peiho, the war party in Pekin were in the ascendant; that they had determined not to carry out the provisions of the treaty, but to resist the execution of it to the utmost; and was not that the cause of the rupture?—As far as I recollect; but the circumstances have not been brought to my attention lately.

1243. It was perefctly well known that war was inevitable, whatever the conduct of Mr. Bruce might have been, whether he acted with precipitancy or not?—That is my impression, and he was not the original cause of the war.

1244. I believe you have stated that you do not approve of doing away with the missions in Denmark and Sweden?—Certainly I do not.

1245. Although of course we all hope that such a thing may never happen, it is still a possibility that some day or other we may be engaged in a war with Russia?—It certainly would be against our interests not to be represented at both those courts. It has happened within the last century three or four times, that Sweden and Denmark have been on opposite sides, and each requires a separate minister.

1246. And if we were to go to war with Russia, and we had no representative in Denmark and Sweden, while the Russian Government had representatives there, I suppose there is no doubt that our position as a naval Power in the Baltic would suffer?—It is of the utmost importance that we should be well represented in those countries.

The Right Honourable Sir Henry George Elliot, G.C.B., called in; and further Examined.

1247. Mr. Sclater-Booth.] You stated in you examination the other day, that you considered it possible that some reduction might be made in the consular establishments of the Levant?—Yes, I think there are a few reductions that might be made; not very many, but there are a few.

1248. It is probable that you may not be here when the Committee enters upon that part of its investigation, and I should therefore like to know whether you have matured your opinions upon that subject and laid them before the Foreign Office?—Yes, the Foreign Office are in possession of all my opinions with regard to the reductions ductions that might be made in the Eastern consulates.

Right Hon. Sir H. G. Elliot, G.C.B.

1249. Mr. Eastwick.] In your answers to Questions 831 and 832, you have stated that before examinations were instituted a great number of gentlemen became attachés who had no intention of following up the profession; those were men of property, I suppose?—Everybody at that time was necessarily possessed of very considerable means who entered the service, because they remained a very long time unpaid, and were not paid at the end of four years then as they are now.

1250. Would you not say that there are now very few men of property in the diplomatic service?—It is difficult to say exactly what you call a man of property, but they are all possessed of private means, and must be so necessarily.

1251. Probably you would say less so now than at that time?—At present an unpaid attaché may be sent to St. Petersburg or to Buenos Ayres, for instance, and in both those places we are told a young man cannot live under 700*l.* or 800*l.* a year. If he is not a paid attaché, and goes and lives there, I presume that he must have some means of his own.

1252. At the same time if they were men of property, there would not be the same difficulty about it of course?—The difference rather is in regard to men of expectations, elder sons, people who were heirs to property, who went into the profession before, and after being employed in an honourable profession for a certain number of year, then retired.

1253. You would say that now there are fewer of that class?—Certainly.

1254. Does the present system ensure any other qualification for the service than that of social position?—The examination ensures your having a person who has received a proper education.

1255. But nothing beyond that?—Nothing beyond that.

1256. You have stated in answer to question 1003 that if the diplomatic service were thrown open to competition, you would not feel yourself justified in introducing those who would then enter it into society abroad if you had other acquaintance with them; would you feel the same objection if the competition were restricted to the universities?—I should feel it in a less degree, but I should still feel it.

1257. Chairman.] You were at the university yourself, I believe?—I was at the university myself, but I did not take a degree.

1258. How long were you residing there?—I think about a year and a half.

1259. Mr. Eastwick.] Is not a commission in a distinguished regiment a passport to good society, and if so, will you explain why a commission in the diplomatic service given to graduates in honours at the universities should not also be a passport to such society?—I am not aware that the fact of a man having a commission in the army gives him an entry to society in the same degree as in the diplomatic service.

1260. Is it not the fact that the captain or major of a regiment has a passport to good society in his position?—It may possibly be so, but I am not aware of it.

1261. In answer to Question 841, you said that you would shelve a man who could not pass a strict examination imposed on him without warning, after he had been eight or ten years in the service; would not that be rather unfair, and would it not be wholly unnecessary to have a second examination if appointments were given to graduates in honours who on entering the service could show proficiency in history, international law, and modern languages?—My object was to endeavour to afford an inducement to the men to work at their own profession. By giving your appointments to men who had graduated in honours, you would secure distinguished young men, but a subsequent examination would show whether a man had worked at the profession, and made himself master of the line he had adopted; and I think that it would have the advantage of enabling you to know the men, and to bring them forward more by selection hereafter, than by the strict seniority system.

1262. But would you not have a sort of guarantee when a man had taken honours at the university, and had passed a distinguished examination on entering the service, that he would be the sort of man who would continue to apply himself to public questions?—I think that generally speaking you might assume that he would be more likely to work seriously than a man who had not taken that trouble with himself in the first instance.

1263. And would it not be rather an advantage to dispense with the second examination in that case, because in the first place, it would surely be rather unfair to put a man again to the test of an examination; I suppose you do not propose to drive him from the profession altogether after seven or eight years' service, but even to retard his natural advancement, would be rather a hard measure, would it not?—A man may take the highest possible honours, and may still not have learnt a word of a foreign language.

1264. But I am supposing that, in the entrance examination, he was tested in that knowledge?—But supposing that at the entrance examination, you required a knowledge of French, you would not probably require much more than that.

1265. French and German I am supposing?—If I found that a man had lived a number of years in Italy, and had not thought it worth while to learn the language, I should not think it any hardship if he were passed over by some one who had taken that trouble.

1266. But would it be at all probable that a man who had passed such an examination, as I am supposing, would not master the language?—No; I do not hold to a severe second examination for a man who really has distinguished himself before he came into the service, but I think it much more essential that the general severe examination should take place at a later period than at the first entry.

1267. If the selection were made by the authorities at the universities from men who had taken honours, might not nominees, with every qualification for the service be secured, because the heads of colleges would be able to judge of their character, and whether they were qualified?—I do not think that it would be easy for the heads of colleges to judge of the qualifications that are required for the diplomatic service.

1268. They would know in the first place whether a man had property or not, and in the second place whether he was a man of ability?—They might know his general ability, and no doubt they would.

1269. Can you explain the reasons of the failure of the scheme for Oriental attachés at Constantinople?—I cannot explain it properly;

t is a good many years ago, namely 25, since it vas tried; student attachés they were called.

1270. You are aware that Mr. Hammond stated that it was a scheme which he looked upon as very advantageous, and promising very well?—It was a scheme which Mr. Hammond was very anxious about indeed, but I suppose it was found practically by the ambassador, at the time, more convenient to himself to employ other people than these people that were sent out to him.

1271. Do you see any objection, except on the score of expense, to a table being provided for the staff of a mission by Government, as, for instance, at Tehran?—I doubt whether it would be found convenient: I should rather pay the men sufficiently to enable them to provide their own table. You have one man who likes to dine out a great deal, and one man who likes to dine at home, and I think it would be practically difficult to provide them with a table; I should rather pay them sufficiently to enable them to provide for themselves.

1272. Would it not be more economical to have a general table than to give a separate allowance; I am speaking now of such expensive places as Buenos Ayres for instance?—You would have to make constantly changing arrangements; first of all you may, at one moment, have three or four bachelors in your legation; then three months later you may have a married man; then, after a little time, you may have nothing but married men; and I think that the arrangement would be found difficult.

1273. If a table were so provided, and an allowance of 100 l. a year, with 50 l. additional each year up to 250 l., were given to attachés, would a property qualification still be requisite?—I do not think that would be sufficient pay in many of the more expensive places.

1274. At all events it would be a great assistance?—No doubt it would be an assistance.

1275. In case of diplomatic officers being thrown out of employment by the suspension of relations with a government or by the suppression of a mission, would it not be fair to make some allowance to such officers until they could be re-employed?—There is a regulation under which that can be done; a regulation made after the last Committee of the House of Commons. If relations are suspended, the Secretary of State has authority to make an allowance to such diplomatic servants as may not be qualified for their pension until they are re-appointed.

1276. Has any alteration been made in consular jurisdiction in Turkey since 1861; and are you aware that any alterations have been suggested?—I am not aware of there having been any alterations since that time. There are alterations suggested at this moment with regard to Egypt which are at present before the Foreign Office.

1277. Solely with regard to Egypt?—Solely with regard to Egypt.

1278. There has been a commission to inquire into the subject?—In Egypt there has.

1279. Were you consulted at all with reference to that?—I saw all the correspondence on it, and could express any opinion that I had on the subject; but, generally, it was a matter which was conducted by direct correspondence between our consul general in Egypt and the Foreign Office.

1280. You have said that the proportion of commercial despatches to political, at the embassy at Constantinople is about one-sixth?—About that.

1281. Can you state what is the proportion of letters sent by consuls on commercial matters to letters sent by them on political matters?—Speaking off-hand, I could not give anything like a notion of the number; they would vary, not only from place to place, but even from year to year.

1282. But, on the whole, have you the impression that you receive a great number of political subjects from consuls?—The term "political subjects" includes their reports, I suppose, on the political state of the country. We are kept acquainted with the state of the country by the consuls throughout all the Turkish empire, and those I should call political reports, even though they might to a certain extent involve commercial questions also. It is almost impossible to draw the line between commercial and political questions. Now there is a question that we have to deal with at Constantinople which is very distinctly a commercial one, in which the political element comes in very largely; I mean the navigation of the Dardanelles. The passage of the Dardanelles by merchant ships at night has been lately the subject of a great deal of talk. We pressed on the Turkish Government to facilitate the passage upon commercial grounds, and they objected on political grounds. Does that correspondence come under the political or under the commercial department? And we have many such cases. The quarantine question is an illustration of the same thing. It gives us a great deal of trouble and a great deal of correspondence; but it is doubtful whether it should be classed as a political or as a commercial one.

1283. Do you see any objection to consuls sending their letters on commercial matters direct to the Board of Trade, and furnishing only a monthly précis of their correspondence to the Embassy, except in the case of very urgent and important matters, and would not that system effect a saving of time and expense?—I do not know with regard to expense, but with regard to time, in most cases I believe that it would be a loss of time. A great number of commercial questions have to be settled between the minister of the country in which the consul resides and the Government. When the consuls write to the Foreign Office, they send a copy of their letters to the minister, and he can immediately enter into communication with the local government upon that matter, and very likely arrange it without any instruction at all from the Foreign Office. I think that we must have one master, and that we could not correspond so well with two.

1284. Do you see any objection to separating mere shipping consuls from those who have political or judicial functions, and placing the former directly under the Board of Trade?—I see the same difficulty that I have pointed to with regard to the questions that arise, namely, that it would be difficult to say which are purely commercial and which are partly political; in the East, most of the consuls are more or less political.

1285. In Europe there are many places where they are simply commercial?—Yes; the large majority of cases in Europe are such.

1286. And would it not be quite as advantageous to place those under the Board of Trade?—I think it would lead possibly to confusion, but certainly to loss of time.

Right Hon. Sir H. G. Elliot, G C.B. — — 28 March 1870.

1287. You think that there would be references made to the Foreign Office?—I think that on all matters which required a reference to the minister you would have lost a good deal of time by going to the Board of Trade; they would then refer to the Foreign Office, and the Foreign Office to the minister.

1288. Could you give any idea of the proportion of correspondence at the embassy at Constantinople on Persian matters?—No, I cannot; Persian despatches pass through our hands; they are sent under a flying seal.

1289. I am speaking rather of your correspondence with Tehran, and references as to disturbances on the frontier, or other matters?—Sometimes I have not had occasion to write to Tehran once in eight or ten months, and then in the course of two or three months I may have had frequent communications to make.

1290. I suppose since the boundary has been settled there has been less correspondence?—There has been less correspondence since that time, but it is a boundary that will never be very positively settled.

1291. Would you consider service at Constantinople good training for service at Tehran, and vice versâ?—I have no knowledge of the service at Tehran, but I should imagine that there was a very decided similarity in Eastern Governments, and that it must be a good training.

1292. There is not a very good feeling between the Turks and the Persians?—No.

1293. Mr. Richard Shaw.] In your evidence the other day you suggested, as a remedy for the block in the diplomatic department, the transfer of attachés to consulates; do you throw out that suggestion as a permanent, or only a temporary arrangement?—I suggested, in order to get rid of the present block, that diplomatic servants should be invited to volunteer for consulates; I would not force them to go to them, but in order to give greater power of selection, I suggested that for the future the young men entering the diplomatic service should be told that till they rose to a certain rank (which I think should be that of secretary of legation) they were all liable to be drafted into the consular service, if the Secretary of State thought that they were better fitted for that than for the diplomatic service.

1294. That would be a permanent arrangement?—Permanent for men not at present in the service.

1295. Suppose your suggestion carried out, what guarantee have we that in the course of a few years we should not have another block in the service?—I have proposed, and insisted very strongly on the opinion that I hold on the subject, that the staffs should be kept in the lowest possible state compatible with efficiency; I think that that is the only security which you can have against a block, and even that would probably not be sufficient to ensure a fairly rapid promotion.

1296. Then you are of opinion, I presume, that it would be better not to make any additional appointments at the present moment?—I express no opinion with regard to the additional appointments to be made. As I have said, that must be regulated by the reports which the Secretary of State receives from the different missions as to their special requirements.

1297. But unless the nominations are regulated in the future we might have a repetition of this block at no distant date?—It is possible that the demand for junior members may be so great that there may be a chronic state of block; I cannot express an opinion on that point.

1298. With reference to the non-payment of attachés, I think you said the other day that you had heard repeated complaints of their having to work gratuitously; did they not know the terms when they accepted their nominations?—Yes, and I do not think that the complaints were so much of having to serve gratuitously as of the finding that the period during which they had so to serve was very much longer than they had expected. That was remedied to a certain extent by the recommendations of the last Committee by which they were paid after four years' service.

1299. Is the training of attachés essentially political?—The training of the attachés is so far essentially political, that all their work is connected with political matters.

1300. After what length of service would you allow an attaché to send in his claim to the Foreign Office for transfer to the consular department?—In the case of all those at present serving, I should be disposed to listen to their applications for transfer into the consular department.

1301. Then you would have no limit at all?—No limit.

1302. Merely subject to the fitness of the party?—Subject to the fitness of the party; I should only like in the case of a man despairing of promotion, that if he asked to go into the consular service his application should be taken into consideration.

1303. In answer to question number 1001 you told us that the business of a consul is essentially of a commercial character. Would you test the attaché's knowledge of commerce before appointing him to a consulate by some examination?—I think that he might very well be made to pass the examination that consuls would have to go through if you thought it necessary; but I believe that the diplomatic examination is so much more severe than that for the consulates, that it ought to be held sufficient.

1304. It is essentially different, is it not?—Not so different, I think, as to make it at all necessary to repeat the examination; I think that examination which he has already gone through as a third secretary would be amply sufficient.

1305. Do you think that young gentlemen trained in the school of diplomacy, and mixing in the best society at foreign courts, are a suitable class of gentlemen to select for commercial consuls?—I think that many of your consuls are selected from the same class of society as the attachés, and if the attachés wish to go into that service I do not see that there is any objection to their doing so.

1306. You stated, in answer to Question 852, that you deprecated amalgamation of the two services, on the ground that it would not be advantageous to have a consul trying to bring himself into notice as a political writer; and referring to the French system, you said that you had seen that effect produced. Do you not think that if your suggestion were adopted, and a number of young diplomatists were appointed consuls, you would be most likely to bring about that objectionable state of things?—I do not think that you will ever have a sufficient number of young diplomatists appointed to consulates to be likely to create the smallest inconvenience in that respect.

1307. Have you any idea what number of transfers would relieve the diplomatic department of the existing block?—No, I have no idea of that; because it would be difficult to say exactly what you consider a block, whether you would consider that a man ought to have been promoted when he had had 15 years' service, or when he had had 12.

1308. But if the change is to be permanent, as you suggest, you might in the course of time get an immense number of these young gentlemen in the consular department, might you not?—Not unless you make a great many new entries into the diplomatic service.

1309. But there is no limit to the number of entries at present, excepting the discretion of the Secretary of State?—That ought to be a sufficient safeguard.

1310. Do you not think that it would open a very wide door at the Foreign Office to applications and appointments unless there was some limit put upon it?—I do not see why any door need be opened at all; the Secretary of State appoints to consulates now without any control, if there are vacancies. I do not see any reason for supposing that he would wish to encumber the diplomatic service with unpaid attachés; it would not increase his patronage in the smallest degree, except for the unpaid posts, which are not what people are anxious for.

1311. May I ask you why you exclude the secretaries of legation from this proposed boon of transfer to the consular department; I think you said that you would not go above attachés?—That was with regard to the forced transfer; the secretaries of legation would not look upon it as a boon if they were rendered liable to be transferred from that post to that of a consulate without their own consent being asked; I consider that when they have arrived at that point they have earned the right to remain in the service.

1312. But I think that I am right in assuming that if you were to appoint a number of secretaries to vacant consulates you would relieve the existing block in the diplomatic department equally as you would relieve it by appointing attachés?—Certainly you would leave vacancies in that case, and would have the power of promoting the junior secretaries to the places vacant.

1313. Suppose that any of the existing secretaries of legation were willing to accept a consulate, would it not be unfair to promote over their heads junior members of the service to posts carrying larger salaries than those of the secretaries?—I said that I should always like to see the wishes of the secretaries of legation attended to if they were anxious to go into the consular service.

1314. If you throw open the consulates to the attachés and secretaries of legation, would you not, in effect, be establishing that amalgamation which the other day you rather deprecated?—There would be a certain amount of amalgamation, but it would not be encouraging to the consuls to make themselves diplomatic personages in order to be brought into the diplomatic service.

1315. That is to say, you would amalgamate for the benefit of the diplomatic department, but not for the benefit of the consular department?—I do not call it amalgamation.

1316. If you throw open all the consulates to secretaries and attachés, that is virtually amalgamation, so far as they are concerned?—I do not call that amalgamation of the services. At present you do not exclusively select your consular agents from the vice-consular body, but you take them from every other class of Englishmen, and I would only say that a man who was a diplomatic servant should be as eligible as if he were an officer in the army, or navy, or militia, or anything else.

1317. Do you not think that the appointment of attachés and secretaries to consulates, would create great dissatisfaction in the consular branch of the service?—It would naturally create great dissatisfaction, if the appointments to the consulates were now confined to the vice-consuls; but a large portion of the consuls have never been vice-consuls, but were taken entirely from outsiders; and I do not see that the vice-consuls therefore would suffer by these outsiders coming from the diplomatic service, rather than from the general mass of the population.

1318. What would be the class outside, who are hoping some day to get these appointments, who would be greatly dissatisfied if you threw them open in that way?—I have no knowledge of what the class outside expect or hope, but am simply considering what would be best for the general efficiency of the two services.

1319. I will take the case of Boston as a test. The consulship at Boston appears by the returns before us to be worth 2,000 l. a year. It is now vacant. Suppose a young attaché appointed consul at Boston, do you not think it would be felt as a great grievance by every man in the consular service who was looking for promotion?—It would be so likely to be felt as a grievance, that I do not think it probable that any Secretary of State would make the appointment.

1320. And you would rely upon that?—Yes; but I think that the abuse would be quite as great if the Secretary of State were to appoint a young man of whom nothing was known, as it would be if he appointed a young attaché to the post.

1321. There are certain prizes in the consular department, as in every other department?—I should be very sorry to deprive the consuls of their prizes; I think they earn them, and deserve them.

1322. Are not our consuls, as a rule, selected from a class distinct from that which furnishes our attachés?—Yes, they are not precisely of the same class; but at the same time, there are a great many in both services that might equally well belong to the sister service.

1323. But in the higher service, it is a matter of necessity that the young gentleman shall be a gentleman of position and property, having 500 l. or 600 l. a year?—It is very unfortunate when he is not.

1324. That necessity does not exist for the appointments to the consular department?—I suppose not.

1325. If then you were to make attachéships in the future a stepping-stone to the consular department, do you not think that the former class would be greatly dissatisfied?—Do you mean the class of consuls or expectant consuls?

1326. The class outside who furnish us with our consuls. If you were to make an attachéship the stepping-stone in the future to a consulship, would that not practically be excluding the class who now furnish us with our consuls, and afford them just ground of complaint?—I cannot speak to what their feelings would be. I do not think that a man is less qualified for a consulship because he happens to have 200 l. or 300 l. a year of his own; the services are not now recruited entirely from different classes, for in the diplomatic service there are many men of certainly no aristocratic connection, and who might have belonged to the consular or any other service.

Right Hon. Sir H. G. Elliot, G.C.B.

1327. Passing to another subject, I see from the Votes of last year that the number of persons engaged in our consular department in Turkey is 42; that the money voted for salaries and office expenses was 25,965 l. Do I rightly understand from the reply that you gave to an honourable Member a short time ago, that you had furnished the Foreign Office with some suggestions for effecting a diminution in this large staff? —The Foreign Office asked me some time ago whether there were reductions that I thought could be made in the consular service of the East. I went over the matter, and I then stated what I thought could be done, but I am afraid that the reductions cannot be very considerable.

1328.—Since the cession of the Ionian Islands, has not the number of British subjects residing in and trading with Turkey very much diminished? —The number of British subjects residing in Turkey has very much diminished. British trade, on the other hand, is increasing very largely.

1329. Has any reduction in the consular staff taken place since the cession of the Islands?—Not since the cession of the Islands, that I am aware of. I have already recommended, in consequence of the diminution of business at the Embassy, that there should be a very considerable reduction in our staff.

1330. But I am speaking of the consular department only?—I think, as far as my knowledge of the consular department goes, that it is very thoroughly employed.

1331. Have you ever considered the proposal to collect our consular fees by stamps?—No.

1332. Does any objection occur to your mind to the introduction of that system; you probably know the system that we have in all public departments in England?—No; I do not know the system at all.

1333. Referring to our consular establishments in Asiatic Turkey, I find that there are 19 officers with salaries amounting to 8,160 l., and, including allowances, to 10,190 l. a year; are these political or commercial consuls?—They are both political and commercial. All our consuls have more or less a political character in the East, especially if you call the protection of the interests and of the persons of British subjects a political matter.

1334. May I ask you what is the nature of the interests that render it necessary to maintain this large staff at so great a cost; what are the political interests of this country in the matter?—Our consuls have a judicial character in the East. Our own people by the treaties must be judged and imprisoned, if necessary, by British officers, and we cannot well say to the Turks that they are not to interfere with Englishmen, but must leave them to the English authorities unless we keep sufficient number of authorities to deal with them as the occasion may arise.

1335. But the number of British subjects in Asiatic Turkey is extremely limited?—Of the "stationary" British subjects it is.

1336. And is not the whole trade of Asiatic Turkey carried on by other than British subjects, chiefly by Greeks?—There are a great many British mercantile houses that have their agents and interests in Asiatic Turkey.

1337. I find from a Return laid before the House, that the total population of British subjects in Asiatic Turkey is only 551?—That is of the resident British subjects; but it does not follow that because there are few British subjects there, there are not very large British interests involved; for many of our large British houses will have Greek agents or Italian agents, or other people, who refer to us if there is a British interest involved.

1338. You think that the individual British interests there require the maintenance of this large staff?—I think that the interests of British subjects and of British trade are decidedly very much benefited by the maintenance of a large consular service.

1339. Looking at it from the trading point of view solely, suppose we were to substitute resident merchants as our consuls in the East, would such a change affect in the slightest degree the sale of our manufactures; I ask the question with regard to trade only, and not with regard to the judicial functions of consuls?—I do not see how you can divide them; but, in the first place, if you make a trader a British consul you put him in a most exceptionally favoured position as regards all others; and his official position would ensure him advantages over other merchants.

1340. I do not see how he would get any advantage; in what way would he?—In all his dealings with the authorities.

1341. Do you mean that he would be favoured by the authorities?—Unquestionably.

1342. Do you consider the political events in Asiatic Turkey of sufficient moment to justify so large and expensive a staff?—Yes, I believe that we are very deeply interested in the political state of the whole Turkish Empire. It is impossible to suppose that a great convulsion could take place there without our being, if not directly involved in it, at least, very much affected in our interests.

1343. But from what quarter could that arise?—It may arise from many quarters; but it is impossible to foretell from which.

1344. Would you be kind enough to explain to me what is the necessity of a consular establishment at Belgrade (I am now in Turkey in Europe, of course), at a cost of 1,300 l. a year; I find the number of British subjects there returned at three, and no trade?—Belgrade may at any moment become a most important political centre. It is the capital of one of the semi-independent vassal states; and it might at any time (I would say the same thing of Bucharest) become the centre of a movement, to which I think it would be almost impossible for us to remain indifferent.

1345. And do those views apply equally to Bucharest?—Equally to Bucharest. Those appointments I look upon as very nearly of the nature of missions to two independent countries; although they are not independent countries, but vassal states; the importance of our agencies in them is nearly equal to that of some of our missions.

1346. Do those observations which you have just made to the Committee apply equally to Jassy?—Only in a very inferior degree; and I may mention that I have stated already to the Foreign Office, that I see no reason why Jassy might not be reduced to a vice consulate since the union of the two Principalities. It is one of the places where I suggest a reduction.

1347. With regard to Rustchuk, I see that our consular establishment there costs us 850 l. a year, there is no trade, and there are only 26 subjects; what is the object of maintaining that?—I believe that if our consul cost us double the money, it would be well expended.

1348. Is Bosnia also a political station?—It is also a political station; not of the same importance as Rustchuk, but it is also important.

1349. Then at Monastir, I see there is only one British subject; is that place too, political?—All those are political.

1350. These are all near one another, are they not?—Yes; there was some arrangement which I suggested with regard to those, which would enable us to get rid of one of the consulates there.

1351. With regard to Smyrna, I see that the cost of our establishment is 2,360 l. a year; can you suggest any economy in that department?—No, I am not aware of any economy that could be effected there. I have not been to Smyrna myself. I shall try, if possible, to go there in the course of next summer; but I cannot say whether any reduction could be made there.

1352. I may understand that your attention has been directed to this expenditure already, and that you will continue to direct your attention to it?—My attention is generally directed to the efficiency and to the economy that can be introduced into the service; but I do not find that the two things are always very compatible.

1354. And of entirely independent position?—Yes; he would receive orders from the embassy, but he acts entirely independently.

1355. He has still, as when the court was first constituted, the nominal rank of vice consul, has he not?—He has the nominal rank of consul general and judge of the Supreme Consular Courts. Then there is what is called the commercial vice consul or first vice consul, and a legal vice consul in addition to the judge.

1357. What is their jurisdiction?—Their jurisdiction extends to the power of condemning a man to death.

1358. It is principally civil, is it not?—Civil and criminal both; criminal as regards our own people.

1359. But the criminal jurisdiction is rather a doubtful matter as far as law goes, is it not?—There is no criminal jurisdiction in our consular judges in a case where a British subject is accused of an offence against a Turk; but if an Englishman were to stab or rob another Englishman, there would be no question made as to the power of the consular judge to deal with the case.

1360. This kind of court has been established for about 12 years?—In its present form it has.

1361. Might I ask you how you think it works?—I think it has worked satisfactorily; we bear a higher character for justice than many other countries in the East, from the way in which our court is conducted.

1362. Have the other great powers similar courts?—Some of them have not, and some are very badly conducted.

Right Hon Sir H. G. Elliot, G.C.B. 28 March 1870.

1363. Have you heard much dissatisfaction expressed by the Porte with the condition of our consular jurisdiction?—No, I cannot say that I have ever heard any complaints.

1364. You are aware that Ali Pasha brought the subject before the Conference of Paris, after the Crimean War, as a great grievance?—I think that it was the general question of the bearing of the treaties or capitulations that he brought forward, and I think it is very natural that any Turkish minister should complain of it. It acts as a great drag upon the progress of the country. I do not think that there can be two opinions about that; but at the same time I am bound to say that I consider it impossible for us to abandon the safeguards which we have under those capitulations.

1365. You think, then, that the Turkish administration of justice is not such as you would like British subjects to be brought under?—In many places I think it is not.

1366. At the seat of government, at Constantinople, what is it?—The jurisdiction even at Constantinople is certainly not what we should think satisfactory.

1367. Take, for instance, some of the provincial towns like Erzeroum and Bagdad?—There would no doubt be abuses if we had not special safeguards.

1368. You said, I think, before, that you were aware of the proceedings of the International Commission with regard to Egypt?—Yes.

1369. We have not at this moment its recommendations in our hands, but may I, without impropriety, ask whether you approve of them?—They have been recently negociated; they are now under the consideration of the Government, and I do not know that they have even been sanctioned by those Governments that took part in them.

1370. You would prefer not to give an opinion on that point?—I am not sufficiently acquainted with the matter. The establishment of new courts is a complicated question, and I would rather not give an opinion upon it.

1371. Is that a subject upon which you imagine that the Porte feels much anxiety?—The Porte feels extremely anxious to get rid of this incubus, as they consider it, of the capitulations; but how far they approve of the suggestion that has been made in Egypt, I am not able to say.

1372. The pressure which led to the appointment of that Commission came entirely from the Pasha of Egypt?—Yes; in Egypt the practice had been very different from what it had been in other parts of the Turkish empire. In Egypt the jurisdiction of the foreign agents had been extended greatly beyond the limits laid down by the capitulations, and pressed heavily on the natives.

1373. From your knowledge of Egypt, would you say that the Egyptian courts were more to be trusted than those of the Ottoman Empire generally?—No; quite the reverse.

1374. There are many very complicated transactions between foreigners and the Pasha himself in Egypt, I think?—There are a great number of transactions of that kind; but I do not think that in any other part of the Empire there has been the same amount of abuse that there has in Egypt.

1375. Many of the questions to be decided by a mixed

Right Hon. Sir H. G Elliot, G.C.B.

a mixed court in Egypt would be those between the Pasha and Europeans?—Yes.

1376. Owing to the fact that the Pasha is largely mixed up in industrial enterprises and owns about a third of the land of Egypt as his personal property?—There is no doubt that he is a very large trader in every way.

1377. Therefore I may gather that you would be of the same opinion with regard to the change in Egypt of our consular jurisdiction that you have expressed with regard to the Turkish Empire generally?—I have not expressed an opinion with regard to a change in the consular jurisdiction in Turkey. I have said that they certainly feel it a heavy weight upon them; but the matter has not been dealt with; there has been no attempt yet to organise a new system in Turkey.

1378. I think I understood you to say that you would not be prepared to recommend the giving up of the capitulations?—It is impossible to give them up. I should not be sorry to see them modified, and for my own part I should be very glad if it were possible to codify them, as I would call it. At present we have to ascertain our rights by deciphering very bad and often incorrect translations of capitulations with five or six or eight different countries, each having the most favoured nation clause, and deduce from all these what our rights are. I should wish, if it were possible, to lay down these rights and define them in one short general treaty.

1379. Do you imagine that the other Great Powers are prepared to take the same view as you take?—It would be very difficult to get the unanimity necessary, because at present each country profits by any arrangements made by any of the other countries.

1380. Do you think that there would be any risk of discouraging our commercial relations with the Turkish empire if we made very great changes as to our consular courts?—I believe that, on the contrary, it would act as an encouragement to the introduction of British capital if there were less inconvenience felt by the Turks from the capitulations. They do not now like to see a powerful company of foreigners introduced into the country, with the knowledge that they will be practically removed from their own jurisdiction.

1381. Do you believe that there has been a gradual deterioration in the character of our commercial men who have settled in the East?—If you speak of our traders in general, I am afraid that they do not bear the exceptionally high character that they once did; but at the same time I must say that in the East they are very much being driven out by much sharper practitioners than themselves, and that a great portion of the trade of Constantinople, which was formerly in British hands, has now almost entirely gone into the hands of the Greeks.

1382. Mr. Otway.] Criminal law is administered by each consul according to the law of the country to which he belongs?—Yes.

1383. Therefore we have the edifying spectacle of an Austrian, an Italian, a French, a British, an American, and a German subject treated to perfectly different punishments, and different degrees of punishment, for the same offence?—Yes.

1384. Does not that show the necessity of establishing a code of laws applicable to all foreigners, before we can expect the Turks to respect the European consular jurisdiction?—Yes; I think it would be very desirable indeed to do that. But there are worse things than that which take place at present. A foreigner who is sentenced for some criminal offence by the Turkish tribunal is handed over to his consul for the execution of the penalty. When persons are handed over to us, we carry out the sentences; but there are other nations which are not so scrupulous; and the Turks complain very much that the sentences which are regularly passed are continually not executed.

1385. Mr. Kinnaird.] You alluded just now to the question of quarantine. Have your diplomatic efforts to diminish the inconveniences of quarantine been crowned with success?—Some of the inconveniences have been removed; there is more to be done, but I do not know how far we shall be successful in getting it.

1386. Mr. Baring.] You stated that you were disposed to prefer the mode of appointment by the French of their consuls to that of the English. From your experience, would you say that our system of consuls is as efficient, or more efficient, or less efficient than that of other countries, speaking generally?—The answer to which you refer was directed entirely to the consuls in the East; I was not alluding at all to the general question; I have very little knowledge of the way of appointment in other parts of the world; but the question in the East was whether we were to try to get men with some knowledge of the country, or whether we were to be satisfied with getting those whom we believed to be more thoroughly Englishmen, acting on the same principle as the French do; I said there were advantages in that latter system, but it was not clear which was the best.

1387. Do you think that the commercial interests of this country have suffered from the inferiority of our consuls in the East?—I did not admit that there was inferiority in our consuls in the East. We have some extremely able men; and we have naturally some people who are not such as we should like to have; but, generally speaking, they are efficient men, and some of the very best are what is generally called Levantines.

1388. You are not in a position to say whether generally our consuls are as efficient as others?—No, I am not; in many cases I have seen other consuls very inferior to ours; and in other cases they have better men than we have; but I cannot make a comparison between the two.

1389. Mr. William Lowther.] Has your opinion been asked with regard to the small missions?—With regard to small missions, my opinion was not asked; I certainly think that it would not be good economy to go very far in reducing small missions, for you never know from what quarters troubles may arise that may produce the greatest complications; and the efforts of every English representative, in whatever part of the world he is, whether in a large embassy or at a small mission, are directed to the one object of preventing anything that may disturb the public peace; that is what we all have in view. As far as the public is concerned, the diplomatic service is only known by two things, by their great successes, or by their failures; by their success in carrying through a great and well-known negotiation, or by their failure in preventing a war; and with regard to that, I do not think that it is much more fair to say that we are of no use because we do not always lways prevent a war, than it is to say that octors are of no use because they do not lways prevent people from dying. In the nall missions there are constantly questions rising, in which, by the personal influence of a British representative, a misunderstanding is leared up, or a claim is satisfied, which if not aken in time would very likely lead to a serious mplication hereafter; and there is no country n which that may not happen. The smallest ingdom in Europe is Greece; but a rup-ure between Greece and Turkey, even if it did ot involve us in a war, would produce a dis-rbance which would certainly cost us a great eal more than any saving you might effect in educing your legation there. What is done by ur representatives in the way I have alluded to annot be generally known, but it ought, I think, o be seriously taken into consideration before too nany missions are suppressed.

1390. Mr. William Cartwright.] I believe you ave changed your opinion with regard to the ppointment of permanent clerks from that which ou expressed in the evidence you gave before he Committee of 1861?—Yes, before the Com-nittee of 1861 I said that I rather objected to he system of permanent clerks because I thought it would prevent the attachés from learning their business as thoroughly as they ought to do. I still think that it may have that effect, but I think that the evil now of the slow promotion that there is, and of the wretched prospect that they have before them, has become so great that I would rather run that risk than go on seeing young men work away without a chance of getting forward. It is only for the sake of reducing the staff, not because I like the system, that I would adopt it.

Right Hon. Sir H. G. Elliot, G.C.B.

1391. I suppose the clerks would be like the chanceliers?—Yes.

1392. And that is a system which is general in the French service?—Yes, very general, and it is one, I believe, which diminishes the apparent cost of their diplomatic service. The chanceliers take fees, at least I understand so, and those fees make a general fund which goes to the maintenance of the chanceliers throughout the service. In one place a chancelier will get a much larger amount than is required for his pay, then the surplus goes to make up the chancelier's salary in a place where the fees are small.

1394. They reside habitually, and become rooted on the spot?—Yes.

The Right Honourable Edmund Hammond, recalled; and further Examined.

1395. Mr. Rylands.] Is not the scale of full utfit understood to be about one-third of the alary?—Yes.

1396. The Return which you have presented hows that in some cases it is much over a third, nd in others it is less; what reason do you give or this discrepancy?—I am unable to give any eason; it is a thing which has been of long tanding.

1398. There is a considerable quantity of ublic furniture in it?—There is a considerable uantity; I cannot tell you what proportion.

1399. Is not this a reason for paying the Am-assador to the French a less sum for outfit, ather than more?—No; I presume that the xpense of outfit is not merely in furniture; here are various things, such as equipage, ser-ants, liveries, and things of that sort, which, in a lace like Paris, are a very great drain upon an mbassador's purse. But of course I am perfectly nable to tell you how much an ambassador does pend as outfit; I can only say that I consider hat at Paris there must be a very large charge or outfit; even stocking the cellar must be a considerable expense.

1400. Still the fact is that, in some missions, here is no furniture provided, in which case the inister would have to pay the full expense of he furniture, and in Paris that is not the case?—All missions are not equally expensive with hat of Paris.

1401. Do you consider that the outfit allow-nces go towards paying the travelling expenses of a minister in going to his post?—He has no other allowance.

Rt. Hon. E. Hammond.

1402. The outfit allowance goes to that?—It assists him in it.

1403. Is not the fact that Paris is so much nearer to England than China, Persia, and South America, a reason why the allowance to the ambassador appointed to Paris should be less in proportion to the outfits to those distant missions rather than more?—Not if I am right in saying that the expense of an ambassador fitting himself out for Paris would greatly exceed that incurred for other places.

1404. But I am asking you about the proportion; the ambassador at Paris has a much larger salary, and has an outfit allowance of more than a third of it, whereas his travelling expenses are very much less?—After all, what is the difference between a third of the outfit and what he gets? A third of the outfit would be 3,333 l., and he gets 4,000 l. Surely the difference, 600 l., is very small to enable him to meet the very great expense which he has in fitting himself out; the journey is but a small item of the expense.

1405. Where to?—To any place, comparatively speaking.

1406. Take China, Persia, and South America?—I imagine that those are exceptional cases. Then, you must remember, too, that with regard to the journey to China, a man would be receiving all that time his full salary.

1407. Still he is put to a considerable amount of expenditure beyond that of the ambassador at Paris, in consequence of the length of the journey?—I doubt very much whether the expense of his journey is not less than the full salary which he is receiving during the time; I should think upon the whole that the full salary which he receives more than pays the expense of his journey.

1408. But it is quite clear that if a minister going to a distant post could get there without paying any charge for passage-money, he would be better off than if he did pay for it?—Of course he would be so, if we put him on full salary whilst he was on his journey; but if he was not put off on full salary, but only on half salary, whilst he was on his journey, I apprehend that he would in most instances be worse off.

1409. But he would in any case have full salary from the date of his appointment?—If you altered the system in one respect, I do not say that you would not alter it in another.

1410. I am speaking of the existing system. Is it not a fact that a minister appointed to a post, commences receiving his salary from the time of his appointment?—Yes, but your suggestion goes, as I understand it, to this, that it would be an advantage to give the minister, in addition to his full salary, travelling expenses; of course it would be an advantage to him.

1411. I am asking simply this with regard to the case of Paris, where you give an extra amount of outfit, whether you do not think that the fact of Paris being so much nearer England than these distant posts, is a reason why the amount of outfit money should be less in proportion?—I do not think that there would be any reason for giving a less outfit on that ground.

1412. Would you not think it fairer to arrange the outfits in such a manner that a sum should be allowed for travelling expenses dependent on the actual cost of the journey, so that if you paid more to distant posts you would pay less to near ones?—I am not prepared to revise a system of outfit and travelling expenses which has been inaugurated and found to work well for the last 40 years.

1413. At which of the embassies is plate provided by the nation?—There is plate provided at St. Petersburg, at Vienna, at Paris, at Constantinople, at Berlin, at Lisbon, and Madrid.

1414. Can you furnish a proximate estimate of the value of the plate belonging to the nation?—Perhaps I had better read a memorandum which I have had made on the subject:—"It was formerly the custom on the appointment of an ambassador or minister to make him a grant of money to enable him to provide himself with a service of plate; but in order to avoid the frequent recurrence of the expense thus incurred, it was determined in 1815 by Lord Castlereagh that no such grant should be in future made; but that at each of the courts of Paris, St. Petersburg, Vienna, Madrid, Constantinople, Netherlands, Berlin, and Lisbon, a suitable service of plate should be provided at the public expense for the use of the resident ambassador or minister, to be taken care of at his cost or charge, and to be delivered up to his successor, on the removal of a minister, according to the inventory deposited in duplicate in the office of his Majesty's Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs in London. In pursuance of this decision, services of plate, the cost of which was shown in a Return laid before the House of Commons in June 1833, were furnished to the ambassadors and ministers at the courts above mentioned. The plate supplied for the use of the embassy at the Hague was brought back to this country on the substitution of a mission for an embassy, and it has since been made use of to complete the service of plate for the Constantinople embassy, the greater portion of the service originally consigned to that embassy having been destroyed by the fire at Constantinople in 1831." "Extract from a Return to the House of Commons, printed 28th June 1833. Return of services of plate provided at the public expense in the department of the Lord Chamberlain of his Majesty's household, which are transferred with the office on new appointments; showing the expense of each service at each place—

For His Majesty's Embassy at the Court of the Netherlands - -	6,749	3	1
at St. Petersburg -	6,774	18	6
at Vienna - -	6,776	19	2
at Madrid - -	4,743	11	- at Paris - - -	8,500	15	11
at Lisbon - -	5,693	6	8

Services of plate provided at the public expense, not included in the above return from the Lord Chamberlain's Department, which are transferred with the office on new appointments, showing the expense of each service at each place. For His Majesty's Embassy at Constantinople, 4,340 l. 10 s. - d., and for His Majesty's Embassy at Berlin, 4,366 l. 1 s. 6 d." Those services were supplied between the years 1820 and 1825, the youngest being 45 years old.

1415. Chairman.] Are those services still going?—They are going.

1416. Mr. Richard Shaw.] In both senses of the word?—Yes; we were obliged last year to repair the Paris plate which had got into a very dilapidated state; and I am afraid that the plate at most of the embassies would be much better for repair. But we repair it on the most economical plan by melting up the heavy pieces of plate which were in fashion in those days when the plate was provided, and making out of it more useful articles, better adapted to the use of these times.

1417. Mr. Rylands.] Would it not be fair to make a deduction from the outfit allowances in cases where ambassadors and ministers are not obliged to buy plate?—Certainly not. The outfit allowances are only sufficient, indeed they are not sufficient to enable them to meet their expenses. I should be very glad, indeed, if the Committee would recommend the granting a certain portion of plate to every mission, as was done before 1815; I know the practice well. At this moment I have in my possession plate which my father obtained in 1792, when he first went to America.

1418. When a minister is appointed to a mission at a higher salary than that attaching to his previous appointment, how soon does his increased salary commence?—In the case of a new appointment of an ambassador or minister, who at the time of his nomination was not already in the service, and in receipt of a diplomatic salary, his salary would commence ten days before his departure for his post. If, however, the ambassador or minister, at the time of his appointment, were already in the service, and in the receipt of a diplomatic salary, he would draw the salary of his new post from the date of his appointment to it.

1419. Is he allowed his outfit whether he goes to the mission or not?—Certainly not; that is to say, if the outfit has been issued to him, and he should not go to the mission, he would refund his outfit.

1420. May I call your attention to a particular case, the case of Mr. Lowther, who is now present; Mr. Lowther was secretary of the embassy assy at Berlin, and he was promoted to be inister plenipotentiary to the Argentine Republic, 26th September 1867; I think you are ell aware of that?—Yes.

1421. As we have the pleasure of the company f the honourable gentleman here, I need not sk you whether he went to that post?—He did ot go there.

1422. I wish to ask you whether he received he outfit money?—The outfit was received by im and returned, I believe.

1423. Because I find in the estimates of the ear 1868, that under the payments for outfits ade between the 1st of January and the 31st of December 1867, "Mr. William Lowther, minister t Buenos Ayres," is put down as having received ,100 l.?—I have no doubt that the outfit was ssued to him, but that return would not show whether the outfit was repaid, and I believe it as. A return of money issued must contain whatever money is issued; it will not contain the fact of the money being repaid.

1424. Then I understand that in your belief the amount, 1,100 l., put down as having been paid to Mr. Lowther, was returned on his resignation of his appointment?—I have every reason to suppose so.

1425. May I ask you a question with regard to the appointment to that mission of Mr. Forbes some years previously. Mr. Forbes, I think, was appointed to the mission at Buenos Ayres from Dresden?—He was appointed to the mission at Rio de Janeiro.

1426. I wish to ask whether you have reason to suppose that Mr. Forbes received his outfit?—I am perfectly unable to state that myself; it is stated to me by Mr. Alston that the money was returned, to the best of his belief.

1427. May I understand distinctly from your answer that the payment of 1,100 l. to Mr. Lowther for outfit was returned?—Yes.

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE EDWARD PLEYDELL BOUVERIE, IN THE CHAIR.

The Right Honourable EDMUND HAMMOND, again called in; and further Examined.

1428. Chairman.] HAVE you any further Papers to put in?—Yes; I wish to put in a continuation of those circulars which were laid in 1861 up to the present time, and I believe that they are complete. If when I get the proof I see that there are any deficient, I will supply them. That brings them up to March of this year. (The same was handed in.)

1429. There is a portion of the Consular Instructions referred to in the General Instructions; can you put that in?—Yes. The Consular Instructions were recast about two years ago. This which is marked as Section 8 is the article of the old Consular Instructions about public and private correspondence, but it has been superseded by a more general instruction under paragraph 12 of the new instructions. (The same were handed in.) I think it may be convenient to the Committee to have "An Account of the Salaries and House Rent paid out of the Consolidated Fund in the Year ended 31st March 1869, for the Diplomatic Service, and the future Annual Charge for the same," as printed in the last Finance Accounts; and I have added to it a note of my own, explaining that the diplomatic expenditure in China, Japan, and Persia was not charged in the year 1868-9 to the Consolidated Fund, but that that for China and Japan was provided for by an annual vote of Parliament, and that for Persia by money contributed for that purpose by the Indian Government; and I add that the salaries of the third secretaries were also voted annually at that time. (The same was handed in.) Since the Exchequer Audit Bill has come in all the accounts of our expenditure have been recast, and it is very difficult to institute a comparison now.

1430. The subdivisions of the expenditure are different?—Quite different.

1431. So that without re-casting the account it is almost impossible to draw a comparison?—Yes; but at the same time the new account is perfect as far as I can see, and hereafter there will not be the least difficulty in coming to a clear understanding about any year. This new Bill has forced us to recast the whole form of our accounts, and has thrown us into a great deal of confusion, but we have got it now settled, I hope. Then there are one or two papers, not bearing on the present portion of your inquiry, but which I think it would be convenient for the Committee to have before them now, inasmuch as they are voluminous, in order that they may consider them in the interval before they come to the consular branch of their inquiry. I will, therefore, put in a statement of the French consular salaries, and also a copy of the Act of Congress by which the diplomatic and consular systems of the United States are regulated. (The same were handed in.)

1432. Is that the ruling Act now?—Yes. I will also put in, taken from the United States documents, returns of the United States diplomatic and consular services, and of the fees levied in the latter. (The same were handed in.)

1433. What are those returns derived from?—They are derived from a little book published officially in the United States, and from a Return made to Congress.

1434. Sir Charles Wentworth Dilke.] Do you happen to know at what rate the dollar has been calculated?—At 4*s.* 2*d.* All the salaries in the United States, when once persons go abroad, are paid in gold. Then I wish to put in, as bearing upon the last, a list of the fees levied in the English consular service, in order to draw a comparison between the United States fees, which number about 109, and ours, which number about 39.

1435. Chairman.] How long has that scale been in operation?—This table of fees was confirmed by Order in Council of the 27th July 1863. Then I wish to hand in the Consular Estimates for the present year, exclusive of China, Japan, and Siam; also, the Consular Estimates for China, Japan, and Siam for the present year. These are draft Estimates, which will be laid before Parliament. (The same were handed in.) The Members of the Committee will have had laid before them a Paper called "China, No. 3 (1870)," containing reports of the consular establishments in China. I wish wish to put that in formally before the Committee, because it is a collection which their attention will be very much called to during the examination of the China votes. Then I have another Return to put in formally, called "China, No. 5 (1870)," containing correspondence respecting diplomatic and consular expenditure in China, Japan, and Siam, which will be laid on the Table of the House to-night.

1436. Have you anything further to put in?—Something may come out in the course of the examination which may render it necessary for me to put in other papers, but at present I have nothing more to put in.

1437. Mr. Rylands.] There is one point that I omitted on the last occasion in reference to Queen's messengers; it was my intention to ask you in reference to the present number of Queen's messengers; can you state what it is?—There are now 15; we have just reduced two.

1438. Then the reduction has been made since the Foreign Office List was printed, which shows 17?—The Treasury have assented to the reduction within the last three or four days.

1439. You have now come down, I think, to the number suggested some years ago by Lord Malmesbury?—Yes.

1440. Is it not the fact that since the time at which Lord Malmesbury suggested this reduction to 15, there has been a still further reduction in the number of journeys taken by Queen's messengers?—There has been a reduction, certainly; I cannot say that by reducing the number of journeys we have not deprived ourselves of the means of getting such information as we formerly had. But I may add that it is the intention of Lord Clarendon, as soon as we can do it, to reduce the number to 12; we cannot get the younger men to take their retirement yet, but I think that at no distant time some will retire and their places will not be filled up till we have reduced the number to 12.

1441. Can you mention to the Committee the number of missions to which formerly Queen's messengers were dispatched, but as to which there is now a change, so that Queen's messengers are not dispatched to them?—It is rather in the distribution of the journeys, in the number of the journeys, that the change has been made. The only one that is absolutely abolished, I think, speaking on the spur of the moment, is the direct messenger who, during the time of the late German war, was established through France by the short way to Vienna, not going through Berlin. That man does not go any longer. Instead of having, as that messenger enabled us to have, a weekly journey to Vienna, we have now only a fortnightly journey to Vienna, and it is effected in this way: We send a messenger every week to Berlin, and the alternate week the messenger goes on to St. Petersburgh or goes on to Vienna also. Therefore there is one messenger every week to Berlin, and every second week there is one to Vienna and to St. Petersburgh. Then too we were in the habit of having a messenger twice a month to Constantinople, Athens, and Persia, carrying all that correspondence. That has been reduced to only once a month. With respect to Italy we have at present reduced that to a monthly journey, but I cannot say that that has been a reduction which has worked well. I think that specially as so many things are now going on in Italy, we should be glad to have at least more frequent communications with Italy by messenger than now. But it has been the object of Lord Clarendon, in deference to the strongly expressed opinion of the House of Commons, to reduce the messenger service as much as he possibly can. I believe that I could satisfy your inquiry in that respect by a Paper which I have not now with me; but I think that in the last quarter's account there was between 1,300 l. and 1,500 l. diminution in consequence of the reduction of messengers' journeys.

1442. Is there a messenger sent at stated intervals to Madrid?—No.

1443. In reference to the other missions in Europe, those that you have not mentioned, is it the case that Queen's messengers are not regularly sent to any of them?—No, except to Paris. The only station messengers are to Paris, Florence, Constantinople, Berlin, Vienna, and St. Petersburgh.

1444. I think I understand you to say that to St. Petersburgh and Vienna messengers were sent every alternate week, to Florence every month, and to Constantinople every month?—Yes.

1445. Can you give me any reason why, when messengers are sent at these intervals to the large capitals to which allusion has been made, there should be a weekly messenger to Berlin?—Because the messenger must go through Berlin on his way to St. Petersburgh and Vienna by the present system. If he went from London to Vienna straight you would deprive yourself of the benefit of sending him to Berlin, and would gain nothing. To go to St. Petersburgh, too, you must go to Berlin; and to go to Vienna I think it is only about 12 or 14 hours longer going through Berlin. But then besides there is a combination of the messengers at Berlin. For instance, last night the messenger went to St. Petersburgh. The Vienna messenger coming home will come through Berlin, bring anything from Berlin, and arrive in London next Monday. The same will be the case with the St. Petersburgh messenger. Berlin is the central point through which the messengers must all go for economy's sake.

1446. I think I understood you to say, as regards the alternate messenger who goes through Berlin to Vienna, that it was at the expense of a considerable time, several hours?—I forget how many hours, but it is the most economical arrangement that we can make.

1447. Is it not the fact that a proposition was made some short time ago by the Foreign Office to reduce the journeys of Queen's messengers to Berlin to fortnightly journeys?—I do not know the fact; but even if it was so, as I was explaining to you just now, necessarily the messenger, if he goes every fortnight alternately to Vienna and St. Petersburgh, goes most conveniently through Berlin.

1448. But still the Foreign Office, I am informed, did wish to reduce the journeys of the messenger to Berlin to fortnightly journeys, in place of weekly journeys?—I cannot say that; but whatever might have been on the canvass it could not have been maintained, simply for the reason which I state to you, that the messengers to Vienna and St. Petersburgh necessarily go through Berlin. Otherwise, instead of having a messenger going to Vienna, at the expense of merely the journey between Berlin and Vienna, you would have him going to Vienna at the expense of the entire journey from London to Vienna,

Vienna, which would make a considerable difference in the expenditure.

1449. But was there not a proposition made to the Prussian Government, or to the Prussian Court, to reduce the journeys?—I am not aware of any such proposition, and I certainly do not see why we should make any to the Prussian Government, because what has the Prussian Government to say to our messengers? They have nothing to say to our messengers; we do not ask the leave of a foreign Government, or consult with a foreign Government, as to the number of journeys that our messengers shall take.

1450. Is it not the fact that the Queen's messenger takes a number of letters and parcels in his bag for the Royal family at Potsdam?—He takes whatever the Queen requires to be sent.

1451. Chairman.] The officer is the Queen's messenger?—He is styled a Queen's messenger. The messenger does not go for the purposes of the Queen, but the Queen and the Royal family avail themselves of our messengers to send things by them. They are not sent expressly for them, but for the public diplomatic service of the country.

1452. Mr. Rylands.] But the fact is that all parcels and letters for the Prussian Royal family are sent in that way?—I beg your pardon. Those intended for the Princess Royal of England, who is the Queen's daughter, are sent in that way.

1453. Then you think that on public grounds that it is necessary for messengers to call with despatches at Berlin every week?—Certainly; and I think that even if the messenger did not go beyond Berlin it would be desirable that he should go there. Certainly, if you ask my opinion (which I presume you are asking me), I think that the public service suffers very much indeed from the infrequency of messengers to some of the great courts in Europe.

1454. I suppose you are quite aware that we keep up a much larger staff of Queen's messengers than any other government in Europe?—We may keep up a larger staff of Queen's messengers, and for this reason, that we live, you may say, at the extremity of Europe. The French Foreign Office, in providing a messenger service between Paris and Berlin, or Vienna, may have their messenger at the frontier at Strasbourg, for instance, for Vienna, or at Erquelines for Berlin; but we are obliged to have a messenger going all through France. In the same manner with the Russians. The Russians do not require to send a messenger for the safety of their despatches till they come upon their frontier. As long as the despatches are within your frontier they are safe, but if they go out of your frontier they are not safe.

1455. With regard to the luggage carried by foreign service messengers, are there any regulations with regard to the amount of luggage which they can take with them?—We restrict it as much as possible. It is regulated.

1456. There is a regulation of recent adoption?—If you refer to parcels sent for private members of the mission, there is a regulation of long standing limiting the amount that they may have sent by a messenger.

1457. Mr. Otway.] There is a regulation of very recent adoption on the subject?—Yes. I have put in a circular still more stringent about sending those things, but the regulation which I am alluding to was made some years ago with a view of restricting the weight that members of the mission should receive or send by any messenger to so many pounds.

1458. Mr. Rylands.] But is it not the fact that the Queen's foreign service messengers have been made use of to a very large extent for taking parcels?—Belonging to the members of the mission?

1459. That has been checked, I understand, recently?—A severer check has been put upon it recently. The check which I am speaking of has been a check of many years' standing; I forget how many, but seven or eight years' standing. May I ask whether you mean the personal luggage of the messenger?

1460. No, I mean making use of the Queen's service messengers to carry parcels for members of the missions and their friends?—No Queen's messenger can carry anything for himself at all: if he did, and were known to do so, he would subject himself to severe censure. And although we allow the members of our missions, with a limitation, to have a certain number of parcels when a Queen's messenger goes, they are specially prohibited from sending or receiving parcels for other people.

1461. It was the fact till a comparatively recent period, was it not, that the Queen's service messengers took parcels for the members of the missions, for the friends of the members of the missions, and for other persons connected with them?—I cannot tell you whether they have done that or not, but they did not do it with the sanction of the Foreign Office. To answer your question distinctly would involve the necessity of my having been present whenever a Queen's messenger was dispatched, and having examined his luggage.

1462. At all events the Foreign Office did consider that an abuse was taking place in the amount of luggage carried by the Queen's messengers?—We considered that an abuse was taking place in the amount of parcels received for their own use by members of the diplomatic body.

1463. That was checked a few years ago?—Yes, and has been recently still more checked. Their attention has been very pointedly called to it lately.

1464. May I ask you the salary paid to Queen's service messengers?—The salary is now 400 l. a year, and when they are on a journey there is a subsistence allowance of 1 l. a day in addition.

1465. Are you aware what salary is paid to the Queen's home service messengers?—The Queen's home service messengers on the old footing are paid 250 l. a year. The two or three last new appointments are at 200 l. a year.

1466. Can you give the Committee any reason why the foreign service messengers should be paid double the amount of the home service messengers?—They have harder work to perform, and they are persons who may be exposed to great difficulty and great danger, which a home service messenger would not necessarily be exposed to.

1467. But in reference to the foreign service messengers to Paris and Berlin and Vienna, I suppose there is no greater danger to them than to a messenger in our own country?—No; but I may say, in the first place, that our messengers consider (I am not responsible for their considering ing it, but they do consider) that their railroad journeys night and day now are much more severe journeys for them, and more trying to their health and constitution, than those which they took when they used to go in carriages. Perhaps going in a carriage to Berlin they were out four or five nights, and now they are only out two; but I can only tell you what the messengers themselves say.

1468. I will not ask you whether you agree with the messengers?—I have not sufficient experience of night travelling to speak as to that, but I know that some people suffer very much indeed from railroad travelling. In addition to that, it must be remembered that this is happily a time of peace. If there were any difficulty in time of war, the messengers would have to ride or get on as best they could. If a railroad is broken up, they must get on as they can. I remember a very old messenger once telling me of the great nuisance he experienced in going through Poland long before railways were made; he found that there was a Jew at every station who wanted to make a bargain for carrying him on; in fact, he was sold and bought among the Jews at every station. You want for a foreign messenger a man well conversant with foreign languages, and well conversant with travelling on the continent; and, of course, if you have men of superior qualifications, you must pay them in a better way than a man of whom not so much is required.

1469. You do not think that we could get men of the right quality at a less salary than that which is now paid by the Foreign Office?—I think the salary is a fair salary, and I do not think that it ought to be diminished for the foreign service messengers; it has been extremely reduced of late years, by the system on which it was put. I remember, before Lord Malmesbury's time, when some of them were supposed to make 1,200*l.* a-year, that is when they travelled by post. Till the railroad got fairly into use, we used to allow the messengers to charge their mileage account on the same principle as when posting. That was entirely reversed in Lord Malmesbury's time, and they were put on a fixed salary; but I should say that even at the time when they were getting those large emoluments, the estimated value of the place on which they were superannuated was 400*l.* a year; now they do not make the same profit as they did when there were those high mileage rates, and their superannuation is now calculated as on salary and emoluments amounting to 525*l.* a year.

1470. I think I gather from you that the Foreign Office at present are contemplating a further reduction in the number of messengers?—Yes, we shall do it as soon as we can; in point of fact, we have sounded some of the messengers, to see whether they would retire, but they were not yet prepared to retire. Some of them, however, have been in the service a long time, and probably at no distant day they will retire.

1471. Mr. Lowther.] The messenger who goes from here to St. Petersburgh leaves on Wednesday night, gets to Berlin, and starts from there that same night?—He gets to Berlin on Friday morning, and starts that night for St. Petersburgh.

1472. Therefore he has very little rest between this and St. Petersburgh?—No night rest.

1473. Have you had complaints from messengers about 1*l.* a day being too little for their journeys?—I have not heard complaints recently; I have in former days; they have given us accounts of expenditure, showing that they spent 25*s.* or 30*s.* a day. Of course, from the nature of their service abroad, they would pay rather higher than other people; they do not spend 24 hours at one place, except it is a station.

1474. Perhaps you would not hear the complaints so much as the chief clerk?—The chief clerk would rather hear them. I remember complaints having been brought before the office officially, and brought to my knowledge officially; and I have no doubt that at the time I passed the complaints on to the Secretary of State with my own written opinion that 1*l.* a day ought not to be exceeded.

1475. I think correspondence from Warsaw, Dantzic, Leipsic, Stettin, and Königsberg all comes through Berlin?—Yes; any confidential correspondence from those places would come through Berlin.

1476. I think they have instructions to send their correspondence to the embassy at Berlin, in time to be taken on by the messenger?—Yes, I believe there is an instruction of that kind; they are not absolutely tied down to send it through Berlin, but as a general rule they do, in order that the ambassador at Berlin may see the correspondence on its way through; it passes under flying seal.

1477. This Government sends out, in the despatch bags, Blue Books and Reports presented to the Houses of Parliament?—Yes.

1478. And there is an exchange of Blue Books with the various Governments, is there not; they send reports to us?—Certain papers are exchanged. I will not say that Blue Books are exchanged, but certain reports are exchanged. And then we send out by those messengers a great deal of stationery for the use of the mission. As we preserve our papers for a long time, we require them to be written in a particular form, and on paper of a particular substance.

1480. Do the Foreign Office get any receipt for it?—It has generally been transacted by the agent of the party who had to pay them.

1481. Can you put in a copy of such a receipt?—There is a copy of the receipt given for your outfit (handing it in), and there is a copy of the receipt given for Mr. Forbes's outfit (handing it in).

1482. Chairman.] Will you read the receipt in Mr. Lowther's case?—"Bank of England, 10th February 1868, I do hereby certify, that, by virtue of an Act of the 45 Geo. 3, c. 58, Mr. W. Lowther has this day paid into the Bank of England the sum of 1,100*l.* to the account of Her Majesty's Paymaster General, cash account. For the Governor and Company of the Bank of England.—R. Humphrey."

1483. Is it a similar receipt in Mr. Forbes's case?—Yes; "Bank of England, 16th February 1860. I do hereby certify that, by virtue of an Act of 45 Geo. 3, c. 58, the Honourable F. R. Forbes has this day paid into the Bank of England the sum of 800*l.*, to the account of Her Majesty's Paymaster General, cash account. For the Governor and Company of the Bank of England.—J. T. Frith."

1484. Mr. Lowther.] Could you give us any explanation of this item, about which we were not able to get any explanation the other day; No. 6, on page 2, of China Excesses?—I am afraid that I can give you no very detailed explanation, except that it was an accumulation of short estimates for many years past. The increase in the expenditure had not been notified to the Foreign Office whilst it was going on increasing, otherwise we should have been able to increase the Vote. There was nothing wrong in the expenditure; but just in the same manner as this year, when we had come into a knowledge of the accounts, and found that we had short estimates for the last year, we were obliged to take a Supplementary Estimate to meet the deficiency, so, if we had known of the previous deficiencies in time, we should have taken an increased Estimate immediately, to meet the necessary expenses. The expenses were necessary, and were properly incurred, only, from the peculiarity of the manner in which money was issued in China, and the way it was brought to account, we, in the Foreign Office, when preparing the Estimate, had not the means of knowing exactly how the account stood. Now, under the new system, when all moneys voted for China, and all other services, are administered by the Foreign Office, we have the accounts passed through the office, and examined in the office, and are able to provide for any deficiencies likely to occur, or for any deficiencies that have occurred, in the next Vote of Parliament; but the accounts were formerly always sent, not through the Foreign Office, but direct from the Audit Office in China to the Audit Office in London.

1486. Then with regard to this excess of expenditure in respect of China, would it not appear that that had been met out of unexpended balances for other portions of the diplomatic service; or where did the money come from?—That I am not able to answer. We did not supply the funds; and I may explain that a very small portion of the China Service is paid in England; that, of course, was issued like all other moneys, by the Paymaster General, upon a requisition through the Treasury. A great portion of the China expenditure was paid out of the Treasury chest in China, that is to say, advanced by the Treasury chest in China. Then a settlement of the account, repaying the Treasury chest in China, was made, I believe, by the Treasury out of the money voted for the China Service, without passing through the Foreign Office. Now, no money for any services belonging to the Foreign Office can be issued by any department except by the Accountant to the Foreign Office.

1487. You do not know whether it arises under the Appropriation Audit?—It has been ascertained by the Appropriation Audit, because it has been necessary for the purposes of that Act to strike all balances, and then the state of things was ascertained.

1488. Mr. Richard Shaw.] I presume these arrears cannot again occur in this department?—Certainly not to that extent. In a fluctuating expenditure, as you will see it must be, if you look at the matter, I will not say that it may not be 1,000 l. or 2,000 l. more or less in one year than the Estimate, and I will not say that in the next year there may not be some deficiency; but after next year I do not believe there will be any. The accounts have been now with the most persevering industry gone through by the chief clerk and by one of the clerks at the Foreign Office, Mr. Abbott, and they have taken infinite pains with them; and if you will examine those Papers which I have just put in, you will see the wonderful trouble which has been taken with those China accounts to get them into order; and the effect of that has been that we have been able to reduce our expenditure in China by very nearly 10,000 l. We have gone through every item of the China expenditure, especially the miscellaneous expenditure, and as the result of the whole there will be, we hope, a clear reduction of the expenditure in China by 10,000 l.

1489. Mr. Lowther.] Then do you consider that this fault of the account running on from 1864 to 1868 is rather with the Treasury than with the Foreign Office?—I am not disposed to take the blame to ourselves, nor am I disposed to impute it to the Treasury. It is one of those accidental circumstances which may occur, which are very much to be deplored, but which persons conversant with the complications of the China accounts would not find it very hard to understand. It has been a puzzle to me for a very long time to make out those accounts, to make out how the expenditure was going on.

1490. I think we are about to put an end to our diplomatic relations with the Hanse Towns?—Yes.

1491. Is that a very important mercantile post?—There is a great deal of trade at Hamburgh.

1492. Would you propose to leave a consul general there?—No, there will be no consul general there. We shall leave a full consul on a liberal salary, in the same manner as when we abolished the direct diplomatic representative at Monte Video, we increased the salary of the vice consul there by 300 l. a year, and made him full consul in charge. I must add that I am not quite certain whether the arrangement is altogether decided as to Hamburgh.

1493. There was a vice consul formerly at Hamburgh, was there not?—There was no vice consul at Hamburgh, there was a consul general there and a consul.

1494. The title of the gentleman under Mr. Ward is consul?—Yes.

1495. By whom was he appointed?—Appointed by Lord Clarendon, I think, some years ago.

1496. Has he ever passed an examination?—That I can hardly tell you. He was appointed on 22nd March 1866. I am not able to tell you whether he has passed an examination or not.

1497. An examination is necessary for all consuls, is it not?—Not absolutely necessary, because it is not absolutely necessary for a person who holds his appointment directly from the Crown, which a consul does.

1499. If a man at 40 receives a pension, and the Foreign Secretary offers him a post, he is bound bound to give up his pension if he does not accept that post?—He is liable to have to do so. He may be required to renounce his pension. Of course if he is required by the Secretary of State to proceed to any mission of the same rank, or a higher one than that which he had when he retired, and he is not willing to do so, he must forfeit his allowance.

1500. Under that you can get rid of all your pensions, cannot you?—It would be rather a hard and unhandsome thing to do.

1501. Still it is possible?—It is possible, supposing that there are vacancies; but you must suppose that there is a vacancy to which a man can be appointed of a higher or of the same rank. You could not now say to any minister, for example, who had retired, "You shall go to Vienna as ambassador," because the embassy at Vienna is not vacant; but if the embassy at Vienna were vacant, and the public service required, in the estimation of the Secretary of State, that a certain man should go there, and that man having a pension did not choose to go there, then if the Secretary of State chose to enforce it, the man would of course forfeit his pension.

1502. What is the lowest pension allowed by Parliament after 15 years' service?—It is hard to answer that question, because a provision is made in the Act for pensions to second secretaries, and there is a provision also that no person shall receive a pension exceeding the salary which he may be receiving at the time when his active employment ceases. Therefore, although the fourth class pension, which is the smallest sum named, is 700*l.* a year, a second secretary who retired after 15 years' service, and whose salary was only 400*l.* a year, would not be entitled to more than 400*l.* a year pension. That is my reading of the Act.

1503. But then he must always have served 15 years?—Fifteen years from the date of his first commission, and 10 years actual service. I do not know that any rule has been laid down on the point, but I apprehend that if a person had served 10 years under a commission, and had remained en disponibilité for five years afterwards, at the end of the 15 years, under the terms of the Act of Parliament, he might claim his pension, because he would have been 15 years in the service from the date of his first commission, and have served 10 years abroad. It does not say that he shall be pensioned from active service.

1504. Practically it would be always 19 years?—Yes, because there would be four years of attachéship.

1505. Will you explain to me why Mr. Christie gets a pension; he was made secretary of legation in 1851 and retired in 1859, and he received a pension in 1863?—Mr. Christie had service as agent and consul general before that.

1506. He comes under the consular pensions then, I suppose?—No. A question was raised some years ago, and has been raised more than once, as to what was the real intent and meaning of the word "minister" in the Act of 2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 116, and we referred it, I think, to the law officers on two different occasions, and they both times ruled that a person having to discharge political functions would come under that Act for pension. But to clear up all doubt upon the subject hereafter, this clause was inserted in the Act of Parliament of 32 & 33 Vict. c. 43: "A person shall not be qualified for receiving a pension of the third class unless he has been an envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary on a mission of the second class, or a minister plenipotentiary, or a minister resident or a chargé d'affaires and consul general in some foreign state or states, or a chargé d'affaires in some foreign state or states where no other diplomatic representative is usually appointed to reside on behalf of Her Majesty, or an agent and consul general in some foreign state or states where his duties have been generally of a political character, and in one or more of those capacities has actually resided in some foreign state or states, either continuously or on different occasions during a time amounting in the aggregate to five years." The law officers had ruled that the Act of Will. 4 was to be construed in that way, and when this new Act was passed it was thought just as well to insert a provision in the Act according to their ruling.

1507. Mr. William Cartwright.] This is the Act of last Session?—Yes; the Act to provide for the payment of diplomatic salaries, allowances, and pensions.

1508. Mr. Lowther.] Then I see that Mr. Howard was appointed secretary of legation in 1846, and that he retired in 1858; he, too, gets a pension, though a very small one, namely, 300*l.*; how comes that?—He must have passed 15 years from the date of his commission; I see that it comes to what I have said. He was appointed on the 23rd of May 1846, and his pension was granted on the 10th of August 1861; that is to say, 15 years had passed from the date of his commission.

1509. But he retired in 1858?—He had served his 10 years abroad. That is exactly what I was saying a little while ago; it was 15 years from the date of his first commission before he got a pension.

1510. Mr. Richard Shaw.] The last five years being out of service?—Not so much as the last five; the last three.

1511. Mr. Lowther.] Why was he not getting his full pension?—I can hardly tell you; I was not in England when the pension was granted to Mr. Howard.

1512. Do you know by whom the pension was granted?—Lord Russell was the Secretary of State at the time when it was granted.

1513. Then we come to Mr. William Robert Ward, who was named secretary of legation on the 12th of February 1852, and was pensioned on the 11th of May 1867; he received his pension because he had served 15 years, I suppose?—At the time he retired on his pension he was, I believe, 60 years of age. But it is on the same principle that he was pensioned; he had actually served 15 years.

1514. But another man who had served actually the same time as Mr. Ward, is equally entitled to a pension, though he is not 60 years of age?—He is legally entitled if he does not refuse service; but you could never give a man a pension who refused service unless he had got to that age; a man, according to the acceptation suggested by an honourable Member, is supposed to have done with active service at 60 years of age.

1515. When a gentleman applies for a pension he applies to the Principal Secretary, who refers the matter, I suppose, to the chief clerk or to yourself to report upon it?—The chief clerk would would be called upon to report upon it; it would pass through my hands to the chief clerk.

1516. Do you consider yourself bound to make any inquiries into the private means of those who apply for pensions?—No.

1517. Because I see that the Diplomatic Committee of 1831 says, "In addition to these restrictions, the Committee are desirous of checking by some positive rules a practice which has prevailed to a considerable extent, of giving retired pensions to diplomatic servants having sufficient private fortunes?"—That was the recommendation of the Committee, but I do not think that any rule of that kind was ever laid down for the diplomatic service. In the Pension Act for political pensions, a rule of that kind, I think, was laid down, but no such rule exists, I believe, for the diplomatic service. At the same time, practically, looking through the list, I imagine that you would hardly put your finger upon any of these gentlemen whose private means were such as to enable them entirely to dispense with their pension.

1518. But if a man who you thought had private means applied to you, would you say to him that he ought not to ask for a pension because his prospects were so good?—I could only say to him what was said in the case of Lord Londonderry; Lord Londonderry applied for a pension, and I think Lord Liverpool minuted, "This is too bad," and the pension was not given.

1519. Then you think that the fact of a man having so-called good prospects, deprives him of his right to a pension?—I will not say if a man has good prospects, but if a man has good actual means he should not have a pension; it must be present means, not prospective means, unless he is in that state in which some people can afford to maintain their sons or their relatives, allowing them so large an amount of income during their life as to make them independent, which would put them in a position which would be covered by that doctrine, viz., that his means were too great to entitle him to a pension.

1520. With whom do Mr. Barnard at Coburg, Mr. Morier at Darmstadt, Mr. Burnley at Dresden, and Mr. Russell at Rome, correspond; do they write to anybody besides the principal secretary?—Only officially to the Principal Secretary of State; that is to say, they would correspond with the Foreign Office exactly on the same footing on which any ambassador or minister would correspond with the Foreign Office. On a question of mere common detail, they might write to the Under Secretary, but as a general rule all their numbered despatches would be addressed to the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. I really am only just guarding myself from giving you a positive negative answer, though, I believe, I might give you very safely a positive negative answer.

1521. Does not Mr. Russell send copies of his Despatches to Sir Augustus Paget?—He would not as of course send them to Sir Augustus Paget; he is perfectly independent at Rome; but he would send his Despatches under flying seal to Sir Augustus Paget, as he would send them under flying seal to Lord Lyons.

1522. With regard to the interchange of employment between the second and third secretaries and junior clerks in the Foreign Office, have you ever remarked that the junior clerks in the Foreign Office, if anxious to exchange, preferred what are called the agreeable posts in the diplomatic service?—No, I will not say that; I should say that a clerk wishing to exchange finds a person, without reference so much to the post he occupies, but who is willing to exchange with him. I have known clerks go to this or that post of importance, and sometimes to an unimportant post; but as a general rule we should discountenance an exchange between a clerk and the secretary at a mission of inferior importance. Of our two clerks now abroad, one is at Berlin, and the other is at Florence, though at present in Rome assisting Mr. Russell. As a general rule, I should say that, if the point had to be decided, I think that both my colleague and myself would prefer for them to go to some important place.

1523. Do you know of any instances of the money allowed for house rent being sufficient to pay for the houses in which the heads of the missions live?—That is a question which I am unable to answer; I think I have seen a complaint made to that effect. In former times, perhaps, a man might not only get his house, but get a little furniture in addition; but, as a general rule, the allowance for house rent will not cover the charge for bare walls.

1524. Therefore, generally, I think a minister has to pay something out of his own pocket for his house? — Yes; he has either to pay dearly for an unfurnished house, or still more dearly for a furnished house. A question was asked me the last time I was here, which I may answer in reference to the question which you have asked me now, namely, about the Paris house. I said then that the Paris house was insufficiently furnished, and required a great deal more furniture in it. I have inquired about that, and the answer which I have received is, that there is hardly any furniture in the Paris house beyond the strict necessaries, and that anything in the shape of ornamental furniture must be found by the ambassador.

1525. Are you aware that the furniture in some of the rooms in the embassy house in Paris is in rags?—I am not aware of that myself, not having been to Paris recently.

1526. Has it been repaired?—Any communication on that subject would have been addressed to the Office of Works, which has charge of the house.

1527. The embassy house at Paris is entirely under the Board of Works, is it?—Yes.

1528. With regard to pensions, there was an Act passed allowing Members of Parliament, who had served in the diplomatic service, to receive pensions, was there not?—Yes; that is to say, enabling a man to sit in Parliament holding his pension. It was a doubtful point, and the Act was passed to clear it up.

1529. You say, in answer to Question 73, "I should not consider that it was a duty obligatory upon the second secretary to collect materials for the first secretary"?—Yes.

1530. It often happens that the first secretary becomes chargé d'affaires, does it not?—Yes.

1531. Do you think that the second secretary then is not bound to assist his chief, when he becomes chief, in that way?—It is a question which one can hardly answer, because it presupposes indisposition to assist one's friends in the legations, where we hope that they are all friends together, and all assist each other. But if the question were put to us officially, whether it was the duty of the second secretary to assist the the chargé d'affaires, not in the performance of his public duty, you may say, but in the performance of his personal duty, namely, making his report, I should myself say that it was not his duty. But I should hope that no question of that sort would ever arise, because it implies a want of good fellowship in the mission, which I do not believe exists in any mission, and which the Foreign Office would certainly very much deplore; and I think it is a sort of question which would, in all probability, never be raised before the Foreign Office, because it is a thing which is arranged among the men themselves.

1532. You say, in answer to Question 116, "It would be very hard, and especially hard now, to appropriate to that class of officers" (namely consuls) "however meritorious any of the few posts which are reserved for those gentlemen who have been trained up in diplomacy"?—Yes, but I think that the question should be read also, because my answer hangs upon the question.

1533. You are asked, "Supposing that a consul generally acquitted himself well in the office of consul general, would there be any objection to his having a diplomatic appointment?" and your answer is, "Of course there would be no objection to him or to anybody else, but as a general rule I should not say that they would be promoted. It would be very hard, and especially hard now, to appropriate to that class of officers, however meritorious, any of the few posts which are reserved for those gentlemen who have been trained up in diplomacy"?—That is my opinion still.

1535. Third secretaries do not of necessity become second secretaries, and second secretaries do not of necessity become first secretaries of legation?—One cannot say "of necessity," but as a general rule they do in succession.

1536. But do you not know any instances of men being at legations which have been made embassies, and their seniors being at legations which were not made embassies, and where those secretaries of embassy have been promoted because they were secretaries of embassy?—For instance, Berlin was a mission with a secretary of legation. It was created an embassy, and as far as I remember the secretary of legation was made secretary of embassy. I cannot say that if he were a junior secretary he would, in such a case, be made secretary of embassy; but if a mission like Berlin should be raised to an embassy, in all probability the secretary of legation would be quite a senior man.

1537. But then those secretaries of embassy take rank over senior secretaries of legation?—They do of course. You are only speaking now of course of the secretaries of embassy.

1538. Do you know any instance of a man losing in salary by promotion to the post of secretary of embassy?—I am not able to carry it in my mind.

1539. If you will look in the Foreign Office List you will see that Mr. Lowther was secretary of legation in 1858 at St. Petersburgh; he was then in the receipt of 700*l.* pay, and 250*l.* extra. If you refer to the list you will see that Mr. Lowther went to Berlin in 1859; Berlin was then made an embassy, and he received as pay 900*l.*, losing 50*l.* by promotion; do you think that that is right?—The only thing that I can say to that is to refer you to Mr. Canning's rule. Mr. Canning's rule was, that because promotion was so slow between the office of secretary of legation and secretary of embassy, as a compensation for the privation of advancement, he allowed the secretary of legation 250*l.* a year, after a service of ten years, extra, but when the secretary of legation got the promotion as secretary of embassy there was no longer the same occasion, according to Mr. Canning's rule, for giving him that extra allowance. That, I presume, is a rule for which nobody now living is answerable, but it is a rule laid down by Mr. Canning, on the ground of the slowness of promotion.

1540. Do you think it would be wise to alter Mr. Canning's rule?—Mr. Canning was a great man, and a rule which he laid down was no doubt well considered, and, on the whole, I should not be disposed to alter it.

1541. You think it, on the whole, not unfair that a man should lose 50*l.* a year by promotion?—He gets additional rank; he pays 50*l.* a year for his additional rank, and he gets an equivalent; of course, in every profession there must be certain rules, and especially in a profession in which we are tied down about money. If you will allow the Foreign Office as much money as we choose to spend we will be as liberal paymasters as possible, but as we really are tied down, and every halfpenny we spend is canvassed, it is hard to find fault with us for not being as liberal as our inclination prompts us to be.

1542. In your answer to Question 147, you alluded to a Paper that you put in, giving an account of correspondence; will you state what correspondence that is?—It is the whole correspondence of the office, taken from our registers. Every paper that comes into the office, and goes out of the office, in the several divisions, is entered in the diary, and that Paper that I put in was the total of the diaries of the respective divisions for the year.

1543. When you speak of papers, does that term include letters?—Everything; not the enclosures of the letters, but everything in the way of letters and circulars.

1544. When you spoke in reference to Darmstadt, of "its territorial sovereignty over one of the most important fortresses on the Rhine, now occupied by a Prussian garrison," did you allude to Mayence?—Yes, Mayence was the one I alluded to; the papers said Dantzic, but it was Mayence.

1545. Do you know of any instances of applications having been made to you by heads of missions for extra hands, and the Foreign Office not being able to supply them?—Several, I think; very many of the foreign missions, even when at the fullest, cry out for additional assistance, and we have no means of supplying them; and when the men are on leave from the mission, of course they are very hardly pressed, but we have no reserve to draw on.

1546. In answer to Question 253, "Do you look upon the consular service as essentially commercial only, and upon the diplomatic service as essentially political"? You say, "Generally so." Can you tell me what number of commercial Despatches you have received this year from Paris?—I can answer for 129; how many more there are I cannot say. Since I was asked that question by one of the Members, my attention being drawn to the matter, I afterwards noticed the number 129 on one of the commercial despatches.

1547. With regard to the houses of our ambassadors and ministers, have you ever made a calculation of what the house at Constantinople would have cost the country if it had not been bought but we had hired a house?—It was quite impossible to hire a house at Constantinople.

1548. It was quite necessary to build that house?—Indispensably necessary to build that house. As I said in my evidence the other day, I was at Constantinople in 1831, shortly after the fire, which destroyed the house at Pera. We lived then in two wretched wooden houses on the Bosphorus, bitterly cold, with the north-east wind coming down the Bosphorus. That went on for a great number of years whilst they were debating the questions how they should build, where they should build, and how much money they should spend. The thing at last got so intolerable, and the houses so ricketty, that the embassy was obliged to come into Pera. They got two or three wooden houses; I think we paid 1,500 l. a year for them. We patched them up to enable the embassy to find some quarters in town till the house was built. I can answer for the house on the Bosphorus, in the year 1831, being very pleasant in summer when the weather was moderately warm, and the wind did not blow very strong; but when the weather was warm and the wind blew strong, I was obliged to shut the window because otherwise I could hardly sit in the room. I remember a gentlemen whom many of you may have known, lying in bed with the rheumatism, with a brazier on each side of him, in order to keep himself tolerably warm.

1549. It is necessary that the embassy house at Constantinople should be surrounded by a large garden, is it not?—It is necessary, unquestionably, for protection from fire. When a fire gets well hold of Constantinople, they have no water and no engines to put it out with.

1550. What did the building of the embassy house and the garden cost the Government?—I can hardly tell you exactly what it cost. The buildings were all lumped together, and the returns are before the Committee, for the building of the house, and of the consular buildings, and the chapel, and I think also for the building of the hospital. Not having the accounts ourselves, the matter being entirely under the Office of Works, we were obliged to obtain from them that statement which Mr. Rylands moved for, and it is their return, although presented by ourselves.

1551. If sold, would it fetch the money paid for it, do you think?—It would depend in the first place upon whether there would be any purchaser for it; I doubt it very much. Every embassy has got its own house there, and nobody but an ambassador would require a house of that size.

1552. If the house and garden at Paris were sold, it would fetch a large sum, would it not?—Yes; but we should have to give in interest very much more than we should get in principal. I perfectly remember the time, a good many years ago, when the house at Paris was in a state of great dilapidation and required thorough repair, and then the embassy was transferred to the Faubourg St. Germain, and if I do not mistake, we were paying at the rate of 3,500 l. a year for that house; it was something enormous.

1553. Mr. Otway.] How many years ago was that?—Twenty years, or perhaps 30 years, ago; it was a large house just behind the Chamber of Deputies, in one of those streets there; a beautiful house it was, and I have always heard that, expensive as the house at Paris is, if we were obliged to lodge our embassy in any other quarter, we should, after selling the present house, have to pay in rent very much more in proportion than we should obtain in principal. I know a house in London, certainly very inadequate for ambassadorial purposes as regards proper reception rooms, the rent of which, without garden or anything, unfurnished, was 2,500 l. a year.

1554. Mr. Lowther.] The French embassy has a house at Pera and at Therapia, and so have the Austrian and Russian embassies, have they not?—Yes, and other missions; I believe all the foreign missions at Constantinople have a country house as well as a town house.

1555. Can you at all account for the large prices that the heads of missions have to pay for their houses abroad?—No, I have no means of accounting for that of my own knowledge; I see that it is the same everywhere, and I have always heard, as to Paris, that though now they have built a great number of large houses, houses suitable for the occupation of the upper classes of society, still not only has that great increase of house room not contributed to render house rent lower, but, in point of fact, house rent is very much higher now in the liveable portion of Paris, than it was in former times.

1556. I think that when Lord Augustus Loftus was in want of a house at Berlin, somebody was sent from the Board of Works?—I dare say. I know only so much of the house at Berlin, that we had the greatest possible difficulty in getting Lord Augustus Loftus lodged; I do not remember the arrangement, but I think the house was taken on Government account for several years, and I believe that Lord Augustus Loftus' house rent may cover the rent of that house. But the difficulty abroad for an ambassador or minister is this, that he is liable to be removed, and therefore he cannot venture to take a house upon lease: consequently we have been obliged, in one or two cases, to take a house upon a lease for the mission. At St. Petersburgh, for instance, Lord Napier took the embassy house on account of the Government. He found that he could not get a suitable house on a lease under 1,200 l., his house rent being 1,000 l. at the time; and it was arranged with him that 200 l. should should be taken from his salary, in order to eke out his house rent when the house was taken by the Government.

1557. The lease is taken in the name of the Government?—Yes, I believe it is. I know it is in Madrid.

1558. And you oblige the man to take that house?—If it is taken in the name of the Government, he must take the house.

1559. Therefore, a man with a large family may take a very large house, and may be succeeded by a single man who only wants a small house, half the size, but he takes that house and pays for what he does not want out of his own money?—It is a choice of evils. It is much better for a single man to have a house found him, with all appliances, than to be living in an hotel for several months. I believe, at Vienna, that Lord Bloomfield had to wait a long while before he could get a house. The French ambassador was months and months out of a proper house. Of course you may say that it is a hardship, but as long as you do not call upon a minister to spend more for his house rent than his allowance, I do not see that there is any particular hardship in putting him into a house taken by Government; because we do not expect him to save anything out of his house rent; house rent is assigned to him on the supposition that he may get a house for that amount; it is not as an additional allowance to him for his eating and drinking and table, but for lodging himself. If he can get a house for the money assigned to him, well and good, but at the same time I believe that, in many instances, a minister cannot do it. It certainly is a hardship to the minister in that case; but then it comes again to this, the Foreign Office would be very glad indeed to relieve the minister from any inconvenience of that kind, but they have not the power.

1560. And when a new head of a mission arrives, he is expected to set himself up at once?—I cannot say that he is expected to do so, but it is assumed that he would.

1561. He does?—As soon as he can get a house.

1563. Has that never been brought forward?—It is an obvious thing; I may make an exception. As to one court I was told that for the first year, however hospitably a man might entertain people at his table, he was not expected to give a ball. I remember that being stated; I will not say where, but that I was told was the case.

1564. With regard to the duties of secretaries of legation, do you consider that they are bound to attend every day at the chancery?—The rule was laid down in a circular which you will find in the Blue Book of 1861; I should myself think that they should attend every day in the chancery, in the same manner as I attend every day in the Foreign Office. They are responsible to the minister, and through the minister to the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, and the country at large, for the detailed business of the mission being properly carried on. I consider myself responsible, and my colleagues also consider themselves responsible, that the business of the Foreign Office is properly carried on, and therefore we are in regular attendance at the office.

1565. With regard to the archives, is there any standing regulation at the Foreign Office with regard to the binding expenses?—Whenever a minister represents that the archives require to be bound, he is allowed to have them bound; we presume that a minister having an interest in the preservation of his archives would not allow them to run to confusion. There is a regulation that there shall be a register duly kept in every chancery, on the same plan as our diaries are kept, and of course the papers accumulate yearly. I do not know whether they do the binding periodically, as we do; we bind every year the correspondence of the year next but one preceding; but unbound archives in the missions do not accumulate so fast as ours, and they may be bound once in three or four years; but whenever they required binding, the minister would write, or ought to write, to the Foreign Office, and say that "the archives require binding, and he proposes to charge the expense in the extraordinary account"; and we invariably say "Yes." We encourage the proper keeping of the archives.

1566. Are you aware that in many missions a great many of the archives are not bound at all?—If they are not, it is the fault of the minister; if complaint had been made of any foreign mission that the archives were allowed to get into confusion from want of binding, and if we were told that they were not bound, we should desire them to be bound.

1567. When a minister leaves, the chargé d'affaires generally, or, I believe, always, writes and says that he has handed over to him the archives and the service of plate?—I cannot say whether or not he does it always; it is a matter of routine, and, strictly speaking, he ought to do so. We send a formal instruction, "You will represent Mr. So-and-so as chargé d'affaires, and you (the minister) will make over to him the archives, plate, and any other public property, that there may be at the mission." Whether the minister reports always in so many words that he has done so I am not prepared to say.

1568. Who has the chief control of the archives?—The chief controller of the archives is the head of the mission for the time being, just in the same manner as, on behalf of the Queen, the Secretary of State has the charge of all the archives of the Secretary of State's Office. The archives in the Secretary of State's Office are the Sovereign's property and under the charge of the Secretary of State; a minister, the head of the mission for the time being, has charge of the archives abroad.

1569. But he cannot himself go and look into the archives and put away the despatches, and so forth?—I presume that is a chancery arrangement, according to the distribution of the work in the chancery.

1570. Who has power to destroy papers?—I know of no power to destroy papers.

1571. Do not you think it would be well that such a power should be given?—No.

1572. Are you not aware that there are hundreds and hundreds of merely official notes that come to an embassy; sending a slave trade warrant and so forth?—I would not sanction their destruction. I know that I have been very much put to in preparing papers for Parliament from missing a despatch merely saying, "I transmit to you herewith such-and-such a paper." That seems a very slight matter, but those little trifles, which appear trifles at the moment, you might might afterwards wish to refer to. Some question might arise about a slave-trade warrant, for instance, years after it had been issued, and it is very desirable that the mission should be able to trace anything out. No office can be properly conducted if all the archives are not preserved.

1573. What has become of the archives in Naples?—I imagine that they are at Florence, 1574. I think I understood you to say in one answer, that you worked yourself on a Sunday?—I am sorry to say I do.

1576. Is not Sunday evening the usual evening for the dispatching of a messenger from Paris?—No.

1577. Do they never send on Sunday?—Yes, but the regular messenger nights from Paris are Tuesday and Friday. A messenger may come through, or something may turn up on another day, but the regular messenger nights are Tuesday and Friday.

1578. Lord Augustus Loftus says that the work has increased tenfold since 1837, do you believe that to be a correct statement?—Yes.

1579. And the pay has not increased in proportion?—No.

1580. Are not secretaries of legation sometimes called upon to make special reports, besides the six monthly reports?—Yes.

1581. And are other secretaries called upon to do so?—They may be called upon, but they are not generally called upon by the special direction of the Secretary of State. It is difficult to answer the question absolutely. If there was a question to be ventilated abroad, and we thought that one secretary might be more conveniently employed upon that, while the secretary of legation might be employed upon something else, I do not say that we should not give directions accordingly; but, as a general rule, the secretary of legation is the person who makes the report. But, in the volume distributed this morning, you will find a report (I have no doubt a very able one), very nearly 300 pages long, from a second secretary at Berlin, upon land tenure. He was required to make it, and I am told that it is a very able report.

1582. I think that the first secretaries may report upon any subject that they like, may they not?—The rule is that the report should be on commerce or matters of general interest in the country where he resides. Of course a secretary of legation who had remained several years in a place would not think it necessary to report every year upon the commerce of the country. He would take up one year industrial questions, and another pauperism, or whatever might prove most interesting. One man, I think it was Mr. Lumley, made a most valuable report from Russia about the tea trade. They consider what is likely to be an interesting subject to the public in this country, and I have no doubt that they tell their chiefs that they are going to make the report. In one case I remember, we called upon the secretaries to make a report upon the vine disease. As a general rule, it is much better to allow a man to apply himself to a subject which he himself takes an interest in, without defining it.

1583. Do you think that the people who come into the profession now look upon it more as a profession than people used to do?—I should think they do more than people used to do 30 or 40 years ago.

1584. They think that if they come in they will remain?—I suppose they do. I never asked the question, but I suppose they do.

1585 Junior secretaries are sometimes employed in making translations, are they not?—Yes, where translations are required.

1586. And do you know whether you have often applications for payment of paid translations?—Occasionally there is a great pressure of such translations. As a general rule we should expect a secretary to be able to translate a French, or German, or Spanish, or Italian paper, but not a Russian paper, or a Danish paper, or a Dutch paper (unless he had been in the country for some time).

1587. Do you think that the feelings of the persons in the countries to whom diplomats are sent should be consulted, that is to say, that you would not think it advisable to send to St. Petersburgh a son of a baker or a butcher?—Not as an attaché certainly.

1588. Or as the head of a mission?—Supposing that he had graduated up, you mean? It is a question really hardly admitting of an answer, because it is a thing so very little likely to occur.

1589. Mr. Otway.] It has no practical bearing?—No practical bearing.

1590. Mr. William Lowther.] Do you know any instances yourself of confidence having been betrayed by any of the junior members of the profession?—I am happy to say that I do not.

1591. Mr. Rylands.] Or by any person employed in binding the archives?—I believe the process is that they always bind them in the mission.

1592. But in the Foreign Office?—I never knew anything get out from our office.

1593. Not from the binder?—Neither from the binder, nor from the printer, nor anybody, except in one particular instance. An exception may prove the rule. It was not for purposes of the Foreign Office, but I think there is a tradition in the office that on one occasion a great many years ago, for another office, they were making a collection of speeches (I will not characterise the speeches) which had been made at different meetings in the country, and they were being printed privately at the office. An untrustworthy printer was employed on that, and it transpired through him that that collection was being printed. But I have never known any single thing get out connected with the Foreign Office of any kind which ought not to have got out.

1594. Then the binders of the archives have proved to be quite as trustworthy as the clerks?—Everything is done in the office.

1595. Mr. Eastwick.] Is your binder bound to secrecy?—We never bind anybody to secrecy; it is a sure way to make him break confidence.

1596. Mr. William Lowther.] Are you aware when Despatches are bound abroad that they generally put one of the gentlemen to watch over him while he is binding them?—Not of my own knowledge, but I conceive that the heads of missions would see that proper care was taken of the archives.

1597. I think you intimated the other day that a journey to Rio or Buenos Ayres was a matter of very small expense?—No, I did not intimate that. What I said the other day was, that a minister inister being on full salary during the voyage, nd being fed by the ship, probably his passage oney would fall far short of the money that he as receiving as full salary. He is perhaps 30 or 5 days going out, and pays 70 l. for his passage nd his food. Now his salary for those 35 days ould amount to more than 70 l.

1598. Mr. Baring.] That is supposing him to alone?—Yes, supposing him to be alone, of urse; but even if he is taking his family with im, a salary of 3,000 l. a year is something un- r 10 l. a day, and he draws, during his passage nd for 10 days before he sets out, perhaps 350 l. r 400 l., so that his passage money is not very uch in excess, if at all in excess, of what he is rawing for salary during the time, for he is kept he whole time on board ship.

1599. Mr. William Lowther.] With regard to utfit, supposing a first secretary of legation is oved from Lisbon to Madrid, what would his utfit be?—One half of the regular outfit; that , one-sixth of his salary. The full outfit is ne-third of the salary.

1600. And supposing that he is moved to the mbassy at Berlin, what would it be?—He would hen have two-thirds of his outfit on his promo- ion.

1601. Would you tell me what has become of he plate at Naples?—There never was any ublic plate, that I know of, at Naples. It is ot in the list that I put in the other day. Mr. Temple may have had plate of his own.

1602. With regard to outfits, the sums seem ather large, but I suppose that a man entering he diplomatic profession has not much money to egin with as an attaché?—I am afraid not uch.

1603. He then gets 150 l., then 250 l., then 00 l., and then 700 l. a year?—Yes.

1604. During that time I suppose he is not ble to lay by much?—I am afraid not.

1605. Then he is named minister, or he may ven be made ambassador at some big post; he as then to expend a large sum of money in buy- ng carriages, horses, furniture, and various hings; do you think that is likely?—Certainly.

1606. Then he begins to entertain, and his ex- enses increase?—Yes.

1607. Taking that into consideration, do you hink that the outfits to the embassies are now as arge as they ought to be?—That is one of the ubjects which it is very painful for me to speak bout. I know that a man cannot establish him- elf upon his outfit, and I should be very glad o see enough granted him to establish himself n. I should like to set him free at the post; to ut him in the house, and then let him begin to ntertain on his salary. But, as I said before, ne's inclination is not the master in that matter; ve cannot ask for the money which we should e very glad to see given to our ministers abroad o enable them to meet those expenses. It is very hard and very cruel upon them.

1608. Do you know of any instances of diplo- mats, successful in their career, having amassed large fortunes, or indeed any fortunes?—It is impossible for me to answer that question. I do not know of any.

1609. Then you would not look upon it as a very lucrative profession?—I look upon it as a most ruinous profession in point of money.

1610. It has been rather suggested that in- formation might be obtained about different countries through the newspapers: you recol- lect when the Zollverein came into existence?—I cannot recall any details to my memory.

1611. It was some time ago; before 1840?—Yes, I think it was before 1840.

1612. Do you recollect an article, two or three years ago, in "The Times," suggesting that Prussia should join the Zollverein?—No; I am afraid that I have so much to do in business that I can read the papers but very slightly indeed.

1613. Do you think that the correspondents of the papers give a colouring to their corres- pondence which is desired by those for whom they write?—I cannot undertake to answer any question about the press.

1614. Do you think that our diplomatic agents abroad write only what they think will suit the convenience of their Government?—I should be sorry to think so badly of any of our public servants as to suppose that they would not state honestly and fairly their opinions. They would be bad public servants if they did not.

1615. You think they sometimes write what is disagreeable to their own Government?—If they have anything disagreeable to say, they should say it.

1616. And they do say it?—I should say so.

1617. Do you think that it would be possible, or that it would be beneficial, to send secretaries of legation to the South American coast, with some other title beyond that of chargé d'affaires?—I think it would be extremely desirable in some, if not in all the South American missions, that our ministers should have the title of minister resident, or minister plenipotentiary, as the case may be. That is what other nations do. The United States do it universally, I think, and some of the other nations do it. I think it might be done without any increase of expenditure; at least I would try to do it with- out any increase of expenditure, and I believe that it would not only be very satisfactory to the men themselves, as a just reward for long service, but also very much improve their posi- tion in the country in which they resided.

1618. Chairman.] What states do you apply that to?—To South America generally; Chili and Peru are the principal ones, but in Columbia, Venezuela, Central America, and Montevideo, I would be very glad to have a minister, and I very much regret that we have appointed, from economy, our minister at Buenos Ayres, a chargé d'affaires at Montevideo, also at Buenos Ayres.

1619. Mr. Butler-Johnstone.] Have you not received great complaints from Montevideo as to the smallness of the salary of our consul there?—I believe very serious complaints have been made, but my colleague will be able to answer that better than I can.

1620. Mr. Kinnaird.] Has there not been a memorial from Major Munro, stating the exact expenditure in respect of his salary, and of the mission at Montevideo?—Yes, and that shall be put in.

1621. Mr. Butler-Johnstone.] Are you inclined to think those complaints with regard to the salary of our consul well founded?—Yes, I am; I should like to state that at the time of the abolition of the post of chargé d'affaires at Monte- video, it was I who recommended the amount of the salary of the consul to be appointed there, but I am now of opinion that I estimated that salary at too low a figure.

1622. Mr. Otway.] Is it not the fact that there has been a certain sum assigned to Major Munro for the providing of a clerk, and he states that there is no clerk to be provided in that country, except at a very much larger sum than that which the Government gave him for that purpose?—I saw something of the kind the other day, I cannot exactly remember now what it was; you are probably right, but the last paper that passed through my hands was an excuse that he could not do his duty as he ought to do it, because the salary would not allow him to obtain sufficient clerical assistance.

1623. Mr. Baring.] Sir Henry Elliott suggested that it would be desirable to reduce the number of secretaries to some of the legations, and in cases of illness or emergency to supply their places with clerks from the present Foreign Office; how do you think that would work?—We could not supply them from the Foreign Office; we have only barely enough to do our current business. And in addition to that it would just amount to the same thing. As far as I understand Sir Henry Elliott's statement, putting it in figures to make myself more understood, it was this. Supposing he has now four secretaries, he says that three are quite sufficient to do the current work, but that it would be necessary that those three should have their regular leaves in succession, and that as two could not do the current work, the Foreign Office must send a person to supply the place of the man on leave; and that I presume will not simply apply to the embassy at Constantinople but to all our embassies. Well, the effect of that would be that we must keep a sort of co-operative store of clerks or secretaries to draw upon as there might be a demand for them. These would be second secretaries to all intents and purposes, and of the most expensive kind, because although you may send a second secretary at a low salary (and we do that I am sorry to say) to live at a place two or three years, yet he can take a lodging, and perhaps make some economical arrangement, but if you send a second secretary from England for three months, you must pay him much more liberally than you would pay your regular second secretary, because he would be obliged to live expensively at an hotel, probably at double the expense that he would otherwise incur. In addition to that a second secretary, with all his ability, on first going to a mission cannot be as useful to the mission as if he regularly belonged to it. A man will require perhaps two or three months to acclimatise himself to the mission, to know the ways of business in the mission, and the papers in the mission. Moreover, in another way it would not answer I think, because as we hold it to be a very important part of the duty of a second secretary to have friends and acquaintances in the place, and go into society, a new man coming to a place would not be able to be of the same use in that respect that a man regularly attached to the mission would be; and practically you would keep a mission with the same number of men, but not so useful and much more expensive. That, I believe, is the upshot of the proposal.

1625. Mr. William Lowther.] In Question 304 this question is put to you: "The present system, in fact, shuts out the sons of poor clergymen, or of gentlemen of small means, or the sons of tradesmen who may have acquired a university education, and are otherwise suited to fill positions in the public service." Do you think that the son of a poor clergyman or gentleman of small means if he took a good degree would go into the diplomatic profession?—I do not believe that he could afford the expense.

1626. A man who took a good degree would probably become a fellow?—In all probability.

1627. And he would in course of time go to the bar, and in course of time to Parliament perhaps, and would thereby find a shorter means of making his fortune?—Certainly; and what I observed the other day I believe is perfectly true, that under the new system at the university, professorships and things of that sort hold out so much inducement to men to stay at the University that, I know in one particular college, they have a great difficulty in finding fellows, except quite juniors, to go out and take Church preferment.

1628. Mr. Rylands.] In reference to the vacancies, you stated that as a matter of course pensioners could not be asked to serve unless there was a vacancy; can you say whether during the last five years, during which there have been several vacancies in embassies and missions, any one of the gentlemen on the list of pensioners has been asked to serve in any of those cases?—It is a matter which I am not competent to speak about; appointments to missions, as all other appointments, rest entirely with the Secretary of State; I cannot say whether they have been; indeed, it is a question which I could scarcely answer with propriety, because the next question, of course, might be, "Why were they not?" and that would rest with the Secretary of State to answer.

1629. I ask whether within your knowledge any of these pensioners have been nominated to the appointments of vacant missions and embassies?—I remember that Sir Charles Wyke was called into active service in that way.

1630. Mr. Otway.] As the Permanent Under Secretary of State, you have no power to increase or diminish a pension, or to grant or refuse a pension to any person in the diplomatic service?—Not the slightest.

1631. You have read section 11 of the Act of last year, providing for the payment of diplomatic salaries and pensions, "If any person who is in receipt of a pension or temporary allowance under this Act, and has not attained the age of 60 years, and is not incapacitated by infirmity of mind or body (proved to the satisfaction of the Secretary of State by a medical certificate or otherwise), refuses, when required so to do by the Secretary of State, to proceed to any mission which is of the same rank as that in respect of which his pension was granted, or to some mission of higher rank, he shall forfeit his right to the pension and allowance." Is not that in your opinion an imperative condition?—It rather turns upon what "refusal" is. If the Secretary of State were to press the man and say, "I require you to go there," then it would come within that provision; but if the Secretary of State were to ask a man, "Would you like to go there?" and the man were to say, "No, I would rather not go there for some reason or other," that would not to my mind amount to a refusal to go.

1632. You have been asked several questions ith regard to the admission to the diplomatic rvice, and to the Foreign Office also; do you nsider, from your long experience in the oreign Office, that if there were any general eling of discontent at the system under which lmissions to these two services obtain, you uld be ignorant of it? — Certainly not; a eneral feeling must come within my knowledge.

1633. Are you aware of any general expression discontent on the part of the country?—No, I n not aware of it; I have seen it alluded to, t as to its being the general impression, my n conviction is, that the country is very well ntent with the present system, as a whole.

1634. Would you not feel justified in saying, at if not content, at any rate they are indiffe- ent to it?—Certainly they are indifferent to it, they would have expressed their discontent.

1635. A question was asked you with refer- nce to the admission of the sons of small adesmen, and, I think, even the son of a utcher; have there been any complaints from ne butchers, or small tradesmen, of the exclu- on of that class?—I have never heard any mplaint of the kind.

1636. Do you think, from your knowledge of ne diplomatic service, that it would be condu- ive to the interest of the public service, looking the state of society in such capitals as specially St. Petersburgh, Vienna, Paris, and Berlin (and I do not know whether I would ven exclude Washington), that the sons of small radesmen, a respectable class society but still f that social position, should form members of ur diplomatic body?—I think that it would be tterly out of the question; and I believe that he same rule as is laid down in our own service, pplies in every diplomatic service in the orld.

1637. I was just going to ask you, whether it s not within your own knowledge that the iplomatic service in every other country is nanned, very much I may say, from the same lass of society as ours?—Very much, as ap- ears from the papers that I have referred to efore the Committee.

1638. You have mentioned, and Lord Malmes- ury has mentioned, the great confidence that very one who has had to do with the Foreign Office must repose in every one employed in it, ith regard to their discretion and their honour. Could you feel that same confidence in a class of nen who might be learned and excellent men, ut who had come into the office on public com- etition, and without their character being known o those who appointed them?—I am unwilling o enter on that point. But the principle on hich open competition is proposed to be worked, s, I believe, that the people who by that means ome into an office should not be employed in onfidential business. I think that is the general mpression as regards open competition. I cer- ainly think that it is very desirable in the oreign Office for carrying on the business of he office, and for the discipline of the office, that ll the men should be in the habit of mixing with ach other on equal terms in society. If another lass of people were introduced, who did not ork with the members of the office on friendly erms, we should be obliged to employ many nore hands in the office, for we should not get he work done in anything like the time. I ave no hesitation in saying, that half of the merit of our office consists in the means that we have of dispatching almost an inconceivable amount of business in an inconceivably short space of time, and that you can only do with good fellowship, and social fellowship, amongst the clerks in the office, and that prevails to an extent which nobody but those practically conversant with the office can appreciate. Long as I have been in the office, I have never known the clerks in the office daunted by any amount of work, or shrink from any amount of sacrifice. The work will be done. It will be a give and take thing among the clerks. If I say to any division, or more than one division, "This or that thing must be done in a certain time," I am as sure that it will be done as if I had already seen it done; and that can only be managed by an office in which what is commonly called a good esprit de corps prevails.

1639. Take the duties of a resident clerk; he must necessarily be in possession in critical times of very important and early information, before you, or I, or the Secretary of State even know it?—Yes.

1640. Is there any instance in your knowledge of the confidence reposed in those gentlemen being betrayed?—I have never known, as regards a resident clerk, or any clerk in the office, anything to transpire that ought not to transpire.

1641. Necessarily, then, a system which has been carried on with such success for so long a time you would feel very much averse to disturbing?—I think that it would be perfectly ruinous to alter the system. Our system has gone on now for a great number of years, I was going to say unchanged, and that not merely as going on in the ordinary groove, but because it has been found to work well in every respect; otherwise as, under Lord Palmerston, we made it ourselves, we should alter it ourselves; and you know as well as I do, and some of the Members of the Committee may know, that the system which was in force 16, and indeed many more, years ago with respect to the general arrangement of the business of the office, is now in force, and we cannot improve upon it, and I do not think any person could improve upon it.

1642. My question referred entirely to the class of men who come into the office?—The system of our office is that there should be no secrecy among ourselves. A junior clerk is admitted into the confidence of the office as much as any senior who has been there for 20 years.

1643. I think it may fairly be said, may it not, that the Foreign Office is somewhat special, and that that does not apply to other offices which applies to the Foreign Office?—It is a special office from the special nature of the business, and from the fact that the business must be done out of hand, so to say.

1644. And that is of a very confidential character? — Yes, it is of a very confidential character, and comes in at uncertain hours and uncertain times, and must be done on the spur of the moment.

1645. To apply the system of the Foreign Office to ordinary commercial arrangements, do you think that any merchant would employ a young man in a position of the greatest confidence of whom he knew nothing, who had come to him merely from passing a successful examination?—I should think that he would not. I can hardly say on what principle a merchant would would regulate his counting-house, but I should think that in all probability he would inquire very much into his character, and not only that, but probably exercise a greater watch over a young man, and know more of his whereabouts out of office hours than we think necessary.

1646. Several questions have been put to you with regard to promotions in the service, and I observe that in one answer you instanced the facility with which certain gentlemen in the office procured rapidly a Paper (it was a Paper, I believe, which I required that you alluded to); does not work of that kind afford both to you and to whoever may be filling the office of Parliamentary Under Secretary at the time, an opportunity of judging of the capacity and willingness of a man in the office?—Yes, certainly.

1647. Therefore, do you think that under those circumstances the Secretary of State, having the aid of the advice of the two Under Secretaries, who must naturally be cognisant of the power of work, and of the willingness to work of those under them, would have any difficulty in promoting men according to their ascertained merits, rather than as at present, almost entirely by seniority?—He would have no difficulty in doing that, but there is a great deal of difficulty in saying that a man ought to be passed over. I have had a great deal of experience in that sort of thing, and I have found that when, as I have said before, I have had occasion to recommend that a person's promotion should be delayed, that person has turned out afterwards (I will not mention names) one of the most able men in his generation, and one whom we could with great difficulty have spared from the office. I certainly was instrumental in stopping that person's promotion for a certain time for a good reason. When I say instrumental, I wish the Committee to understand that it was not my own act alone, but also that of my colleague for the time being. The thing was discussed between us, and very anxiously discussed, and our duty was to lay the case before the Secretary of State. The Secretary of State was guided in that matter by our opinion; and at a future time, when the person who had been so unfortunate had shown that he was deserving of being promoted, my colleague and myself, having consulted together, and having taken the best means we could in the office of ascertaining the merits of the man, represented the case as we always do to the Secretary of State, and he in his judgment decided upon our representation.

1648. The Secretary of State selects a man for the post of minister or ambassador; can you see therefore any reason why he should not exercise the same responsibility in selecting a man from the office for a higher post than that which he now fills, according to his supposed merit?—Not the least; and I say that I have known instances in which a person has been promoted out of his turn.

1649. Still the rule of promotion, and it is a rule with rare exceptions, is by seniority?—You would not pass over a man unless it was really hopeless to give him his promotion; that is a thing in which you have not had the experience which I have had, so as to know how thoroughly painful it is to have to come to a decision of that kind; it has at times given me many an anxious night to decide such a point.

1650. Does it not seem to you that the Secretary of State would have a great advantage by the recommendation of these young men, and the reports of their efficiency being made to him by the Under Secretaries?—A Secretary of State would in all probability not promote a person in the office unless he had taken the opinion of the Under Secretaries of State. The usual process is, that when a vacancy occurs, the matter comes to me in the first instance, and I refer to my colleague, saying that there is a vacancy, "So-and-so is the first, do you see any reason why he should not be promoted?" and he returns me an answer, and our two opinions go to the Secretary of State.

1651. With regard to Question 514, you were asked there about Wurtemburg. Are you aware whether the French Government maintain a diplomatic representation with Wurtemburg?—The French Government maintain a diplomatic mission at Stuttgardt, consisting of a minister, with a salary of 1,800 l. a year, two secretaries, two attachés, and a chancellor. They also maintain a separate mission at Baden, consisting of a Minister, with a salary of 2,000 l. a year, two secretaries, two attachés, and a chancellor. The British Minister at Stuttgardt, who is also accredited to Baden, receives a salary of 2,000 l. a year.

1652. There were a number of questions asked you with regard to the German missions, running from Question 507 to Question 518. Have you any remarks that you would like to make on that subject?—I wish to say, with regard to that, that the United States maintain a diplomatic representative with the character of a minister of the third class at Brussels, the Hague, Copenhagen, Stockholm, Athens, Lisbon, and Berne. They are not in diplomatic relations with Bavaria, Saxony, Wurtemburg, Darmstadt, or Coburg; but they maintain a consul and vice consul at Munich, the former with a salary of 300 l. a year; a consul and vice consul at Dresden, the former paid by fees; a consul at Stuttgardt, with a salary of about 200 l. a year; and a consul general at Frankfort, with a salary of about 600 l. a year. If, as suggested, we were to reduce our missions at the courts above mentioned, to which the United States appoint ministers, to the lower rank of chargés d'affaires, the position of the country in Europe would be disparaged, and with that its influence entirely destroyed. I would refer the Committee to a better witness than myself on this subject, namely, to Lord Palmerston's evidence given before the Committee on Official Salaries in 1850, at Questions 654 to 693, page 72 and the following pages. Then I would further beg leave to say that the cost of the United States diplomatic service, as appears from their official returns, amounts to not less than 85,000 l. a year. Lord Palmerston said, in giving evidence before the Committee, on official salaries, in answer to Question 413, page 50, "The position of the United States renders their European diplomacy a matter to them of very secondary importance; they are separated from Europe by the Atlantic; they have no direct interest in most of the things that pass in Europe, and the chief thing that they want is information." Then I would go on to say that the cost of the United States consular service amounts to 108,000 l. a year. But it is not, perhaps, an unfair thing, in contrasting the cost of those services in the two countries to consider also the proportion between tween the expenditures of the two countries, not for political, but for merely commercial interests, and to see which is the most economical. Perhaps the Committee will be surprised to learn that we are considerably the most economical. I will put in a detailed Paper with reference to that. It is rather a curious calculation, but for every one pound expended by Great Britain in the diplomatic service we protect 2,439 l. of trade and 101 tons of shipping, while the United States, for every pound expended, protect only 2,082 l. of trade, and 80 tons of shipping. For the consular service, one pound in our service protects 2,050 l. of trade, and 85 tons of shipping, and in the United States, 1,647 l. of trade, and 63 tons of shipping; the total result being that we protect 760 l. more of trade by our aggregate services, and 43 tons more of shipping, for every pound expended than the United States protect. (The Statement was handed in). Then a question has been raised outside of this Committee as to the amount of our naval protection in China, as compared with the naval protection of the United States. I think the statement was that the United States only employed nine ships of war to protect the United States trade in Australia, the East Indies, China, and Japan. I have only the accurate sum as regards China; but we have above 37,000,000 l. of direct British export and import trade to protect in China, including trade between China and India, and the United States have 2,230,755 l. to protect. We have British ships entered and cleared in China to the number of 7,165, with a tonnage of 3,332,092 tons; while the United States have 3,623 ships entered and cleared, with a tonnage of 2,232,327 tons. In addition to that, I may say that exclusive of the trade between China and India, the British Indian trade with foreign countries, which is also under the protection of our ships in those seas, amounts to very nearly 23,000,000 l. sterling; I cannot give you the Australian trade. The direct foreign trade from the East Indies to all countries, China included, is 32,000,000 l., and I have given 9,000,000 l. for the opium trade, leaving 23,000,000 l. for the rest of the trade.

1653. Mr. Holms.] Have you taken the fees all off?—No, because it comes as broad as it is long whether you pay by fees or by vote of Parliament. The difference is this, that if you pay by fees you tax a portion of the community to maintain your consuls, and if by vote of Parliament, you tax the whole community.

1654. But a difference will arise from the fees not being returned in our case, and being returned in the case of the Americans?—They are returned in our case. The difference is this, that our fees apply to 39 articles, and the American fees to 109. I have put in a table to day on that point.

1655. But our arrangements for having fees returned are very defective?—No; I beg your pardon, our arrangements are not defective.

4 April 1870.

1656. Mr. Otway.] IN answer to some questions of mine, you have spoken of the confidential character of the business generally conducted in the Foreign Office, and you adverted to the circumstance that the youngest clerk in that office was by the system of the office necessarily cognisant of business of that confidential character; there is one department, is there not, where the business, as a rule, is not of so confidential a character; indeed, I may say not of a confidential character at all, namely, the commercial department?—It very much depends upon circumstances. In the ordinary routine of commercial and consular business it is not confidential; but if there is a treaty or a negotiation with a foreign power that is necessarily most confidential, because it would be a great mischief both as regards this country and as regards the power with which you are negotiating, if the confidential communications between offices in this country, or the intentions of the Government in dealing with the questions turning upon those negotiations, were allowed to transpire. Therefore, I cannot say that the consular and the commercial departments are not equally confidential with other departments. It is true that they have not so much confidential business to transact, but still every clerk in that division has access to the register and to the papers, and may be employed in a pressure of business upon the most confidential matters relating to an important commercial negotiation, and I am unable, and should be very reluctant, to draw a distinction between it and of what is strictly political business.

1657. Disregarding for a moment the contingency to which you have alluded, and also setting aside for a moment any opinion that you may have formed as to the comparative expenditure which would be caused by the employment of different classes of persons, is it not the fact that the great bulk of the work in the commercial department, such as consular and commercial despatches, is such as might be copied by any person without the public service in any way suffering?—The difficulty there as in other divisions would be in mixing in the office two different classes of persons. And moreover, what I feel most strongly is this, that we look to a clerk when he comes as a junior into the Foreign Office eventually rising to senior stations, and I am quite sure that no person can properly conduct business in a senior station unless he knows from the beginning by practical experience all the little petty routine of the office which falls, as you may say, to the lot of the junior clerks in the consular as well as in other divisions.

1658. Those are considerations unquestionably of importance; but setting them aside for the moment and reverting to the question, is it not the fact that the great bulk of the consular and commercial despatches, for instance, 99 out of a 100, are not of that character that any damage to the public service would be entailed by a less confidential class of clerks seeing them?—But that really involves another question. You must have in the commercial department a power of putting your whole staff upon any particular matter; and if you were to put in a certain number of clerks who would not sit in the same room with other clerks, because they would be separated as mere copying clerks (as I believe they are in most departments; we happily have none of them) under a superintendent of copyists, our consular and commercial division, I apprehend, would at times be very severely taxed to get through in proper time some of their business which is most important to the general interests of the country. My feeling is strong (and I cannot distinguish between the two matters) that we have not more clerks of a confidential class than we require to transact our confidential business in any and every department; and that if we imported into the office what may be called copying clerks at a daily rate of wage, with no hope and with no expectation of rising beyond a very limited income, we should be badly served, and all the money that we paid to them would be thrown away for the purposes of the office. We must remember that the office is an office of great importance, and it is of great consequence that every man in the office should be able in his turn, or even out of his turn, to carry on and discharge any duties that may come before him; and our numbers are adequate to that, but not more than adequate. We could not dispense with one of our

our men. If we employed copying clerks they would be an increase of expense, and disorganise and ruin the office. And then, as I have already explained, I cannot omit this further consideration in discussing the matters. In consequence of the discussions which have been going on in regard to open competition and copying clerks, I took the trouble to compare the cost of our 15 junior clerks with the cost of 15 copying clerks in the office of another Secretary of State, and the result was that our expenditure was 600*l.* or 700*l.* a year less for clerks, who would be useful to us in all times, whom we could employ on all business, and about whose conduct and general behaviour we would not have the least anxiety.

1659. But the clerks in the Foreign Office rise naturally, and their pay naturally increases with their length of service till they rise to a fair remunerating scale of pay, 800*l.* or 1,000*l.* a year. The copying clerk, I presume, would remain at the rate at which he was originally paid, so much per day or per week, according to his engagement, would he not?—Certainly; but then, as I say, we should be paying a superabundant man; we do not want him for the purposes of the office. We want our confidential clerks, every one of them; whether they rise or do not rise, or continue at a low rate of salary for a number of years, there must be confidential clerks of that number; they are, usefully to themselves and usefully to the office, with reference to their future rising, engaged in learning the A B C and the whole alphabet of their profession. I express that opinion very strongly, and I hope the Committee will bear with me in doing so. I came into the office as a junior clerk a great number of years ago, and at this very time, from day to day, almost from hour to hour, I find that the knowledge of the routine of the office that I acquired in my probation as a junior clerk, enables me not only to assist myself, but to assist the clerks around me in getting through the business of the office quickly, satisfactorily, and certainty.

1660. I can bear my own testimony to the latter part of your answer; but you are aware that my question applies to the commercial department only? — Yes; and I express that opinion with respect to all whom we call the clerks on the establishment of the office. I think we have now about 40, but practically we have only about 37.

1661. Have we not three departments in the Foreign Office; one a department of very great importance, the treaty department, the chief clerk's department, and also the librarian's department, in which a class of clerks are introduced, who are not on the establishment or on the same footing as the other clerks in the Foreign Office?—But their work is distinct from that of the other officers, and moreover they are paid at a far higher rate than a copying clerk would be. With regard to the librarian's clerks, for instance, every paper, confidential or otherwise, is open, and not only open and accessible to them, but they are necessarily obliged to make themselves acquainted with it, because our librarian's clerks are obliged to abstract shortly the despatches in order to make a register more extended than that which I put into the hands of the Chairman, which is always done as soon as possible after the papers are bound. They have also to make references of the most confidential kind to all the most confidential correspondence, and you could not employ in that business people whom you had not tried and of whom you had not full assurance that they had studied in the office and acquired the means of digesting what they read, and thereupon making those reports without which no Secretary of State, no Under Secretary of State, and no senior clerk could carry on the business of their respective divisions.

1662. Is there anything in the nature of the work in the commercial department which would prevent a class of persons being employed in that department not immediately connected with the office, as they are in the treaty department, and librarian's department, and chief clerk's department?—I should say that it would be very objectionable; but after all, it just comes to this, that you are pressing me to say that we want more clerks than we have now; I say that we cannot do without a single one of our clerks, but I say that we can do our business, political and commercial, with our present staff; and therefore if you ask me whether other clerks might not do a part of that business, I say, that if you employ such other clerks, you would be throwing money away by employing them, and paying money to people who, except as mere machines, would never be of the slightest use in the office.

1663. But as a matter of economy, it would be economical, would it not, to employ a man to copy a consular despatch, whom you paid at the rate of 30*s.* a week, rather than one to whom you would eventually have to pay 1,000*l.* a year?—That man, when you pay him 1,000*l* a year, has well earned it by the knowledge that he has acquired in the lower departments, which has fitted him for discharging those duties properly which are required of him when he receives the 1,000*l.* a year.

1664. Do you not think that, to take a young man from the University, or such men as generally enter the Foreign Office, it tends rather to damp their energies, and somewhat cramp their intellect, if for three or four years they are employed in the work of copying consular despatches?—Their energies ought not to be damped, nor would they be if the system could be pursued which ought to be pursued in every division of the office, and theoretically is pursued, of a junior member of the office being moved from one division to another after two years' service in any division. Unfortunately for myself, the consular department have at this present moment so many good clerks, that they will not part with them, though I should be very glad if I could move some of them into other divisions.

1665. You were asked a question about the archives. Has the public service received any damage, or any hindrance, from the destruction of the archives in the fire at the Constantinople Embassy?—We were obliged to supply the principal archives, at a large expense of public money. Of course we did not possess the means of providing the Turkish documents; but I forget the sum (I could tell you, if you wished, by referring to our accounts) which was paid for copying the public despatches for a great number of years, in order to send them out to supply the archives at Constantinople. The Turkish papers were lost, and in that same calamity, I believe (and I am glad to refer to this), a gentleman, who was then acting as one of our senior dragomans for political business, namely, Mr. Frederick Pisani, lost a work on which he had been long engaged, and which would have been most useful to the public and to those who live in Turkey, but which, in his advanced age, I believe he has not yet been able to restore.

1666. There was a duplicate of all those papers in the Foreign Office, was there not?—A duplicate of the despatches, but not of the papers in the Turkish language, which are not sent home. I can hardly tell you where those are kept at Constantinople; whether they are kept by the dragomans, or in the embassy. That fire swept everything away, private and public property, and private and public residences, and the loss was very severe in every respect.

1667. Mr. Rylands.] Have you any reason to suppose that British interests suffered in consequence of the destruction of those papers?—It is impossible for me to say; the fire took place in 1831, when I was a very junior clerk, and I cannot say what inconvenience, or whether any, may have been experienced at Constantinople from the want of those papers which were then destroyed. For myself I should be inclined to think, judging from the experience of the Foreign Office, that it would have been a severe and daily loss and inconvenience to be deprived of documents which, however apparently worthless, might have been required to be referred to in the daily and hourly transactions which we have with the Porte, with the consulates, and with private persons having interests in Turkey.

1668. Mr. Otway.] When are the papers sent to the State Paper Office; after how long?—We keep them as long as we have room to keep them; I believe that we now are able to keep in the office the entire correspondence from the year 1783.

1669. Chairman.] Have you got it all in the office from 1783?—We have got it all. In former times, before the new building was erected, we were obliged to deposit in the State Paper Office, papers even of 20 or 30 years' standing, and the inconvenience was so serious that we were very glad when the new office was built to discover that there was an entire story in the office which could be appropriated to our own manuscripts or printed library, and the vast accumulation of papers of different kinds which, in an office like ours, is sure in the course of time to be got together: we have now, for the first time, access to a library of very valuable printed books, which fills rooms above 110 feet long, and are piled up nearly to the ceiling, and all through the rooms. Those books are very valuable both for their worth and for daily reference, for our own purposes; and it is only since we have got into the new office that we have had ready access to them; in the old office, in Downing-street, they were put in cellars and in rickety rooms where there was not the slightest protection from fire, not the slightest means of access to them, no catalogue, and no means of knowing what we had. When we went into the house in Whitehall Gardens there was a large kitchen, cellars, and some rooms adjoining, in which we managed to pile the books, and make a catalogue of them. Now we have got a proper library, and certainly I was never more surprised in my life (and I believe the librarian was equally surprised) when I found the vast accumulation of valuable books which we possessed, but never before had any means of access to.

1670. Viscount Barrington.] You speak of them as being "piled up" now; are they in book shelves?—Yes; I rather take a pride in that library, and if any gentleman of the Committee likes to call on me any day, I should be very glad to show him over it.

1671. Mr. Otway.] Do not you think that there would be some advantage in appointing to each mission a chancelier, on the French system, to take charge of the archives, and who would hand down the traditions, so to speak, of the legation when a new chief came in?—I do not think that it would be desirable, except in a place like Constantinople or Paris, where the archives are very voluminous; there we cannot well dispense with such an officer, for they are so voluminous. I said the other day that Paris was provided with a copy of every important political paper that came into the Foreign Office; but the objection to that system of a resident chancelier is this, that under such a system the secretaries and attachés would never have occasion to exert themselves to study and to make themselves acquainted with the business of the mission in which they were employed; they would rely upon the archivist, and the minister in his turn would be more likely to employ a man who had ready access to and knowledge of the archives, than his own secretaries; and that would be a very mischievous thing, and it would do what I think as a general rule is objectionable, namely, domicile a man perpetually in the same place. And besides that, you must remember that that chancelier must have his leave of absence, and when he goes you would have one of the secretaries called upon to supply his place, without any knowledge of the papers, without any interest in the papers, and therefore perfectly unable to give the minister, or the office generally that assistance which a minister and the office expect to find from persons well acquainted with the archives, which every attaché, and minister in fact, ought to be. I conceive that when a minister goes to a place, if he has not before he took his departure read up the correspondence in the Foreign Office, or generally acquainted himself with it, the first thing that he would do would be to send for the registers, and go through the registers, or the important correspondence, for himself, in order to make himself acquainted with it; he would not choose to depend absolutely upon another person with whom he had no personal connection, and over whom you may say he had only a precarious control.

1672. But in the case of archives, going back so far as those to which you have alluded, the frequent transfer of secretaries, every two years, for instance, would prevent them from obtaining that acquaintance with the archives, if they properly discharged their duties, that the chancelier, if always there, would obtain?—I do not mean to say it is necessary that every secretary, or every clerk of the Foreign Office, should know the correspondence of 50 years, but he should know how and where to put his hand upon it, and how to get at it; and that he would never rest or trouble himself to do if he were taught depend upon the librarian's department, or chancellor. I know that even in the Foreign ce we have some difficulty at certain times of sure to make our clerks work the cases out for nselves, rather than refer to the librarian. have a standing rule (I do not mean to say it is generally acted upon) that it is only in ard to correspondence going back for many rs that the librarian is called upon to make abstract. Strictly speaking, the abstract ght to be made, if it goes back only a few rs, by the clerks in their respective divisions, they find, with the pressure of other business, t it is more convenient, and more expeditious, haps, for them to refer to the librarian's de- tment. I think it is not a good plan, but n you must remember that those clerks of s are constantly looking through the corre- ndence, and looking at the correspondence, l tracing papers out, and making abstracts minutes, and therefore they do not depend entirely upon a permanent officer, like the rarian, for obtaining that information, and that erest in the papers which would be, I am sure, nerally the case in missions if an archivist re attached to each. And I think, if I do t mistake, that at the present time, since this mmittee has sat, but certainly in the Com- ittee of 1861, an objection similar to that which am now taking, was taken against attaching discriminately to missions officers such as a ancellor. But as regards the term "chan- llor," I do not believe that the chancellors in e foreign chanceries have that access to the chives which is supposed. I believe that their uties are different; they are not archivists. We ve an archivist at Paris, a registrar we call m, and we have another at Constantinople, and owhere else; and I confess, myself, I think it ould be an unnecessary expenditure of public oney, and injurious to the public service, if we tended such appointments beyond those two laces.

1673. My question had reference to the ap- ointment of a man filling the office of chance- er; the chancelier draws out notarial acts, and pies unimportant political despatches in the rench service, and performs other duties be- des attending to the archives; my question was hether the appointment of such an officer as at would not be advantageous, inasmuch as he ould have a more intimate knowledge of the rchives, and you would have a man performing t the same time other duties of the legation, and ould thereby be enabled to relieve the staff of e legation?—I honestly tell you that I do not ink it would answer on any grounds. In the rst place, I do not think that we want in our iplomatic chanceries a person competent to raw notarial acts. It is no part of their iplomatic duties, properly so called, to do hat; as I understand your definition of the uties of a chancellor, I believe it to be orrect. A chancellor is not what is considered trictly speaking a confidential employé of the ission; and my contention is this, that you annot safely and conveniently, or for the benefit f the public service, have any person in a ission who is not trusted, and to be trusted ntirely with every paper, and all secret and onfidential information that comes into the mission. Our registrar at Paris is Mr. Atlee, who was for many years Lord Cowley's private secretary, and therefore a person upon whom the most implicit confidence can be placed. Our archivist at Constantinople is Count Alexander Pisani, who has been, I believe, 50 years in the service, has acquitted himself honourably and uprightly throughout the whole of his career, and who, I believe, is a man whose like you could hardly find in any other public service.

1674. Yet that discrimination is constantly shown, is it not, between work that can be confided only to members of the embassy and the service, and work which others can be called in to perform; take for instance the case of translations?—A translation is generally of a document which is public in its nature. A printed paper or a lithograph paper may come into the hands of a mission, which it is very desirable should be sent home in translation to the Secretary of State's office. But I am not aware that what you would call confidential correspondence of the Government or of the minister would be placed in the hands of a translator, so to say, out of doors, in order to have a translation of it.

1675. Mr. Rylands.] If the junior secretaries of legation, the second and third secretaries, were not moved from post to post, would it not be practicable to attach to the position of under secretary of legation the duties of an archivist?—It would be very injurious to the public service to fix the men permanently at certain posts.

1676. I am quite aware that you are very much in favour of moving the under secretaries of legation from post to post; bnt I ask you whether, supposing that they were not so moved from post to post, but were attached more permanently to missions, this particular duty could not be assigned to them with their other duties?—Of course it could; but in seeking to attain that end you would be doing a great deal of harm to the service.

1677. In the small missions you actually do attach the duties of archivist to the under secretaries of legation?—That is to say, in the same manner as in the Foreign Office. In each division of our office the papers are kept in the division for about two years. They do not go into the library till you may say the divisions have done with them. Every one of our clerks in the office is, as regards the correspondence of two years, you may say, an archivist; he arranges the papers and puts them by, and sorts them. But then that is quite a different thing from keeping a man permanently in the post.

1678. However, the fact is that, in the smaller missions, the duties of archivist are fulfilled by the under secretaries of legation; and I asked you whether that might not be extended to the larger missions, provided that there were not such constant change amongst the under secretaries of legation?—In regard to the larger missions, I have named the only ones where we have archivists that remain permanently, and where there is no question of moving them at all. They are not diplomatic attachés, except so far as honour is concerned; they are not in the diplomatic career.

1679. However, there is no absolute reason why

4 April 1870.

why they should not be, I presume?—No, there is no absolute reason why they should not; but then we do not think that it is desirable that a person should, if he is to rise in the diplomatic service, remain permanently at one post. His mind becomes stagnant if he does; he has no incentive to exertion; he does not qualify himself by general knowledge to occupy those posts to which in due succession he ought to attain, and always may hope to attain.

1680. Mr. Otway.] You have been asked several questions about the Foreign Office agencies; the contemplated change will inflict very serious loss on these gentlemen, will it not?—A very serious loss indeed.

1681. Have they shown, at any time, any obstruction to this change, or have they not, on the other hand, shown a perfect willingness to meet all the schemes that have been propounded, and confidence in the justice of the House of Commons with regard to their case?—They have shown the most perfect submission, and the most complete desire to co-operate with the wishes of the House of Commons. They know, and regret, that their friends, for whom they have acted as agents, will be most seriously inconvenienced by the change of system; they know that they themselves will suffer great pecuniary loss, but they have submitted to it with resignation, in the full belief and hope that when their case is fairly stated by themselves, and those who are interested in their behalf, to the House of Commons and to the Treasury, they will be justly compensated, as it always has been held that they should be compensated, and as the House of Commons, as shown in the paper that the agents have put in, have recognised to be the right, and the just due of public servants who have been allowed to undertake private agencies, but who, from motives of policy, or other motives, have been directed to abstain from continuing to do so.

1682. Mr. Kinnaird.] Has any answer been obtained from the Treasury as to the arrangement proposed to be made for the convenience of ministers and consuls in the suppression of Foreign Office agencies?—No answer has yet been received. The Treasury have doubtless been, during the last two months, fully engrossed with preparing the Estimates, and other financial matters, for Parliament. The Estimates are now presented, and I trust that they will very soon be able to give us an answer. It becomes now really to us a very serious matter to have that answer soon. We have undertaken that the agencies shall cease on the 30th of November next. We wish and intend to effect that; but unless we are soon able to notify to our ministers and consuls in distant quarters of the world that the heretofore existing arrangements will come to an end on that day, and that they must make their arrangements for receiving their salaries, or for getting their correspondence irrespective of those facilities which were extended to them by the agency system, they will be put to very serious inconvenience; and I honestly that say I am getting very anxious as to how many of our servants will be able to obtain their salaries, which will fall due to them on the 31st of December next.

1683. Chairman.] Are the agencies actually put an end to, or is it only contemplated that they will be put an end to?—The agents go on transacting their business and receiving their percentage till the 30th of November next. Of course it was necessary to allow them to go on in order to give such notice to the members of the diplomatic and consular services as would admit of those members making other arrangements.

1684. And notice has been given to all the service that the system will terminate on that date?—We are precluded from giving notice, except what has been stated in Parliament, because with that formal notice we must be able to say how the men are to get their salaries, and what arrangements, if any, can be made for their correspondence.

1685. And as yet that no such arrangement have been made?—No such arrangements have as yet been made, and it is that that we are waiting to hear about from the Treasury. A circular was drawn of the same date as that letter which I put in as being addressed to the Treasury, but that circular was suspended because it was felt that unless we told our people what system could be substituted for the system about to die out, they would be very much embarrassed, and the whole thing would get into greater confusion than it is in now.

1686. Mr. Otway.] Still, as a matter of fact the public declaration in Parliament, independent of communications from the Foreign Office, has informed every member of the diplomatic and consular services that on the 30th of November the present system of agencies will come to an end?—I consider that it has.

1687. Mr. Arthur Russell.] There have been no complaints from the members of the diplomatic service against the agency system, have there?—I believe that the general feeling in the diplomatic and consular services is one of unmixed regret at the abolition of a system which has served them, under which their convenience has been greatly consulted, under which they have made many personal friends, and from which their connection with the Foreign Office has been most close.

1688. What was the origin of the agitation against the system of agencies?—That is one of those mysterious things which I do not feel either disposed or competent to attempt to elucidate.

1689. It came entirely from outside the diplomatic service?—There may have been, as there are in all services, a certain number of grumblers, but I believe, and I know, in fact, that some of those who have grumbled are now loudest in deploring that they have to seek elsewhere the services which they have obtained from their agents; and on their behalf I do deplore it, because I am perfectly certain that if they are obliged to have recourse to private agents (I do not mean their bankers, who would receive their salaries as mere ordinary banking transactions) properly so called, our servants abroad will have to pay infinitely more in one way or other for the services which they obtain from those people, and those services will not be so efficient, and in one particular respect cannot be so efficient, for of course we could not allow an out-of-door agent to have continual access to the Foreign Office, and to be able to send abroad under official seal papers and letters, and so on, to this or that person; and therefore whatever money may be paid to a private agent, our consuls and our ministers will not receive through their means the protection for their correspond-. and will lose the convenience of having

-ionally small parcels forwarded to them
r official seal, which they now enjoy. It be a great deprivation to them; they feel it ely, and I feel it as severely for them as do themselves.

690. Mr. Butler-Johnstone.] If that is the taken by the Foreign Office of the agitation at these agencies, why did the Foreign e yield to an agitation which they thought asonable?—The Foreign Office is a welled office; we are obliged to submit. If a nber gets up in the House of Commons, or if blic newspaper says, "Here there is fraud, here there is oppression," we cannot descend the arena of the newspapers, neither can we upon our colleague in the House of Commons efend or explain all those minute points.

691. Why not?—Because they are matters of il, and I am afraid that, however kindly dis-ed the House of Commons may be to listen he grievances of public servants, they would er be disposed to pay close attention to such a ter, and could not be expected to go into all minute details of a question of the kind, which s necessary to enter into, in order fully to reciate it. We have submitted to that. We not wish to go in the teeth of the House of mmons or public opinion. We have yielded that, and all that we now ask of the House of mmons, and all that we now ask of the public large is, that they should do justice to those pers who have been deprived of an emolument ich they have enjoyed for a long period, and en taught to look forward to as assured to them.

692. Then am I to understand that if there s a newspaper article advocating the abolition the Foreign Office, the Foreign Office would once collapse without making any defence?— at would be a public misfortune.

693. Is not the other?—No, the other you y say is a private wrong, and there is consider-le distinction between a public and a private ong.

694. Mr. Lowther.] Was a man in the diplo-tic profession obliged to have an agent or not?
Certainly not obliged.

695. Then supposing that all the gentlemen the diplomatic profession declined to have ents, the agents would by force of circumnces have been disestablished?—They would ve collapsed.

696. Then would any compensation have been en to them?—No compensation would have en due then, because their collapsing would ve been the result not of a force imposed upon em, but of the voluntary withdrawal of the nfidence of those by whom they were then ployed. No compensation was due to an ent because, on the change of an ambassador, e new ambassador had another agent different m that of his predecessor. The one agent t by the change, and his successor gained it.

697. Mr. Rylands.] I think that Mr. James Murray was formerly a Foreign Office agent?—Yes.

1698. When he was appointed assistant under secretary he gave up the agency?—Yes.

1699. Is there anything at all inconsistent in the assistant under secretary holding a Foreign Office agency?—I should say that an under secretary should not hold an agency; it never has been the practice. The institution of agencies always contemplated that clerks should hold them.

1700. Then I am right in supposing that it was a condition of the terms of a Foreign Office agency that the person fulfilling those duties should be a clerk in the Foreign Office?—Yes.

1701. Does it come within your knowledge that when Mr. Murray was appointed assistant under secretary he sent a circular round to his different connexions abroad?—I know nothing of what Mr. Murray may have done; all I know is that Mr. Murray told me the day he was appointed under secretary that he had renounced his agencies.

1702. Have you any knowledge as to whether he received compensation or payment for goodwill on transferring his Foreign Office agencies to Mr. Bidwell?—I know nothing of any such transactions.

1703. I presume that the fact of a Foreign Office agency being connected with the position of clerk in the Foreign Office would not prevent the Secretary of State from removing such clerk or pensioning him if his health gave way?—Certainly not; a person can only be an agent during the tenure of his office of clerk.

1704. In such a case would there be any claim for compensation?—Of course there would not be, for his emoluments and employment as agent would cease with his emoluments and employment as a clerk.

1705. It is at the option of the Foreign Secretary to withdraw him from his position on a pension?—Of course; I must guard myself by saying that an arbitrary dismissal is not to be contemplated.

1706. Even if he did arbitrarily dismiss him, he would not be called upon for compensation?—It is essential to the position of an agent in the Foreign Office that he should be a clerk in the Foreign Office, and if he ceased to be a clerk in the Foreign Office he would cease to be an agent.

1707. And not receive any compensation?—He would not have any claim to any compensation, because he would not have a claim to any other compensation if he retired as a clerk, than that provided by Act of Parliament as superannuation.

1708. Does Mr. Bidwell continue to perform his duties as clerk in the Foreign Office?—He does.

1709. What leave of absence has he had lately?—I cannot tell you that, but my colleague can; his usual leave, I presume.

1710. Is his health such as to permit him to attend here as a witness?—I conclude it is. I see him but seldom, because he is entirely on the other side of the office. Our rooms are 300 feet apart, and I am not often inclined to walk that distance in the office without absolute necessity.

1711. I understand that he is in a very much worse position for walking than you are?—He

—He is attending to the duties of his office; but he is in Mr. Otway's division, and Mr. Otway can say better than I can what he is capable of doing.

1712. Mr. Kinnaird.] With regard to the answer given by you to Question 1434, do you happen to know at what rate the dollar has been depreciated, and have you heard what effect the depreciation in the value of gold in the United States is likely to have on the salary of our minister at Washington?—Mr. Thornton, who is our minister there, mentioned to me, in a private letter of the 8th of March of this year, that this would be the effect: "The paper currency has been steadily increasing in value. When I arrived here, gold was at about 150 in paper currency; it is now 112; so that, at this rate, my salary will be about 9,000 dollars less in paper currency than it was last year, and yet I do not find that at Washington the price of anything has gone down." Now I wish to be allowed to say to the Committee, that the position of our minister at Washington is peculiar. He is obliged, perhaps more than any other minister (I do not say ambassador), to open his house and his table liberally in order to receive the ministers, senators, and influential persons in the United States. It is expected of the British Minister that he should do so. In the United States, I believe that there is a great personal friendship and esteem for the British Minister, so to say in the abstract, and, I am sure most deservedly so, for the present occupant of that office. Mr. Thornton is therefore obliged, and will be obliged, to continue his hospitality on diminished means, unless it please this Committee to take into consideration not only that his salary, when gold was at 150, was wholly inadequate to maintain the expense which for the interest of the country he ought to incur, but that he is now much more deprived of the means of meeting that expense by the great depreciation in the value of gold. It is really a thing which is very well deserving the attention of any persons who look at the relations between this country and the United States, and who know how strong the real feeling in the United States is, as I believe, in favour of this country. There may be, as we all know, on the surface, storms, hard words, ill-natured language, but you may depend upon it that under those hard words, storms, and ill-natured language there is an under current of good feeling which tends to make the United States draw closer and closer to this country, and to feel in the prosperity and welfare of this country a kindred interest, for they know and feel that, in time to come, those of the Anglo-Saxon race may have to stand shoulder to shoulder in support of civilisation and progress; and it is greatly our interest, and it ought to be our pride and our desire, not to damp that good feeling by discouraging the disposition of the influential persons in the United States to look upon the British Minister as the representative of a kindred nation, and of a sovereign whom they justly respect and admire.

1713. Mr. Otway.] Those observations generally, with regard to expenditure, apply to the consul at New York also, do they not?—They apply to all our consuls in the United States. I only alluded then to the minister, because I expect hereafter that the Committee will permit me to plead before them the cause of our consuls generally, and of those in the United States in particular, who are impoverished and absolutely ruined by the great expense of living in those countries, and which is rendered still more impossible for them to meet by the alteration in the value of gold.

1714. Chairman.] They are not paid in paper they are paid in gold, are they not?—Yes; but while they could formerly get for their gold 150 paper dollars, they only now get 112.

1715. Assuming that prices vary immediately as the paper varies, that would be an advantage to them?—But the prices have not varied; the prices remain the same, but their power of purchasing has diminished.

1716. Assuming that that had been the case and that they got 150 dollars, as you say, the payment in gold would have been a rise of their salaries virtually?—Yes, but it would be what was only required to enable them to meet the expenditure which, without that increase, they would not have had the means of meeting.

1717. I understand you to say, that prices having been inflated, owing to the paper currency, now that the price of gold has gone down the prices have not depreciated correspondingly —Just so, the prices are the same, but the purchasing power is less.

1718. Mr. Rylands.] Taking the purchasing power of gold, you say the purchasing power of gold is less now than it was a few months ago?—Less now, as I read from Mr. Thornton's letter, by 38, namely, the difference between gold at 150, and gold at 112. That is a month ago; I daresay it is much less now.

1719. Mr. Kinnaird.] You said something in answer to Question 1552 about the house and garden at Paris; has the Foreign Office any reliable information as to what a house suitable for the British embassy could be obtained for at Paris?—In consequence of what passed in the Committee the other day, I have endeavoured to ascertain how that matter stood, and this is the result of my inquiry. It would be very seldom that a house like that of the British embassy could be hired at Paris at all, but supposing that one could be hired, the rent would not be less than 5,000 l. a year unfurnished, and to furnish it decently for Paris would cost not less than 20,000 l. To find a house from time to time suitable for an embassy would be next to impossible, and no ambassador could afford to set himself up properly in one unless he had a large private fortune. The only chance of obtaining a good hotel would be in the Faubourg St. Germain, and that would be a very inconvenient situation for British subjects. In the eyes of the French official and social world, the present embassy house contributes greatly to the support of the dignity and prestige of the embassy. There is at present a foreign embassy at Paris looking out for a house, but they have not yet been able to find anything that will do. They have obtained temporary accommodation, but they could not get on at all without a large private fortune. The British embassy house was purchased of the Princess Borghese in 1814 for about 20,000 l., and the furniture and stables cost about 16,000 l. more, in all 36,000 l. The value of the house and land on which it stands was estimated in 1868 at 140,000 l.

1720. Mr. Richard Shaw.] I understand you to say that the Foreign Office have given notice

f their intention to abolish agencies in deference o the expressed wish of the House; when did he House express that wish?—It was not a vote f the House, but it was the general tenor of a iscussion which took place in the House. We re so much disposed to meet the wish of the Iouse in everything that we do not care to wait or a formal vote, but we endeavour to conform ur conduct to the sentiments of the House as e may gather them from the debates.

1721. Mr. Eastwick.] You have complaints om Tehran, I suppose, as to the loss which ur diplomatic officers have incurred there, owing o the difference in the rate of exchange?—I annot remember any specific complaint being ade. I saw some allusion the other day to the lteration of the rate of exchange; it was men- ioned incidentally, but I do not think it was ientioned in the form of a complaint; at least ot such a complaint as was officially brought efore us to take cognizance of or to decide pon.

1722. You are aware that the Russian Mission ere receive their salaries in gold?—I am not at ll aware how they are paid.

1723. Can you state if diplomatic or consular fficers enjoy any immunities as regards proceed- gs for debt?—The diplomatic officers do; the onsular officers do not in European countries; ut I daresay that in the East they do, though if it ere a question of strict right they have no rivilege that we could uphold, except in Tur- ey or in Persia. If immunity is extended to id enjoyed by the French or Russian consuls, e of course might claim it under the ordinary most favoured nation" clause; but the strict le among European countries is that a consular fficer has no privileges whatever unless by a pecial consular treaty, of which treaties we have ne, such privileges are secured to him.

1724. Would you consider it injurious to the ublic interest that any diplomatic or consular fficer should be constantly in debt?—I agree in e Minute of the Treasury, that a man in debt is ot a good public servant; his time is engrossed by is pecuniary embarrassments, and his mind dis- acted from those duties which he ought to be ble to perform irrespective of any private feel- gs or anxieties.

1725. But, may I ask, are any precautions ken against such cases arising?—I do not know hat precautions the Secretary of State or the oreign Office could take against a man's private xpenditure outrunning his means. We could nly take measures upon such a matter if com- laints were made to us, and the case brought fficially before us. Then it would be for the ecretary of State to judge how he would deal ith such cases. I cannot say how he would eal with them. I must wait, in the words of a urkish Minister, till the child is born and then I ill tell its sex.

1726. In case of a consular officer giving a ond with the consular seal on it for a private ebt, would you consider it incumbent on the oreign Office to enforce his paying it?—I ould rather not answer the question till I saw he case with all the circumstances before me. I ight give an opinion which might be construed o apply to another and different case, which pinion I might not have given if I had had the acts of that case before me.

1727. Mr. Otway.] With regard to the question asked by Mr. Eastwick, is it not very rare indeed that complaints are made of debt against men in the services?—Very rare indeed.

1728. Is it not the custom of the Secretary of State invariably, when a complaint of that nature does occur, to require an explanation immediately from the person complained of?—As a general rule we should send the complaint to the consul or any other officer; and we would leave it to his good taste and good feeling either to explain the matter to the Secretary of State, or if he was conscious of the debt to pay it. But if that milder course was not successful, I will not say that the Secretary of State might not and would not call upon the man for an explanation why he did not do that which it was his bounden duty to do if he continued a public servant.

1729. Mr. Lowther.] With regard to pensions, are there not sometimes disputes with the Foreign Office with regard to whether they are bound to pay them or not; a man making a claim for a pension, and the Foreign Office saying that he has not a claim?—If an application is made for a pension to the Foreign Office, of course the Foreign Office must judge whether that application is well founded, or whether a compliance with it would be consistent with the terms of the Act of Parliament applicable to the case. As regards diplomatic pensions, we have always been guided by the Act of Parliament of William 4. As regards consular persons, they come under the terms of the Superannuation Act. Formerly the Secretary of State was the judge of what diplomatic pension a man was entitled to receive consistently with the provisions of the Act of Parliament, and on having satisfied himself that a pension could properly be given under those conditions, the process would have been that he signified to the Lords of the Treasury the Queen's pleasure that such or such a pension should be granted to such or such a man. It was on his responsibility that the communication was made, and the amount of the diplomatic pension was not called in question by the Treasury, whose duty then was to submit a warrant for the Queen's signature, granting that pension. With regard to consular pensions, those are judged by the pension committee of the Treasury alone. The Secretary of State, when a man has fulfilled the conditions of age and length of service, or has been incapacitated by illness from continuing in the service, submits the case to the Treasury, with a statement according to the words of the Act of Parliament, that the man has served "with fidelity, &c."; and then the Treasury take the case into their consideration, and award to the applicant such an amount of pension as they may be empowered to do by Act of Parliament, or as they think within the provisions of the Act of Parliament ought to be awarded to him.

1730. Mr. Griffith, I think the consul at Bogota, applied for a pension, did he not?—And he received a pension.

1731. When did he apply for it?—I cannot exactly tell you the date; he applied for it when his term of service was completed.

1732. Did the Foreign Office refuse him then?—No, the Foreign Office recommended a pension to be granted to him.

1733. Did he get the pension in 1867?—In 1865; but I have no objection to say, that in regard to Mr. Griffith's pension, and the rate that should be assigned to him, a question arose between the Foreign Office and the Treasury, and that question was decided by the Treasury in favour of Mr. Griffith.

4 April 1870.

1734. Contrary to the opinion of the Foreign Office?—In a matter of that kind we submit to the decision of the Treasury. We are glad always, I am sure I myself am always glad, when the Treasury deal more liberally with a man when he is pensioned, than I might think could be done under the provisions of an Act of Parliament; I am no lawyer, and I do not profess to be competent to interpret an Act of Parliament correctly, and I should always be glad to see any opinion that I entertained on the matter, or that the Foreign Office entertained on the matter (when I am speaking of myself I mean the Foreign Office), over-ruled by the Treasury, if their decision was for the benefit of the person who applied for a pension. We never endeavour to diminish the rewards granted to a man for his service; we should much prefer to be able to increase them.

1735. But in the case of Mr. Griffith, the Foreign Office was over-ruled by the Treasury?—The Foreign Office and the Treasury took different views of the construction of the Acts of Parliament, on the case of Mr. Griffith that was laid before them. The Treasury, in matters of that kind, in regard to the Foreign Office, are omnipotent; if the Treasury say that a man shall have more or less than the Foreign Office would think him entitled to, we have only to submit to the will of the Treasury, and we have no room to make remonstrance. We should never assume and never wish to do it, to counteract the liberality of the Treasury; only we should so far guard ourselves, if the Treasury were more liberal than we felt that we could be, by holding that the act was that of the Treasury, and not the act of the Foreign Office.

1736. Viscount Barrington.] I believe that in all our large commercial firms copying machines are used; that is not the case in the diplomatic service?—No.

1737. Can you state what your objection is to the use of copying machines?—I have a very great personal objection to it, because I have suffered very much indeed from a copying machine being used in another office. The Board of Trade use one largely, and the papers come in so damp and wet that it almost gives you a cold to read them. I do not think that it answers at all. The Admiralty are now using it, to a certain extent, and in order to their employing it their papers come to us written upon what I believe is, in technical language, called flimsy. They are very unpleasant to read; they are only written on one side, and they are written very widely and take up a monstrous deal of space; and for an office like ourselves who are in the habit of binding our papers, those papers will either cost double or treble the sum for binding that papers written in the ordinary way would cost, because the papers being sent on half sheets must have a guard put to every half sheet, which is, of course, not only a laborious operation but an expensive one. And it has this further inconvenience, that it helps to swell the size of the volume. I know that it is one of the economical arrangements of the present day, but, like many other economical arrangements, it is one which to us would involve, I think, much greater expenditure in binding, and not be so satisfactory for the preservation of our archives as the present system of writing upon folio paper. As I said before, we are obliged to keep all the papers that come into our office. We find at times that we are obliged to go back years and years to get at the history of a case, and if our papers were not well and securely bound if they were lost or damaged, or destroyed, we might be very often seriously put to it in important negociations from adopting a system which I, for one, very much disapprove of. If that system had been adopted from the year 1780 and our American archives of that year had been written by that process, and bound as they might have been under that process, I doubt very much whether, in those controversies which went on during the American Civil War, we should have had such ready, such certain, or such secure reference to our archives of that date as we were constantly obliged to have.

1738. At the same time, I understand your chief objection to the copying machines to be that the paper now in use is very thin?—I would go further. I object to the system because, though we have not got it in the office, I am certain that it is not nearly so expeditious as that of copying papers. Considering the process of setting your machine, of putting your papers in order, and various other little manipulations which with a copying machine require to be attended to, I feel quite sure that a paper would get copied twice over by putting it in the hands of our well trained clerks.

1739. It seems rather strange that all our large firms should make use of it, if there are these difficulties in the way?—I cannot say what the mercantile firms may do, or how they may do it; I believe that most of our mercantile firms keep their correspondence in books, that is to say, they write their letters in books. Now, of all ruinous, mischievous things for a public office to embark in, the worst is a correspondence book; you enter a draft in a book, you want to get at that draft at some future time, you are obliged to move the whole of that book in order to exhibit one paper; and if (as in our case) the papers are not confined within the walls of the office, but must travel to the Secretary of State, to the Under Secretaries of State, to the Queen, and to the Prime Minister and to all the Cabinet, I am afraid that we should have some difficulty in transporting our books whenever we wanted to communicate to any one of those parties any despatch or letter not of a current date, but of some former date, which it is desirable they should be made acquainted with. We are obliged frequently, even as it is, to unbind our volumes in order that we may be relieved from the necessity of sending our large folio volumes in circulation among ourselves at our own houses; and, with all our care, that process is very destructive to the safe keeping of our correspondence. It is for that reason that we do not bind our papers till 24 or 36 months after they have come into the office; because we are constantly obliged to examine a mass of current Papers, in order to go through any particular case; it may be necessary for my colleague and myself to have before us a box or two of papers in order to determine a single point which may turn up on any given day.

1740. Then I understand that if you want

fer to any particular despatch, and to have an despatch circulated amongst the Cabinet or ut to the Queen, you take it out of the book, nd do not have it simply copied?—It would de- end. If it were a short despatch we should opy it, if it were a mass of papers that were anted in a hurry we should have them taken ut. Of course it is a certain risk to the papers emoving them. We always return them to the brary immediately that they are done with, in rder that they may be replaced in the volumes; ut at the same time it is not a practice that I ke to see adopted, and if it were only a single aper or one of two sheets, I would have it copied the time would allow of its being done, or the lerks were sufficiently unoccupied to do it. But s a general rule we are obliged to be prepared o send out of the office papers of old standing, nd that we should never be able to do satisfac- orily if our letters were kept in a letter book. I vas asked by the American Secretary the specific uestion whether we had copying books, books of orrespondence, as I believe they have in the American Legations, and I explained to the gentleman who asked me the reason why we did not use them; that it was not only because of the nconvenience of having papers in a book, but because of the still more serious inconvenience of not having preserved the original drafts (which in most cases are for a time, and perhaps for years, preserved by us), in which corrections are made showing how the matter was worked. It happened to myself the other day that it was of importance to show how a certain letter had been altered. I could never have shown that to the satisfaction of another person, though I remembered the transaction, if the draft had been destroyed and the letter copied into another book. I sent for the draft, and there was the history of the transaction clearly made out by the corrections in the margin of the draft. It was an instance which only happened to me in the last few weeks; it was important to decide the point, and because we had the original draft and not a book to depend upon, it was possible to ascertain it.

1741. But at the same time all Cabinet Ministers, I believe, have their letters copied into a book, and do not find it inconvenient?—I cannot undertake to answer for the practice of another office. I only speak of the practice of my own. I do not know what they do with their papers. I believe in the Treasury they never bind their papers at all, or bind them rarely; but we in the Foreign Office must carry on our business for the purposes of that office in the manner which enables us to dispatch quickly and certainly any amount of business, and to make any amount of references that we may require to make.

1742. You think that the system does not answer upon a large scale, though it may answer on a small one?—It would not answer on a large scale, such as the scale of the Foreign Office. I believe that, taking the principal offices of the Government (I do not mean to include the War Office, where they have a great deal of detail), but those under the other Secretaries of State, our correspondence is perhaps the most voluminous; and I would say, that there is no correspondence kept better, and more easily to be referred to, than our own. At least I know this, as to my own practice, that if I cannot get a paper in a very few minutes I consider I have a just cause of complaint.

1743. Mr. Arthur Russell.] With regard to Return No. 7, you put in the other day, which gives the salaries paid by foreign Governments to their diplomatic agents, on what authority is that based?—It was abstracted from the returns which are in that book laid before the Committee the first day, entitled "Reports from Her Majesty's Representatives respecting the British and Foreign Diplomatic Services 1869-70." I had it abstracted from that for the convenience of the Committee

1744. Do you know anything about the extras allowed by foreign Governments to their diplomatic agents, under the name of frais de représentation?—No, I am not able to speak to that. I remember that, when looking through those returns, I observed that in the Italian service they adopted the plan of having a classification of their ministers, they receiving a certain rate of salary, according to their standing in the profession, and receiving a certain rate in the shape of frais de représentation, according to the place at which they resided.

1745. The salaries stated in that Return, No. 7, do not therefore comprise considerable allowances regularly granted?—They only comprise the salaries of the heads of missions, as stated in the return; they do not even extend to the secretaries. In that book containing the reports from Her Majesty's representatives, I believe in many cases, if not in all, you will find the salaries of the subordinate members of foreign missions, but I did not think that it was necessary to trouble the Committee with a detail of that kind, though I did think that it might be convenient to them to have the salaries of the heads of missions brought within a comparative table such as I have reduced them to.

1746. It is not a practice of foreign governments to make regular grants to the junior members of the legations for their living expenses?—I am unable to say what the practice of the foreign governments may be as to gratuities, beyond the fixed rate of salaries. I have heard that they do make grants, not only to the junior members, but to their heads of missions. That is a question obviously that we can never ask or expect to learn directly about. It would be rather invidious to ask a foreign minister or secretary, "Does your Government make you any extraordinary allowance?"

1747. The salaries entered on Return No. 7 do not by a considerable sum represent the sums granted to the heads of missions?—It represents them correctly according to the data which we have before us. I cannot say whether Ministers of foreign powers receive more than the sums set down to their names; they may or they may not do so. That is a question which I have no business to ask them to answer, and which I should think they would be very much offended with me if I did ask.

1748. Did I rightly understand you that there were no supernumeraries in our diplomatic service at present?—I believe that they all are appointed to some place or other.

1749. Do you mean by supernumeraries, attachés who have passed their examination?—No. We never have had supernumeraries. There may have been a chance person not placed. We have now two or three attachés in the office working out their six months. They are not supernumeraries; they will be immediately seized upon with avidity by some missions, which are already crying out for assistance, and which we are now unable to give them. But as to supernumeraries, in the proper sense of the word, we have not one. We have not more than enough to perform the duties required of them in our diplomatic service.

1750. Mr. Cameron.] I wish rather to press a question which I asked you in a former examination, and which it was perhaps hardly fair to expect you to give an immediate answer to without consideration, namely, whether you have any plan to suggest to the Committee to improve the position of the junior members of the diplomatic service?—I certainly have thought over the matter a great deal since I was before this Committee the first time, and I am ready to put before the Committee as my own, not as doing it by any authority, but merely as my own impression, a plan which, though it may not provide promotion for the junior members of our service, may certainly improve their position very considerably. I will put the plan in, it being distinctly understood that it is my own and not an official plan, not put in by authority of the Secretary of State. I will state generally what that plan is. It is this, that an attaché instead of waiting for an allowance till he has served four years, should at the end of two years receive a salary of 100 l.; at the end of four years he should as now receive his commission as third secretary, with a salary as now of 150 l. a year in the aggregate. When a third secretary had served for five years, I would give him 50 l. a year more, making the aggregate salary 200 l. a year as long as he remained thereafter a third secretary. I would give a second secretary, if he had served five years as such, an addition of 50 l. a year to his salary, and after he had served 10 years as such, I would make that 50 l. 100 l., wholly irrespective of any other salary that he might be drawing at the time. I would give a secretary of legation after five years' service as a secretary of legation, 100 l. a year beyond his salary, irrespective of whatever salary he might be receiving; and then when he had served his 10 years he would come upon Mr. Canning's arrangement, and receive his 250 l. a year as he does now, until he was promoted to be a secretary of embassy. I would go still further (and this I really wish to press the Committee very much indeed to consider), and to any member of our service, secretary of embassy, secretary of legation, second and third secretary, or attaché, who at Petersburg, at Constantinople, at Tehran, at Athens, at Pekin, or at Yeddo, should obtain a colloquial knowledge of the country in which he was living, so that he might be able to converse with the people without the assistance of an interpreter for all ordinary purposes, I would give, so long as he remained in the country, irrespective of any other allowance that he might be drawing, a sum of 100 l. a year. I am afraid that the Committee, and perhaps the profession, will think that I have been very niggardly. I wish I could have offered more, but if we cannot give them promotion, we must try and improve their financial means. The boon is small, but it would be a boon; it would be something for them to look forward to, and the latter clause would, I think, be a most useful encouragement to diligence and attention on the part of the junior members of our service. I will put in a Paper on that subject.

1751. Your proposal points entirely to pecuniary advantages; you do not suggest any mode of increasing chances of promotion for the junior members of the service?—That I fear I cannot do; I do not see my way to do it. And besides (it may be unpopular to say so), I do not think that it is called for. I drew a comparison the other day between the proportion of junior members in the diplomatic service, to the missions to which they might aspire, and I found that the proportion is the same, or perhaps a fraction more in favour of the junior members now than it was in the years before those five missions were abolished; that whereas before those missions were abolished, the proportion of junior members to our ministers was about $2\frac{7}{8}$ to 1; it is now, I think, about $2\frac{3}{4}$ to 1. We had in 1861, before those missions were abolished, 81 or 82 junior members of our service, and we have now 61 or 62. We had, I believe, then 21 missions to which they could aspire; we have now only 16. But the proportion between 81 and 21, and 62 and 16, is very nearly what I tell you, namely, less in either case than three junior members to one mission. And therefore, however much I should be pleased to see promotion more rapid, I do not think that the present state of the diplomatic service constitutes, as regards promotion, a new grievance to the junior members of it.

1752. Am I to understand you to say distinctly, that you think the public service could not dispense with any of the second secretaries, or third secretaries who are now employed, and that it is distinctly your opinion that there are not too many second secretaries, or of any class of secretaries now in the service?—The public service could not be conducted with fewer than there are now.

1753. Mr. Holms.] On Thursday last you were asked a number of questions about Queen's messengers; I believe that the main object of those Queen's messengers is to carry important despatches as well as Blue Books and reports in exchange for those that we receive from foreign countries?—The main object of their being employed is to carry important despatches; the other is an accidental addition to the main object.

1754. Are those important despatches usually written in cipher?—No, not when they are sent in charge of the Queen's messenger.

1755. But when sending telegraphic messages you send them in cipher?—Yes.

1756. Would it not be practically possible and as safe as the present plan, to send the great bulk of our despatches in cipher by post?—No, certainly not as safe; what the ingenuity of one man can make, the ingenuity of another man can discover and unmake; a cipher which is much used is as easily read in a foreign post office as if it were written in words.

1757. The great bulk of despatches sent by Queen's messengers, I suppose, are not of a very important character?—We send by Queen's messengers whatever there may be to be sent. Of course it may not be all of the same important character; but it would be a bad economy if we were to send by a Queen's messenger a despatch consisting of a few lines or a few pages which should ould not be sent otherwise, and did not avail urselves of that Queen's messenger to carry hatever unimportant despatches might be going. ut I should like to explain the business of the fice to you a little more fully.

1758. To interrupt you for a moment, the uestion is simply in regard to those despatches at we send out which are not of an important haracter, and I ask whether, supposing that we ad no messengers at all (if we have messengers ey may, of course, as well take them or anyhing else), those despatches which are not of an nportant character would not form the great ulk of the despatches usually sent by you?—I ave some difficulty in answering that question, ecause you interrupted me in the answer that was going to give you. Our despatches consist f two classes. One class, which perhaps you ay say is the most important, consists of the inructions of the Secretary of State to the amassador abroad. But there is another class of espatches which it frequently happens are much ore important than any instructions that the given essenger may have to carry, namely, copies of he correspondence which has been received in he Foreign Office of a secret and most confidential ature, and which we send to our missions acording to the practice of our diplomatic service, hich requires that all our Ministers and amassadors at the great courts should be perfectly nd completely informed of everything that is going on which is of interest in Europe and of nterest in the courts where they reside. We send by messengers, when we have messengers going, copies of such correspondence which we could not entrust to the post any more than the secret and confidential instructions which the ambassador receives. As I have said more than once, we send to Paris copies of every paper of the least importance that comes into the Foreign Office. The ambassador at Paris should be as well informed on public European matters as the Secretary of State in London. The despatches from Paris that may treat of things in Prussia, in Russia, in Constantinople, in Italy, or in Austria, are sent in copy to our representatives at those courts that they may be perfectly informed of, and able to deal with, any political questions that may arise, with full knowledge of the circumstances of the case. It was only the other day that one of our ambassadors wrote to me privately, and complained that he was not sufficiently supplied with copies of certain important papers on a certain subject. My excuse was that such papers had not been received at the Foreign Office; if they had been received they would have been sent to him. He thought that such despatches must have come in; it happened that no such despatches had been received. If they had they would have been sent; but if they had come in, such despatches could not have been entrusted to the mercy of the common post. As to our telegraphic despatches we put them into cipher, because we think that, at all events, they are not read by the telegraph clerk who passes them on. We think, too, that we perhaps get them more clearly transmitted in cipher than if they were in the English language, because we can generally, by the skill of our decipherers, work out a mistake which occurs in the transmission of a figure, and we cannot always do it in the transmission of a word. The ingenuity of man, however, will get the clue to any cipher if he has got enough of the cipher before him. I may mention on that subject that there was a letter which appeared in one of the Scotch papers the other day, which complained of the new telegraphic system of the Post Office in London, and held up the Post Office to blame as sending a confused and perplexed telegram which nobody could understand, and the editor pitied the person most deeply who received it. I saw that telegram in a newspaper one Sunday afternoon as I was sitting over the fire, and I looked at it. It was sent most perfectly by the telegraph. It was a transposition of words, and I read every word of it in about five minutes. And with regard to those ciphers, which are so much relied on for the transmission of messages in newspapers, I may mention that I often find great amusement in reading those ciphered messages which you see in the sensation column of the "Times." I once made out a whole love correspondence.

1759. But in the case of a country having the telegraph in their own hands and also having the postal system in their own hands, do not you think that in sending an open letter, which a telegram is, there would be quite as much risk as in sending a letter which is sealed through the post?—Happily in this country the post office is a safe and secure communication; but I cannot say of my own knowledge what it may be in the foreign countries. I do remember once having a letter brought to me which had been very cleverly opened, but very carelessly refastened in a foreign post office. I do know of that instance, because it happened to me personally a good number of years ago, with a private letter of my own; but it was very cleverly done; and I should not have discovered it, only they had forgotten to reseal it with a little gum.

1760. Mr. Otway.] It is a well ascertained fact in every Chancery that the seal is no defence at all against the opening of a letter, is it not?—I would not trust any letter of the slightest consequence to a foreign post office. I may belie them, and I hope I do, but my experience would induce me to shrink from sending anything that I did not care to be read on its road through a foreign post-office; and I dare say the foreign governments have the same opinion of the post-office in this country, but it is, I can assure them, wholly unfounded and unjust.

1761. Mr. Holms.] But you do not mean to say that you consider that a message sent by telegraph is more safe than a letter sent by the ordinary post-office; a ciphered letter sent through the post-office would be safer than a ciphered despatch sent by telegram?—It is not more safe, and not near so safe, because a decipherer might fail at constructing a cipher on two or three short telegrams, but give him two or three despatches, and he is but a poor decipherer if he does not make the cipher out of them.

1762. But if the letter is sent directly to any country, and you know very well that it is perfectly understood about what time that letter should be delivered, is there any sound reason why they should have time in the post-office to examine that letter without your having some suspicion that it has been examined?—Have you ever seen a foreign railroad post-office? I believe that they can open as many letters on their journey as they would in the post-office in the country; and besides that, they have time between the arrival of the mail and the delivery of the letters. I do not believe myself that they would open every letter. I presume that they open some letters as a matter of course, and some only accidentally; but with my name in the corner I should think my letters would have a very fair chance of being opened abroad.

1763. Mr. Kinnaird.] It is generally understood that there is a department in foreign post offices for the very purpose connected with the police?—There is supposed to be a department which goes by the general designation of the bureau noir.

1764. It is not at all an unusual thing, but it is one of the precautions of their system to open letters?—Of course I cannot say that of my own knowledge, but my impression is so strong on the subject, that I never send through a foreign post office a thing that I do not wish them to read. If it were a thing that I should wish them to read, and which I did not like to say otherwise, I would send it through the post office.

1765. Mr. Holms.] At page 8 of the reports from our Representatives Abroad, I see stated, in Lord Bloomfield's despatches, from Vienna, of the 29th of September last, that the Austrian Government employ six messengers, three at 70*l.* a year, and three at 52*l.* No doubt those men are more in the position of ordinary clerks, or porters, than anything else, but they seem to conduct their service well enough by that means. Would there be any objection to our employing a similar class of people in our service?—It is very difficult for me to draw a comparison between our wants and those of a foreign Government. All I can say is, speaking of my own service, that I should be sorry to see a different class of persons employed generally than are now employed. Of course it is impossible for me to be acquainted with the principles or system of a foreign Chancery. A matter like that might be stated in the paper, but there are many other circumstances which might throw a light upon it, and one circumstance, I suspect, is that those European countries have a long portion of their own territory to be traversed, and they do not require to send a messenger from the capital itself in the same manner as we do. We save the 100 miles between London and Calais for our Paris messenger; we send by the post office to Calais, where our messenger is waiting.

1766. You misapprehend a little the character of those messengers, because they are not confined to their own country, but they are often in other countries, and they have an additional allowance on that account. But I think, some time ago, in your evidence, you gave it as your opinion that it would be well always to have one class of persons engaged in our diplomatic service, and you also stated that other countries followed the principle of having men of a certain social standing. Now whilst in Austria they do that generally, they in this case employ people of an inferior order, and I want to know if there is anything against our employing the same class of people to do that messengers' work?—I cannot explain or justify any system employed in foreign countries. I have been told that one foreign Government has that respect for their despatches that they locked them round the person of the courier; that is to say, the small box in which the couriers' despatches were deposited, was fastened round his person, and he could only get rid of his burden at certain places or stations where the key of the fastening was kept. I cannot say that I know it of my own knowledge, but I have always understood that to be the case in one foreign service at least, and similar precautions may be taken in others. I cannot say whether they are.

1767. There are a few general questions that I would like to ask you. The first is one that I would particularly like to have your answer upon, namely, that when recommendations are made by Select Committees on the diplomatic and consular services, with whom do you consider it rests to carry out those recommendations?—I can only say, that the Secretary of State would, of course, pay all proper respect and consideration to any recommendation made by a Committee of the House of Commons, but of course I need not say that a Report of a Committee, however valuable, has not the force of law; it is not obligatory upon the Secretary of State. The Secretary of State must first judge whether, in the general interest of the public service, the Report of the Committee appears to him to be well advised, or otherwise. He must also judge whether the diminution of expense is just, in his estimation, as regards the individuals who might be affected by it. He must judge whether the House of Commons, or, in the first place, the Treasury, will sanction any increased expenditure which the Committee may recommend. And having all those points to consider, he will determine, to the best of his ability, upon the course to be pursued, and in full reliance that the Committee, even though their opinions may not have been accepted, will give him credit for good intentions, and for a just desire to do all that he can to carry them out, and will excuse what they may consider to be his shortcomings, looking to the many considerations by which he must be influenced in the decision that he comes to.

1768. Is there any permanent official in the Foreign Office whose duty it would be to draw the attention of the Secretary of State to the recommendations of such Committees?—There is no permanent official charged with that especial duty. The Secretary of State having the Report of the Committee before him, would probably consult his under secretaries, and they in their turn might consult the senior members of the office as to how that recommendation, if adopted, might work. But in regard to that, as in regard to many other matters within the province of the Foreign Office, we do not find it practicable or useful to lay down any definite or fixed rules. Our principle is from first to last that the public service is our sole consideration, and that the public service must be promoted howsoever and whensoever, and wheresoever it comes within our competence to advance it.

1769. Then the Secretary of State might in reality select any portion of the recommendations made by any Committee which he thought proper, and leave others?—I believe that the Secretary of State has always been recognised as having that power; and necessarily it should be vested in him. Recommendations of a Committee, valuable as they are, are only valuable so far as they go: they do not speak with the united voice vice of Parliament imperatively to a Secretary of State. They rather, I should say, represent to the Secretary of State the opinion of a Committee as to what would be beneficial for the public service or for the public interest, and it is left to him, subject always to being questioned in Parliament for not carrying out any recommendation of the Committee, to determine which recommendation shall be carried out, which shall be modified, and which shall be put aside altogether; and of course any member of the Committee who may be dissatisfied with the judgment and action of the Secretary of State in a matter of that kind, might and would call the attention of Parliament to it, and require the Government and the Secretary of State to account for the omission to attend to the recommendation; and then the House of Commons would decide between the Secretary of State and the Committee on the point which had been raised between them.

1770. Some very valuable suggestions were made by the Select Committee of 1850 upon Official Salaries; amongst them they recommended that the Government should "propose to the Governments of France and Turkey to convert the embassies now maintained between those countries and England into missions, and that our diplomatic establishments at Paris and Constantinople be put on the footing of first class missions." Are you aware whether there was any notice at all taken of that recommendation by the Foreign Office at that time?—I was not Under Secretary at the time; but it would have been a very singular proposal (I say it with due deference to that Committee) to have made to a foreign Government, that they should regulate the rank and position of their public servants by a suggestion of a Committee of the House of Commons. All friendly Governments have an independent action of their own; they are responsible to their legislature and people for their action; they do not receive laws, and they are not required, as a matter of international courtesy, to receive suggestions from our Parliament; and therefore I think that, whatever the Secretary of State may have done (and I do not pretend to know what he did do), the Secretary of State for the time being would have exercised a sound discretion, in which exercise he would have received the concurrence and assent of Parliament, if the matter had been brought before it, in not submitting to a foreign Government a question which a foreign Government might have thought an offensive interference with its independent prerogative.

1771. Do you know who was the permanent Under Secretary at that time, and who might give us information on that subject?—Unfortunately, he has just died. Mr. Addington, who was the Under Secretary referred to, was a man whom many gentlemen on this Committee knew; his career had been marked with great devotedness to the public service; he had served from his very youth in different situations of great importance, and great trust abroad; and he had served with ability, and to his credit, and to the advantage of the country. He had served afterwards, for many years in the Foreign Office, and I have known him from my youth, and I am sure there is no member of this Committee who did know him, who will not agree with me when I say, that he was a most meritorious public servant, and one whose loss all those who are interested in public matters may regret, and all those who were private friends of his may deplore.

1772. The Select Committee on the Diplomatic Service of 1861 made a recommendation which probably you may know something about; they recommended that "The attachéships shall, for the future, be regarded as a probationary period of four years at the most, six months of which shall be spent in the duties of the Foreign Office." Now I understand that very frequent changes of our attachés entail a very considerable expenditure; this would seem to indicate that three and a half years was about the period that would give a fair trial of an attaché in any one place?—The six months' attendance in the Foreign Office was to give him an insight into the manner of conducting and carrying on business on a large scale. No better training is possible for a young man than to be in daily intercourse with our clerks, to assist in carrying on the business of the office, and to learn all its routine.

1773. I mean as regards the time that he would be occupied at a particular legation or mission to which he would be sent?—I am saying that we consider that six months is sufficient for him to acquire that knowledge in this office; but when he has passed that time, he then goes upon the recommendation, or ought to go upon the recommendation which I think was also made by that Committee, that there should be periodical changes; I am not sure that it was made in the Report of the Committee, but the question was canvassed and discussed a good deal whilst the Committee were sitting, and the opinion was that two years should be the time that a junior officer should remain at his post.

1774. It was stated in evidence on Thursday that it took two or three months for a man to get acclimatised in the place where he went; do you think that that is a long enough period to be at any particular post?—It is desirable that men should move about when they are young and unencumbered with a family to different places; they do it more cheaply, and perhaps diversified experience in younger life is more advantageous than in more advanced years; the mind is more impressible, less calculated to adapt itself to a mere regular routine, and has a greater tendency to expand in youth than it is in advanced manhood.

1775. There is another subject altogether to which I will pass, and that is as regards the Paper, No. 3; at page 5, there is a statement of the expenses connected with some special missions; will you tell us what that special mission was which is described as "Commission for Regulating the Navigation of the Danube"?—It was a Commission which of all valuable commissions that have ever been instituted by the Foreign Office is perhaps the most valuable. The Danube, I need not tell the Committee, in former times was a river difficult of access, dangerous to be navigated, and yet a most important outlet for the agricultural produce of some of the most productive countries in Europe. The efforts of that Commission have deepened the channel of that river; so that instead of its being an uncertain and fluctuating channel to the depth of perhaps nine feet of water, and one in which all vessels were obliged to unload into lighters, and which was so beset by wrecks that navigation was almost impossible, they have given us a clear channel of 18 or 19 feet depth of water, and we now run ships and steamers up that river, and we bring from it a large amount of grain which is very necessary for our market, and the transport of which employs a large amount of shipping; so that it is generally on those grounds conducive to a great extent to the well-being of our population at home.

1776. Are those duties of a permanent character?—Those duties will cease as soon as the works are completed. I believe that the works of what is called the European Commission, who are engaged in improving the Danube, will cease in 1871 or 1872; their time is limited by international engagement.

1777. Then that charge will finish?—Yes. Thereafter there will be what they call a River Commission, conducted by the river States, of which I need not say England is not one, who will have the charge of the Danube, of the tolls, and everything.

1778. Who is our commissioner?—Major Stokes of the Royal Engineers is our commissioner, and he has done his duty well, ably, and most efficiently, and he has secured the respect of all those who have had to do with him. Then, though he is not, strictly speaking, an officer of the Government, I wish to say that the Chief Engineer, Sir Charles Hartley, is a man of the greatest ability, and who has conducted those works in a manner creditable to the country and creditable to himself, and who, I hope (if the recommendation which I have ventured privately to make to the Hungarian Government is followed up), may be instrumental in opening the course of the Danube far above the Iron Gates, to the mercantile marine of our own country and of other countries.

1779. I wish to ask you a question in connection with this Paper put in by yourself, No. 7, and which Mr. Russell has already asked you about; it purports to give a comparison of the salaries of diplomatic agents in different countries, namely, in England, France, Russia, Austria, Prussia, and the United States; it is put in as a comparison of expenditure between the various countries as regards the salaries only?—"The Salaries of Diplomatic Agents in Europe and the United States: Heads of Mission," is the title of the paper. It was taken, as I explained just now, from the book containing the reports of Her Majesty's representatives abroad. I took it out in that form only in order that the members of the Committee might, without having to turn to the pages of the book, have an easy reference to it.

1780. But you will perceive that this is not a fair comparison, because in the case of England you do not include the house rents in those salaries (I will leave out the question of allowances altogether), whereas in the case of the United States they have the rent allowed only in London and Paris?—I am not aware that they have their rents either in London or in Paris; but however that may be, you must take the Paper for what it is worth; I gave the Paper for the convenience of the Committee, that they might not have to turn over the pages of that book to refer to the salaries of the heads of missions. As far as I recollect, the recommendation of the Committee of 1850 only went to the salaries of the heads of missions; and I have ventured to put before the Committee, in one view, what the different heads of missions receive as salaries.

1782. This Return, No. 7, I find gives in the same way the diplomatic agents in South America of various countries; in our case the salaries are returned without the rent, and in the case of the United States and some other countries, with the rent; so that that partakes of the same character?—Except in the Argentine Republic and in Brazil there is no rent allowed by this country at any of the places in the South American missions.

1783. In this same Return, No. 7, at page 2, there is a Return given of the number of volumes of diplomatic correspondence bound during the 10 years from 1857 to 1867; do you give that as an indication of the amount of business transacted at the various missions?—Partly that, but I gave it rather as a matter of curiosity, which might be interesting to the Committee.

1784. Then it is of very little worth except as curiosity?—It certainly is a fair indication of the amount of business, but it must be taken pleat quantum.

1785. Mr. Otway.] But that Return of the mount of the despatches and papers really gives o proper indication of the business transacted the Foreign Office, because so much is done personal interview, is it not?—A great deal done in that way as well.

1786. Mr. Holms.] Is that Return to be taken all as an indication of the amount of business ansacted?—Certainly.

1787. I see that the number of volumes of espatches at Rome is given as 31, our represen-tative there has no secretary or attaché to assist im, and as he does not appear to grumble about his amount of work, I suppose we may take it or granted that he is able to do the work?—He oes the work well and efficiently, but I am not prepared to say what is the amount of pressure put upon him to do the work. Many people will do a great deal more work than others. Many people will do an amount of work that you could not expect others to do.

1789. What do you do in that case?—The place is vacant till he returns.

1790. Mr. Rylands.] Will you put in a statement of the absence on leave of heads of missions during the last 10 years?—I should have no objection to do so, only I think that it would be a very difficult one to make, because I should have to give explanations of what may have induced this or that man to take so much leave; that he had been ill or that he had not been wanted, and so on. All those things would have to be taken into account to make such a return of any value; but I will endeavour to supply one.

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE EDWARD PLEYDELL BOUVERIE, IN THE CHAIR.

The Right Honourable EDMUND HAMMOND, again called in; and further Examined.

7 April 1870.

1791. Mr. Holms.] OWING to the great number of our countrymen who visit Rome, Mr. Odo Russell, I suppose, has a great deal to do by personal interview?—Mr. Odo Russell, though he is always very glad to see the gentlemen who come to him, has, strictly speaking, no official character at Rome. Mr. Severn, the consul, is the only official agent we have there. Mr. Odo Russell is a sort of unofficial agent.

1792. Has Mr. Odo Russell many personal interviews, do you know?—I cannot say; I have no knowledge.

1793. The last question I asked you, and which you answered on the last occasion, was with regard to the number of volumes of despatches sent from Rome between 1857 and 1867; comparing the result with the figures from the following stations, do you not think that it indicates that at all of them a reduction might safely be made in the staff: from the Argentine Republic, 46 volumes, and we have there a minister, two secretaries, and a clerk; from Brazil, 38 volumes, and we have there a minister, two secretaries, and an attaché; from Bavaria, 42 volumes, and we have there a minister, two secretaries, and an attaché; from Belgium, 47 volumes, and we have there a minister and three secretaries; from Denmark, 51 volumes, and we have there a minister, two secretaries, and a chaplain; from Greece, 65 volumes, and we have there a minister, three secretaries, a clerk, and a chaplain; from the Netherlands, 41 volumes, and we have there a minister and three secretaries; from Portugal, 52 volumes, and we have there a minister, two secretaries, an attaché, and a translator; from Saxony, 19 volumes, and we have there a chargé d'affaires, and a consul general; from Wurtemburg, 36 volumes, and we have there a minister and three secretaries; from Sweden, 33 volumes, and we have there a minister and three secretaries?—The answer is, that the number of volumes of correspondence do not represent the business that is carried on in the missions, for they only represent what is reduced to paper, and do not represent all that is done by personal application; and I have no doubt that in those two South American countries there is a great deal of personal and direct appli cation.

1794. In Paper Number 9, put in by you you will find it stated at the bottom of page that eight attachés have been appointed since th 1st of January, that "five of them were to fil up vacancies, and three to make up the numbe of junior members of the diplomatic service, ab solutely required for the work of the severa embassies and missions;" prior to that date, a you will find by the reports from our representa tives abroad, Mr. Elliot, Mr. Jerningham, an Mr. Thornton, each suggest reductions. Mr Thornton, writing from Washington, Septembe the 16th, 1869, says, that "According to the Esti mate inserted in the Foreign Office list, the sta of this legation should consist at this moment c one first secretary, two second, and three thir secretaries, six in all; as Her Majesty's Govern ment are desirous of enforcing economy, I thin that one of these might be dispensed with, leavin five;" and so on. Then Mr. Elliot, writing th 22nd September 1869, from Constantinople, state that "Since the cession of the Ionian Islands th work has greatly decreased, and I have no hesita tion in saying that the staff of the embassy migh be considerably reduced, without in any wa impairing its efficiency;" and Mr. Jerningham writing in England, states, "The present staff c Her Majesty's legation at Stockholm appears t me amply, if not more than, sufficient, consistin of a second and third secretary besides the secre tary of legation;" and yet here we find tha since the 1st of January these additions hav been made; can you explain that?—I explai it simply in this way, that the gentlemen wh made those reports made them under pressur being required to say exactly the minimum whic they could do with; and I am not aware tha they took into consideration the necessity of pro viding for absences on leave or ill-health. As I explained the other day, in answer to a questio put to me by Mr. Baring, though Sir Henr Elliot's estimate is plausible on the surface when you come to work it out it requires jus the same number of people as he now ha Though perhaps on the spot at one time only certai rtain number are necessary, there must be pro-sion made for accidental vacancies. And I lieve that all our establishments are upon a wer scale than those of the French.

1795. Practically then you mean to say that r. Jerningham, Mr. Elliot, and Mr. Thornton ere not so well acquainted with the require-ents of their special missions as you were at ead-quarters?—I say that, practically, that is the se, because I know from experience that a de-ient number in a mission immediately or very ortly entails upon us a demand for additional sistance.

1796. I want to ask you one or two questions ith regard to fees. I see that we have a nsul at Paris who receives 100*l.* as salary, and 00*l.* as an allowance. Is he not virtually a ember of that mission?—When Mr. Pickford, ie late consul, died, an arrangement was made at Mr. Attlee should be archivist or registrar the embassy, and should also undertake the nall consular duties.

1797. He receives a large sum as fees, does e not?—The fees are all paid into the Trea-ry. I believe the fees amount to between 00*l.* and 600*l.* a year, and they are paid into ie Treasury. He does not receive any fees as member of the mission.

1798. There is also a large sum received in idicial fees at Constantinople. How are they ppropriated?—They are appropriated for the urrent expenditure of the establishment, as all he fees in the Levant have hitherto been appro-riated. They are now about to be brought nder the new system, and will be all paid into he Exchequer, and the current expenditure will o into the ordinary Estimate.

1799. I see that Sir Augustus Paget, writing rom Florence on 27th October 1869, in his eport to Lord Clarendon, at page 66 of the Reports, states that the staff has plenty of work. 'It must be remembered, that at the Florence Mission there is, in addition to the ordinary hancery work, a far greater amount of consular nd notarial business to be attended to, than at lmost any other mission, owing to the vast umber of British subjects residing in, or passing hrough, this capital." I presume that that work s not done for nothing?—It is done for nothing; here are no fees taken at any legation.

1800. In the Foreign Office list before us, I ee an explanation is made of the different de-artments at the Foreign Office. The Honour-ble Mr. Spring Rice is stated to be Superin-endent of the Commercial and Consular De-artment, and his duties are defined to be 'Correspondence with Ministers and consul (except China, Japan, and Siam), with repre-entatives of Foreign Powers in England, Board of Trade, &c., on commercial matters only." Are we to understand from that, that the re-maining senior clerks are only concerned with political affairs?—I hardly know what list you have got before you, but Mr. Spring Rice is now Assistant Under Secretary. There is a senior clerk in the consular department occupy-ing the place that Mr. Spring Rice occupied when Mr. Murray was Assistant Under Secre-tary.

1801. Does Mr. Woodford, who has the care of the correspondence from China, Japan, and Siam, conduct both the commercial and the poli-tical correspondence?—Yes.

1802. Does he communicate independently with the Board of Trade on commercial matters relating to those countries?—He does nothing independently. I execute every order of the Secretary of State, and everything that goes to the Board of Trade, as regards those countries, passes through my hands, and is signed by me.

1803. I see that Sir Henry Elliot, in answer to Question 1248, states, "The Foreign Office are in possession of all my opinions with regard to the reductions that might be made in the Eastern consulates." Could you furnish the Committee with a copy of that?—Perhaps you will allow me to defer the answer till the consular question comes before the Committee.

1804. I will only ask you now one broad ques-tion, can you give this Committee any sugges-tions for reducing the expenditure or increasing the efficiency of the Foreign Office, and the whole service for foreign affairs?—I could give the Committee many suggestions for increasing the expense, which would of course pro tanto in-crease the efficiency. I cannot give them any suggestions, because I have none to give, for re-ducing in any way the expenditure or reducing the numbers employed.

1805. Mr. Rylands.] I understand that you will be good enough to furnish the Committee with a statement of the absences of ministers from their posts for the last ten years?—It is being prepared, and I can put it in formally now if you like, or the chief clerk will put it in by and by. It is not quite finished.

1806. I notice among the Reports presented by ministers abroad that that of Mr. Jerning-ham, our minister at Stockholm, is dated in this country?—Yes.

1807. Is it not the fact that he is very fre-quently away from his mission?—I do not be-lieve that he is on leave more than his fair pro-portion of time.

1808. Viscount Barrington.] With regard to the Queen's foreign messengers, I wish to ask you whether you have ever thought of making any alteration in the present plan with regard to their journeys; I mean with regard to their having fixed stations, and bringing their despatches from one place to another, say from Vienna to Berlin, and from St. Petersburgh to Berlin, and then having a messenger from Berlin to Paris? —We tried that experiment some years ago, and found that it did not answer; we found it much better that a man should come on from those distant stations to England, much more convenient to the service generally. A fair trial was given to the experiment after Lord Malmesbury made a reduction in the mes-sengers, and it was found not to work satis-factorily.

1809. You do that now from Paris to Calais, do you not?—Yes.

1810. And from Washington to the port in the United States from which the mail-packet starts? —He is not a Queen's messenger, but a gentleman who has long been employed on that station. The rule is that as long as we can convey our despatches safely, without their going through a foreign post office, we do not very much care about their being in charge of messengers, and that applies to Paris and Calais; the messenger waits at Calais, and the same thing applies in New York. The despatches are carried by our own mail-packets, and they are always in our custody.

1811. But still it must cause a decided increase of

7 April 1870.

of the expense if the journeys of all the messengers originate from London?—The expense saved by the other plan would really be very trifling; the allowance is, I think, about two guineas for the railroad fare to Calais; we should be obliged in that case to have all our messengers living at Calais, and I do not think that that would be very conducive to the discipline of the service.

1812. You are aware that that system that I have mentioned is carried on in Prussia?—I hardly know sufficiently how the foreign services conduct their business; and it is impossible almost to regulate the services of two different countries on the same plan exactly, and especially in the case of a country like ours. I explained the other day that a number of these foreign nations having long distances to travel through their own territory, where they can carry their despatches safely by their post, need only send a messenger from the frontier, but I really cannot fully explain it to you; I know that formerly (and I believe it is the case now) the French messenger always came to London.

1813. Will you inform us as to the privileges of exemption from import duties that are attached to our missions abroad?—Practically I believe that our heads of missions are exempt; legally, in some foreign countries, I believe they only have what they call the première entrée, and perhaps for six months or a year afterwards. We in this country are more liberal, and always allow exemption; but I believe that practically it is the case in most foreign countries also.

1815. Wine, for instance?—Yes; but I should say, in justice to the foreign missions, that a foreign minister going away and selling his wine, would give notice, so that the duties might be levied on the wine.

1816. But for his own consumption he has foreign produce free out of bond?—Yes; it is done in this way: the heads of the missions write to the Secretary of State requesting that a Treasury Order may be given for the free passage through the Custom House of such-and-such articles; we always require the head of the mission to sign his own name, to prevent any abuse. After all, except when they first come and bring in their furniture and such things, their applications are really very trifling; sometimes a cask of wine, sometimes a chest of tea, sometimes 1,000 cigars.

1817. Viscount Barrington.] Some of our own foreign ambassadors are put on an allowance, are they not, as to what may be imported?—I believe that in some countries there is some sort of allowance, but that practically they do not very much insist upon it. I cannot exactly tell you how that is.

1818. Could we not apply to those Governments to put our foreign ambassadors on the same footing as ambassadors are put on in this country?—I think that it would be rather an act of discourtesy to any of them to put them on a different footing from their fellows. I do not think that it would be worth while to do it, and besides that, on the principle of the most favoured nation, they would enjoy in the country the same privileges that any representative of any foreign country might enjoy.

1819. I suppose it is really a privilege accorded to the chief, and he does not allow his subordinates to get goods through him?—Of course it is impossible that I can ask such a question of a foreign minister. I can only take the chief's word that they are for the use of his family.

1820. Chairman.] Is it limited to the chief?—It is nominally limited to the chief. The chief says they are "destined for the use of my establishment." I frankly say that I would not be disposed to look very closely into that matter. The thing is very trifling. Very few of the subordinates keep house. A secretary of embassy or legation may do so, but when he is chargé d'affaires he would have a right, as the head of the mission, to bring in what he may wish.

1821. Viscount Barrington.] In the case of America, where there is reciprocity, our ministers get supplies in that way, do they not?—I am sorry that you have said that, because it may lead the Americans to think whether they should not restrict that advantage.

1822. Chairman.] You said that the experiment of Queen's messengers coming to the frontier merely had been tried and failed; how came it to fail?—I forget exactly; it is a good number of years since, and I can hardly explain it, but we found that it did not answer.

1823. For what posts did you try it?—Your question, practically, only applies to the northern messengers, and it is a combination now, as I endeavoured to explain to you the other day, in which two messengers are employed on the service. One messenger, for instance, who went last night, will go on through Berlin to Vienna. The messenger who went yesterday week went on through Berlin to Petersburgh, and he will come home on Monday next, bringing the Petersburgh and Berlin despatches. Next week the Vienna man will bring the Vienna and Berlin despatches.

1824. Then Berlin has two messengers to one for Vienna and St. Petersburgh?—Necessarily, because both their routes lie through Berlin, and there is no reason why the messenger going through it should not carry despatches to and from Berlin.

1825. Are the regular messengers for the Queen's foreign service confined to Paris, St. Petersburgh, Berlin, and Vienna?—And one to Constantinople, and one to Italy; those are the regular services.

1826. What about Madrid?—There is no regular messenger to Madrid.

1827. But occasionally one is sent to Madrid?—Yes, and he goes to his journey's end, and comes back to his journey's end.

1828. What is the ordinary communication; is it by post?—By post, and very unsatisfactory it is.

1829. And to Portugal, is it the same?—Either by post or by a packet; we have maritime communication with Portugal.

1830. In the case of Washington, the despatch goes to New York by the mail-packet, and then the messenger meets it?—Not a Queen's messenger, but a person who has been in our employ a long time. I believe he runs down from Washington with the despatches for the outgoing mail, and waits to receive the incoming despatches. In the time of the civil war we were obliged to have a second messenger, and we sent a Queen's messenger.

1831. Viscount Barrington.] Is that messenger paid in the same way?—No; I think he is paid aid by a fixed salary and some allowance. Mr. Alston will be able to explain that point.

1832. There are 15 Queen's messengers now?—There are 15 now, and we shall reduce them s soon as we can. But I omitted to say the ther day, that when, in consequence of Lord Malmesbury's arrangement, we reduced them o 15, we found after a little experience that t was utterly impossible to go on with that umber. As that question has been raised, I hould rather like to let the Committee see what Lord Russell wrote when he asked for an increase of the messenger establishment. It answers ome other questions which have been incidentally alluded to. It gives the reasons why the elegram communication has not superseded the se of messengers. Before he wrote that letter ve were very hard-pressed indeed, and we constantly did not know where to turn for messengers. Of course it is a fluctuating service.

1833. Chairman.] The recommendation by Lord Russell was to increase the number from 15 to 17?—It put before the Treasury that the service could not be performed by the number of 15, to which Lord Malmesbury had reduced the staff. We were obliged, as is stated in that letter, to get occasional assistance from people whom we knew well; but frequently we have been obliged to have perhaps three or four of our home service messengers doing foreign service duty, very much to our inconvenience.

1834. Was Lord Russell's recommendation that the number should be increased to 17 followed at that time?—Yes.

1835. And you have reduced it again?—Yes, in consequence of the reduction of our journeys.

1836. The demand for service by foreign service messengers must be a very varying demand, I presume?—Very varying indeed. If any particular disturbance were going on in Europe we might have to send off a messenger perhaps daily. You cannot get a person on whom you can rely at a moment's notice. At the time just before that letter was written, I used to be continually interrupted by the chief clerk coming to ask, "What am I to do for a messenger? I do not know where to turn for one." Messengers, like other people, are liable to sickness, and a man perhaps having had a severe journey may fall ill. We have had four or five Queen's messengers ill at a time.

1837. Viscount Barrington.] It is hardly possible for you to do with a smaller staff of messengers than now?—We mean to try to do with 12, just, as I say, in order to meet the pressure upon us for economy; but I feel certain myself, that if any trouble were to occur in Europe we should not only have to pay the messengers whom we had reduced, their pensions, but to re-create the original number, and should therefore have pensioners and active servants going on at the same time; and that upon the whole is not economy.

1838. Chairman.] I was going to ask you upon what system of retirement are these messengers; are they upon the Civil Service superannuation?—Upon superannuation; they are retired now upon the basis of 525 l. a year as the estimate of their salary and allowances. In former times they used to make a very large sum. They had very heavy mileages, 3 d. or 6 d. or even 1 s. mileages, and when they retired their superannuation was calculated as 400 l.; that is to say, it was calculated upon that; but now the basis of the calculation is 525 l., because they do not make those emoluments, or anything like them, that they did in former times.

1839. I see that Lord Russell alludes to the employment of home service messengers in consequence of the deficiency in Foreign Office messengers; are those home service messengers persons of the same class and position as the Foreign Office messengers?—No.

1840. Had you any complaint to make at that time of want of confidence or of unreliability in the home service messengers in the performance of that duty?—No; no doubt the home service messengers would perform, and do perform, their duty as honestly and faithfully abroad as they do in England. Our home messengers are people of the most trustworthy description. They have in their possession day after day the despatches in circulation to the Cabinet.

1841. They are of the class of gentlemen's servants, are they not?—Yes. Before 1825 messengers were indiscriminately taken from that class. In 1825 Mr. Canning, the Secretary of State for the time being, decided upon separating the two classes of messengers and taking the foreign service messengers from a higher class of people than the others, because they required higher qualifications. We require a foreign service messenger to be acquainted with foreign languages and accustomed to travelling abroad. A home service messenger might get on very well for one or two journeys, but in times of difficulty I should certainly much prefer a man of the class of our foreign service messengers for duty abroad to one of our home service messengers.

1842. Take the ordinary service between Paris and London; would not a man of the position of the home service messengers, who could talk French colloquially, be perfectly efficient for the performance of that duty?—I prefer the rotation of messengers abroad.

1843. For the ordinary service to Paris, would not a messenger of the class of home service messengers be perfectly trustworthy?—But the messenger to Paris may, on an emergency, be sent on to Constantinople or to anywhere else. If a messenger going through is taken ill at Paris, the messenger on duty there is sent on with his despatches. I do not think that any real advantage would be obtained by a change such as you suggest, and I think that we should at times be very much inconvenienced by it.

1844. At the same time you are not prepared to say that any inconvenience arose from the employment of the home service messengers at the period when Lord Russell wrote this letter?—Simply because they only went on an occasional journey, and they were not regularly employed. If we could find nobody else to go, we sent a home service messenger, because we could rely upon him. At the same time, I do not mean to say that it was a satisfactory course to pursue. I would rather not have done it, but we were driven to it.

1845. Viscount Barrington.] What is the difference in the pay?—As between 200 l. and 400 l. a year; and the home service messenger would receive 15 s. or 16 s. a day when he is abroad, while the foreign service messenger receives 20 s.

1846. Chairman.] Do I rightly understand that, up to the time when Mr. Canning made the change of introducing the two classes, the ordinary ordinary business was carried on by men of the same class as the home service messengers?—In former times, all the messengers belonged to the Lord Chamberlain's Office, and the origin of the badge which they wear, a silver greyhound, was the fact that it was the badge of a Lord Chamberlain. It was known, and would be known all over the Continent, in times of trouble, as a sure pass for a Queen's messenger. It was certainly a great improvement, I think, which Mr. Canning made when the classes were separated.

1847. Mr. Richard Shaw.] The superannuation is on the basis of 525*l.*?—It is so many 60ths of 525*l.* a year.

1848. You seem to anticipate that, in the case of emergency, you might find inconvenience from want of these messengers?—Yes.

1849. Could you not, if they were on pensions, call them into service again in case of emergency?—It depends whether they retire from infirmity or age.

1850. But you anticipate, as I understand you, reducing the number from 15 to 12. Supposing that you did that, would you not, in cases of emergency, be in a position to call on these gentlemen who had retired for service again?—You would employ them as we did in former times, as extra messengers. If they retired at 60 years of age, you could not call upon them again.

1851. But I am speaking of the three that you contemplate reducing?—The three senior messengers are getting on in years now.

1852. Would you, or would you not, in cases of emergency, be entitled to call them into service?—I do not say that we should be entitled to do it; we should be very glad if they would take a journey, and assist us, as they did in former times; but I think that when a messenger is regularly pensioned off, you do not put him on a redundant list, and the Government is not entitled to call him into service again.

1853. Would you not look upon them as a reserve?—No; if we pensioned a man we should not require him to dwell at hand.

1854. You have no doubt that they would be willing to undertake the service in cases of emergency?—I have no doubt that anybody who had been in the Government service would be most happy to assist the Government in any emergency; and one of them did assist us, in fact, very much in those difficulties which I referred to just now.

1855. And in cases of emergency you would be able to call upon the home service messengers as you have done in the past?—Yes, but it is a very great hardship upon us to be obliged to call upon our home messengers; our home messengers have very severe work indeed. Only yesterday I had a man on the run from one o'clock at noon till 12 at night; what he did for food I cannot tell.

1856. Viscount Barrington.] Do many retire voluntarily before they arrive at the age for receiving pensions?—Of the two men who have now retired, one has certainly retired voluntarily; the other was broken down in health, and he was glad to retire.

1857. Chairman.] How many home service messengers are there?—Eight.

1858. Mr. Cameron.] Allusion was made just now to the slavery department in the Foreign Office; could you inform me of the number of clerks employed in that department?—There is a senior clerk, and there are three others.

1859. Has the work which falls upon that particular department become much less of late years than it used to be formerly?—Very much less, but what work there is is of a heavy kind. But at the present moment I believe my colleague contemplates taking one of those clerks off, and throwing him into the commercial department, which is heavily worked. We could not by any possibility do with less than a senior clerk and two clerks in the slave trade division. We have got a fourth clerk now, and I believe that he will be transferred shortly to another department, where assistance is wanted.

1860. But the department itself must exist as separate department?—Yes.

1861. It could not be absorbed in any other department?—In no other department, at present; I do not mean to say that it may not be so eventually. We hope that it may eventually be absorbed if the slave trade is abolished to a greater extent than now, but there is a great deal of slave trade going on now in the Eastern seas; and besides that, the slave trade department has inherited from times of slavery a superintendence over all our interests on the West Coast of Africa; and, happily, a lucrative trade has taken the place, in a great degree, of slavery; but the trade being carried on in wild places, and among wild people, there is a great deal of trouble in the management of the questions which arise in connection with it.

1862. Does the subject of coolie emigration come under that department?—No, it is to the French colonies and foreign colonies; it would come under the consular department, because the British consul in the foreign colonies is superintendent of the interests of the coolies.

1863. In fact, the work is not diminished to such an extent as to justify your making more than a very slight reduction in that department?—I certainly conceive that to be the case.

1864. Mr. Frederick Stanley.] With regard to the Foreign Office messengers, did you continue to send them to Vienna by the same route as usual during the war of 1866, or were they allowed to make any deviation from the route which they had taken before?—We were obliged in that war to establish a messenger direct to Vienna; we could not send him through Prussia, we were obliged to send him through France to Carlsruhe, Stuttgardt, Munich, and Vienna; that was the route which he was obliged to take in order to avoid the armies.

1865. But sometimes your messenger had to pass through countries which you might almost have called in a state of war?—Unquestionably if war was raging in a country, that would be the case.

1866. Do you think that messengers of the class of home service messengers would have been as able to make their way through those countries as people who had rather better knowledge of the world, and were more conversant with languages?—I should certainly say not.

1867. And you consider it of great importance, I presume, particularly at such a time, that despatches should be sent out in the most direct manner and with the least delay?—Yes.

1868. Mr. Frederick Walpole.] I believe that the Foreign Office messengers pass an examination before they are admitted?—Yes.

1869. In what languages are they examined?—The

The regulation is, "That they have such a nowledge of either French, German, or Italian, will enable them to make themselves under-ood in regard to such matters as concern their ities on the road, those duties being to convey e despatches entrusted to them safely and ex-ditiously by whatever means they may have easion to travel."

1870. It is only in one continental language at they are examined?—Yes.

1871. Is every despatch sent over land by a oreign Office messenger?—No, only special es.

1872. Mr. Eastwick.] I wish to ask you a estion with reference to some questions that ere put to you on the 4th of April, with regard the debts of diplomatic officers; I wish to ask hether it is not the fact that Lord Clarendon as applied to the Shah of Persia, through our linister at Tehran, to have certain debts, nounting to 3,000*l.*, which have been incurred the Shah's representative and chargés d'affaires this country, paid?—The ground of that appli-ation was, that the Persian Minister in this ountry had not received his salary regularly from he Persian Government. I do not mean to say hat if a minister was to leave the country very uch in debt we should not privately inti-ate to his government that such was the case, nd leave it to them to decide what they would o in the matter. This was a very peculiar case. his Persian chargé d'affaires was in the country ithout the means of paying his bills, and yet it as necessary for him to keep up his position and o subsist himself, which he could not, without ncurring debt, do unless the necessary means ere granted him.

1873. I wish to ask whether it is not the fact hat, in consequence of that application, a sum mounting to about 1,000*l.* has been paid?—ertainly some money has been paid, and some oney we are still applying for.

1874. Is it not the fact that our consul at esht, in Persia, left a debt exceeding 800*l.*, hich was vouched for by a bond bearing the onsular seal, owing to a certain Mirza Jaffar?—he consul did leave debts of that kind, but those re quite different from the debts to which you ave just been alluding. They were not incurred rom the omission of the Government to pay that onsul the salary that was his due.

1875. Is it not the fact that Lord Clarendon as declined to take any action in the matter of hat debt?—He has declined; but it is not a debt hich Government could be asked to pay, and he gentleman who incurred that debt is no longer our service.

1876. Sir Charles Wentworth Dilke.] With gard to the despatches from our consul general t Warsaw, in what way are they sent to Peters-urgh or Berlin?—I believe that our consul gene-al at Warsaw generally has the facility afforded im of sending his despatches to Berlin by the rench messenger who goes periodically to erlin, and then he would send to Berlin a copy f any despatches that he had occasion to send to t. Petersburgh, to be taken on from there.

1877. You mean that there is a French essenger who goes between Berlin and War-aw?—Yes.

1878. You stated to me on a former occasion hat the consul general at Warsaw performed olitical functions of considerable importance?—es.

1879. His despatches are of great importance at times, probably?—Yes.

1880. And yet you trust those despatches to the messenger of another government?—We are obliged to do it because we want to save expense. If we were in very critical times we should do as we did in former times, make an arrangement to have a temporary messenger to pass between Berlin and Warsaw. We put an end to that in consequence of the expense which it involved, and we can manage at present to do without it. I do not mean to say that there are not occasions even now when I should be very glad if our consul at Warsaw had an opportunity of sending despatches by one of our own messengers; but there is not the same objection to employing the messenger of a foreign power when he only goes between a foreign capital, not his own, and the station from which he is despatched, as there would be to employing a messenger of a foreign power going to his own capital.

1881. Mr. Kinnaird.] You mutually assist one another, I suppose?—Yes. Whenever we are sending an extra messenger to any place, if I think of it I always send a note to the minister of that state in this country, and say to him that he can take advantage of the opportunity for sending any despatches if he wishes to do so.

1882. And there is a considerable saving of expense by this mutual assistance, I suppose?—A considerable saving of expense; and it is a little courtesy which it is very desirable to show on all occasions.

1883. Sir Charles Wentworth Dilke.] Then the French messenger is not paid for carrying our despatches?—We do not pay him.

1884. Did our consul general at Warsaw remain there in 1863, while Warsaw was in the hands of the Revolutionary Government?—I have no doubt that he would remain there, but I do not remember the fact.

1885. I was going to ask whether you had any recollection as to whether, during that very important time, he still sent despatches in that way by the French messenger to Berlin?—No; at that time, I think (I am speaking from recollection) that arrangement which I spoke of, of having an extra person of our own plying between Berlin and Warsaw was in force; I think most probably that was the case. At all events, the consul general was there; and I have no doubt that sufficient measures were taken, whatever they may have been (which I cannot remember now), for the security of his despatches, and of his periodical reports to the Government.

1886. Mr. Richard Shaw.] Have you, within recent years, experienced any difficulty in filling up any vacancies either of ambassadors or heads of missions?—The only answer that I can give to that is that the embassies and the missions have been filled up. Whether the Secretary of State, within whose judgment the filling up of those missions rests, was in any difficulty on the subject, I am unable to say.

1887. But you know no instance of a vacancy existing for any length of time?—A vacancy may have existed for some length of time, but there may have been circumstances which I cannot remember, which rendered it desirable that the post should remain vacant; if it did remain vacant, the Treasury had the benefit of it, for the salary attaching to it was not drawn.

1888. Have you found any difficulty in filling up vacancies which have arisen either in the secretaryships or under secretaryships of legations, or in attachéships?—I am not aware that any difficulties have arisen in that respect; of course, having an establishment, there can be no difficulty, since you have a fund to draw upon, and, as I mentioned the other day, there are at least about 20 candidates for attachéships on the Secretary of State's list.

1889. Mr. William Henry Gladstone.] I see by this Return, No. 6, that there is a very great disparity between the salaries paid to our ministers at Munich and at Stuttgardt; can you explain it in any way?—I apprehend that Munich is a much larger and more expensive court.

1890. The business is much the same, I suppose, in the two cases?—Bavaria is considered the greatest of the South German kingdoms.

1891. But there is a very great disparity between the salaries; our minister at Stuttgardt receiving 2,000*l.*, while the minister at Munich receives 3,600*l.*?—Munich is the more important place of the two.

1892. You said, did you not, that the post to Madrid was very unsatisfactory?—The idea that I meant to convey was, that I think the correspondence with Madrid is of that nature that it would be very desirable that we should have a periodical messenger to Madrid. The post goes regularly, and goes quickly, but at the same time it does not go securely, because it goes through two countries.

1893. That is the reason why it is unsatisfactory?—Yes.

1894. Have you read any part of the evidence of Sir Henry Elliot?—No.

1895. Are you aware of the suggestion that he made with regard to a second examination, and making it a stricter one, with the view of diminishing the number who would enter the diplomatic profession?—I should think that the second examination is as severe an examination now as could be justly imposed upon the men. I think that an attaché's examinations, and that of a third secretary, are both very severe examinations, and if you were to make them more severe, of course the consequence would be that the whole interval between the first examination and the second examination must be given up, not to the public service, but to the studies of the man, in order to qualify himself for the second examination.

1896. Sir Henry Elliot suggested that the second examination should be sudden, so as to do away with cramming; what is your view on that point?—I may be excused for saying, that as to many questions which seem easy of solution at the moment, when you come to work them out in detail you find insuperable difficulties, and we in the Foreign Office have to work out all those questions, and we must look at things practically, and not theoretically, as, perhaps, others do.

1897. I think his great reason was, that he felt so seriously the stagnation in the service, that he was anxious to hit upon some remedy or other; I do not think that you look upon it in quite as serious a light as he does?—I do not look upon the stagnation in the same light as he does, because, in the first place, I contend that there is no stagnation; and, in the next place, I think that we should be obliged to have just the same number of gentlemen, whether you put them under the harrow of a very severe examination, severer than they have now, or let them go in under what I believe is considered a very severe test for them now; because, after all, you must just remember that a man's education does not cease, or ought not to cease, when he is 23 or 24; he must go on educating himself for ever.

1898. Chairman.] Have you anything further that you wish to say?—I wish to thank the Committee for the attention and kindness which they have shown me in listening to what I have said. I have been here endeavouring to explain the proceedings and to uphold the interests of the diplomatic service and the office which I serve. We have been misinterpreted and misunderstood; we have been decried and vilified in a manner and to an extent that I venture to say no other public office in this or any other country has ever been decried and vilified. We did not doubt, however, that sooner or later an opportunity would be afforded to us of justifying our conduct and defending our character before the only tribunal to which public officers when assailed can properly appeal; and we felt assured that an impartial Committee of the House of Commons would do us that justice which in our conscience we believe and know that we deserve, and which on behalf of the two services, I claim with confidence from the Committee.

Mr. Francis Beilby Alston, called in; and Examined.

1899. Chairman.] You are Chief Clerk of the Foreign Office, I believe?—I am.

1900. And as such you have the general charge of the arrangements of the establishment?—My duties are of a very miscellaneous character and comprise almost every point of detail.

1901. As chief clerk you overlook the establishments generally, do you not?—I should rather say that I assist the under secretaries in so doing.

1902. Mr. Rylands.] In regard to the extraordinary expenditure of which Mr. Hammond has given us a Return, 11*a*, the extraordinary disbursements are of a very miscellaneous character, and I presume come entirely under your notice as chief clerk?—They are examined by me or under my directions.

1903. I made some inquiry of Mr. Hammond as to the mode that was adopted for checking these extraordinary expenses, and I should like to ask you what steps are taken by you in order to satisfy yourself that this expenditure is correct and justifiable?—On the arrival of an account it is subjected to a detailed examination with a view to ascertain that the expenditure is properly vouched for. As a matter of course every voucher is examined, and every charge is required to be supported by a voucher. Every charge must also have its proper "authority," that is to say, if the charge be of an ordinary and recurring character it would be passed under what may be termed continuous sanction, but any charge of a novel character, or which was not covered by the regulations, would require to be expressly sanctioned by the Secretary of State, and if we are not satisfied that any charge has received proper sanction, we at once query it, and require the minister who may have rendered the account to produce the "authority," or if he has not got one to apply for one.

1904. Have you any means of checking the accounts which did not exist in the year 1865?—I have established a form of query called a query paper, which was not in use before I became chief clerk, and one or two other forms which assist us very much in the examination of the accounts. With those exceptions, I am not aware that there is any material difference in the course now pursued.

1905. But you are able to say, that you now give a more accurate attention to the examination of the accounts than existed in the time of your predecessor?—I may perhaps say that I have devised and established forms by means of which I can with greater facility test and check the accounts, but I do not say that I examine them more accurately than my predecessor did.

1906. My reason for asking you that question is, that your predecessor, Mr. Conyngham, gave evidence before the Public Accounts Committee of 1865, and his evidence leaves the impression that there was no sufficient check for a very large portion of the expenditure?—I do not recollect his evidence.

1907. Mr. Conyngham is asked these questions: "Do you question the accounts sent in by the ministers abroad?—Yes, very much. In the end it comes to your passing the accounts?—We get rid of the difficulties somehow. Then the check is the possibility of your grumbling at the accounts they render, not any chance of their being disallowed?—No, I do not think that there is ever any sum disallowed, because a man says, 'I know that I spent this money'; my bankers' book shows that. I drew a check for this money when I was there. I could not get receipts for every penny." Is there anything in the present system which would modify that?—All I would say upon that is, that I do not think that Mr. Conyngham quite did himself justice in giving that evidence. I intended to have brought with me, thinking I might be asked for it, a form of letter which Mr. Conyngham made use of as often as a charge was disallowed, and the existence of such a form establishes the fact that disallowances were made in his time. The difference between us may be said to be that Mr. Conyngham made use of one form of letter, and I make use of another.

1908. At Mr. Conyngham's death, was there not a careful examination in reference to his accounts in connection with the Foreign Office?—When I became chief clerk, I took over the accounts, and I naturally made it my business to ascertain in what state those accounts were.

1909. Did you not find the accounts in considerable confusion?—No; on the contrary.

1910. There is no justification for the belief that the accounts were in confusion, and that there was a deficiency which had to be made up?—There is no justification whatever for such a statement; it is the reverse of the case absolutely.

1911. In taking the accounts of the disbursements as put in by you, I find that two or three items have only made their appearance very recently; in 1865–6 for the first time there is an item, "Lighting and Warming Diplomatic Residences, 1,246 l. 3 s. 11 d."?—Yes.

1912. I wish to ask you how it is that the charge for "Lighting and Warming" appears for the first time in 1865–6?—The charge existed in the accounts since the year 1853, I believe; but before the year 1865–6, it was charged under the head of "Miscellaneous Expenses." In that year it was transferred to "Lighting and Warming" as a separate sub-head.

Mr. F. B. Alston. 7 April 1870.

1913. Then in reference to consular establishments at Paris and Moscow, I see that there is a charge commencing in 1865–6; how is that accounted for?—So long as the late consul, Mr. Pickford, lived, he drew a consular salary of 100 l. a year, and was allowed to appropriate the fees to his own use. On his death, Mr. Atlee, who was the librarian and registrar of the embassy, was appointed to succeed him, with the rank of consul. He was to draw the salary as before, but the fees were from that time forth to be credited to the public. The fees were accordingly received on Government account, but instead of being actually paid into the Exchequer, in the manner in which we now deal with them, they were applied from 1865 to 1868 in diminution of the issues on account of the extraordinaries. It was consequently necessary to charge the expenditure of the Paris consulate during those years to the extraordinaries, but, as I have said, the issues on account of the extraordinaries were diminished to the amount of the fees.

1914. And now in future the course will be that the charges of this character in connection with the consular establishments at Paris and Moscow will be included in the extraordinaries, and on the other hand the fees received by the consuls will be brought to the credit of that account?—The consulate at Moscow is now altogether an unpaid establishment. There was a certain allowance made to the consul for office expenses, which was charged in the St. Petersburgh extraordinaries. It was not a charge which should properly have been inserted in the extraordinaries, because consular expenditure should appear as a charge in the Consular Vote; but the Secretary of State not only decided that that allowance should no longer be charged to the extraordinaries, but that the circumstances of the case did not justify the continuance of any allowance to the Moscow consul; that charge, therefore, is at an end. At Paris the consul's salary is now charged to the Consular Vote, and the fees received by him are remitted at the end of each quarter to me as chief clerk, and I pay them, together with other consular fees, into the Exchequer, and they appear in the account as extra receipts.

1915. And will be shown in the Return of Consular Fees?—Undoubtedly.

1916. With regard to law charges, I observe that "Law Charges" are included in this Return; I presume that those are law charges which are incurred by ministers abroad, in advice that they take abroad, and not law charges that are incurred here?—They are incurred abroad, and they consist of two sorts of charges, those which are fixed and permanent, being in the nature of retaining fees, and those which are paid from time to time for legal advice and assistance actually rendered. At Lisbon, for instance, we pay a retaining salary to a lawyer who is confidential law adviser to the legation, and a small fee is also paid to another officer who acts as solicitor to the consulate. The honourable

Member is no doubt aware that in former years there was what was called a British Conservatorial Court in Portugal. That court was abolished in 1842, at the instance of the Portuguese government, but it was stipulated by the British Government that the court should be re-established at any time that circumstances might require it, and it was therefore thought very desirable to retain the services of these two officers as having been members of it. Moreover there were, and I have no doubt still are, many questions with the Portuguese Government requiring an intimate knowledge of Portuguese law, which render it necessary that the minister should have ready means of obtaining legal advice. At Washington there is also a counsellor or lawyer permanently retained, on account of the legation, and this arrangement enables the minister, from time to time, when questions of a legal character arise, to consult the legal adviser of the legation, whose retaining fee is drawn in the shape of salary once a quarter.

1917. Can you inform us what is the amount of the retaining fees paid to the legal officers at Lisbon?—I have a Table here which I had prepared in anticipation of the questions that the honourable Member might ask me; it commences with the year 1848 and ends with 1867-8. I find in the year 1848-9, the sum inserted as law charges at Lisbon was 63*l.* 12*s.* 2*d.*; the next year it was 65 l. 2*s.* 2*d.*; and so it runs on, 65*l.*, 64*l.*, 63*l.*; and, speaking from recollection, I should say that two-thirds of that sum goes to the one, and one-third to the other of the gentlemen I have named.

1918. Then the amount of salaries at Lisbon and Washington only form a small proportion of the total amount of law charges; I suppose that they are exceptional cases; you have not similar retaining fees in other missions abroad, have you?—I do not at this moment recollect any other mission where there are permanent legal advisers; but the charge for legal assistance is one which appears from time to time in the extraordinaries. At St. Petersburgh, I find that in the year 1857-8 there was a charge of 4*l.* 12*s.* 9*d.*; in the year 1863-4 there was a charge of 35*l.* 12*s.* 4*d*; those are the only charges at St. Petersburgh, and they represent work done.

1919. Does it not occur to you that there can be no circumstance in Lisbon that would justify a retaining fee of a legal agent, that does not exist as strongly in other missions abroad?—It is many years since I was in the Portuguese Department, but I remember that 20 years ago we were constantly having occasion, or rather the minister was constantly having occasion, to take legal advice. The questions at issue in Portugal were of a very complicated character at that time, and, for all I know to the contrary, that may be the case now.

1920. I think I might ask you whether it is not the case that many of the commercial questions, which in those days did occur, are, in fact, now at an end as regards Lisbon?—I am not in a position, as chief clerk, to answer that question, but, as a matter of private opinion I should say that such questions would arise from time to time.

1921. At Lisbon, more than at other missions abroad?—I can only say, speaking from the experience of some years back, that the two gentlemen I have alluded to were of the greatest possible service to us, and my impression is, that the records of the Foreign Office would establish most conclusively that this was so.

1922. Will your records show you whether the services at the present time are such as justifies a salary, in place of paying a fee for work actually done?—I can only repeat that my impression is, that the records of the Foreign Office would clearly and conclusively establish the propriety of those payments. Within the last few months I made it my business to examine into that very point; I looked myself through the papers, and I was satisfied from the examination which I made that good grounds were shown for the payment of those retaining fees.

1923. I suppose, in addition to the law charges put down here as paid abroad, a very large sum is paid at home in law charges, arising out of advice taken by the Foreign Office in connection with the diplomatic department?—Undoubtedly.

1924. Can you inform the Committee from whom the Foreign Office obtain advice when they require legal advice?—If it were a matter of international law, we should consult the Queen's Advocate. If it were a question which also involved points of English law, or if it were a question of grave international importance, the probability would be that we should consult all three law officers, namely the Attorney and Solicitor General, and the Queen's Advocate, who would then give us a joint report. It is a thing of almost every day occurrence.

1925. You send in the papers to the law advisers in the bulk, I presume?—Yes.

1926. And you have no one in your establishment to prepare the case for the law advisers, have you?—No. As a general rule we do not like leading our law officers, but prefer leaving them to form their own opinion upon the papers.

1927. You send the papers to them?—Yes, we send the papers and ask the law officers for their opinion upon them.

1928. Can you inform us what the annual charge is for the advice of the law officers?—No, I cannot; it is not a matter which comes within the knowledge of the Foreign Office.

1929. Does anybody know?—I suppose the law officers themselves, and of course the Treasury, could inform you.

1930. Does it appear on the Estimates anywhere?—I cannot answer the question. It is not a matter that comes before us in any way.

1931. Then you cannot assist us at all to any idea of the cost of the legal advice obtained by the Foreign Office; and you cannot tell us where to find what the cost is?—No, I am sorry I cannot.

1932. You have no solicitor in the Foreign Office?—No.

1933. This is continually occurring; you are continually applying to the law officers?—Yes, constantly.

1934. Mr. Baring.] Do you know whether the law officers of the Crown themselves employ a solicitor in these cases?—I have no knowledge on that point; but I should say, judging from the experience which I gained when in charge of the American Department during the time of the Civil War, that I believe that Sir Roundell Palmer wrote most of the reports himself; indeed I am sure he did. I have been astonished to find how much the law officers have worked

t our cases themselves, when it might have been upposed that they would have handed them over) a junior, and this has been so even when it as not been a matter of importance.

1935. Mr. Rylands.] In the Supplementary Estimates laid before Parliament this year, there - an item in connection with Venezuela; it is an ccount paid to Mrs. Mary Ackers Cage, "Settlement in full of her claim against Her Majesty's Government on account of the maladministration f the estate of her late father, Mr. W. Ackers f Venezuela, 3,404 l. 17 s.;" has that ever come nder your own notice?—No, it has not come nder my notice. I imagine the case was settled nd dealt with by the Treasury. I have no oubt that the Foreign Office was consulted, but t did not come before me in any way.

1936. Was this mal-administration through he consul of Venezuela?—I know nothing offiially on the subject. I may have heard somehing about the case, but it has not come officially efore me.

1937. But you check consular accounts?—I heck consular accounts; but I should observe hat the chief clerk did not check them at the ime in question, and, moreover, I was not chief lerk at that time.

1938. You could tell us, perhaps, who was the onsul that was mixed up in this Venezuelan busiess; it is a large amount?—The gentleman who vas mixed up with the case was Mr. Bingham.

1939. "The Honourable Richard Camden Bingham," is that the gentleman?—Yes.

1940. The Honourable Mr. Bingham seems to ave had a considerable career, commencing at Naples in 1818, and being made "chargé l'affaires and consul general in the Republic of Venezuela, the 23rd November 1852, which post e held till 31st August 1858, when he retired, nd a pension was granted to him by Treasury Minutes dated 26th October 1858, and 1st Janury 1861;" cannot we get information from somebody as to the circumstances under which this naladministration occurred by this pensioner of he Crown?—I really do not know the details of he case.

1941. Mr. Eastwick.] Is it not the fact that Mr. Stacey is now in this country?—He has returned to his post.

1942. Mr. Stacey was there at the time when his happened, was he not?—He was in Venezuela. I do not know exactly what the point vas, neither do I know that Mr. Stacey had anything to do with it.

1943. Chairman.] Who has the charge of the Venezuelan Department?—Mr. Gifford is the gentleman at the head of the political division which comprises Venezuela; but my impression s that you would get the information better rom the Treasury.

1944. If there is anybody in the Foreign Office who could give information upon the subject, it is Mr. Gifford?—Yes, I should say so.

1945. Mr. Rylands.] But it is the fact that the consular expenditure proper is checked by you?—Since the Exchequer Audit Act came into operation the whole accounts of the consular and diplomatic services come to me, and I examine and check them all; but the chief clerk had nothing whatever to do with consular expenditure previously to the 1st of April 1868.

1946. Who has to do with the arrangement as to the pensions to be granted to any diplomatic or consular officers?—The consular pensions are dealt with entirely in the consular department; diplomatic pensions are dealt with in the chief clerk's department. The course pursued was, I think, stated the other day by Mr. Hammond. A minister who wishes to retire upon his pension makes application to the Secretary of State; his case is then referred to the chief clerk, who reports as to his qualification for a pension under the Act 2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 116, or the Act of last Session. It is the duty of the chief clerk to submit to the Secretary of State a statement of the services of the minister, of the length of time which has elapsed since he obtained his commission, and of the various points required to show that he has complied with the conditions of the Act; the chief clerk sends that report through the Under Secretary of State to the Secretary of State, and the Secretary of State then decides upon the course which he will pursue.

1947. In the case of a consular pension it would go through a similar course, I suppose?—The consular pension is not strictly speaking a pension, it is a superannuation or retired allowance.

1948. Then, in the case of a diplomatic pension, there is an option, that is to say, if a person has been guilty of any maladministration, there is the option on the part of the Government to refuse the pension; and it would be, I presume, the duty of the chief clerk to direct the attention of the Secretary of State to any such proceedings?—I do not recollect any case having occurred of any minister who had been guilty of maladministration, and therefore I cannot speak as to that. But I should say that if a minister applied for a pension, and he had been guilty of maladministration, that would very much interfere with his obtaining the pension.

1949. You would suppose that, according to the custom of the office, the application of Mr. Bingham for a pension would go through the chief clerk, and be reported upon by him?—No, that would not be so, because Mr. Bingham has not been retired on a pension but on a superannuation allowance.

1950. He was chargé d'affaires?—Yes; but at the time Mr. Bingham retired, if not at the time when Mr. Griffith, about whom Mr. Lowther asked some questions the other day, retired, all our diplomatic agents in South America were consuls general and chargé d'affaires, instead of being, as they now are, chargé d'affaires and consuls general; and the principal portion of Mr. Bingham's salary was charged to the Consular Vote.

1951. Mr. Frederick Walpole.] I suppose the report that you make is merely a formal report as to service?—Yes.

1952. The report of the chief clerk as to pensions is limited to that?—Yes, absolutely.

1953. Mr. Rylands.] I am not now asking you about Mr. Bingham, but on the general question?—I should only report upon the claims of the minister to a diplomatic pension, specifying the number of years' service, the date at which he obtained his commission, and so on.

1954. The chief clerk would not go into any matters beyond that in reporting to the Secretary of State?—I do not think that it would be any part of his duty to do so; it would be for those in a position superior to the chief clerk to do that.

1955. The retiring superannuation allowance is a matter of right in the consular service, I suppose?—Provided that the applicants have reached 60 years of age or are disqualified by ill health.

1956. In reference to pensions, you have alluded to the Act under which diplomatic pensions were formerly paid; of course you are quite aware that that has been altered by the Act of last Session?—It has.

1957. And that the Act of last Session for the first time introduced into the Diplomatic Pensions Act the position of consul general and chargé d'affaires?—It did so.

1958. Under the old Diplomatic Act, the service of consul general was not in any way recognised as being a diplomatic service?—It was a doubtful question at best.

1959. And, in fact, under the old Act, I see that no diplomatic pension was allowed to be granted until the expiration of 15 years from the date of the first commission?—Yes.

1960. That commission having reference, according to that Act, to the diplomatic service, and not the consular service?—Yes.

1961. But, in point of fact, you did grant pensions, dating the first commission from the time when a gentleman first had a consul generalship?—We did so under the advice of the law officers.

1962. And that has been cured by the Act of last year?—Yes.

1963. Mr. Hammond read to us the other day the receipts for the repayment of the outfit money of Mr. Lowther and of Mr. Forbes; can you explain how it was that, while in Mr. Lowther's case it was 1,100*l.*, in Mr. Forbes's case it was only 800*l.*?—The difference of outfit is explained in this way. Mr. Lowther was appointed to Buenos Ayres, whereas Mr. Forbes was appointed to Rio Janeiro. Moreover, Mr. Lowther's was his first appointment as minister, and consequently he drew full outfit; whereas Mr. Forbes's was a second appointment as minister, and accordingly he drew the reduced or half-outfit.

1964. I observe, in the Estimate for Consular Services, a vote of 10,500*l.* for chaplains and chapels, but the particulars are not given. I suppose you are in possession of full particulars of the items of this large sum of 10,500*l.* for chaplains and chapels?—The expenditure is on account of British consular church establishments abroad, in pursuance of the Act 6 Geo. 4, c. 87, which provides that where a certain number of British residents abroad have formed themselves into a church community, and have subscribed a certain sum of money, it shall be competent for the Secretary of State to supplement those subscriptions by a contribution on the part of Government not exceeding the sum subscribed by the residents.

1965. Could you furnish a list of the items of this expenditure for the last year on consular chapels and chaplains?—Yes, I will do it for the year 1868–9.

1966. The Consular Act to which you refer, of the 6 Geo. 4, c. 87, provides that there shall be these chaplains and chapels in places where there are consuls?—Yes.

1967. And any locality where there may be British residents, if there is no consul, cannot have the benefit of this Act?—I take it that it requires the presence of a consul or a consular officer.

1968. And before the congregation can obtain a grant from the Government under this Act, they must raise a certain sum of money themselves?—They must do so.

1269. The effect is to limit the operation of this Act to places where there are a certain number of persons of means who are able to maintain or assist in maintaining a chaplain and chapel; is it ever matter of consideration on the part of the Foreign Office whether in some of these places the people are not wealthy enough to pay for their own religious services, without the assistance of the Government?—The question has undoubtedly been considered by the Foreign Office. The Foreign Office entertains a very strong opinion upon that subject, and has from time to time expressed that opinion; and I believe I am right in stating that contributions have, from time to time, been discontinued in certain quarters, on the ground that the principal object and intention of the Act, so far as we are informed, and so far as we can deduce it, was to enable the services of the Church of England, or the Church of Scotland, to be performed at ports and places where there was a large British trade, and to which a British seafaring population was attracted by that trade. I have myself no doubt that that was the origin and intention of the clause in that Act, and that it was not intended that churches should be maintained at inland cities, whither travellers might resort for purposes of pleasure, or with the view of residing permanently abroad. The object of the Act was to afford the means of a Church service to our merchants and sailors at ports abroad.

1970. The object of the Act was to supply religious instrumentality for people at these various ports, provided people wanted to have that religious instrumentality in an authorised form?—Yes.

1971. The Established Church of England and the Established Church of Scotland being recognised as the two authorised forms, and the people of other religious denominations having no power under this Act of getting any assistance in their religious worship?—I believe that to be so, but I am not aware whether the question was ever distinctly raised.

1972. In some cases, I think, you will be aware that there are Scotch chaplains as well as English chaplains?—There are.

1973. Can you, from recollection, state where that is the case?—There is a Scotch church at Buenos Ayres and at Alexandria.

1974. And at Paris, according to a memorandum which I have here; bnt that can hardly be the fact?—I rather think there is one there.

1975. Mr. Frederick Walpole.] Then any chaplain or chapel supported by Government, except in a seaport town, is rather an undue extension of the primary meaning of that Act?—I so consider it. The origin of it was this, that the Act of 6 Geo. 4, c. 87, abolished several British factories. There was a British factory at Lisbon and also one at Rio Janeiro; these were dissolved about the same time that the Levant Company was abolished, but these factories maintained British churches abroad; and it was no doubt thought that, as the Government was taking upon itself the duties hitherto devolving upon these factories and appropriating the moneys which had hitherto been levied by them, it was only right that some substitute should be provided in their place. That was the origin, I have very ery little doubt, of that clause in the Act in uestion. Advantage has been taken of that ause to apply for Government assistance from me to time in various places, until the expendi- re under that head charged to the Consular ote alone is upwards of 10,000*l.* a year.

1976. Mr. Kinnaird.] The Secretary of State, believe, always makes, I may say, minute in- iries before the grant is made to anyone apply- g for it?—The Secretary of State, before thorising a grant, requires that the Church counts shall be carefully examined, with a view ascertain that the conditions of the Act have en complied with, and he also satisfies himself at the amount stated to be subscribed has been ally and truly subscribed.

1977. With regard to the Act applying only places with consuls, are there not many ports Spain, for instance, where you can only have rvice in the consular house, and is not that e reason of making the services consular?—es, I believe that is so. It is only of late ars that the Spanish Government have allowed ything in the shape of service in Spain, ac- rding to the Anglican rites.

1978. Mr. Frederick Walpole.] The Govern- ent never refuse the grant when a certain sum made up by the inhabitants, do they?—It a question whether we can. I should be dis- sed to say that the Secretary of State refuses when he has got fair ground for doing so.

1979. Mr. Rylands.] The feeling of the oreign Office is rather against encouraging it?—The Foreign Office would check the tendency increassd expenditure in this direction if it as in their power to do so.

1980. But, practically, parties abroad come efore the Foreign Office, having fulfilled the nditions of this Act of Geo. 4, and the Foreign ffice are in a measure bound to meet those nditions?—It is very difficult to draw distinc- ons, and say, "We will give it to you who ave complied with the conditions of the Act, ut we will not give it to others who have qually complied with those conditions."

1981. The fact is, that at Alexandria, Buenos yres, and Paris, under this Consular Act, there e maintained out of the funds provided, chap- ins connected with the English Church, and so with the Scotch Church?—It is certainly so Buenos Ayres and at Alexandria, and also at aris, I think.

1982. There being a consul at Paris, Paris eing an inland place, still had the power under is Act of having a chaplain. The chaplain hom the honourable Member abolished last ession, was the embassy chaplain?—Yes, that as so.

1983. But the fact is, that except in the case the English Church and the Scotch Church would be impossible for any number of persons nnected with any religious denomination to ail themselves of this Act for the establish- ent of consular places of worship?—I appre- end that the Act provides only for the two tablished churches, the United Church of Eng- nd and Ireland, and the Established Church Scotland.

1984. There is one chaplain entered in the onsular Estimates: it is the chaplain at Smyrna, d he is put down with a salary of 300*l.* a year, d a personal allowance of 100*l.* a year. I am raid that you will hardly be able to tell us why is chaplain is put down and no other chaplain?—I can. The Smyrna consulate was, in former days, at the charge of the Levant Company, and the house at Smyrna, which is a large house, was a legacy to us from that company. The Levant Company, on its dissolution in 1825, it being considered undesirable that the company should continue any longer as a distinct corporation, among other properties handed over, I believe, the sum of 60,000*l.* in Consols or other Government stock to the Treasury, and there was an understanding, if not a stipulation, on the part of the Levant Company, that the establishments which they had maintained in the East should be kept up by the British Government. One of those establishments, as I have said, was the consulate at Smyrna, with a chaplaincy attached to it, and as the Government pocketed the 60,000*l.* it has been felt right to continue to pay the salary of the chaplain at Smyrna, and to charge it to the Consular Vote. I should explain that the additional allowance of 100*l.* a year, assigned to the chaplain for house rent, originated in this way: the chaplain at Smyrna had a house assigned to him; it was a part of the buildings formerly belonging to the Levant Company. When, in 1861 (I think it was), a branch of the Supreme Court at Constantinople was established at Smyrna; it was thought that the chaplain's house would be very well suited for the purposes of a court. The chaplain was very loth to give up his house; but he was told it was required for Government purposes, and as compensation for the loss of his house, an allowance of 100*l.* a year was assigned to him. Mr. Lewis, the then chaplain, resigned early in 1869, and his successor, Mr. Hanson, who was appointed some time last year, has not had that allowance for house rent continued to him, which is, in his eyes, a very great grievance.

1985. It now stands at 300*l.* a year?—Yes.

1986. With regard to chaplains at embassies and legations, can you give any reason why the chaplains should be maintained at the various legations which did not apply to Paris, any justification for maintaining a chaplain in connection with the legation at Vienna, for instance?—I should be able to answer the question better if I had been the party to abolish the chaplain at Paris.

1987. Then you are not prepared to say that these legations occupy a different position from the legation in Paris?—I apprehend that the idea is that the possession of a chapel is inherent to the dignity and status of an embassy; or, at all events it is supposed to contribute to it. That is, I believe, the idea, quite apart from the usefulness which the chapel may in other respects be supposed to possess.

1988. Mr. Eastwick.] Do you make any payment for any chaplain or chapel at Tehran?—I am not sure.

1989. It is a fact that there are a great number of British officers and their families now in Persia?—Officers connected with the telegraph.

1990. They have no means, and they never had any means whatever of any religious service. Persons who die there are buried, and persons who are married there are married without any religious service except that performed by the consul?—The marriages would be performed within the legation, and therefore would be valid marriages, but I cannot answer the question as to what opportunities of religious service they may have.

1991. You

Mr. F. B. Alston. 7 April 1870.

1991. You are not aware that we are the only nation that affords no religious service whatever to its mission at Tehran?—I am not aware of the fact.

1992. Chairman.] I see in the Foreign Office list, amongst those who retired in 1869, "The Rev. John Charles Cox, chaplain at Paris, post abolished." Has the chaplaincy at Paris been abolished?—It was abolished in accordance with the decision of the House of Commons.

1993. Mr. Kinnaird.] But are you not aware that there is a chapel in the Rue d'Aguesseau?—That is so.

1994. And that there is a clergyman of the Church of England who officiates several times on the Sunday there; and are you not aware that the embassy have a gallery at their disposal in that chapel whenever they want to use it?—I did not intend or presume to question the decision of the House of Commons; what I meant to convey was, that the Foreign Office, in abolishing the chaplain, had merely been carrying out that decision.

1995. Mr. Rylands.] I wanted to see in connection with our legations abroad, what ground there was for our being called upon to provide chaplains; and I take your answer to be, that on general grounds you are in favour of having a chaplain connected with the embassies and legations, because you think that the existence of a chaplain there gives a certain character and support to them?—I should say chaplains have generally been attachéd to embassies.

1996. I see from the list of salaries that the salaries paid to the chaplains at several of these legations are very moderate in amount; perhaps you are not aware whether subscriptions are raised by Protestant residents in these foreign capitals towards the salary of the chaplain?—I am not aware of that being done in the case of any embassy chaplain. A subscription in aid is raised at Copenhagen, but the case of Copenhagen is peculiar. I should observe, that Copenhagen is a mission, and not an embassy; and the reason why we maintain a clergyman there is the reason which I explained a short time ago, namely, that Copenhagen is the resort of a considerable seafaring population caused by the number of British vessels trading to the Baltic. I apprehend that that is the ground upon which we support the clergyman at Copenhagen. We do, in that case, take into consideration the amount raised by the residents, including therein any passers-by, shipmasters, and others, and we supplement those subscriptions by Government contributions. We apply, in that respect, to the case of the clergyman at Copenhagen the principles of the Consular Act.

1997. I think I may assume that the duties of your very important office very fully occupy your time?—They do so.

1998. It is really one of the most important offices, I assume, in the Foreign Office?—I conceive that it is so.

1999. Generally, as I understand, it includes the checking of the entire expenditure under the Foreign Office; and is there anything beyond the expenditure of an important character that comes within your superintendence?—The accounts of the Foreign Office are under my supervision and control. I examine and check the expenditure; and, after having audited the accounts of the several sub-accountants, I myself account for the whole to the Auditor General; but this, after all, is only one branch of my duties I am hardly prepared to say off-hand what my duties do or do not consist of. The duties of the chief clerk at the Foreign Office are of the most varied character; they comprise a great mass of detail, and generally of an important character.

2000. I presume that you would be appealed to by the Secretary and Under Secretaries of State with regard to many matters of importance which might be within your cognisance?—It is the duty of the chief clerk to report on almost all subjects.

2001. In view of this very important position which you hold, and which is next in importance, I suppose, to that of the Assistant Under Secretary of State, I wish to ask you what objection exists to the Assistant Under Secretary of State being a Foreign Office agent; that does not apply to one in your own position being a Foreign Office agent?—My answer to that question is, that I conceive there is a very great difference between the position of the Assistant Under Secretary of State and that of the chief clerk. It is true that, as chief clerk, he is at the head of the clerks, very much as is the case with the top boy at school, but he is still one of the clerks; whereas the Assistant Under Secretary of State is an officer altogether of a different character, and occupying a different position. I think it would be an exceedingly mistaken notion to bracket the chief clerk, and I should be very sorry for a moment to think of bracketing myself as such with the Assistant Under Secretary of State.

2002. And yet you are just immediately on the line of promotion next to the Assistant Under Secretary of State?—I stand next to the Assistant Under Secretary of State.

2003. You are in a fair line of promotion; that is to say, the present Assistant Under Secretary was one of the senior clerks?—He was one of the senior clerks; he was senior to me.

2004. The objection that you feel to the Assistant Under Secretary of State being a Foreign Office agent, I presume, does not arise from the fact that he has more to do than you have as chief clerk, but from the circumstance that his higher position and influence and authority would render it undesirable that he should have these intimate relations with our ministers abroad?—I am not aware that the point has ever been considered, or that any decision upon the subject has ever been given. The appointment of an Assistant Under Secretary only dates from the year 1858. Up to the year 1858 we had no such office as Assistant Under Secretary. The clerk who was appointed in 1858 Assistant Under Secretary gave up his agencies. Whether he was under any obligation to do so, or whether he was directed to do so, or what the circumstances were, I am not informed; but the fact is that he did give them up.

2005. And I gather from your very sound judgment (for I am sure that it is very sound), that you would feel, if you were appointed Assistant Under Secretary, that you could not retain this appointment of Foreign Office agent?—That would be my opinion.

2006. When Mr. James Murray, who was the gentleman to whom allusion has just now been made, ceased to be an agent on his being appointed Assistant Under Secretary, did he not send a circular to his clients, requesting them to transfer nsfer their business to you and your partner, . Bidwell?—Mr. Murray issued a circular, t I cannot say that he transferred those agen- s to me and my partner, because it is obvious it he could not transfer them.

2007. But he would use his influence by ans of this circular, as far as that influence nt, to transfer them to you?—As the honour- e Member has asked me this question, he will haps allow me to answer it somewhat in tail, and to explain exactly what Mr. Murray on that occasion, and I am glad to have the portunity of giving this explanation, because was the subject of comment either last year or year before. The circumstances of the case re these: in the year 1839, on my appoint- nt to the Foreign Office, I was placed in the ne room with Mr. James Murray, in the con- lar department of the Foreign Office, where I nained some years. Sitting as we did, in the ne room, we contracted a friendship which, I happy to think, time has not impaired, and nich was perhaps somewhat closer than that hich usually exists, or at all events might be pected to exist, between fellow clerks. As idence of this, I may perhaps be excused for ying that, in the year 1844, when some affairs connection with my family were being ranged, Mr. Murray accepted a somewhat erous trust on behalf of myself and other embers of my family; I mention this because it ows that Mr. Murray and I were on terms of ry considerable intimacy. When I subse- ently became an agent, in conjunction with the te Mr. John Bidwell, it was arranged by Mr. urray and myself (we often talked over the opriety and advantage to ourselves of doing so) at we should unite our forces at a future time, e intending that future time to be whenever r. Bidwell might retire from the office. Mr. idwell retired from the office in 1851. Cir- mstances prevented our giving immediate ffect to our intentions, but we had come to an nderstanding on the subject, and had arranged l the preliminaries, when, in the year 1854, ord Clarendon received from the Treasury an timation of their desire that the agencies should e abolished. Lord Clarendon entertained that oposal, a discussion ensued, and Mr. Murray nd I conceived that, under those circumstances, was better to wait, and not to carry into effect that time our proposal for uniting our agencies to one. The communications with the Trea- ry led to no result; but I think in the llowing year, 1855, Mr. Wise, who was then a lember of Parliament, began to move for eturns, and he used frequently to come to the oreign Office about those Returns, and he gave s to understand that it was his intention to ove for an inquiry into the diplomatic and nsular services, and from the year 1855 to 858 we were constantly expecting the Com- ittee would take place. In the year 1858, the onsular Committee was nominated, but it was that year that Mr. Murray was appointed ssistant Under Secretary of State. Mr. urray then issued the circular to which the nourable Member has referred, and, as far as can recollect, I believe its terms were some- ing to this effect, that as he had been ap- ointed Assistant Under Secretary of State, it as his intention to give up acting as a Foreign ffice agent; and he requested his clients to nsider, and to decide upon whatever arrange- ments they chose to make for the future conduct of their business; that he should feel bound to continue to place himself at their disposal until they had made their arrangements, but that if they were in any difficulty as to their future arrangements, he would suggest that they could not do better than place themselves in my hands; and I have only to say, that so far from thinking it strange that Mr. Murray took that course, I should have thought it strange if he had not taken it, because Mr. Murray was almost bound to take it, considering the understanding that had existed between us.

Mr. F. B. Alston. 7 April 1870.

2008. I hope you will not have the slightest idea that I meant to imply that the whole transaction was not honourable and proper?—I am glad to have had an opportunity of explaining it.

2009. I presume, from your statement (which, no doubt, is in every particular strictly correct), that at the time when Mr. Murray handed over his agencies to you, it was done as a matter of personal friendship, and that there was no payment made to him for goodwill, or in compensation for the loss of his profits?—There was no payment.

2010. And, at the time, and for some years previously, as I gather from your statement, there was an impression in the Foreign Office, amongst the Foreign Office agents, that there was a public feeling and opinion rising up which rendered the tenure of those agencies rather less secure than it had been in former years?—We thought our tenure doubtful from 1854 until the year 1858; but after the Committee of 1858 had sat, and a proposal had been made before the Committee condemnatory of the system, and that proposal had been negatived without a division, we considered that our tenure of the agencies was very much strengthened and improved. The feeling and the idea of the agents, and throughout the office generally, was that the utility of the agencies had been recognised by the Committee, and it received its illustration in the fact that the very next year Mr. Charles Spring Rice established himself as the Foreign Office agent, he considering, no doubt, that the agencies had obtained a fresh lease.

2011. The Committee of 1858, I think, reported very much in the interests of the services about which they were inquiring, in every direction; perhaps you do not know that the 1858 Committee was a very tolerant and favourable Committee towards the services?—I cannot say that I recollect all that they reported upon. I know that with regard to the agency question it was what I have stated.——I have brought with me a Return showing the absences on leave of the heads of missions, for which you were asking the other day (handing it in). You also asked the other day one or two questions with regard to the extraordinary expenditure at certain courts. I have accordingly prepared several tables showing that expenditure; but this Paper, which I will hand in, comprises every detail of the expenditure charged to extraordinaries for the year for which the Appropriation Account has just been presented to Parliament, namely, 1868-9, and I think it will be a very useful one for the Committee to have (handing it in).

2012. Mr. Kinnaird.] You have mentioned, I think, that the duties of your office are very varied; for how long were those duties discharged by Mr. Conyngham?—Mr. Conyngham was was appointed chief clerk in 1841, and he held the appointment till his death in 1866.

2013. He had a very wonderful knowledge of all the details of the Foreign Office, had he not?—He had a very great knowledge of its details, and he was in other respects a very able man and a most excellent public servant.

2014. I think it was very difficult ever to get him to leave the office, his attendance and his attention to his duties were so very remarkable?—Mr. Conyngham was always at the office, early and late, summer and winter, year after year; he hardly ever took a holiday.

2015. And the duties which he discharged were of the greatest importance?—They were of the greatest importance.

2016. Do you not of your own knowledge know that it was Mr. Conyngham's practice to criticise and check all the accounts that came before him; was he not rather considered a rigid examiner of accounts?—Mr. Conyngham examined, besides the account of office contingencies, only the accounts of ministers extraordinaries and the messengers' accounts; but it is perfectly true that Mr. Conyngham, who was a very great disciplinarian, was very particular with those accounts; nobody could be more so.

2017. Mr. Eastwick.] I wish to ask whether in case of debts being shown against a consul, and an application being made to the Foreign Office, it has ever been the case that sums have been retained from the consul's pay in order to pay those debts?—I cannot answer that question. I am not in a position to do so. I certainly am not aware of the fact myself.

2018. Can you state when the consulship at Resht became vacant by the retirement of Consul Mackenzie, and when the present consul or the consul who succeeded him was appointed; how long it remained vacant, in fact?—That is a question, too, which I cannot answer. The vacancy was filled up by the appointment of Mr. Abbott to the consulate, but what interval elapsed I cannot say.

2019. And during the interval, of course there was no expenditure for a consul there at all?—I cannot answer as to the expenditure; I had nothing to do with it.

2020. You could find it out for us?—Yes.

2021. You are aware that Consul Mackenzie had left very considerable debts?—I have heard so.

2022. Are you aware whether any application was made to the Foreign Office to settle those debts?—Not within my knowledge; it has not come before me.

2023. You are not aware then whether similar cases have occurred of applications being ma for the payment of debts?—I think it is not u likely that from time to time representations w have been made to the Secretary of State wi regard to debts of consuls; but I understoo your question to be whether deductions h been made from the salaries of those officers b cause of their having debts. As far as I c recollect, I should say there has not been a such case.

2024. Mr. Richard Shaw.] With regard the Audit Office, after you have examined th accounts, they go to the Audit Office; do the claim the right to reject any of the payments f extraordinary expenditure?—As a general ru they require that we should show Treasury auth rity, and unless we can show Treasury authori they disallow the payments.

2025. Am I to understand that you have g the Treasury authority before you examine th accounts for all the expenditure?—We have standing authority in regard to a certain class expenditure, but any unusual expenditure, ar expenditure out of the ordinary way, requir Treasury sanction.

2027. With regard to Siam, by whom are thos accounts audited?—They are now audited b me.

2028. Would it not be better that they shoul be audited in India, or even in China itself?—We have just abolished the audit of China ac counts at Hong Kong; we found that it did no work.

2029. Where did it take place?—The Siam accounts have never been audited either in Chin or in India; those accounts have always com under direct audit in this country; but our ex perience of the local audit in Hong Kong, whic was an audit conducted with great care and wa very scrupulously performed, was that there wa no advantage in it commensurate with the dela which it entailed. There could be no necessity for three audits; an audit at Hong Kong, a second audit at the Foreign Office, and a thir audit at Somerset House. We have, accordingly just abolished the audit at Hong Kong. It wa thought desirable, on grounds of economy a simplifying arrangements, as insuring an earlie arrival of the accounts, and as centralising the responsibility, to have the audit at the Foreign Office in London. I am satisfied, myself, that it is a very good arrangement.

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE EDWARD PLEYDELL BOUVERIE, IN THE CHAIR.

Mr. JOHN WILLIAM KAYE, called in; and Examined.

11 April 1870.

2030. Chairman.] WHAT office do you hold in the Indian department?—I hold what is called the office of Secretary in the Political and Secret department; ours is a very large office, and I may say that it represents the whole Home Government of India; supposing that we are an entire Government of India, I am the Foreign Secretary, which is the designation in India.

2031. You are equivalent to the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs?—Small things compared with great, my office corresponds with it. Supposing the Duke of Argyll to be Premier, I am his Foreign Secretary.

2032. Mr. Eastwick.] Will you state how long you have held that office?—Ever since the office of Secretary of State for India was established, and I have held a similar appointment under the East India Company, which bore a different name.

2033. At what date was it that you came into your present office?—In 1858, when the Government of India first came under the Crown.

2034. All the correspondence relating to the external relations of the Government of India passes through your hands, does it not?—Yes; everything that has to do with the native principalities and states, and everything that has to do with the external relations of India, with Affghanistan and Persia, and other parts, is managed under the department of which I am the head.

2035. Were you in office when the superintendence of our relations with the Court of Persia was transferred from the Foreign Office to the India Office?—Yes; that was in 1858; the communication from the Foreign Office came to us in 1858, and it was answered in 1858, so that I may assume that the transfer took place in 1858, though I do not know whether we had all the records from the Foreign Office in that year.

2036. Can you produce any letter from the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs to the Secretary of State for India, proposing to transfer the control to the India Office?—Yes, I have got a letter here from Lord Malmesbury, dated the 12th November 1858, addressed to Lord Stanley, who was at that time Secretary of State for Indian Affairs.

2038. Can you produce the answer?—Yes; I have got the answer from Lord Stanley, dated the 17th November 1858, in which he says that he entirely concurs in the recommendations of Lord Malmesbury upon the ground that the affairs of the Persian Mission are more of an Asiatic than an European character.—(The letters were handed in.)

2040. Chairman.] That was in the early part of the century?—Yes; in Lord Wellesley's time. Then afterwards Sir Harford Jones was sent out in 1808 by the British Government. Sir John Malcolm was then sent out by Lord Minto, as Governor General of India, about the same time. They came into collision, and after that Sir Gore Ouseley was sent, and he was the head of the first permanent mission that was established there.

2041. Was it as an Indian servant or as a Home servant that he was sent out?—He went out under the Foreign Office. He had been in India, but he was sent out under the Foreign Office.

2042. I think both Sir Harford Jones and Sir Gore Ouseley might be called Indian officers?—Yes; Sir Harford Jones had been in the Persian Gulf, and Sir Gore Ouseley had been in India, but I do not think in the Company's service.

2043. He was, of course, acquainted with the language?—Yes; he was acquainted with Oriental languages, and most probably with Persian.

11 April 1870.

2044. Mr. Eastwick.] Can you state when the first permanent mission was located in Persia?—Yes; it was in 1810, in Sir Gore Ouseley's time. He was appointed to be our minister in 1810.

2045. Was it then under the Foreign Office or the Indian Government?—Under the Foreign Office. His instructions are conveyed in a Foreign Office Letter of the 10th of July 1810, and he was then told it was the intention of his Majesty's Government to continue a permanent mission at the Court of Persia.

2046. Was it subsequently transferred to the Board of Control?—In 1823 it came back again to the Indian Government, in consequence of a letter from Mr. Canning, who was then Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, in which he said that the objects of the intercourse with Persia were principally, if not purely, Asiatic.

2047. Have you got the letter?—I have not got Mr. Canning's letter, but I have got quotations from it in a letter from the Court of Directors of the East India Company, in which they say: "You will perceive from that communication that with reference to 'Mr. Willock's sudden abdication of his post, followed by the entreaties of the Shah that he may not be returned to it,' and considering also that 'the objects of the intercourse with Persia are (here comes the quotation) principally, if not purely, Asiatic,' Mr. Canning thinks it advisable to change the character of the mission, together with the nature of its appointment, and to revert to the system which prevailed before the nomination of it was assumed by the Crown. It has accordingly been determined by his Majesty's Government that Mr. Willock shall return to Persia in the character of his Majesty's chargé d'affaires for the purpose of finally settling the unadjusted account of subsidy with the Persian Government, which we trust that you will have furnished the means of doing previously to his arrival, but that he shall remain there in that character only so long as may be necessary for the end in view, or until he shall be relieved." Then it was transferred over to the East India Company.

2048. How long did it continue under the East India Company?—It continued so until the latter end of 1834, or the beginning of 1835. I may say that the letter which Lord Ellenborough, who was then President of the Board of Control, addressed to the Chairman and Deputy Chairman of the East India Company, was dated the 20th of December 1834, and the answer from the East India Company was dated the 15th of January 1835, so that we may say that it was in the Christmas or winter of 1834–5 that the change was made.

2050. And did the East India Company concur in those reasons?—The East India Company did concur in them; and the Board of Control wrote, "I am directed by the Commissioners for the affairs of India to express their satisfaction that the Court of Directors should concur with them in thinking that the proposed transfer of the mission in Persia from the Company to the King, will be productive of advantage." That is dated the 20th of January 1835, and is written from the India Board.

2052. Was it then considered that no objection, on the part of the Shah's Government, could any longer exist, as the control would be exercised by a Secretary of State, as the immediate representative of the Queen?—Yes, those were the grounds upon which Lord Derby's Government were willing and anxious that the change should take place. Before that it was objected that a mission from a company of merchants would not have the same effect at a proud court like that of Persia, as a mission direct from the sovereign of England; but when the direct control of the Government of India was transferred to the Crown, and the India Office was superintended by a Secretary of State, it was felt that one Secretary of State was of equal weight with another, and therefore that the Shah of Persia could entertain no sort of objection to the change.

2053. Chairman.] That change was made the same year that this letter, which you have put in, was written?—Yes.

2055. Are you of opinion that as this business was suddenly transferred to the India Department, there were officers, and particularly in the Council, who were sufficiently informed on the subject to conduct it efficiently?—With regard to the members of council, I have stated that the business was transferred to the single power of the Secretary of State. I should, however, mention to the Committee that the Secretary of State did take the opinions of certain members of the Council of India upon matters connected with the Persian Mission. He did not do it in a formal way, and they never came before the Council of India, nor did they come before any Committees; but the Secretary of State did take the advice of certain members of the Council who, he thought, by their antecedents and experience, were particularly well acquainted with the subject. And there always are in the Council of India some members who have had that kind of experience; and besides as we in the India Office have had frequent transactions with Persia, and the Foreign Office are continually referring to us on questions concerning the relations of Persia with other Asiatic Courts, we of course are well posted up in questions of this nature.

2056. Were the officers employed in the Persion Mission, even when it was under the Foreign Office, officers who had resided in India?—I think that the heads of the mission, until Mr. Murray's time, were previously officers of some Oriental experience; Mr. Murray was the first officer officer who went from a European Court to be chief of the Persian Mission.

2057. But Mr. Murray had been employed in Egypt, had he not?—Yes, he was consul general in Egypt, I think.

2058. Were the officers employed in Persia accredited from the Imperial Government, or from the Indian Government, or from both?—During the time that they were under the Indian Government, of course they received their credentials from India; but there seems to be no general rule about it. I find, so far as I can ascertain the thing, that when it was directly under the Foreign Office, unless there was a special arrangement, there were, as a rule, no credentials from the Government of India.

2059. You do not recollect any case of that kind?—No, I do not know any case. I think that Mr. Willock, afterwards Sir Henry Willock, had some credentials from the Court of Directors in England, but I do not know that he had any from the Government in India.

2060. Did the greater amount of the correspondence received at the India Office, during the time that the superintendence of affairs in Persia was under it, relate chiefly to Asiatic matters, and to Indian matters, or to European matters, matters connected with Russia, for instance?—I should certainly say that a large proportion of the correspondence related to Oriental matters.

2061. Could you say what proportion?—I should say certainly from two-thirds to three-fourths; I think that would be a minimum statement. But then it is only fair and just to state that at the time when our Persian relations were under the India Office, Sir Henry Rawlinson was the head of the mission, and Sir Henry Rawlinson's very large acquaintance with Oriental affairs, particularly with the affairs of Affghanistan, would naturally cause him to take greater interest in, and to dwell perhaps to a larger extent upon Asiatic questions, because he was better able to see their importance. A minister going from a European Court might probably, on the other hand, write a larger number of letters on questions connected with Russia or Turkey, or other European states.

2067. It is the fact, is it not, that there are Indian officers all about the southern and eastern frontiers of Persia, and that there are matters continually arising in which there is some difficulty occasioned, owing to there being a dual Government?—Yes; we have a consul general and political agent at Bagdad, and we have a resident at Bushire, and we have also a political agent at Muscat.

2070. Mr. Otway.] And at other places too; at Zanzibar, for instance?—Except that Zanzibar has relations with Muscat, and through Muscat indirectly with Persia, I do not think that I can produce Zanzibar as an instance of political relations with Persia.

2072. Mr. Eastwick.] All the telegraph officers in

11 April 1870.

in Persia are under the Indian Government, are they not?—Yes.

2073. And are paid by the Indian Government?—Yes.

2074. And when our officers were employed formerly to discipline the troops of the Shah, they were under the Indian Government?—They were selected, and employed, and paid by the Indian Government.

2075. Supposing that the superintendence of our relations with Persia should be re-transferred to the India Office, are you of opinion that it should be placed under the Secretary of State directly, or under the Viceroy?—Most decidedly under the Secretary of State for India. The very reason that caused the Shah of Persia to consider that an indirect mission, which was at one time sent by the East India Company, was not one of so high a rank as one coming directly from the Crown, would lead him to think that a mission coming from the Viceroy of India would not be of the same rank and condition as one coming from the Queen; and anyone appointed by the Secretary of State for India would be virtually appointed by the Queen.

2076. You are not aware that he would see any difference between the Secretary of State for India and the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs?—I can see none whatsoever, and I believe that the Shah's government could not discern any difference at all.

2079. Have any opinions been expressed on the subject by the present Viceroy?—Yes, the present Viceroy has expressed his opinion to the effect, that the complications are such that he finds it difficult to conduct the business of the Persian Gulf at all. He says, "Under the existing arrangements, which for some years past has been in force, Her Majesty's Minister at the court of the Shah is placed under the direct control of the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs; and while the revenues of India contribute 9,000*l.* a year" (I beg to say that is a mistake, for it is 12,000*l.* a year) "for the support of the Persian Mission, no person who by service in India has obtained experience of those questions, which affect the interest of this empire, is attached to embassy. The Secretary of State for India, or the Viceroy in Council, has no power to direct a single act of Her Majesty's Minister at Teheran; all they can do is to ask for information. In the memorandum drawn up by Sir H. C. Rawlinson on the Central Asian question, forwarded to us by your Grace's predecessor, the inconvenience of this arrangement is pointed out, and it is there shown that diplomatic action at Teheran is nearly invariably connected with questions which are intimately mixed up with the policy and interests of Her Majesty's Government in India;" and this Despatch concluded with these words, "It is our duty to explain very fully the whole position of affairs to your Grace, and to point out that the means placed at our disposal render it most difficult in all cases, and impossible in some, to carry out with success the policy which has been laid down and the instructions of Her Majesty's Government." That is Lord Mayo's Despatch, under date 10th of June 1869.

2080. In point of fact, our policy in Affghanistan and our policy in Persia have a great number of commingling points?—No doubt they have, particularly all the boundary questions. I will not go into details of them, but I may mention that there are several boundary questions which cause great complications at the present time; and owing to the two different sets of officers that are now controlling these affairs, there is necessarily considerable antagonism which would not, I think, happen if the whole were under one controlling head, whether that one controlling head were the Foreign Office or the India Office.

2081. It could not well be the Foreign Office, could it, as you could not well transfer your Indian officers to them?—I have heard a question raised as to whether the control of the Persian Gulf might not be placed under the Foreign Office. It is one which I have not considered, but I think that the same authorities that control the affairs of Persia should also control the affairs of the Persian Gulf. If not there must be complications, and it is a very natural thing that each controlling power or authority, whether the Secretary of State or the Viceroy in India, should support that power which is under his immediate protection, because, for one reason, he understands its affairs a great deal better than anyone else. The Viceroy of India now does not clearly understand the motives which impel our Minister at Teheran to take certain proceedings, and if he thinks that any states are being encroached upon by the Government of Persia his first care is to protect those states which are under his protection.

2082. And there is also a good deal of misunderstanding in India itself, is there not?—I have have no doubt that there is, and for that very reason the Government of India sometimes takes a one-sided view of the question, and only thinks of those whom it immediately protects. It is like the conduct of the master of a school, who if one of his school-boys has a fight with a boy of another school, of course takes the part of the boy of his own school; whereas if it were between two boys both of his own school, he would arbitrate fairly between them.

2083. With regard to the expenditure, while the management of Persian affairs was under the India Office, how much did the Imperial Exchequer contribute?—The amount previously to 1858 paid by the Indian Exchequer to the Imperial Exchequer was 12,000 l. a year. When it was brought under the India Office there was a correspondence between the Secretary of State for India and the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, as to the amount which, under those altered circumstances, should be paid by the Imperial Exchequer, and the sum was then fixed at 5,000 l. a year, to be paid by the Imperial Exchequer, which was consented to by the Lords of the Treasury.

2084. I see that Mr. Hammond stated that the Imperial Exchequer was saddled with an expenditure of about 3,000 l. a year?—I think that probably Mr. Hammond may have been considering the aggregate of the cost that it had been to the Imperial Exchequer, during several years in which it had been under the Foreign Office, and the India Office had paid 12,000 l. a year. I think that probably would be about the aggregate cost; but during the time when it was under the India Office, the Lords of the Treasury consented to pay us 5,000 l. a year. Here is a letter from the Foreign Office, dated May the 4th 1859, which says, "In reply to your letter of the 30th of April, relative to the division of the charges of the Persian Mission, I am directed by the Earl of Malmesbury to state to you, for the information of Lord Stanley, that the Lords Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury have notified to his Lordship that they will not object to a vote being proposed to Parliament in the approaching Session for 5,000 l., as a contribution on account of the expenses of the above-named mission." So I think probably Mr. Hammond must have been speaking of the average cost it had been, not of a particular year in which it was under the India Office.

2085. The expenses of the Residency at Bushire, and some other places in the Persian Gulf, are not included in that 12,000 l. a year?—No.

2086. Can you state at all what is the expenditure at the Residency at Bushire?—No; I have not any exact account of that expenditure.

2087. You could, I presume, give us a memorandum of the expenses at the Residency at Bushire?—Yes, perfectly well, on consulting the India Office records.

2088. There are some pensions paid in Persia, I think, by the Indian Government besides?—Yes, there are some pensions and other amounts that are drawn upon the Indian Government. But I made inquiry this morning in the financial department of our office, and I found that they were all debited to the 12,000 l. fund, and not paid in excess.

2089. Not even the pension of Ghias Khan?—It was considered that that was not on account of the war in Persia, but of the war in Affghanistan. There are no expenses connected with Persia proper, but there are large expenses connected with the Persian Gulf, not included in the 12,000 l.

2090. Is the trade that we have with the Persian Gulf considerable?—Yes, I think it is, and that it has been continually increasing since there have been steamers on the Euphrates and the Tigris.

2091. Do you consider that the whole expense of the Persian Mission might fairly be defrayed from the Indian revenues?—It was so defrayed at one time; but I certainly consider that it could not fairly be defrayed from the Indian revenues, so long as the conduct of the business is not in the hands of the Indian department of Her Majesty's Government. The position at present appears to be, that the payment is from one Exchequer, and that the control of the whole business is in the hands of another department, which only pays a very small contribution towards it.

2093. With regard to the present state of the Indian services, as to supernumerary officers that may be existing there, do you think that efficient officers could be found willing to undertake these posts in Persia?—Yes, I have not the slightest doubt that such officers could be found at the present time; and that if it was known that the Persian service was open to them, there would be additional reasons for them to qualify in the Oriental languages. There would be a new field of ambition open to them; and at the present time when, owing to the changes that have taken place through the amalgamation of the two services in the Indian army, the prospects of our officers in India proper are not so good, there would be great incentives to them to fit themselves for positions in Persia.

2094. In fact, service in Persia would be very popular?—Yes; when it was known a little time ago that there was some idea of appointing officers of the Indian army to organise and discipline the army of the Shah of Persia, the number of applications made for that particular service was greater than I had expected. A number of men, who had done good service in India, sought these appointments.

2096. With regard to Siam, I believe that the first consul general in Siam, Sir James Brooke, was an Indian officer?—Yes, Sir James Brooke was an Indian officer; he was consul general at Borneo, and went on a special mission to Siam in 1850. The permanent consulate was subsequently established.

2097. He was appointed by the Foreign Office?—Yes.

2099. Does not India contribute anything towards them?—No; I believe there was some correspondence on the subject with the Treasury (a charge on the Indian Exchequer for part of the expenses of the Siamese consulate having crept into the accounts), but ultimately the charge was not allowed by the Indian Department.

2100. Have there been any diplomatic relations between the Court of Siam and the Indian Government?—We were at one time indirectly, I think, brought a good deal into communication with Siam, but that was at the time when the Straits Settlements were under the Government of India, and our connection with the Government of Siam has diminished since our relations with the Straits Settlements were handed over to the Colonial Office. I remember that we had at one time some uncomfortable complications, owing to marriages of the chiefs in that part of the country with members of the Siamese Royal family; and there may be some eventually with regard to Burmah and the Shan States, if some of the projects at present afloat should be carried out.

2101. In that case, with reference to the complications which might occur in that direction, do you think that it would be advantageous to have an Indian officer at Siam?—I do not know; it might, under certain circumstances, but it is a question that it is almost impossible to answer till you know the exact position of affairs.

2102. Mr. Richard Shaw.] Are we to understand that the Foreign Office, since the Persian Mission has been under its control, has not selected Indian officers for that service?—Yes, Indian officers have been appointed by the Foreign Office. They were appointed until Mr. Murray was appointed; at least, in the case of the head of the mission. I do not know whether the subordinate officers were Indian officers. There are what are called the assistants, or attachés, and then there are the consulships also there, as to which I think I should express my opinion that there is no reason why the consular officers should be officers of the Indian Government; there are two now, one at Resht, and the other at Tabreez. There was formerly a consul at Teheran.

2103. I understood rather from you that the Indian officers had been excluded from the Persion service?—No; but now the two last appointments have been those of Mr. Murray and Alison; and, with the exception of Mr. Eastwick, I think I do not know an Indian officer since Mr. Murray who was appointed by the Foreign Office; Captain Watson was appointed by the India Office. There is no officer there, with that exception, appointed by the Foreign Office, since Mr. Murray.

2104. Mr. Butler-Johnstone.] At present the affairs of Persia are settled by the Foreign Office, and despatches sent to the India Office under flying seal; but they would have to be sent under flying seal through the Foreign Office to the India Office, even if they were directed by the India Office, would they not?—Yes; if our Persian relations were transferred to the India Office, just the reverse of the present state of things would be the fact—namely, that matters relating to European subjects would, of course, go to the Foreign Office, and when the Secretary of State for Indian Affairs had to deal with them he would consult the Foreign Office; therefore, the only questions would be, whether the aggregate of business were a greater amount on the one side or on the other, and whether the general character of our Persian relations were such as to be best conducted on European or Asiatic principles.

2105. Chairman.] Was that the practice previously to the transfer?—Yes. During the time that the Persian Mission was under the India Office, whenever there was anything affecting a question of European policy that was done. It must be remembered that any member of the Cabinet is very well acquainted with European politics, and the Secretary of State for India would to a certain extent be acquainted with the politics of Russia or Turkey; but I do not think that the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs would give the same amount of study or care to Indian politics. A member of the Cabinet is always supposed to be acquainted with Home and Foreign affairs, but India is supposed to be abnormal and exceptional.

2106. Mr. Butler-Johnstone.] Questions which arise in the Persian Gulf and Persia are often of a very mixed character, as much European as Indian, are they not?—In Persia doubtless it is so, but not in the Persian Gulf. Turkey is of course a European power, but it is only Turkey in Asia that has any interest in the politics of the Persian Gulf. For instance, the Sultan has some, and might put in other, claims, as he does on the coast of Arabia, which might so far bring us into European politics.

2108. In point of fact the double Government does not cause much delay; you get very rapid communication between the two offices?—No doubt, and particularly in this branch of the business which, as I have already said, is conducted in the India Office mainly by the Secretary of State, without reference to committees or councils. If it went by committees or councils there would be immense delay, but as it is done in the secret department of the India Office, that is not the case, and I think Mr. Otway can say that we do not take very long, if there be no difference of opinion between the two offices.

2109. Does all communication between the two offices take place by writing, or is there any oral communication?—If there is anything of great urgency I think we should communicate orally. If it were merely a matter of sending some papers over, I should act upon my own authority ty and send them on, if I could not have immediate access to the Secretary of State for is instructions.

2111. Then, in point of fact, the question might e settled in the course of the same day that the Despatch was received from India?—Yes, if the uthority of the two Secretaries of State could e obtained upon it. If I had the means of eeing the Secretary of State for India, I should ay, "Will you give me authority to do so-and-o." I do not think that we should be brought p much by forms.

2112. You mentioned something about English officers being employed by the Shah of Persia. Is that question settled?—No, that uestion is not settled; and there is a reference eing made now to the Shah's Government as to he terms. The India Office express themselves uite willing to grant the officers; the question s as to the terms.

2114. Mr. Rylands.] In reference to the question which the honourable Member just ow asked you, as to matters being settled in a day, did I correctly understand you to say, that here are a number of questions now pending in which the dual government comes in, and in which considerable delay and difficulty and complication have been caused, in consequence of the existence of this double government?—Most decidedly; especially when the Governments of India intervene. I mean to say, that supposing a case in which the Government of India were not concerned, and in which no agents or officers under the Government of India were concerned, in that case a direct reference between the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs and the Secretary of State for India, might settle the question in a day. But if it were a question in which the good faith of the Government of India was concerned, or in which the conduct of the officers of the Government of India was concerned, or anything of a similar character, the India Office would not settle it without reference to the Government of India.

2115. But in such a case, I presume, the delay does not arise out of the existence of a double government. The questions put to you had reference to the effect of there being a dual government in creating delay and complication?—And it does so in the case I put, because supposing that the Government of India had power to take certain proceedings with reference to Persia, they would telegraph to us and ask if they might do so-and-so, and we would telegraph back to them, and then they would act in accordance with our instructions, and we might in the course of two or three days send out instructions to them as to the policy to be pursued. But if we have to consult also the Foreign Office, and the Foreign Office differ from us, and if we are ignorant, as probably we are, of the views which are entertained by the Persian Minister here, owing to the fact that we cannot have direct communication with the Persian Minister, but only through the Foreign Office, all those things must cause delay.

2116. Then, in point of fact, the matters which can be settled in a day are only matters of routine?—Only matters in which there is no necessity to refer to the Government of India or to our minister in Persia (their views having been already ascertained), and in which there is no difference of opinion between the India Office and the Foreign Office.

2120. But you would require to have recourse to the Government of India equally if there were not that dual government?—Yes; but the chief cause of the delay is that there are very often antagonistic views entertained by the Foreign Office and the India Office. The real causes of delay arise not from matters of detail, but sometimes from extreme antagonism of opinion, and it takes some time for one department to state its views and get up all the facts bearing on those views, and for the other to do the same; so that necessarily considerable delay is involved in stating those antagonistic views; and there are many questions that have gone on and do not seem to advance in the slightest degree between the two offices; each seems to hold to its own opinion. We send all the despatches that we have relating to the affair in question to the Foreign Office, and the Foreign Office send us the correspondence with the Persian Minister in this country and our Minister at Teheran, and of course the correspondence with regard to these antagonistic views, each side, perhaps, believing that the good faith of the British Government is involved, takes considerable time.

2121. The questions in which there is a difference of view between the Foreign Office and the India Office are, I presume, questions in which European politics are involved, and questions of high policy, not of India alone?—No doubt a number of important questions relating to European politics are not referred to the India Office.

2122. But where there is collision of opinion it is because of the matter involving questions of European policy?—I think not; I think the reason why a difference of opinion exists is, that our British Minister at Teheran is very anxious to support the Persian Government, and is not sufficiently well acquainted with the effect that supporting the Persian Government in a particular question would have upon those states under the protection of the Indian Government, and therefore he backs up his own man; our officers, on the other hand, back up their men; and I think the reason why each backs up his man is because he is ignorant of the case of the other man.

2123. Mr. Rylands.] Does not the difficulty often occur in this way, that the Foreign Office have a notion that they can understand the questions arising out of Persian affairs better than the India Office can understand those questions?—I do not know. I have no doubt that the Foreign Office understand a great deal better all questions relating to European relations and powers, but I do not see how they can understand a great deal better questions relating to Asiatic powers, and with which we are continually in connection. It is, I think, because the India Office does not understand the Persian standpoint, and the Foreign Office does not understand the Indian standpoint, that we come into collision.

2124. That, of course, will lead to considerable correspondence and delay?—Yes.

2125. In reference to the other question put to you by the honourable Member, whether, in the event of the Persian Mission being transferred to India, there would not still be a certain amount of double government in connection with European questions, I suppose the fact would be that whereas now in relation to Indian questions something like four-fifths of the matters before the Government would bring into play the double government, in the other case, if the Persian Mission were transferred to the India Office, only about one-fifth of the questions would partake of the character of those involving a double government?—Without stating the exact proportion, I think certainly that fewer such questions would arise. At the India Office we should generally say to ourselves, "We do not understand this question, it is a question connected with Turkey, or France, or Russia" (unless it happened to be with regard to the advances of Russia in Central Asia, which is particularly one of our own questions); "it is a question of European policy, and we are Indians, and we think that you at the Foreign Office know best."

2126. You do not pretend to omniscience in the India Office?—Certainly not; we are Indians.

2128. Chairman.] Does not a great deal of your objection arise from the fact that the head of the mission in Persia is a European politician, and not an Indian politician?—I should like to see the head of the mission, and all under him, men of Indian experience; but that is not my sole objection. One of my principal objections is, that the present system involves an extraordinary anomaly, which is this: that for all purposes of control and government of our relations with Persia, it is said at the present time that the affairs of the mission are more European than they are Asiatic or Indian; but for purposes of payment, it is stated that they are more Indian than they are European. I say that those who have the control over these relations, and can govern them as they like, are those which should pay the bulk of the money; and why India, when it is said that the business is more European than it is Asiatic, should pay 12,000*l.* a year towards this mission, and the Foreign Office, according to Mr. Hammond's figures, should pay only 3,000*l.* a year, or only one-fourth of the whole, is what I do not understand. I say, either let the Imperial Exchequer pay the bulk of the money, or let India have the control of those transactions.

2129. Then, as I understand, it comes to this, that if the English Exchequer was to pay the 12,000*l.*, as the English Exchequer pays the 3,000*l.*, you would be very much more satisfied with the state of things than now?—Yes; but not wholly satisfied. There are some who think the money considerations more important than anything else; but I consider that it would be better for India that she should have the entire control of the business there, and should pay all the money, whatever the amount of that money may be. Even in a financial sense, we might be gainers in the end, for I consider that the last Persian war was certainly a Foreign Office war, and not an Indian war. England did, in that case, pay half the amount, though it paid nothing towards the Affghanistan war. I think that if Sir Henry Rawlinson had been there we should not have had war in Persia in 1856.

2130. It comes, then, very much to what I was suggesting, that if you had a skilled Indian politician in Persia, representing the British Government, you think very likely these difficulties would not occur, and our affairs would be better conducted. But is not the difficulty that you have been stating an inherent difficulty in the nature of the relations between India and this country, and is it not the case that, even if you had the control of the mission in Persia, you must communicate, in regard to all matters of European business, with the Foreign Office, as you used to do?—Most certainly. But I have stated already that I do not think that the questions which would then arise of European diplomacy would be so frequent as they are now; and in the next place, I stated that I did not think that there would be so much difference of opinion between the two departments of Her Majesty's Government.

2131. Might not the same differences still arise upon those points, as between the Indian Government and the Home Government?—My view is, that the reason why the differences of opinion arise is because the Indian Viceroy controls the officers of the Persian Gulf, and the countries that border upon Persia, whereas the Foreign Office controls Persia itself, and that if all were under the India Office we should seldom have these difficulties, because the questions would not arise at all, or would soon be smoothed down by arbitration.

hah's Government would say that it was a ission, not from the Queen herself, but from ie Minister of the Queen; so that it is not onsidered advisable, in case of any change aking place, that it should be a mission from ie Viceroy of the Queen, but from the Queen; ie only difference being, that the Secretary of tate for India should regulate the proceedings, nstead of the Secretary of State for Foreign ffairs.

2134. You think that that would meet the ifficulty?—Yes; because, as far as I under- tand, there is no difference, in point of rank, etween the Secretary of State for India and ie Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. In ct, it so happens that the son of the Prime linister, namely, Lord Stanley, was the first ho sent out any despatches to Persia as Secre- ry of State for India. That was an accident, f course. But I believe that it had some effect Persia.

2135. Mr. Baring.] Your objection is that ie Indian Government should pay for what the oreign Office does?—That is one of my objec- ons, but I would sooner that the India Office hould manage it, and pay for it too. I think it very hard if we are not allowed to manage it, hat we should have to pay for it.

2137. But if the Persian Government came nto collision with the Indian Government on ny one of these questions, of necessity it would nvolve a European question also?—Indirectly, t might, in some.

2140. I think the last war was concluded by he mediation of France?—It was concluded at Paris. I do not know to what extent, if any, France was concerned in the matter. I quite see he point you are putting. I wished to make it ppear to the Committee that these collisions be- ween Persia and other Asiatic states would run nuch less chance of taking place if Persia and hose states were under the same control, ecause the single government would in that ase understand the facts as from both sides, and ould be in a better temper to adjudicate, and ave much better chance of using its influence uccessfully, first from one side, and then from the ther.

2142. With regard to those small states with hich the Indian Government has treaties, for nstance, Khelat, the Foreign Office has not the ame means of knowing the value, or even the onditions, of those treaties, as you have in the ndia Office; have they?—No, of course they ave not the same means; and we have not the ame means of knowing the standpoint from hich Persia operates; and that is one of my main rguments for wishing to bring them under one ingle authority, which does know both sides of he questions.

2143. I conclude that when the Indian Government appointed the head of the mission in Persia, it was considered by all the Indian officers as a very great prize, was it not?—Yes, certainly; it was considered that it would be advantageous to the services generally, and the general feeling was, I think, if you may judge from what was commonly expressed by the newspapers, and what is still now being expressed by the newspapers, in the country, that it was for the general interest of India that the Persian Mission should be under the Indian Department of Her Majesty's Government.

2145. You mentioned something about the difficulty of communication between the Viceroy of India and our Minister in Persia; but still in case of an emergency the Viceroy of India does not hesitate to address what you might almost call instructions to him?—I think the Viceroy of India complains that he cannot give instructions; that though he can communicate and state his views, they are not always acted upon, and they fall far short of instructions. Lord Mayo (as before cited) says, "Under the existing arrangements which, for some years past, have been in force, Her Majesty's Minister at the Court of the Shah is placed under the direct control of the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs; and while the revenues of India contribute 9,000 l. a year for the support of the Persian Mission, no person who by service in India has obtained experience of those questions which affect the interests of this Empire is attached to that Embassy. The Secretary of State for India, or the Viceroy in Council, has no power to direct a single act of Her Majesty's Minister at Teheran; all they can do is to ask for information." That is Lord Mayo's account of the position, and he winds up with these words, which I read before: "It is our duty to explain very fully the whole position of affairs to your Grace, and to point out that the means placed at our disposal render it most difficult in all cases, and impossible in some, to carry out with success the policy which has been laid down and the instructions of Her Majesty's Government." That is what Lord Mayo says of the present state of affairs as far as regards his connection as Viceroy with Her Majesty's Minister at Teheran.

2146. Still it is within your own knowledge, is it not, that the Viceroy does express his views, by telegraph and otherwise, to the Minister at Persia?—Yes.

2148. I take it that the Viceroy's communications do not amount to positive instructions?—Exactly so. I think you will see that Lord Mayo considers that they are not tantamount to instructions at all, but merely an expression of opinion.

2149. However, you have stated from your experience

perience that you are of opinion that the dual system of government is disadvantageous?—I think it is. By the dual government I understand government between the Foreign Office and the India Office. I think, as I have before said, they look at similar questions from different standpoints, and have different information to guide them; they have the inclination, of course, to support those under their own protection, and therefore they are apt to come into conflict and antagonism with each other; and that happens not only with regard to the Secretaries of State at home, but still more with regard to the officers out in that country. Each officer backs up his own man, and then the Indian officer comes into antagonism with our Minister in Persia, and then there are references to England, and each office supports its officer, each department acting in perfect good faith, each doing what it is best for the public interest, but each of them being short of the desired amount of information that will enable them to form a just and judicial view of the case.

2150. If, on an act of vigour on the part of an officer, the Indian Government were led to approve of that officer's proceedings, you may suppose it possible that the Foreign Office would view that Act unfavourably, in consequence of representatsons made by the Persian authorities?—Yes, so much so, that a case might arise of this kind: whilst the Viceroy of India is writing home to the Secretary of State for India, recommending that, owing to the excellent manner in which an officer had conducted a case in the Persian Gulf, he should be recommended for the honour of a K.C.B-ship, perhaps the Foreign Office, at the same time, is suggesting that he should be called upon to give explanations of his improper conduct in those very transactions.

2151. Mr. Rylands.] Has there not been a case in which a Minister in Persia, at all events a person attached to the Persian Mission, has been treated differently by the Foreign Office and the India Office; in the one case being recalled, certainly not in a manner redounding to his credit, and in the other case being recommended for an honour of the character you have mentioned?—I think there may have been a case of that kind.

2156. Mr. Eastwick.] When the superintendence of our relations with Persia was under the India Office, can you recollect any European matters of importance which came under your notice connected with Persia?—I cannot at this moment bear in mind any question of great importance connected with European politics. There may have been references about the Turko-Persian boundary question.

2160. And do the Foreign Office exercise that discretion about sending other Despatches to you?—Even supposing that we have these Despatches before us at the India Office, if the Foreign Office wished to make a reference to us upon any question, and to have the views of the India Office upon it, they would write to us "With reference to Mr. Murray's or Mr. Alison's letter of such and such a date, number so and so, a copy of which you have had, I am directed by Lord Clarendon to say that he wishes to have the opinion of the India Office upon it."

2162. As to what is a matter of Indian interes nterest, and what is one of general interest?—Yes.

2163. Then, as to the other officers, in the ature of diplomatic agents, do they correspond vith the Foreign Office, through you?—No; here are one or two of our agents that do corre-pond with the Foreign Office; the consul and gent at Zanzibar corresponds with the Foreign Office, and I think the Muscat man does also, vhich is only recently. The fact is, that they re Her Majesty's consuls as well as being gents of the Indian Government, and the con-equence is, that as consuls they are allowed to correspond with the Foreign Office.

2165. Chairman.] Does that correspondence from Zanzibar go direct to the India Office?—The Zanzibar correspondence goes direct to both offices; as political agent, the officer there writes direct to the India Office, and, as consul, to the Foreign Office.

2166. Is it the same at Baghdad?—I do not quite know the system as regards the Foreign Office; the consul general at Baghdad wished to communicate directly with the Foreign Office, as political agent as well as consul general, but was not allowed to do so.

2167. His communications to the Foreign Office come through you, whatever they may be?—Not in his consular capacity. He has communications with the minister at Constantinople, in regard to Turkish affairs, and with the Foreign Office; but we know little of these matters.

2168. Do you pay him entirely?—Yes.

2169. Mr. Richard Shaw.] Are we to understand that if the control were once more vested in the Indian Government, you would be quite ready to bear the whole expense of the Persian establishment?—That is a question that I could not answer; it would depend upon the Council of India, with whom the power of controlling the finances of India would rest; but as it would appear that the expenses are not much beyond 12,000 l. a year, which we now pay, I think we might see that there would be corresponding advantages, which would result from it, which would be worth the further expense. Speaking of my own private opinion, I should say that it would be well worth doing, if it were only to avoid collisions, and correspondence, and expeditions, and so on, that are very expensive; I would not hesitate to say that I think India would gain in purse by having the entire management of it, even if she paid the entire expenses, without a contribution from the Imperial Exchequer.

2170. Sir Charles Wentworth Dilke.] Have you any experience of the working of the competition of your civil servants?—Yes.

2171. Sufficient to justify you in giving an opinion at all as to whether such a scheme would be satisfactory for the diplomatic service?—Not having been in India since the new rules came into force, I cannot judge very well, but I find that the opinion generally of the civil service (it may be prejudice) is not very much in favour of the present plan; but certainly the new system has developed some men of very great ability, and men who have turned out admirable public servants, and particularly in this very foreign department, men like Mr. Wyllie and Mr. Aitchison, the latter now holding the office of Foreign Secretary in India. It is held in his person by a younger man than has ever yet held that position in India. He was considered so much the ablest man to succeed to the appointment when the previous Foreign Secretary intimated his intention to resign, that he was telegraphed for to England by Lord Mayo, to ask him to accept the appointment. He was a very young man for the appointment, but they selected him out of the whole service. Mr. Wyllie had retired from the service, or he might perhaps have been asked to go.

2172. How many years had Mr. Aitchison been in the service?—I think not more than 12 or 13. But certainly the general opinion with regard to those who have come in under the new system is that, although very good at the office work, they have not that same kind of pith and sinew that the former civilians had, and that in a great crisis like the mutiny of 1857 and 1858, they would not have distinguished themselves, so much as the old civil servants, did as soldiers—men who took their rifles and went out and fought the enemy just as if they had been bred up as soldiers.

2174. But it would be easy to have an examination in riding?—Yes; but I never knew a person who could ride well who did not ride as a boy.

2176. Mr. Otway.] What is the system of competition in the India Office?—I do not know that we have had much system there; it has generally been that three go up, and one out of the three is taken.

2178. Practically it is simply that the Secretary of State nominates a number, out of whom those who prove themselves most capable on examination are selected?—Yes; I do not think that they are any better than those who came in before. I think a great number of those that came into the office before were the sons of the old functionaries of the India House or Office; and those men took special pains, of course, in training their sons for those duties, and that turned them into better officers; and such men generally had more pride in their offices—more esprit de corps. I think that is a very important circumstance that ought not to be forgotten. I have found sometimes that those who have been the sons of old servants in the India House, have turned out the best clerks in the office.

Major General Sir Henry Creswicke Rawlinson, K.C.B., called in; and Examined.

Major-Gen. Sir H. C. Rawlinson, K.C.B.

2179. Mr. Eastwick.] You have held appointments, I believe, both in the diplomatic and in the consular services?—Yes, in both.

2181. I believe that the appointment at Bagdad and that at Bushire, and all the other appointments in Persia, with the exception of the mission at Teheran, and the consulships at Tabreez and Resht, are purely Indian appointments, and are paid for out of the Indian revenues?—Perhaps it may be convenient that I should state seriatim what the appointments are in Persia and the neighbouring countries. There is a diplomatic mission with an establishment at Teheran, which is entirely under the Foreign Office. There are consulships at Tabreez and at Resht, which are also under the Foreign Office. Then there is a telegraphic establishment in Persia, which, although under the control of the mission, belongs to the Indian Government, and is conducted by Indian officers at the expense of India. In the adjoining countries there is a political agent with an establishment at Bagdad, under the Government of India politically, but holding the commission of consul general from the Crown. He is paid by the Indian Government, and corresponds both with the Government of India and with the Foreign Office. There is also a naval establishment on the Tigris under the Indian Government, and some telegraph officers at the telegraph terminus at Bussorah. With regard to Bushire, in the Persian Gulf, although the place itself is in Persia, the officer who is stationed there and who is called the Resident in the Persian Gulf is entirely under the Government of Bombay, receiving his pay and instructions from India, and being in fact boná fide an Indian officer. The telegraph establishment, and the naval establishment in the Gulf, are also under the Government of India, and so is the establishment at Muscat. I may also mention that the mission in Persia, although under the Foreign Office, is paid principally, if not entirely, by the Indian Government to the amount of 12,000 l. a year, and that all the subordinate native agents also throughout Persia are paid by the Indian Government, although nominated by and under the control of the mission. I mean the agents at Shiraz, Ispahan, Kermanshah, and in Khorassan.

2182. Do you think it desirable that the officers who fill these appointments in Persia should be Indian officers, or would officers of the regular diplomatic and consular services do as well; at all events after a time?—I think that officers of the Indian service are better. I think that they are better qualified for employment in Persia from the circumstance of their being conversant with the manners of Orientals, and more scrupulous about offending Mahommedan prejudices. Besides, they would come to Persia with a certain knowledge of the language, and would take a real interest in the country, which is a very important consideration.

2184. Hitherto the officers who have been employed in these appointments in Persia, even at the mission itself, have been Indian officers, have they not generally?—Until recent times I should say almost universally. I believe indeed that from the commencement of the century there are only three or four officers who have been in charge of the mission who have not been Anglo-Indians. The only ones that I remember were Mr. Morier in former times, and in more recent times Sir Charles Murray and Mr. Alison.

2186. Would you say that the Court of Persia approximates more to the Indian courts or to the European courts in customs and character?—The Court of Teheran is in reality of the same type as the Indian courts, as the old Courts of Delhi and Lucknow, and the modern Courts of Cabul and Hyderabad. Certainly in Persia there is a refinement both in manners and language which does not exist in India; and there is also a tendency to imitate and to adopt European institutions which some day, it is to be hoped, will bring forth good fruit. But as I said before, the type is decidedly Oriental, and there is this essential difference between the Persian court and other courts; that at Teheran there is nothing like representation, or any approach to constitutional government, or even what we call in Europe "public opinion"; there is nothing but the individual and the irresponsible will of the sovereign. So that the duties of an envoy are very different in Persia from what they are in any European court. An envoy in an European court, when engaged in any difficult negotiation, naturally and very properly brings the influence of his government to bear upon public opinion or upon the advisers of the Crown; but in Persia he must be mainly dependent for success upon his own personal influence with the sovereign. That I do think is an essential difference between the Persian court and the courts of America and Europe.

2187. So that an envoy who was not acquainted with the language or with Oriental manners would be very unlikely to be successful in his negotiations, or at all events more unlikely than one accustomed to them?—Certainly more unlikely. In fact I consider an acquaintance with Oriental manners and usages, and with with the language of the country, to be indispensable to the position of envoy at Teheran.

2188. You held your appointment as minister in Persia for a comparatively short period, can you give any reasons for having retired so speedily?—The history of the affair may be told in a very few words. I was already in the Council of India in the year 1859, when the relations with Persia were transferred from the Foreign Office to the India Office, and I was invited to take charge of the Persian Mission, in immediate connection with the India Office. In the following year the mission was re-transferred to the Foreign Office, and I tendered my resignation. My reasons for taking that step were stated to the Government at the time, but I may explain to the Committee that I tendered my resignation because the conditions on which I had taken office were not continued, and because by the transfer the position and the duties of the mission were very considerably altered.

2189. Have you any objection to state those reasons?—The reasons are to be found in my official letter; but whether I put that in, or whether I should state them verbally, must rest with the Committee. I have no objection to do either.

2190. Chairman.] Will you state them verbally?—The reasons then, under which I acted, amount to this, that the system of the India Office, and the system of the Foreign Office, are very different. Under the India Office, an officer appointed to such a position as mine in Persia would be allowed a very considerable liberty of action. Having received his general instructions, it would then be left to his own individual responsibility to carry them out, by personal management and influence. Under the Foreign Office, on the other hand, he would be required implicitly to obey the rules and traditions of that office, which, as I have before explained, are hardly, I think, applicable to an Oriental court, although very well adapted to European diplomacy; and he would receive specific instructions on each separate question. That was one of the considerations which influenced me. But also, under the transfer, there was a change in the personnel of the establishment, and there was especially an abolition of the system of making presents, which, on accepting office, I had made a sine qua non, as I knew it to be a recognised Oriental institution, and as I considered it to be absolutely indispensable for the acquisition and the retention of an influence at the court, as indeed is felt and acted on by the Russian Government to the present day. I may also add, as a matter of fact, that under the liberal system of the India Office, which authorised my making presents on my own discretion, I had acquired a very considerable personal influence with the Shah, which certainly tended very much to facilitate the conduct of public business, and which, if any political emergency had occurred, might have been of very great national importance.

2191. Did the power of bestowing presents contribute materially to that influence?—Very greatly, indeed most essentially; because the system of making presents is not so much buying the good-will of the sovereign, as it is falling in with the habits and prejudices of the people, and doing what they believe to be only due and proper to the position of the ministers and the sovereign of a great state. Not giving presents is considered disrespectful, and to show a carelessness and indifference to the good-will of the state.

2193. To the sovereign himself?—To the sovereign himself. And knowing that I had, by making presents at first, and by personal management afterwards, acquired very considerable influence at court, and feeling that I should be unable to retain that influence, under the new system I really thought that, on public as well as private grounds, it was better to retire while the confidential position which I occupied with the sovereign was still unimpaired.

2196. While you held the office of minister, can you say whether the affairs that you had to transact were generally affairs relating to India, Affghanistan, and the East, or whether they had reference to the European states more than to the East?—Certainly, the principal and important business of the mission refers to India; but there occasionally arise European questions of some importance. I should say myself, from what I remember, that at least three-fourths of the Despatches sent from Teheran are connected, directly or indirectly, with India and Indian interests.

2197. And those affairs are the affairs of the greatest importance?—Undoubtedly; those are the essential duties of the mission. In fact, it is only owing to the geographical position of Persia as regards India, that it is of any importance to us. If we had no Indian Empire we should probably have no mission in Persia.

2199. Were you sensible of any loss of influence with the Shah, or with reference to the other diplomatic officers there, owing to your having come from the India Office?—Most undoubtedly not. I am satisfied that no distinction at all is made in Persia between an envoy under the India Office and an envoy under the Foreign Office.

11 April 1870.

2200. In your opinion, would officers trained in India be as well able to manage such transactions as take place between our mission in Persia and the Russian and Turkish missions as European diplomatists?—There are very few matters really which come before a British Minister in Persia involving discussions with the representatives of the European Powers at the Court; but if such cases did arise, I can see no reason why an Indian officer of ability and experience should not be just as competent to deal with them as a trained European diplomatist.

2201. Do you remember any transactions of that nature while you were at Teheran, principally of a European interest and character?—I remember nothing, except the Turko-Persian boundary question, which ever came before me as a European matter, and that merely in an incidental way, as the measure had been almost completely carried out before I took office.

2202. There were no great questions with Turkey or Russia just at that time?—No, not in 1859 and 1860.

2203. Would you recommend that the junior officers of the mission should be taken from the Indian service, or from the European diplomatic service, with reference to the prestige or otherwise that Indian officers have acquired in Persia from the time of Malcolm to the present time?—I think that young Indian officers would be more valuable servants, as they take more kindly to the duties, and are better qualified in every respect.

2204. From the experience that you have had in Persia, would you say that officers who come from the European diplomatic service are as contented with their posts, and as desirous of remaining, as officers who come from the Indian service?—From my own experience I can say that the Indian officers make much better assistants at the mission, and for a very simple reason; namely, that to a young Indian political officer, service in the Persian mission is promotion, whereas, to an attaché from Paris or Vienna, it is banishment.

2205. Have you observed any inconveniences in our mission in Teheran, and our consulships at Tabreez and Resht being under the Foreign Office, while the control of affairs in the Persian Gulf, at Bagdad, and on the eastern frontier, is entirely under the India Office?—I do not think that it would be desirable, under any circumstances, to place the consulates in Persia under the India Office, because there is very little trade between India and the north of Persia, where the consuls reside; but I am clearly of opinion that there is very great inconvenience, and not only inconvenience but injury, to the public interest from a diversity of authority in conducting the relations with Persia and her immediate neighbours; for that diversity of authority not only delays and complicates business, but also it begets an antagonism of views, and even of interests, which is very deplorable. For example, at the present day, if we may judge from the tone of the Indian press, all the proceedings of Persia in reference to the Persian Gulf, or to the Eastern frontier, are looked upon in India with suspicion and disfavour, as opposed to the interests of the states conterminous with India, and with which India is more immediately connected; whereas, if our Eastern relations were all equally under the Indian authorities, (either at home or in India) it would be understood that the Viceroy was just as careful of the rights and interests of Persia as of her neighbours the Arabs, or Affghans, or Belooches. It must be apparent that this constant abuse of Persia, which takes place in the Indian press must produce a very bad effect in the country, and does, I have no doubt, very seriously cripple our minister's action.

2207. Is not the consul general at Bagdad an instance also?—He certainly receives a commission as consul, but he is not appointed in the first instance by the Foreign Office as a consul. He is first appointed by the Indian Government as political agent, and then receives a consul's commission from the Foreign Office in order to enable him to attend to the consul's duties; the difference is this, that whereas the officers at Tabreez and Resht are essentially consular, at Bagdad the officer is essentially political, and is only consular for the convenience of the public.

2208. Do you see any objection to making the consuls at Resht and Tabreez similar to the consul general at Bagdad, that is to say Indian officers, giving them the commission of consul in order to admit of their discharging such duties as consuls have to discharge?—It would certainly be practicable, but I do not think it would be so advantageous as the present arrangements.

2209. Are you aware that there are questions now of great importance relating to the frontier of India and Persia, and to the Persian Gulf, the decision of which ought to rest entirely with the India Office, and in which references to the Foreign Office occasion delay and embarrassment?—There are pending matters of much consequence in reference to a disputed frontier in Sistan and Mekran, and also as to the claims of the Shah to certain islands in the Persian Gulf. I think it would be much better that all matters relating to the eastern frontiers of Persia should be dealt with by one authority.

2210. The Eastern frontier being Sistan and Mekran?—Yes.

2211. That is purely an Indian question, of which the Foreign Office can know nothing?—Certainly; but every reference which comes home from Persia with regard to those matters, is addressed in the first instance to the Foreign Office, and is then the subject of a lengthy correspondence between the India Office and the Foreign Office. That causes delay at any rate, and I think, moreover, that such questions would be more efficiently dealt with by one single department.

2212. In case of any serious complications arising, would military demonstrations be made from from India or from Europe?—In all previous cases of disagreement between England and Persia, the demonstrations have been made from India, and I presume that the same course would be followed in the event of any possible future rupture.

2213. Would it be necessary to entrust the conduct of the expedition to the Indian Government, or would it be as well to give it altogether or in part to the Foreign Office?—I presume that the Indian Government must of necessity be the executive authority, organising the expedition, and supplying stores and material, and troops and commanders; but of course, as far as the political objects of the expedition were concerned, the India Office would take its instructions from the Foreign Office, or would at any rate consult with the Foreign Office before sending its executive instructions to India.

2215. Mr. Otway.] Were the good offices of the French Government tendered in that matter?—I do not think that the French Government interfered at all. Paris was only adopted as a convenient place for the settlement of the matter, because Lord Cowley had been cognisant of all circumstances of the war, and he was thought therefore to be the most fitting instrument to arrange the peace.

2216. Mr. Eastwick.] Were the services of that Indian officer that you have mentioned very important in assisting the nogotiation as interpreter?—Captain Lynch is an officer who has served for a very long time in Persia and the Persian seas, and is thoroughly well acquainted with the language, and an able man altogether, and I have always understood that his services in arranging the Treaty of Paris in 1857 were very important; indeed, so much so, that the Government made him a present of 500*l.* for his services on the occasion.

2217. The only actual war that we had with Persia was while the mission was under an officer brought up in European courts?—The only actual war that we had was during Sir Charles Murray's tenure of office; but there was a suspension of relations, and a hostile occupation of Karrack, while Sir John McNeill was Minister, who was originally an Indian officer.

2218. As a member of the Indian Council, I would ask you whether you think it reasonable that the whole of the charges in Persia should be borne by the Indian Exchequer?—I must say I think it unreasonable that all the expenses should be borne by one department, and all the control should be exercised by another department. It seems to me that that only can be justified on the assumption that the interests to be guarded in our relations with Persia are exclusively Indian, while the Foreign Office is alone competent to conduct those relations; and this I take to be a complete fallacy. At any rate, whichever department may ultimately be considered the best for managing Persian affairs, I certainly think that the payment and the control should be in the same hands.

2219. Are you aware whether there have not been some complaints from the officers of the mission at Teheran, as to the loss occasioned to them by the rates of exchange in payment of their salaries?—I am not aware of that; in my time I never heard of any complaints of the sort; and I am not aware that any such complaints have been made recently, but I do know that the currency in Persia has been very much depreciated of late.

2220. It is the fact, is it not, that the Russian Government send the whole of the salaries of their officers in Teheran in gold?—Yes, they are paid in gold forwarded by Government messengers.

2221. Mr. Kinnaird.] What is the practice of the Russian Government as regards sending ambassadors cognisant of Eastern affairs to Persia?—I think that the officers who have come to Persia from the Russian Government have generally served a novitiate in the Caucasus, or in Siberia, in Turkey, or in some of the quasi Eastern possessions of Russia, or Eastern countries bordering on Russia.

2222. Generally are they men of capacity?—I have known men of very great mark among them, like Count Medem, who was one of the first diplomatists of Europe.

2223. Mr. Otway.] How far do you think that the progress of Russia in Central Asia, and the increased communications of Persia with European courts, which has taken place since you were there, would modify your view as to our diplomatic representation there being under the Foreign Office?—I should say that the advance of Russia in Central Asia is a raison de plus, since it makes Persia and the Persian interests of very much more importance to us, in consequence of the increased pressure upon India. With regard to the increased tendency of Persia to adopt European customs and institutions, I really am not aware to what extent that has operated. I felt when I left Persia that they were on the eve of a transition state from the Oriental to the European type; but I hardly think that very much progress has been made in that direction as yet.

2224. Had Persia a Minister in Paris when you were at Teheran?—Yes.

2225. And at Vienna and St. Petersburgh?—Yes; at St. Petersburgh they have had a Minister for 30 or 40 years.

2226. In Vienna not so long?—In Vienna and Paris for the last 20 years, perhaps.

2227. I conclude that if a great difference arose between Great Britain and Russia on questions in Central Asia, those differences would have to be considered and settled by the action of the Foreign Office, not by that of the India Office?—Certainly, but the local interests in Persia, as connected with that advance of Russia, would be decidedly more Indian than European.

2228. You mean that you would press on

11 April 1870.

Persia from India rather than from Europe?—Yes, certainly; but besides that, I repeat that the question would, in its general character, be more Indian than European. It would only be European in fact; that is to say, it would only affect England through India.

2229. Mr. Kinnaird.] Have any of the independent native states bordering on our dominions in India, kept up communication with the Persian Government by sending representatives?—Not at present. I think the Persian Government itself has recently sent an envoy to the Court of Cabul, but I have not heard that any return envoy has been sent to Teheran, and certainly there is no communication between Khelat or the Arab States and the Persian Court, in the way of sending envoys.

2230. During the war with us, did they attempt to send any mission to stir up the states that were bordering on us?—That is a matter that we do not think it particularly prudent or desirable to rake up, but there is evidence that, during the war, they did intrigue against us to a very considerable extent, and very naturally.

2231. And therefore it is of great importance that our Indian Government should be in the closest relations with Persia?—Yes. I may state that I am not alluding to intrigues with the neighbouring states, but to intrigues in our own territory.

2232. Mr. Otway.] Did you find any difficulty during your stay at Teheran in getting access to the Shah?—Not the slightest. I never asked to see his Majesty that I was not admitted immediately; the same day, or in a few hours. He would always see me, and I used to see him very frequently without the presence even of the Minister of Foreign Affairs.

2233. You spoke Persian?—Yes, just as I spoke English.

2234. Chairman.] You consider the knowledge of Persian indispensable there?—Yes.

2235. Mr. Otway.] The intercourse was carried on between you two?—The intercourse was carried on between us alone in the room; somewhat perhaps to the discontent of the Minister for Foreign Affairs, who found that Othello's occupation was gone, but certainly very advantageously to the conduct of business.

2239. The fact is, that as regards the sovereign there is scarcely any operative public opinion in a despotic government like that of Persia?—None. The despotism of Persia is quite different from anything that we can conceive by comparing it with despotism in Europe, because in Persia there is absolutely nothing but the irresponsible will of the sovereign, who may send out and strangle any of his ministers at five minutes' notice, and sometimes does so.

2240. It becomes exceedingly important that diplomatic action, with such a sovereign, should be carried on in accordance with the experience that may be obtained at the particular court?—Yes.

2241. And such experience can hardly be obtained in Downing-street, I suppose?—It is not so much that the experience could hardly be obtained there if it were sought for; it is, that the traditions of Downing-street do not run in that groove; they refer to civilised diplomacy with cultivated European nations.

2242. But is it not the fact, that at the time that you were in Persia, before you wrote the official document to which you have alluded, from the action of the Foreign Office, you were led to suppose that they imagine themselves to know better how to manage affairs in Teheran than you did?—I suppose that that was their impression.

2243. May I ask whether you did not write home to the Foreign Office to say that you knew Persia better than the Foreign Office did?—No, I do not think that I ever wrote that; but really I should have no objection if the Committee think it desirable, to read the letter that has been alluded to. There is nothing, I think, compromising to any one in it.

2244. Is that the first letter that you wrote on that subject, or was there not a former letter?—This is the only official letter that I wrote on the subject.

2245. Did you not write any letter before that to Lord Russell?—This is the only official letter. I may have written private letters to Lord Russell, which are not on record.

2246. Mr. Otway.] Has that letter ever been made public; ever been moved for?—I do not think that it has. It is a public letter to Lord Russell at the Foreign Office, and is as follows: "Teheran, 20 February 1860.—My Lord, When I accepted the appointment of Her Majesty's Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary at the Court of Persia, in the spring of last year, I had no personal object to serve, either of advancement or emolument. I took office simply as a matter of public duty, in connection with my immediate line of employment. As I had been for more than 28 years in the Indian service, and for four years in the Indian Department of the Government at home, it seemed to me to be in harmony with my previous career that I should take on myself the duties of the Teheran Mission, under the direction of the India Office; and I also thought that as the conduct of our relations with the Court of Persia would, under the control of the India Office, be naturally placed on the same liberal footing, in regard to presents, and contingent expenditure, which, in deference to Oriental usage, is sanctioned for all other diplomatic establishments in the East, I might be able to recover for the British Mission at Teheran that influential position which it formerly occupied, and thus do good service to my country. These views, however, have been entirely altered by the re-transfer of the Persian Mission to the Foreign Office, and the instructions consequent on that re-transfer, which are communicated to me in your Lordship's Despatches, No. 1 and No. 4, of the 1st and 12th ultimo, ultimo respectively. In the first place, I find myself taken out of the line to which I belong, and attached to a department on which I have no claim, and with the regulations and traditions of which I am comparatively unacquainted; and, secondly, I am required to observe certain principles of action as established for the general guidance of Her Majesty's diplomatic service, which I conscientiously believe to be inapplicable to Persia, and to be incompatible with the acquisition or retention of influence at this court. As the conditions under which I took office have been thus essentially altered by circumstances beyond my control, and as I can no longer indulge a hope of being able to serve in this country either with credit to myself or with advantage to the Government I take this first opportunity, after being officially informed of the retransfer of our relations with Persia to the Foreign Office, respectfully to tender my resignation of the post of Her Majesty's envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary at the court of the Shah. It will rest with Her Majesty's Government to decide on the exact period of my retirement from the charge of the Persian mission. If your Lordship should be pleased to dispense with my services at once, I shall be glad to move from Teheran before the hot weather sets in. If, on the other hand, there should be any matter of urgency which may require my presence, or your Lordship should think it desirable on general grounds that I should wait to be relieved by the minister who may be appointed to succeed me, then I shall be prepared to remain the summer at Teheran; and, under any circumstances, I shall, of course, consider myself bound to follow out, with the utmost exactitude, your Lordship's instructions with regard to presents and economy of expenditure, during my remaining brief tenure of office.—I have, &c., H. C. Rawlinson, Envoy and Minister."

Major Gen. Sir H. C. Rawlinson, K.C.G.

2249. Used he to remain in the room with other foreign ministers who had interviews with the Shah?—Always.

2250. Therefore you consider that you had advantages over other foreign ministers?—Yes.

2251. Viscount Barrington.] I think you stated that one of your reasons for giving up the post of minister there, was the discontinuance of the presents from this country to Persia?—Yes.

2253. Any return presents are made to the Government, not to the minister, I presume?—They are made to the Government.

THE RIGHT HON. EDWARD PLEYDELL BOUVERIE, IN THE CHAIR.

The Right Honourable EDWARD HENRY Earl of DERBY (attending by permission of the House of Lords), Examined.

The Earl of Derby.
2 May 1870.

2255. Chairman.] YOU have been Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs?—Yes; for about two years and a-half.

2256. Previously to that, I think, at one time, you were Under Secretary of State?—For a very short time, between six and seven months.

2258. The entrance into the service, as we have been told, is now by a limited system of competition, there being a certain number of nominees?—That is the case in regard to the entrance into the Foreign Office.

2259. The entrance into the diplomatic service is by simple examination, a test examination, without competition?—Yes.

2260. Subsequently followed by a further examination, is it not?—Yes.

2261. Had you anything to do with the establishment of that system?—No, I had not; I took the system as I found it; I considered it to work satisfactorily upon the whole; I heard no complaints against it, and I made no alterations.

2262. You found it so, and left it so?—I found it so, and left it so.

2264. Were you able to make any comparison in that respect between the applications for entrance into the Foreign Office, and those for entrance into the diplomatic service, so as to see whether there was greater pressure to get into the Foreign Office than to get into the diplomatic service?—My impression is that there is decidedly much greater eagerness to get into the Foreign Office, or any public office here, than to get into the diplomatic service.

2265. Are you inclined to attribute that to the insufficient remuneration of the diplomatic servants, or to the other discouragements of that service?—I am not prepared to call it insufficient remuneration, because, though the pecuniary inducement is not great, we still have a sufficient supply of men for the service. I should rather put it down to the other causes which you have indicated.

2266. You found no actual deficiency in the supply of competent qualified men?—No.

2267. Men whom under any circumstances you would be glad to appoint to that service?—Yes; I should say that I was never driven to nominate any persons whom I did not think competent, merely by the absence of other candidates.

2268. Are you inclined to approve of that mode of entrance into the service, or to recommend any change?—The general bias of my mind is favourable to competition, at least to competition of a limited kind; and for this reason, that competition makes it easier to keep up the standard of qualification. It has been often argued, and argued I think with great justice, that where the question is merely between one candidate and the public, there is always a tendency on the part of the examiner to lower the bar, so to speak, to let him in more easily; but if it is a competition between three, two of whom must be disappointed, there is no such feeling or bias on the part of the examiner, and the standard of qualification is generally higher. But of course if you are to have a limited competition it is absolutely necessary that that should be accompanied by a minimum standard of qualification. If that is not done, you may have one unqualified man get in merely because he is competing with two who are more unqualified than himself.

2269. That is the standing objection which is taken aken now to limited competition; that it is possible to handicap the men so that one of them is ure to win?—There is no doubt, if you assume hat a minister is desirous of evading the spirit f a rule, that he can do so; but, as a general ule, I should apprehend that a minister will not e sorry to oblige three men instead of one, and e will say say that, as between themselves, they nust settle it in the best manner they can.

2270. Therefore, abstractedly, I understand ou to prefer the Foreign Office system of enrance rather than the diplomatic service system? —I think that the Foreign Office system of enrance has worked very well. The doubt that as arisen in my mind as to applying the prinple of limited competition is merely this: I am ot quite sure whether you would have competiors. Of course competition, if competitors do ot come forward, reduces itself to simple nomiation, and that not the best kind of nomination, ecause the minister appointing, in that case feels imself less responsible.

2271. That is in consequence of what you reerred to just now, namely, the diplomatic service eing less attractive than the general public serice?—I do not think that it is so attractive, omparing it with the eagerness that exists to nter other branches of the public service. I do ot think that there is much eagerness to enter he diplomatic service.

2272. A good deal has been said to us about he social position which it is said to be necessary hat the gentlemen nominated to the diplomatic ervice should occupy, and that it is necessary, herefore, that they should be selected more or ess from one class of society; is that your pinion, or do you think that it might be thrown pen?—I think that it is very essential that they hould be, in every sense of the word, gentlemen; mean by that, men of refined manners and ultivated minds.

2273. There has been a suggestion that a uniersity degree should be rather a qualification or a nomination; has that ever been suggested o you, or considered by you?—No, and I should ot be inclined to favour that suggestion. I annot say that I have ever considered it very eriously, but I do not see that a university deree proves much in any way; the ordinary pass egree at Oxford and Cambridge is certainly no est of any very high acquirements.

2274. It is no test of the higher qualities of a an, as contrasted with his literary attainments? —No, I am afraid that when you are speaking f the case of a young man who has had no opportunity of making himself known in the world, ny test which you can apply, must necessarily e a very imperfect one; you cannot tell with ny certainty how a man will turn out.

2275. Then I think I collect on the whole, hat you are prepared to say that the present ystem of admission is, from your experience, a atisfactory mode, and you would not be disposed o make a change in it?—I can only judge the ree by its fruit. I should say that, taking it upon n average, the personnel of the diplomatic serice stands decidedly high; there are many men n it whom I should consider, with the experience which they must necessarily have acquired in the ischarge of their duty, quite fitted for the highest ost in the service. With regard to those who ave entered within the last two or three years, ne cannot speak with the same certainty, because hey are not in a position in which their qualifications can be very generally tested; but as far as I am able to form an opinion, I should say that the average qualifications of the service are high.

2276. There are great complaints, we are told of the slowness of promotion in the profession, that now it has become almost a seniority profession, and that the consequence is, that the rise to the higher grades is extremely slow, and that that is extremely discouraging; have you given your attention to that at all?—I have heard that often stated, and to a certain extent of late years it is the truth; but I am bound to say that as far as I have had any opportunity of becoming acquainted with the state of things in other professions, I have heard the same complaints there also. I think that if you take men at a certain age, say 40 or 45, and see what position they hold, and what emoluments they are receiving, the diplomatic service does not compare unfavourably with other professions, certainly not with the army or navy, and probably not with the civil service at home.

2277. Foreign service begins, as you are aware, with no payment at all; there is a period without any salary, then a low one, then gradually a rise? —Yes.

2278. It has been stated to us, that great discouragements are caused to the younger members of the profession, in consequence of the very distant hope of promotion; you think that that is not peculiar to that branch of the public service?—I think in the first place that it is not peculiar to that branch of the public service, and in the next place, I think that you must allow for a rather temporary and exceptional state of things. Within the last 10 years, there have been missions suppressed at Turin, at Naples, at Dresden, at Frankfort, at Hanover, and temporarily at Mexico; that is six missions which have been swept away, and of course that implies a corresponding diminution of appointments in the lower grades.

2279. What was the doctrine which you held as Secretary of State in regard to promotion; did you look upon it as if there was a claim to promotion by seniority, or that it was a system of selection for the chiefships?—I hold that any system is unsatisfactory which does not take into account both the principle of seniority and the principle of selection. I cannot conceive anything more unworkable than a system absolutely confined to seniority. In point of fact that never has been the practice in the diplomatic service, or, so far as I know, in any service as regards the higher grades. On the other hand, I think that other things being equal, seniority should be considered in the case of two men who are equal or even nearly equal; I should undoubtedly prefer the claims of the senior, because, I think that a man is entitled in fairness not to be passed over unless for very obvious reasons of public advantage. I should say, therefore, that the system adopted ought to be that of selection in which very considerable attention is paid to the claims of seniority.

2280. Selection with due regard to seniority? —Yes; that regard to seniority, let me add, becoming less in proportion as you rose to higher grades.

2281. It would appear, as far we can collect, I think, from general statements that in recent times the tendency has been more and more strong to look to seniority rather than to selection;

The Earl of Derby.

tion; do you think that there was anything of that kind in the Foreign Office during your headship of it?—No, I should not say so; I should not have hesitated to pass over the claims of seniority where there was a case of very superior ability.

2282. And with regard to the introduction of gentlemen from without the profession into the higher ranks in it, had you any occasion, during your chiefship, to exercise that duty?—I did not do so. I may say that that is about the most difficult question, as connected with the service, that I know; and it is, perhaps, of all, the question which most admits of being argued on both sides. On the whole, I think it is best to leave it in this way: that, as a general rule, men who are actually in the service should be entitled to look forward to the higher posts in the service; but it should be clearly understood that the power rests with the Secretary of State to appoint an outsider if, for any special reason, he thinks fit to do so. I would make appointments within the service the rule, and appointments from outside the exception.

2283. Then I rather understand, from what you say, that you consider that the block, as it is called, in the service, is of a temporary character, and is more or less unavoidable, and does not call for any immediate or urgent remedy; is that your opinion?—Yes; that is my opinion. The remedy which it calls for is a very simple one; that is, not unduly to multiply the number of new appointments.

2284. Not to put too great a number of fresh men into the service?—Yes. I may say that, during the two years and a half when I was at the head of that department, I took care to keep the number of new admissions very considerably below the number of vacancies.

2286. Has it ever occurred to you that that number could be safely reduced in the principal missions; because we had a suggestion from Sir Henry Elliot that he thought it quite possible to reduce the permanent younger members of the larger missions, and have a sort of flying squadron of gentlemen who might be detached from the Foreign Office for special duty, in case of extra pressure in any one of the missions?—I do not feel that I could speak with any authority on that point; you would get that much better from the heads of the missions, who know of their own knowledge what has to be done there.

2287. We had a suggestion, too, that to a certain extent the pressure in the lower grades might be relieved by transferring some of those who showed themselves less disposed or less competent to advance in the diplomatic profession to the consular service; has that ever been suggested to your Lordship?—There is no rule that prevents that being done at present. The objection to it, looking at it from the point of view the consular service, is that it would be hardly fair upon the interests of that service to use it as a place into which you might draft off those who are not likely to be successful in diplomacy. But it may very well be that a man under certain circumstances would prefer the inferior position of a consul and the consular duties, with a certain fixed remuneration, to the uncertain prospect of rising to a higher grade in diplomacy. In that case I think he would be neither a better nor a worse consul for having been in the diplomatic service; and I would take his claims and consider them exactly as I would consider the claims of any other person.

2288. Would you be in favour of a more general fusion of the consular and diplomatic services for the interchange of servants and duties because there has been a suggestion thrown out that consular servants should be more of the nature of diplomatic servants as they are in the French service?—That is exceedingly difficult to answer. The French are undoubtedly very successful in the art of administration, and anything which comes to us sanctioned by their authority is entitled to much consideration. But you have such a mass of existing interests to deal with, apart from difficulties of any other class, that for my own part I never did see my way to a conclusion of that kind. Perhaps I might say upon that point that the first step as it seems to me would be to organise the consular service a little more than it is at present organised. The great deficiency of the consular service is that there is no security for a man who gets into it and does well that he will get promoted to a better post than that which he holds. I endeavoured as far as I could to remedy that defect by appointing, whenever an eligible consulate fell in, preferentially, some one who had done his duty well in an inferior post; but there has been no established rule of that kind, and therefore no man who enters the consular service has any assurance of getting on.

2289. There is no regular routine of promotion in that service?—No.

2290. Did you take occasion when you were at the Foreign Office, at all to consider the expenses of the diplomatic branch, or to enter into the question of whether the salaries were adequate or inadequate?—I received continual applications and continual complaints from most parts of the world, more I think, perhaps, from the consuls than from the diplomatists, but still from both; and the plea put forward in every case was the same, that, whether from the habits of modern society, or from the diminished value of money, living had become enormously more expensive within the last 20 years; and, therefore, that the salaries which were fixed 20 or 25 years ago, did not now represent the same spending power as they represented when first fixed at that rate.

2291. Is your Lordship disposed to believe that those representations are substantially founded in fact, and that it is the case that the same nominal salary has a less purchasing power to a very considerable extent now than it had 20 years ago?—I have no doubt whatever about that; of course there is the further question, whether the salary was first fixed at a higher rate than necessary; but if you assume that 20 years ago, at any European capital a certain rate of salary was properly fixed, there is no question that that post has very greatly diminished in value in the interval.

2292. I do not know whether your lordship has seen the answers addressed to the Foreign Office by our representatives abroad on the subject?—I have seen them, but I am not prepared to speak on them.

2293. The representations from all parts of the world, contained in those reports, seem all to be in the same key, as to the disproportion of their salaries to the expenses of the office?—Yes.

2294. You are not disposed, therefore, to say that the salaries are more than adequate now looking at that state of things?—No; unless you takxe an entirely different view of the functions a diplomatist, and the social position that he ould hold, I do not think that you should duce them. There are places where it is torious no man can serve without trenching very nsiderably on his private income. Washington a case in point.

2295. I imagine that that has been more or ss true ever since the diplomatic service be- me a permanent branch of the service of the rown?—I think that very possible.

2296. You said that unless there were a orough change of the whole system of our plomatic arrangements, the salaries could not reduced; are you prepared to suggest a ange of that kind yourself with regard to laries, so as to put the system on a different oting?—No, I am not. I should attach great nportance to this; that English diplomatists ould be in the same general position, and upon ie same footing as those of other great European owers. I do not think it would be at all emly or conducive to the interests of this ountry if, while the other great powers main- ined, at any court, an ambassador with a high alary, we were to maintain a minister with a alary of a consul general; that is to say, a man ho would be in an entirely different social osition.

2297. Your Lordship will not be prepared to pprove of the American scale of salaries, and he system which they have established with egard to their diplomatic service, as compared ith ours?—Their system is altogether different n this respect, that they have no permanent iplomatic service.

2299. And do you think that that system com- pares advantageously with our system of having a egular profession?—No, I think that, other things eing equal, a man does best the work which he as been trained and accustomed to do.

2300. During your service at the Foreign Office, id your Lordship ever consider that question of he number of ambassadors at the great courts of Europe, whether they can be reduced, and minis- ers plenipotentiary substituted for them, or did ou take that as you found it, and leave it so?—I aw no urgent reason to make any alteration, the aving would not be very considerable, and in oint of fact the change could only be made at a ime when a change of individuals took place; ou could not say to a man who had been serving s an ambassador at a certain salary, that from the eginning of the next year he should be reduced o serve as a minister with a much lower salary; uch a course would be unfair to the individual, nd prejudicial to the service.

2301. Is the difference in salary more than ompensated, in your Lordship's opinion, by the uperior advantage of having a great officer of State representing the Crown in the great courts f Europe, or should you say that it was of equal dvantage to the public service that this country hould be represented by ministers plenipoten- iary, or by ambassadors?—I think that we ought o keep our establishments in that respect gene- ally on the same footing as those of other great owers; I think if the French send us an ambas- ador here they would naturally expect that we should send them an ambassador in return. Whether, if all the great powers agreed that a minister would do as well as an ambassador, that change might not be made, I do not say, but I think, we ought not to make it alone; I ought to add that by international usage an ambassador has the right of claiming a personal interview with the sovereign, and so long as personal government in any form continues to exist in Europe, that privilege may be very important.

2303. We have had a suggestion made, that it would be a considerable advantage at the chief missions, to have a permanent officer in charge of the records, who would take care of the records, and keep alive the tradition as it were of the mission; has that ever been considered by your Lordship?—It has not been considered by me with the view of practically adopting it; but I do not see upon the face of it, any objection to that proposition, and I can see some advantages in its adoption.

2304. We have been told that there is a hardship upon the chiefs of missions in the system of leave of absence, that those who are at a distant mission particularly, can scarcely get the absence which is requisite, really to keep them au fait with the state of things here, without sacrificing a considerable amount of their emoluments; has that point ever been considered by you, and have you ever had such complaints from the chiefs of missions?—No; I should look upon a demand of that kind simply as a demand in another form for an increased salary, because you may assume as a matter of course, that every minister will claim and take his leave of absence, except in exceptional circumstances.

2305. But two months' leave of absence from Paris is a very different thing from two months' leave of absence from Buenos Ayres or Washington; one ground of complaint, as I understand is, that there is no scale according to distance, and that one minister may take a great part of his stated time of leave on the journey, while another may do it in a couple of days; has that ever been represented to you?—I never heard it made a grievance; and if you look at it from the point of view of the missions, those interested in the mission, say, at Buenos Ayres, being kept up on an efficient footing, might reasonably say that they do not see why their representative should be absent from his post more than double the length of time which would be allowed to a representative similarly situated in Europe. The grievance reduces itself to this, that a post at a great distance from England is more disadvantageous than one near home; that is undoubtedly the case, and the remedy, I think, is to promote men from the less advantageous posts to the more advantageous posts, if they have done their duty in the former.

2306. That is practically what is done by the heads of the Foreign Office, rather to consider the superior European missions the great prizes of the profession?—Certainly.

2307. I think there was a change made during your Lordship's chiefship of the Foreign Office, with regard to the Persia mission, was there not, by transferring it to the India Office?—No; but when I was at the India Office in 1858, Lord Malmesbury, who was then at the head of the Foreign Office, wished to transfer, and did transfer Persia to the India Office.

2308. That was done with your Lordship's full knowledge and consent, no doubt?—It was done with my full knowledge and consent.

2309. Was that after consideration of the question with Lord Malmesbury?—Yes.

2310. Do you recollect the reasons on which that was grounded?—That Persia fell rather within the Indian than within the European system.

2311. That, of the two, it was more advantageous to the public service that it should be under the Indian Secretary than under the Foreign Secretary?—Yes.

2312. And, practically, in the working of the thing, was it found to be so according to your experience?—My experience at the India Office was short, it did not extend over more than a twelvemonth, and nothing occurred during that time of any particular importance in Persian affairs; but I should say that the distinction was not so great as it may appear, because, whatever is done in Persia it is most essential that both the Indian and the English Governments should be informed of it. If it is worked by the India Office, it is absolutely necessary that the Foreign Office should know everything doing there; and so conversely, if it remains as at present in the hands of the Foreign Office, it is essential that the India Office and the Indian Government should be minutely informed of what passes.

2313. The Persian question touches Home politics and Indian politics both?—Exactly so; perhaps the strongest argument for transferring it to the Indian service is this, that it is a very out of the way place, and requires, to fill it satisfactorily, acquaintance with Eastern languages and with Eastern habits, which you cannot generally expect to find among English diplomatists, and which you do often find among Indian public servants.

2314. Had you any occasion to make any appointments in Persia yourself?—Yes; I sent Sir Henry Rawlinson there.

2315. Your opinion upon which you founded that change, in conjunction with Lord Malmesbury, I understand, is one which you still entertain?—I have no very strong opinion on the subject; but, on the whole, I am inclined to prefer the system which places Persia under the India Office. I may say that I did not attempt to move in the matter during the time when I was at the head of the Foreign Office, because the change that was made by Lord Malmesbury in 1858 was reversed by our successors in the year following, and it seemed to me that if there was that difference of opinion, it was better to go on with the system as I found it than to have perpetual changes made according to the opinion of every successive Government.

2316. Are you aware at all of the circumstances under which and the reasons for which that change was made by the Government that succeeded you?—No.

2317. By whom was it made?—It was done by Lord Palmerston's Government.

2318. Lord Palmerston's judgment and opinion on a matter of that kind would be of very great weight, and his authority very high, I presume?—Undoubtedly.

2319. Mr. Rylands.] I think I understood that you considered that it might be an advantage if competition were applied under proper regulations, to the admission of attachés to the Foreign Office?—Are you speaking of limited or unlimited competition?

2320. My own feeling is in favour of a system not of limited competition, but of wider competition; and it is in that direction that I wish to ask you whether you do not think that there should be a system of competition wider than what is known as limited competition, but still under certain regulations which might prevent its being absolutely open competition?—In that case everything would depend upon the regulations. Limited competition and unlimited competition differ from one another widely in principle. In the case of a limited competition, it only differs from a nomination in this way, that a minister nominates, say, three persons, any one of whom he thinks fairly competent, and leaves them to fight it out between themselves as to which shall be the winner. In that case the responsibility of the minister remains, and is hardly weakened, because, if the person is unfit, he ought not to have given him a chance of succeeding to the place. On the other hand, unlimited competition (the propriety of which is a very large question to discuss) relieves a minister from all responsibility whatever.

2322. Supposing a system were adopted which without opening it to all the world, secured such a large amount of competition as would necessarily compel a person going in for examination to attain a high standard, would not that meet your view, so far as opening the service went, and at the same time provide suitable persons for appointment?—I should like to see the regulations before I could give an answer upon that point.

2323. Your Lordship said, what I am sure we all quite believe, that the present system has had the effect of introducing into the service a number of persons who are, in every point of view, in character and attainments, gentlemen; but I think I gathered from your reply that you would consider that we might have men equal to them in gentlemanly character and attainments, who might not have the advantages of political interest, or the interest arising from birth?—Certainly, when I said that an English diplomatist ought to be in every sense of the word a gentleman, I did not at all refer to his birth, except so far as it is necessary that he should have had a good education and general culture.

2324. And that good education and general culture would, in your opinion, be likely to lead to the refined and gentlemanly manners which would be required in the position of a member of a foreign mission?—That is a very vague and general question. I should have no wish, if the honourable Member puts it in that way, to confine the diplomatic service, and practically, I think, it is not confined, to any one class in the country.

2325. Are you aware that under the present system, the effect of it is that a very considerable proportion of the members of the diplomatic service belong to families of considerable position in this country, or to families possessed of a considerable amount of wealth?—Well, as long as diplomatists occupy the position that they do, you will only have the alternative of taking men who have some private means, or of considerably increasing the salaries.

2326. That is to say, so long as you do not give aries equivalent to the work that you require m the officers of the service, our officers must essarily supplement those salaries by their vate means?—I think that, as a rule, under present state of things, it is a very unwise ng for a man without any private means to into the diplomatic profession.

2327. But would your Lordship be good ough to give us your opinion as to whether you nk it desirable that we should have a system, ich practically excludes all those who are not the possession of other sources of income?—will be for the House of Commons to consider v far an increased expenditure upon the diplotic service is desirable.

2328. If it were so arranged that the members the diplomatic service were paid in accordance h the duties that they performed, then I think ur Lordship will see that it would offer a very nsiderable argument in favour of opening the vice to everyone who might present himself h sufficient qualifications; at present, perhaps, ere is less objection to it, it being a close ser-e in consequence of the fact that men have to ke use of their private means to eke out the aries; but supposing that it were a service perly paid, then, I think, you would agree with that to make it a close service would naturally eate a considerable amount of public complaint? Undoubtedly, if the appointments were much tter paid than they are at present there would a more general competition for them.

2330. That is, no doubt, very true; but is it ur opinion that the present officers connected th missions abroad have their time fully occu-ed, and do as much work as could be reasonably pected from better paid servants?—As a gene- rule, I should say that they do as much work can be expected from them. There has been great deal done in the way of drawing up re-rts, and so forth; and I must say that those ports appear to me, for the most part, to be very ll executed, and to be very valuable and in-uctive; and, in addition to that, you must con-er that there is a great mass of work done at ery mission and every consulate abroad, of which u never hear anything at all; complaints that brought to the minister, or to some one ing for the minister, and that are settled on e spot.

2331. There can be no doubt about that, but, the same time, I think I may assume that if ere are three men engaged as secretaries of gation doing a certain amount of work, it is rely possible that two men or even one man ght do all the necessary work of the legation he gave a sufficient amount of time and atten-n to it?—If I understand the honourable ember, he is putting it in this way: Would it t be better to reduce the numbers, and to work every individual at all times up to his full powers?

2332. It is in that direction that I am putting the question; to pay those whom you employ better, and try to get more work out of them?—The difficulty of that is, that if in a time of calm you are working every man in the service up to the utmost that he can do, you would have no reserve force, so to speak, for a time of emergency.

2333. But do not you think that in a time of emergency there might be arrangements made under which clerks from the Foreign Office would be sent abroad to assist foreign missions?—In the diplomatic service a crisis arises so suddenly that I think it would be difficult as a rule to meet it in the way that the honourable Member proposes.

2334. But is it your opinion that at the present moment the staff at the legations is sufficient to meet every extraordinary pressure upon them?—I should view it in this way: as a rule the pay is low; the work that is required of the individuals for that pay, though it keeps them fairly well employed, is not severe; there is a reserve strength, so to speak, which can be utilised when it is wanted; they are able and willing to work harder than they do at ordinary times, when the necessity of the moment demands it.

2335. And you are aware that the effect of all that is that we have a large number of juniors in the service who are badly paid, and who are now complaining very much that they have no reasonable prospect of promotion?—I have already stated that in my belief, so far as the complaints of want of promotion may be held to be well founded (because such complaints exist more or less in all services), they arise out of the peculiar circumstances of the last 10 years, during which time a large number of good appointments have from political changes been suppressed and have not been replaced by others.

2336. There are a very considerable number of secretaries of legation, and second and third secretaries and unpaid attachés upon the Foreign Office list; secretaries of embassy five, secretaries of legation 23, second secretaries 34, third secretaries 13, and attachés 14, making a very large number, even allowing for these missions that have been suppressed, that still continue on the list of juniors; I think, therefore, you will see that there would be very little hope of promotion for the men in the lowest positions, if they are to be taken according to seniority?—In every profession that difficulty arises; you have more midshipmen than admirals. You do not require the same number of persons in the higher grades of any service that you do in the lower grades, and, therefore, at some one stage the pressure is felt, and it generally happens that a cetain number of individuals leave the service; that has been very much the case in the diplomatic service. It was very common for young men to go into it for a few years, not intending to make it a permanent profession, but simply as a useful occupation and as a means of education.

2337. Does your Lordship think that it is for the public interest that the men should go into the service with expectations not having reference to their future utility in connection with the service?—Yes, I do. You get their services as long as they are in the profession; you can make them work as you make any other men work; you get their services when they are wanted as juniors, and when they cease to be juniors they take themselves out of the way and do not increase the pressure for the higher posts.

The Earl of Derby.

2338. But still, I think, you find that in all other branches of the public service it is held that if a man has had good training he makes a more valuable public servant the more experience he possesses?—No doubt; but unless you reduce the number of attachés to the number at any one time of ministers, in which case they will not be sufficient in numbers to do their work, you will always have a certain number of attachés who will not succeed in becoming ministers.

2339. But if you reduced the number of juniors they might get promotion up to secretaries of legation, or secretaries of embassy; and it seems now that there is very little prospect, on the part of the junior members of ever reaching the post of secretaries of embassy and of legation; that is the complaint?—I am bound to say that to my mind it is exaggerated; of course much will depend upon the ability and energy of the individual.

2340. In reply to a question of the Chairman's, I think I understood your Lordship to say that the promotion in the service, in your opinion, should be according to seniority and selection combined?—Yes.

2341. Other things being equal, secretaries should be promoted by seniority; but that there should be an opportunity of rewarding, by promotion, any extraordinary merit?—Yes, I would wish to qualify that by one observation, namely, that I think when it comes to a question of the higher grades, such as ministers and ambassadors, I should attach very little importance indeed to seniority, and look almost exclusively to the ability of the individual.

2342. I quite understood that distinction; I think I may ask you whether at the time that you held the seals of the Foreign Office, there was any case of a secretary of legation being promoted in consequence of meritorious conduct?—I made several changes, several promotions as vacancies occurred, and I certainly did not hold myself bound to follow, nor did I follow the rule of seniority.

2343. In regard to second and third secretaries and secretaries of legation, we have been told that the practice of the diplomatic service has been to appoint by seniority alone?—I understood the honourable Member to be speaking of secretaries of legation.

2344. I was speaking of second and third secretaries of legation; of men being promoted from the third to the second, and from the second to the first secretaries of legation; and my question was, whether any case in your recollection occurred in which a third secretary of legation, for instance, was raised to a second secretary, or a second secretary appointed as a first secretary on account of merit?—I dare say not; it would be extraordinary merit that would justify such a departure from the rule. The difference between the position of second or third secretary and the position of secretary of legation or embassy, is this, that in the latter case, the man is more or less brought under the observation of the Foreign Office directly. A secretary of legation is generally during some part of the year left in charge; then he is acting for the minister, and if anything occurs, you see what he is made of; he writes the despatches himself, and he becomes known, and the Foreign Secretary has opportunities of forming a personal and independe judgment of what his value is. But in the c of a second or third secretary, he is so entir under his immediate chief that nothing can known about him, speaking generally, at t Foreign Office, except through the medium that chief. And applying generally the princi of selection in preference to those lower gra it would merely come to this, that they wo rise according to the favour of their chiefs.

2345. But is not it a reasonable course t the promotion of a secretary serving under a ch should depend, to some extent, upon the g opinion of his chief?—I do not object to th but I may observe that there is this differen that in the one case, the foreign secretary is s ing entirely with other men's eyes, and in t other case, that of the secretary of legation embassy, he is able to see with his own.

2346. But if the junior members by merito ous conduct under the eyes of their chiefs, mig expect to be in the line of promotion, is it r reasonable to suppose that they would have inducement to perform their duties in an effici manner, which they do not possess at the pres time?—I do not think that a man who sho marked ability or willingness to work, has a reason to complain of the present system; th are many ways in which he may be noticed put in the way of promotion; one post is bet than another; at one post, there are more opp tunities of educating yourself for the high places, than at another; and I think there wo be a wish, as a rule, to put the best man, if y can find out who he is, in the place where would have the greatest opportunity of traini himself to future service.

2349. We have been told by Mr. Hamm that the practice at the Foreign Office has b not to ask the chief what he thinks of the sub dinate, but to trust to information that reac the Foreign Office from travellers, and ot chance means of information. In Question 3 Mr. Hammond was asked this question by m "You said, speaking of the Foreign Office, ' have the means of taking the measure of fore secretaries,' but are not those means necessa limited"? The reply was, "No, almost all people know each other, and if any person w decidedly wrong, we could hardly fail to hear In my own case, since I was Under Secreta someth omething was told me respecting some person mployed abroad, indeed twice that has happened me; and on both those occasions I gave a iendly hint that those things had better not go n. It is much better that supervision and con-ol should be exercised in that manner, than by ny formal and confidential reports on the part f the heads of misisons. The information in the ases I allude to was brought to me, and was not ought for by me. I never wish to hear those hings myself, because I know how destructive is to the good of any establishment that those ttle stories should be circulated and attended to. know a great deal that goes on, but I take care ot to let it be known that I do know it." Then ie next question is, "But does not your answer mount to this, that the means you have of taking ie measure of foreign secretaries are such that ou are obliged to trust reports brought to you asually?" and the answer is, "I hear the opinions f travellers, who tell us what is going on in the issions." I wish to ask whether you do not onsider that the judgment of the heads of issions is much better in relation to the promo-ion of their subordinates than any reports of ravellers, such as were alluded to by Mr. Ham-ond, as enabling the Foreign Office to form an pinion on the conduct of subordinates of mis-ions?—I will answer you so far as this, that I ertainly should not take any action with regard o a subordinate without knowing what his im-ediate chief thought of him. I might have eason to think that from mere incompatibility of empers, or from different ways of doing their usiness, they might not exactly suit one another r appreciate one another, and in that case I hould make allowance for the existence of such eelings, but I should certainly not take any step ith a view to the removal or promotion of any sub-rdinate without at least knowing what the opinion f his own immediate chief was, although I should ot pledge myself absolutely to act upon it.

2350. With regard to the transfer of secre-aries of legation, according to the present ystem, they are transferred periodically about very two years?—I think that is so.

2351. I should like to know whether you think hat that is desirable for the public service?—It s better for the public service than for the indi-idual. It comes very hardly upon the indi-idual, because the expenses of removal are ften heavy. The rule, I should say, was not stablished by me; but the theory of it is that hey should not be kept always in one place, but hould have the opportunity of obtaining as com-rehensive a knowledge as possible of all that s passing in the diplomatic world.

2352. But does it not occur to you that if a nan has been employed in one of the South American missions, for instance, he has gained a certain amount of knowledge and experience which is very useful in that mission, but which would not be useful in Switzerland, for instance?—Undoubtedly. I can only say that you cannot gain those two incompatible advantages; you cannot at the same time give a man a wide general knowledge of what is passing in various parts of the world, and give him that intimate and minute knowledge of the politics of one par-icular state which he would acquire by residing here through a long term of years.

2353. But do not you think that on the whole t would secure the efficiency of the different missions if the secretaries appointed to those missions were more of the nature of permanent officers?—There would be various objections in my mind to that. In the first place it would operate very unequally. There are very few people who would like to be kept 10 or 12 years at the South American missions, for example.

2354. But if it were understood to be the rule of the service, and, of course, if the work at these various missions were properly paid for, do you think that there would be any difficulty whatever in securing candidates for appointments for permanent service in foreign missions?—The inconvenience of the system which the honourable Member proposes, carried to its legitimate results, would be this: that you would have a great number of men (relative to the size of the service), each knowing perfectly well the details of his particular post, but each absolutely useless anywhere else.

2355. Even if you had, do not you think that you would find a man with such a knowledge of the details of his particular post, more efficient than a man coming to it without that knowledge?—Possibly; but even as to that, there are two sides to the question, because a man may have resided so long a time at a place as to be mixed up with local parties and local politics, and to see things from a local point of view; I do not lay much stress upon that, but it is a point to be considered.

2356. Of course a subordinate might become a chief under some circumstances; but still, if you have a stranger coming to a mission, where the language and the circumstances of the place and the conditions under which the mission is carried on are all strange to him, I think it must be clear that he must be for some time much less efficient than a man who has had considerable experience of all those matters?—It would be so.

2357. Your Lordship is perfectly aware that there are great mercantile houses in this country who are represented at various important stations in the world, and that they send out to those stations persons who are there for a great number of years, and I think I may presume that your Lordship will agree with me, that they would be unwise to move those persons from one part of the world, to another part of the world where they would be entire strangers?—I cannot follow the comparison, because the object of the gentlemen whom you speak of would be an entirely different one from the object of a Minister of Foreign Affairs. The object of the Minister of Foreign Affairs is to get a number of men as well acquainted as possible with the state of diplomatic affairs throughout the world, and who, by means of that general and varied experience, shall be capable of filling the highest posts. I do not think that if you kept every man during the earlier grades of his service in the same place, they would have anything like the same general and varied experience when their turn came to fill the highest posts. A man who had served all his life in Italy would know Italian politics intimately; but he would know nothing of what had passed in Germany; so a man who had served all his life in Germany would know nothing of Italian affairs; and a man who had been 10 or 12 years in South America would know absolutely nothing of European affairs.

2358. You would not transfer that man from South America to be the head of a European mission, but it might be the case that you would give the highest post in the South American missions to a man who had made it the purpose of his life to fit himself for it?—I think that the honourable Member's system would amount to this, that you would have a separate South American service, a separate Italian service, a separate German service, and there would be no means, without great inconvenience, of transferring a man from one to another.

The Earl of Derby.

2 May 1870.

2359. It would be so in regard to a large number of the posts, but I think I understand from your answers to questions which I put to you that in special cases you would be prepared to appoint outsiders to the highest posts of missions?—Yes, in special cases.

2360. You would not consider it necessary in special case that an outsider should even have been trained in the diplomatic service?—No; I think that, other things being equal, it would be a great advantage that he should have been trained in the diplomatic service, but there may be cases in which, for special reasons, it may be desirable to send a man outside the profession. In that case I should take very good care that he had under him a secretary thoroughly conversant with local details, and also with the general business of the office; else the ablest man without experience in the position would be likely to make blunders.

2361. But do not you think that a secretary trained in the way which I have been suggesting would form an admirable second to a chief brought in from outside?—A secretary trained as secretaries are trained now would form an admirable second.

2362. But do not you think that a secretary who had been for several years, for instance, trained up in the French embassy would form a most desirable second to a chief of the embassy in Paris?—There would be special reasons in certain cases for keeping men in a particular post for a length of time. The disadvantage of that is, that you sacrifice the man generally to the particular office.

2363. But does it not occur to you that while the line that I have ventured to suggest may be an extreme line in one direction, the other line of changing our secretaries every two years, is quite as extreme in the other direction?—If you mean to put it to me, whether two years or three years would be a better term of residence, I cannot say that I have considered that sufficiently to be able to answer you with any certainty. There is no doubt that the term of two years is short, and that the expense and inconvenience of removal is severely felt in some cases.

2364. Of course, in the event of there being a system of appointment to special missions mainly carried out, I do not say without exception, there would be no difficulty in appointing as heads of missions gentlemen who might not have been trained in the diplomatic service?—I do not think that it is quite the same thing that a man should have an experienced subordinate as that he should have large personal experience in the matters that he has to deal with.

2365. But still, taking for instance the French embassy, if it were thought right to send over as ambassador to Paris a public man of very great position and authority, who had not been trained in the diplomatic service, do not you think that the presence of permanent officials in the embassy at Paris would render such action very much more easy than it would be under present circumstances?—No; I think at a post like Paris you would find a very good subordinate in th secretary of embassy, who might actually be there 2366. And, speaking generally, you think tha the existence of these changes would not inter fere with the placing at the head of the embassie distinguished public men, not otherwise traine to the diplomatic service?—I do not think tha that on the whole would be a good system but if it were to be adopted I have no doubt tha they would find in the respective missions suc assistance as they might require.

2367. Now, already under the present syster as it is, you think they would find such assistanc as they might require?—Yes; but I must repea what I said just now, that it is one thing to hav an experienced subordinate and to lean upon him and another to have experience yourself. should very much prefer that the head of th mission should have the knowledge himself, rathe than that he should be compelled to refer to som one under him for it.

2368. Has your Lordship considered at all th proposal to amalgamate the Foreign Office servic with the diplomatic service, so as to make the rank in each and the appointments in each correspond —There is the power of transferring at present.

2369. But not a perfect amalgamation; I mea that the ranks in the diplomatic service shoul correspond in position and in remuneration wit the ranks in the Foreign Office service, so tha there might be the opportunity, if the Foreig Office thought necessary, of transferring to much greater extent than is now the case?—I d not think, as a rule, that there is any great de sire, either on the part of those who are employe abroad to come and serve in the Foreign Office or on the part of those employed in the Foreig Office to serve abroad. There is no difficulty i effecting a transfer.

2370. But if the services were amalgamated having the staff of the two combined, would ther not be less difficulty in meeting emergencies, and therefore, a greater practicability of reducing th staffs of foreign legations to a much lower stat than they are in now?—I can hardly speak wit confidence upon that point. I think that th work of a foreign mission, that is to say, the wor of a diplomatist, and the work of the Foreig Office, are really essentially distinct; they ar two separate occupations, although, no doubt, bot have to deal with the same class of subjects.

2371. I think you will admit that a great por tion of the training in the Foreign Office is equall available with the training abroad, for the unde branches of the profession?—Yes.

2372. And that, assuming that our presen missions abroad, and their staffs, are kept up t the point, that would be sufficient for any grea emergency, if we could go to the Foreign Offic to meet that special emergency by the provisio of additional labour, we might keep down th ordinary number of the persons employed in th missions to a lower rate?—As I understand th system proposed is that you have a certain num ber of clerks who might be kept flying throug Europe, from post to post, where they migh happen to be wanted.

2373. If he were wanted you would I presume send out a special officer: You rarely have i Europe special requirements and pressure of busi ness in more than one court probably at once perhaps you may pass a year or two withou having any special requirements whatever; an yet under the present system you keep up a sta whic hich is sufficient for extraordinary emergencies? -The objection to the plan suggested would be the .me as that which the honourable Member was rging just now against the removal of secretaries, .at a man suddenly transferred to a place of which e knew nothing would be able to contribute ery little beyond his mere copying powers.

2374. In the Foreign Office the promotion of erks, we have been informed, does depend more pon ability than is the case in the appointment secretaries of legation. Is your Lordship vare whether it is the case or not that it does epend to some extent upon the ability displayed y the clerks?—Certainly it does in the higher rades. I would not make a man chief clerk or ssistant under secretary, unless I were thoroughly onvinced of his fitness for the post. Among the uniors they have not so much opportunity of owing ability, and therefore the system of selec- on is more difficult to work with there. And iere is moreover this objection, that when a umber of men are working together in the same ffice, bound to assist one another continually, and rought into perpetual personal contact, there is certain disadvantage in creating a very strong eling of rivalry and jealousy among them.

2376. And then, as to the highest of all, taking ie Secretary of Foreign Affairs as being the head f the Foreign Office that is a position which, as matter of course, is not looked forward to by ie trained servants of the Foreign Office?—I onsider that the political head of an office belongs an entirely different class.

2377. Do you not think that some similarity ight be drawn between the position of the head the Foreign Office and the position of the head a mission abroad?—I was once inclined to take iat view, and as I dare say the honourable Member is aware, I expressed myself somewhat i that sense, and I am not sorry to have an pportunity of saying why, and to what extent, I ntertained that view, and to what extent I am iclined now to doubt its expediency. When I ntered the Foreign Office first, as Under Secre- ary, in 1852, it had been thought expedient not nce, I believe, but several times in recent years, make a change of ministers abroad, when a hange of Government occurred at home, because was thought that each Government represented different policy, and ought to have to support s policy abroad; those who were known to ympathise with it. My feeling on the subject ien was that this was rather hard upon the pro- essional members of the diplomatic service, and iat if you were to have that system at all (and I id not see my way then to anything else), it ould be fairer and better to make it general; ideed, to make it universal, and to tell a man ho went into the permanent diplomatic service iat he had nothing to look forward to beyond the ost of secretary of legation or embassy, but that ie missions were to be open to the competition f Parliamentary men. I thought that it would e better to have a general system of that kind ather than to have diplomatists rising in the rofessional service, and then liable to be removed om one place to another, or suspended alto- ether from employment, because of their sup- osed political views. But in the last 20 years (and it is almost 20 years since the time that I speak of) there has been a very marked change. I think no one can fail to see that the tendency of the present time is very much to limit political patronage, and to encourage men to look for promotion in that branch of the service to which they belong merely as a reward of their professional activity and zeal. Now, I have no doubt that that is the better system of the two. I have no doubt that it is a better thing to have a trained permanent diplomatic service, the members of which expect promotion only as they perform their duty, and who are entirely unconnected with the change of parties at home. The alteration, as far as there is one in my views, is this; that though I never doubted that that would be the best state of things if it could be established, I did not believe that it was possible 17 or 18 years ago, and with the experience that we have had since that time, I do believe it to be possible. I did not, myself, when I was at the Foreign Office, make an inquiry into the political opinions of any head of a mission, nor did that enter into my calculation at all in considering who was to be put into this place or that; I looked solely to their professional fitness; and I venture to say that I believe that those who have gone before me of late years, and Lord Clarendon, since my time, have acted upon those views; that appears to me to be the best rule to follow for different reasons. In the first place, all political patronage has its objectionable side, which I need not dwell upon; in the next place, if men are to be employed in doing professional work, it is much better that they should understand that their reward and promotion will depend on the way in which they do their work, than that they should look to interest or influence, or to the changes of parties at home.

The Earl of Derby.

2378. But the appointment of ambassadors and ministers abroad from the diplomatic ranks does not prevent, at all events, it has not prevented recently, within the last few years, the appointment of extraordinary missions; that is to say, that on extraordinary occasions it has been found, or supposed that the permanent diplomatic service could not well be entrusted with the special duty that the Government of this country was desirous of having performed?—I should not like to put it in that way; I should say rather, that there have been cases of great European importance in which some one who was probably a member of the Cabinet, or in close connection with it, might be thought more immdiately to represent the views of the Cabinet than any other person.

2379. But does not that point to the fact, that apart from the political differences, mere party differences, which might operate in the selection of ministers abroad, there are very important considerations in reference to the national policy which our Government may adopt in opposition to the views of a previous Government; and is it not necessary, under those circumstances, that the Government should be represented in important courts abroad by men who thoroughly sympathise with them in their line of policy?—No, I do not think it necessary; because if you train the diplomatist to consider himself as merely the agent of the Foreign Office, as merely employed to express the views of the Foreign Office, he becomes very much separated from political parties, and will probably endeavour only to follow out his instructions to the best of his

his power. Of course at any moment, or at any place, it may occur that the view taken by the Foreign Office, and which is the view that has to be acted upon, is not personally the view of the representative who has to carry it out. That is an unavoidable circumstance, for which every diplomatist must be prepared; and I am bound to say that I believe, as a rule, that our diplomatists have no desire to put their own personal views where they differ into rivalry with those of their superiors.

2380. It has been an impression that in some of the foreign capitals our ministers abroad have mixed themselves up to some extent with the political parties in those capitals; has your Lordship any reason to suppose that that has taken place?—I should say certainly not within my experience, and I should say that there is nothing that I should consider more fatal to the influence of a British minister.

2381. So far as your opinion goes, is it clearly the case that our ministers abroad are not likely to be affected by their own predilections for parties either on this side or on the other side of the water?—I think that their only wish would be to carry out their instructions, and the more entirely you separate them from party politics at home the more you put them into the positions of the officers of the army and navy, who have nothing to do with the opinions of the Government in power, but only to execute their orders, the more entirely you will divest them of even the suspicion of partiality.

2382. With regard to the expenses and salaries of the diplomatic branch, your Lordship was asked a question in reference to the increase of salaries, and I think I gathered that on the whole you did not express any opinion that the salaries of the higher branches of the service were insufficient?—There are one or two cases where it may be a question whether they are not; Washington is a very strong case. I believe it to be the dearest capital in the world.

2383. I suppose you are aware that we pay our minister at Washington a salary quite equal to that enjoyed by the President of the United States of America?—The salary of the President of the United States is, I believe, 5,000 l. a year.

2384. And the salary of our representative there is 5,000 l. a year, besides house rent?—It may be so.

2385. Does it not strike you as singular that we should require to pay our representative a salary equal to the amount paid to the head of the government?—I am not aware exactly, nor have I the means of ascertaining, what the president receives in addition to his pay; he has a residence for one thing.

2386. And our minister to the United States has an allowance for residence; but can you give us any reason why our representatives in the European courts should be paid on the whole considerably higher salaries than the representatives of the foreign courts of Europe?—I believe that there has been prepared for this Committee a comparison of the various salaries paid by the various courts; but I have not gone into that; it has never come before me, and therefore I am not able to speak upon it.

2387. That return shows that in many cases the ministers representing the principal courts in Europe do receive lower salaries at various capitals than the minister representing Great Britain; you cannot give us any reason why we should pay more salaries than the other European Governments, such as Austria and Prussia?—No; but if I may venture to say so, I advise the honourable Member to examine those statistics carefully, because it must be remembered that the manner of payment may differ in the different countries. I know that in some branches of the French service (I cannot say whether it is so in the diplomatic branch), that is allowed which is not allowed here, namely, that a man may receive public pay for two or three different functions at the same time. If he holds military rank, and if he also holds senatorial rank for instance, he is receiving pay for both together. In England if a man holds any office I believe the rule to be universal that whatever he is entitled to receive of public moneys otherwise, is deducted from the pay which he receives in respect of that office.

2388. Would that be the case if a general in the army were sent abroad on a special mission if he were on halfpay, would he sacrifice his half pay in the event of his being appointed minister?—In the case of a special mission, I cannot say.

2389. Mr. Butler-Johnstone.] Is it not the case that they have in foreign accounts what they call frais de représentation, extraordinary expenses, which are not included in the salaries of ministers; whereas the English ministers have no such extraordinary allowances?—Very likely that may be the case, but I am not aware of the manner in which foreign accounts are kept.

2390. Mr. Rylands.] I dare say that without going into the particulars of the amount, paid to representatives of foreign states, you will be perfectly aware that the amount paid to the representatives of the United States in London and other European capitals is very much less than the salaries paid to our representatives in other capitals?—It is undoubtedly less; how much less I am not prepared to say, because I believe that by the American system, there is a large sum paid for outfit, and a large sum paid also for the expenses of returning home; at least it used to be so.

2391. In our case, also, there is a considerable amount paid for outfit in addition to the salaries paid to our minister abroad?—I have no doubt if you put it in that way, that the whole sum received by the American minister is less, as a rule, than the sum received by our minister.

2392. And the course of the American diplomatic system is what you have told us, that the heads at all events of the missions, are appointed from public men in America, not necessarily previously connected with the diplomatic service?—Yes, that is so.

2393. Very eminent men, I think, have been appointed to London as ministers from the United States?—Yes.

2394. With regard to the work which is now performed at our foreign missions, do you not think that that work, so far as it is of a routine character, might be very much diminished?—There are so many kinds of work, that I must ask what particular work you refer to.

2395. I refer to the attention which is paid by the members of foreign missions to almost all European questions, and the ordinary politics events of the state in which they are placed?—That is a question which I can only answer in very general way; I do not think that, as a rule I have had occasion to complain that the report which reach us of what is passing in other countries are too voluminous.

2396. You do not think that with the other means of information at present possessed by us, attention is paid to details of foreign intelligence in the foreign missions that might be avoided?—If you mean to ask me whether in the way of supplying news, the newspapers supply the place of official sources of information, I should say, certainly not; they are exceedingly useful, but they are not entirely accurate. It is quite possible that the earliest intelligence of what is passing may reach you in a newspaper, but then you can only take that as current report. The person who sends that is not in any way bound to guarantee it; he only tells it as what is currently believed and is probable. You expect your minister, or in his absence your secretary of legation, to take some pains to ascertain accurately not merely the fact that a report is current, but the accuracy of that report.

2397. I suppose that if some transaction took place in the Italian Parliament, for instance, in regard to matters of public policy, it would be communicated in a despatch to the Foreign Office, and the details would be given very fully, although it might not bear any immediate relation to English interests?—It would depend entirely upon the importance of the subject.

2398. May we take it for granted, that all that occurs in almost any foreign government in reference to any European question, is transmitted to the Foreign Office by way of despatches?—Anything of political importance that occurs in a country to which a minister is accredited, is reported by him more or less fully.

2400. And they would be copied in the Paris embassy?—That would rest with the ambassador. If he thought it of importance to have them for purposes of reference, he would take a copy.

2401. With your experience of the smaller missions of Europe, leaving out of the question now the secondary missions, do you not think that there is a very large amount of routine work done of the character I have alluded to, that is of no advantage to this country or interest in this country?—Not a very large amount I should say; it may occasionally happen that you have a minister, or still more a secretary of legation, with more industry than discrimination; but I should say that that would be rather the exception than the rule.

2402. I suppose the object of these reports is to which allusion has been made, is to enable a foreign minister to judge of the course of public opinion, and the general course of events?—Yes.

2404. From your experience, you are not inclined to believe that a considerable number of small questions might be dropped out of our diplomatic correspondence?—You can never draw the line accurately; but, speaking on the whole, I think it a less evil to receive a dozen rather voluminous records of proceedings which do not turn out to be important, than to miss one record of proceedings which you might feel the want of.

2405. But I suppose there is no doubt that any fact of great importance would be quite sure to come under the notice of the Foreign Office; for instance, any change of Government abroad, or any action of a serious character in a foreign legislature; supposing it possible that it might be dropped out of the correspondence, which is hardly possible, still the Foreign Office would have the means of knowing any such matter?—The honourable Member must recollect that a very large part of the politics of continental Europe do not pass in public. If you were on the point of negotiating with some continental government, it would be a matter of very great importance to you to hear things which you are not likely to hear in public; for instance, if there is some intrigue going on which is very likely to upset the government with which you are seeking to negotiate.

2406. But the importance of such information increases just so far as we as a country mix ourselves up in European politics?—Yes.

2407. And I think I may assume that it is your Lordship's opinion that it is desirable that we should avoid as much as possible mixing ourselves up in these European questions?—I am not in favour, certainly, of unnecessary intervention, and still less in favour of intervention of a character which might involve us in the risk of having to take part in a general war.

2408. Is it not the fact that treaties which have been made between this country and other governments in former years have become very embarrassing in consequence of their entailing obligations upon us which now we should be very glad to be free from?—If you put it in that way, it is undoubtedly true that the kind of legal fiction by which every treaty is supposed to be perpetual has certain inconveniences attending it, because nothing in politics can be perpetual, and therefore the fact does not always correspond with the theory. But that is, I should say, no more than what happens in your legislation at home; you have many laws still upon the Statute Book which are obsolete, and which are known to be obsolete.

2409. But there is this difference, that with regard to our laws, we can please ourselves whether we put them in force or not; but I presume that in the case of treaties, we are under obligations to foreign powers, and might be called upon by them to enforce those treaties?—Certainly, I am not here to say that no imprudent treaties have been made by this country.

2410. And the treaties under which this country

The Earl of Derby.

2 May 1870.

country has been bound, have been made by means of secret negotiations, such as you have been alluding to between this court and courts abroad?—The amount of secrecy observed in the negotiation would be a matter which the House of Commons and the minister concerned must settle between themselves.

2411. Is it not the fact that, in many cases, treaties are completed before there has been an opportunity for the House of Commons or public opinion to pronounce upon their details?—Yes.

2412. You, in the Foreign Office, might in any case, have come to a conclusion with reference to a treaty without the House of Commons knowing the ground on which you came to that conclusion, or in fact the character of the treaty which you had agreed to make?—There is no doubt that the constitution of this country, as it exists, imposes upon the foreign Minister a very great responsibility in that respect; I apprehend, however, that if an engagement were entered into by a minister, it must, as a matter of course, be made public, and if then the House of Commons chose to repudiate it, and to censure the Government by which it had been passed, I think, giving merely my own opinion, that that would be considered as a national repudiation of the engagement.

2413. But the House of Commons has not the opportunity of knowing it now until after the ratification of the treaty?—No; that is the constitution of the country.

2414. In evidence that we have had before the Committee on a former occasion, an opinion has been expressed that the effect of diplomacy was to preserve the peace of Europe; I should like to have your Lordship's opinion whether it has not been the case that diplomatic action has sometimes had an opposite tendency within your own experience?—I cannot answer that without supposing a state of things which it is hardly possible for me to suppose, in which diplomatic communications did not exist between European countries.

2415. The reason that I ask that question has reference to an opinion which was stated in a speech which your Lordship made in the House of Commons in 1864, and if you will allow me, I will read the words. Referring to the Crimean War, Lord Stanley said, "In 1853, the ministers of this country at one moment threatened Russia, and at another encouraged Turkey, and at the same time they were profuse in their protestations that they wished only for peace, and that nothing but peace would follow. And so it came about that both parties were duped; Russia was sure that we should not fight, Turkey that we should, and Europe was surprised into a war. I will not profess to say that I feel any great apprehension that the same thing will take place now." (That is said in reference to the Danish question.) "The country is more wide awake now on these questions than it was then, and public feeling will be too strong for diplomacy"?—Yes; but I do not see a word in that reflecting upon the manner in which foreign affairs are conducted by our ministers abroad. What I intended to convey (I am not justifying it now as a matter of argument, but merely stating it), was that I believed the Crimean war to have been caused by a certain vacillation and hesitation in the Cabinet itself, by which the two parties were led, the one, Russia, to believe that under no circumstance would we fight, and the other, Turkey, to believe that we were ready to defend it, and that the consequence of that vacillation was, that the two parties were led into a war, whereas if we had from the first said either that we should fight, or that we should not, a casus belli would not have arisen; but that has nothing to do as far as I can see with the conduct of those who represent England in foreign countries. Rightly or wrongly, that which I was complaining of in that instance was the policy of the Cabinet at home.

2416. Still the diplomatic policy is exhibited by means of the diplomatic representatives of this country abroad?—And the diplomatic representatives of this country abroad would, I presume, only obey the instructions which they receive from Downing-street. The diplomacy of which I spoke as creating that war, was, to use perhaps a more accurate phrase, the foreign policy of the Cabinet then existing.

2417. And in reference to this point, "the country is more wide awake now on these questions" (of international and European interest) "than it was then, and public feeling will be too strong for diplomacy;" you would alter that now, and say that it would be too strong for foreign policy?—What I intend to convey by that was, that the feeling of the general public would be too strong for that, viz., the breaking out of a war, to happen in the case to which I was then alluding; though no doubt at that time there were some who took a very warm interest in the question then pending, and who upon that question would have been prepared to involve England in a war.

2418. And the fact was that our representative at Copenhagen was instructed to give certain assurances of support to Denmark, which, in your Lordship's opinion, were calculated rather to involve us in difficulties, and not to promote the peace of Europe?—On the supposition that any such instructions were received, they are no doubt in the published Blue Books, and would be the instructions of the Cabinet at home, and for them, not the representative abroad, but the ministers of the day collectively would be responsible.

2419. Then you entirely distinguish between the diplomatic servants abroad, and the Foreign Office at home?—Certainly; the latter are responsible for the orders that they give, and the former only for carrying out those orders strictly and accurately.

2420. Do not you think that it is equally wrong to give to the diplomatic representative abroad, the credit of peace arising out of the policy of the Foreign Office at home, as it is to blame them for a policy leading to war, when that is in the same way, in accordance with the instructions of the Foreign Office at home?—The Foreign Office gives instructions, and those instructions, in any case of European importance, are supposed to be those of the Cabinet, and for them the Cabinet is responsible; what a diplomatist can do in the first place, to send home early and accurate information of what is passing, to supply the best possible materials upon which the judgment of the Cabinet shall be formed, and next to execute the instructions which he receives in an efficient and conciliatory manner; something will always depend upon the instrument.

2421. Then you consider that, to a very great extent, it depends upon the policy for the foreign minister as to whether the action abroad will be in the direction of peace or of war, rather than upon the action of the diplomatist abroad?—Undoubtedly. It is not to be supposed that a diplomatist natist in any European country can involve his country in a war without the Foreign Office being consenting party. The diplomatist may, if he does not understand, or does not efficiently discharge his duty, mislead the Foreign Office; that is a different matter.

2422. Is your Lordship of opinion that it is desirable to keep up in the very small courts of Europe ministers at high salaries?—Which do you call the small courts?

2423. Take Bavaria, for instance, where there is an envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary with a salary of 3,600 l. a year, and an allowance for house-rent of 400 l., with the additional expenses of outfit, and also the services of three secretaries of legation?—I will say at once that I think there is one alteration which, when a convenient opportunity occurs, might be made; I do not think that there is any necessity for keeping up a separate diplomatic establishment at Stuttgardt. Southern Germany, as the honourable Members of the Committee are well aware, is at present in rather a peculiar position; the Northern Confederation, which is virtually Prussia, is a power by itself, and the South Germans are in a more independent and isolated condition than they have been at any former period; I do not think, therefore, that it would be desirable to withdraw our minister from South Germany altogether; and if he is to remain in South Germany, Munich is undoubtedly the proper place for him; but I think it is quite worth considering whether the minister who is at Munich might not do the little work that there is to do at Stuttgardt also.

2424. As to Hesse Darmstadt, do you think that we require a secretary of legation there?—I have always looked upon that mission as being rather an appendage to the court than to the diplomacy of the country. I cannot honestly say that there is any such public business to do at Darmstadt as requires a diplomatist to be there; but I have always considered the official to be there (and he is not one of a high rank) as a mark of respect to a member of the royal family.

2425. I do not gather from your Lordship's answer that you justify it on that ground, but merely that you explain that that is the ground?—You must take me to justify it to this extent, that I did not alter it when I was at the Foreign Office.

2426. Then, with regard to Saxe Coburg, would the same view apply there?—Precisely the same; they stand on the same footing.

2427. And Saxony?—I reduced the mission there, and there is now only a secretary of legation.

2428. There is a chargé d'affaires with a salary of 750 l., and an allowance for rent of 200 l.?—Yes, but the mission was reduced; that gives me perhaps as good an opportunity as I shall have of stating one difficulty in the way of reducing these small missions. There can be no question, it seems to me, as to the inexpediency of maintaining a large diplomatic staff at Dresden; for, by the treaty concluded in 1866, between Saxony and Prussia, the Saxons have virtually bound themselves to follow in all respects the foreign policy of Prussia; and I therefore, in the first instance, withdrew the mission altogether, but I found the step so much misunderstood, and so universal a feeling of disappointment, and I may say of annoyance, in Germany, and also on the part of the English residents, who were very many at Dresden, that I so far yielded as to place a chargé d'affaires there at a lower rank and less cost.

2430. Mr. Kinnaird.] And you have not had reason to change your views on that point of the diplomatic necessity since that reduction was carried out?—No; I think that what weighed with me in replacing an official there, although of lower rank, and at less cost was, that I found that the act was very much misunderstood on the Continent; it was considered as indicating some quarrel or coldness between the courts, than which nothing could be further from the truth; and I thought it better to spend 700 l. or 800 l. a year, than to allow that impression to continue.

2431. Mr. Rylands.] That, of course, would be the immediate impression; but does it not appear to you, that a certain time having elapsed, a withdrawal might now take place without creating any unfair impression as to the occasion of it?—I cannot say that I see any strong political or diplomatic necessity for a resident at Dresden.

2432. With regard to Switzerland, does your Lordship think it desirable that we should keep up in Switzeland an appointment of the rank of envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary?—The objection in the case of Switzerland (and the same thing would apply to the case of Denmark and to the case of Sweden) to withdrawing your minister is, that you have a representative there, and you must continue some communication with the government; and if you withdraw your minister, you have a representative there of lower rank, and so of less influence than any of the other great powers. And I may also say that there is no point upon which very small states are so touchy as that of their importance in Europe (that is, I dare say, very natural); and I have no doubt, that if from Sweden, Denmark, and Switzerland you were to withdraw your minister, you would find that would give deep and lasting offence.

2433. You do not think that it would be practicable to place a chargé d'affaires in each of those courts, with the understanding, that on any special occasion, a minister would be accredited to those courts?—I should not like to do that unless the other powers did the same; I do not think the saving effected would be worth the offence you would give.

2434. Mr. Kinnaird.] Do not you think that Switzerland, from its position in Europe, and its liberal tendency, might, some day, be a most valuable ally, and be nationally of great use to this country? — I think that there has been always strong sympathy felt in this country for the people and government of Switzerland; but as far as material means are concerned, it is less accessible to us than almost any country in Europe.

2435. The moral effect on its political relations of retaining its present diplomatic connection with us might be good?—Undoubtedly.

2436. Mr. Butler-Johnstone.] Will you state whether any inconvenience has been felt in your experience from our having a minister of a lower diplomatic station at Rome than we might have, and whether it would be advisable to give our chargé d'affaires at Rome a higher diplomatic rank?

The Earl of Derby.

rank?—We have, strictly speaking, no official communication with the court of Rome.

2437. But has any inconvenience been felt by us from want of regular diplomatic correspondence with Rome at such times as the present, for instance?—No, I cannot say that there has; and I must add, that I think whatever can be done by personal ability and thorough comprehension of his duty, has been done and is being done there by Mr. Odo Russell.

2438. If that is the case, might we not do equally well with lower diplomatic officers in other courts; Mr. Odo Russell, holding a lower diplomatic station than the representatives of other European countries, and doing equally well, might not the same thing apply to other countries?—I must repeat, that Rome is so far a peculiar case, that we have, strictly speaking, no diplomatic communication with it.

2439. But would it not be of political advantage for us to have diplomatic communication with it?—That involves several considerations of home politics of great delicacy and difficulty.

2440. No difficulty has been experienced by reason of our having only an unofficial representative there?—No, I cannot say that we have experienced any.

2441. With regard to a question that has been put to you, whether the staff of the foreign missions might not be supplemented by the staff of the Foreign Office, I wish to know whether there is any reserved staff at the Foreign Office which could so supplement the staff of the foreign missions?—That is a difficult question to answer, for this reason, that there is no public department in which the amount of business to be done fluctuates so much as in the Foreign Office. You may have a season of dead calms, when half the clerks have very little to do; then some sudden complication may arise at a day's notice, when everybody will be worked to the utmost.

2442. The same complication which would create a pressure abroad would create one also at home?—Yes.

2443. Mr. Arthur Russell.] Do you think that our representatives abroad could be relieved in any way from the duty of entertaining with with a view to a reduction of their expenditure?—It is extremely difficult to lay down any rule upon that subject, because you cannot say that the amount of representation or of entertainment which a minister abroad has to perform can be regulated in any way by the instructions which he receives. If he does not entertain at all, the difficulty is this, that he is not in a position to return the hospitality which he receives, and, to a certain extent, he is excluded from social life.

2444. Mr. Cartwright.] Did I rightly understand your Lordship to say, that you thought that there might be certain advantages in the appointment of permanent clerks in the foreign missions?—Yes; I can imagine, for instance (I do not know whether it is so), that where the archives of a mission have become extremely voluminous, it might be desirable to retain permanently some one who knew his way through them.

2445. It is only in the larger missions, I suppose, that that would be the case?—I only pointed to that as an exceptional resource.

2446. I think your Lordship said that you concurred originally in the transfer of the Persian mission to the India Office?—Yes.

2447. And then when your Lordship was at the Foreign Office you found it re-transferred? Could you call to mind any inconveniences which you found in consequence of its re-transfer to the Foreign Office?—No, nothing very urgent occurred in Persian affairs either when I had to manage them as head of the India Office in 1859, or as head of the Foreign Office between 1866 and 1868. The principal advantage, as it seemed to me, in having it under the India Office, was that it is in the Indian service that you are more likely to find men who are thoroughly conversant with the languages and ways of the Orientals.

2449. Can you tell me whether, so far as you know, that time is well spent in training attachés for future duties?—You will get that better from one of the permanent officials, but I should be inclined to say it was; they have never seen the inside of a public office before, and they get to learn there something of the elementary principles upon which the business of an office is conducted.

2450. My reason for asking is that some of the heads of missions who have sent in reports to Lord Clarendon, have made a complaint that the training which they got in those six months was not very good?—I do not know how that is, but I think that the principle of putting them in the Foreign Office to learn the way in which the office is conducted is a good one.

2451. Mr. Lowther.] I think I understood your Lordship that you were in favour of having a permanent clerk at some of the large embassies?—I hardly put it as strongly as that; I said that I could conceive that there might be an advantage in it.

2452. But the gentleman who would be there would be an Englishman, I presume?—Yes, I suppose, generally.

2453. And he would, occasionally, want to go on leave?—Yes.

2454. And who would take his place during his absence?—The office would have to do without him, I suppose.

2455. But would the records then be left to take care of themselves until he came back?—The honourable Member must understand that I did not put it forward as a plan of my own proposing. Of course the inconvenience is, that, in any case, if there is one man who becomes indispensable to an office, it occasionally happens that he must go away, and then the office is rather awkwardly circumstanced without him.

2456. And, therefore, is it not better that those who belong to that embassy or mission should each of them, as it were, take his turn at the duty which that officer would have to perform, and that there should not be one man alone to discharge it?—That inconvenience is an objection, as far as it goes, to the plan which has been suggested.

2457. With regard to the second and third secretaries, I think they are sometimes called upon to make reports irrespective of the six-monthly reports of the first secretary?—I do not like to speak with certainty upon that point, but my impression is that that is so.

2458. Is it unusual for the chief of a legation to mention in an approving manner the name of one of his subordinates who has distinguished himself in that way?—I think that if a subordinate nate distinguishes himself in any respect, it would be the duty of his chief to bring his services in some way favourably before the Foreign Office.

2459. But do chiefs do that; is it in your Lordship's recollection than you have seen the name of a second or third secretary, or even an attaché, mentioned as having performed his duty with zeal and diligence?—Yes; I think that has been done.

2460. Did you find when you were at the head of the Foreign Office that our representatives abroad were in the habit of putting forward their own political opinions in connection with public affairs?—No; I should say that nothing more struck me than their honourable and scrupulous abstinence from anything of that kind.

2461. And therefore you would say that a Tory Minister would report as conscientiously to a Whig Government as a Whig Minister would do?—I believe that you might take the whole mass of the diplomatic correspondence that comes from the various capitals, and although you might gather from it what were the opinions of the writers upon certain special subjects, you would not gather from it whether any of the writers were, in their personal politics, what is called Liberal or Conservative.

2463. That, I suppose, is rather out of proportion to the pay of a Prime Minister in England?—Undoubtedly; that is double the pay of the Prime Minister.

2464. With regard to the intelligence given by newspapers, I think your Lordship said that it was sometimes earlier than that given by our legations abroad?—Yes; I put it in this way: that a newspaper writer will, as is his duty, put down the current report of the day, not in any way vouching for it. It is possible that your official correspondent might do the same, saying, "I send you this, valeat quantum;" but more probably he would take the earliest opportunity of calling at the Foreign Office of the place where he was, and trying to find out whether there was any truth in the story or not.

2465. And did your Lordship find that intelligence given by newspapers came occasionally later than that given by official persons?—Occasionally it would be earlier, occasionally later; but the main distinction which I draw is this, that if you rely upon newspapers alone you have no means of getting the fact which is reported officially verified or officially contradicted.

2466. And would a Principal Secretary of State, as a rule, take much heed of the information that he would see in a public paper?—It would depend upon the character of the paper, and also upon the country. There are many countries in which very little that is of diplomatic importance would appear in the newspapers at all; there are other countries in which party feeling is so strong, and the journals so numerous, each only representing its own individual shade of opinion, that you could hardly place any reliance upon what any of them might say.

2467. I think your Lordship nominated the present agent at Darmstadt, Mr. Morier?—Yes, he was appointed to that post in November 1866.

2468. Is your Lordship of opinion that the correspondence received from there is not of great European interest?—As regards Mr. Morier personally, I must say that he has been of very great service in sending information relating to matters of a very varied nature concerning all parts of Germany; he is a man of very great information upon all German subjects.

2469. And from the geographical position of Darmstadt, he has the means of hearing a great deal of what is going on in Germany?—Yes.

2470. And therefore, I presume, that another man in the same post, might also be able to give intelligence of considerable interest?—No doubt, if you get hold of an able man well acquainted, to begin with, with German politics, and set him down in almost any capital in Germany, he will be able to send you some useful and valuable information.

2471. What I want to know is, whether an agent stationed at Darmstadt, is not in a position to supply valuable information with regard to Germany?—Yes, he may, no doubt, send valuable information from there.

2472. Which he, perhaps, would not get at a large court?—I am hardly prepared to say that.

2473. I think your Lordship has never been in the diplomatic service yourself?—No, I have not.

2474. And you have never lived much in foreign capitals, I believe?—No, I have not.

2475. Supposing that the secretary of legation at Dresden was disestablished, would it not be necessary to have somebody there to attend to the interests of the British subjects at Dresden or in Saxony?—There are a considerable number of British subjects resident in and near Dresden, and no doubt they would require to have some members of the consular service within easy reach.

2476. I think there are deaths of British subjects, and there are births, and there are probably marriages, in Saxony, which would have to be attended to?—Yes.

2477. And, therefore, there would be a necessity for some agent at Dresden?—There would be a convenience in having an agent in or near Dresden; I will put it in that way.

2478. And has your Lordship considered the question whether a consular agent would be sufficient there?—Undoubtedly, a consul would not perform some social services for which the British colony at Dresden are very grateful.

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE EDWARD PLEYDELL BOUVERIE, IN THE CHAIR.

The Right Honourable EDWARD HENRY Earl of DERBY (attending by permission of the House of Lords); further Examined.

The Earl of Derby.

2479. Chairman.] I BELIEVE your Lordship wishes to make a statement to the Committee?—Before my examination is continued, I wish to correct, or rather slightly to modify, one or two answers which I gave on Monday. One of the corrections which I wish to make, relates to the second and third secretaries being removed at the end of two years. I do not think that I stated with sufficient clearness that they are not necessarily removed, but only removable at the end of that period; as a matter of fact there have been many cases in which persons in that position have not been removed for three years, and I think that there are one or two cases in which they have even exceeded that time. The second correction that I wish to make is with regard to the question of leave. My impression was when I was examined before, that no complaints had been made to me by members of the diplomatic profession upon that subject. On referring to my papers I find that though the complaints were not numerous nor pressed with much urgency, still some complaints of that description have been made to me, but I may say that they turn not so much upon the question of reduction of salary during the time of leave, as upon the shortness of the leave itself. I believe it is felt as a cause of complaint by ministers resident at distant stations that the two months' leave allowed them out of the twelve is hardly more than sufficient for their journey out and home. The remedy for that, as I conceive, if it requires a remedy, is that they should be allowed to throw together two years' leave into one. As a matter of fact, I believe that has been done sometimes in special cases, but I confess that I can see no reason why that alteration should not be made general, subject, of course, as all granting of leave is subject, to the discretion of the Secretary of State.

2481. Mr. Kinnaird.] Not wishing to go over any of the ground that has been already gone over, there is one point upon which I should like your Lordship to favour the Committee with an opinion. The object of this Committee is to economise if possible the resources of the country. I see that very large items have been, at different times, spent for what are called special embassies and special missions, amounting in a few years to something like 50,000*l.* or 60,000*l.*, the details of which do not appear in the Estimates. For instance, recently (I think in 1866) there was a special mission sent to invest the King of Denmark with the Order of the Garter, and I see a charge for Garter King-at-Arms of 600*l.*, simply for going over to Denmark and coming back again; these items swell the Estimates very considerably; do you think that in the altered state of our relations it was necessary, having, as we believe, a very able representative at that court, to send a nobleman specially over for that purpose; is it not both detracting from the position of the resident minister and putting the country to great expense?—These special missions are merely international courtesies, and I cannot deny that they are international courtesies of rather a costly kind. With regard to the question of how far it is right that public money should be spent upon matters of public pomp and show, that is entirely a question of argument, and not of evidence.

2482. Do not you think that it rather detracts from the position of the resident minister, who ough ought to stand well at that court, to be superseded temporarily by some young nobleman for the purpose of investing a sovereign with an order when he could have done it perfectly well himself?—I do not think that resident ministers would look at it in that point of view, because it is an old established usage, and it is perfectly well understood that these missions are of a merely ceremonial character. I think if the honourable Member is objecting to them, undoubtedly the strong ground of objection is the expense.

2483. There is another point which, perhaps, your Lordship will favour the Committee with your opinion upon; why we do not make a greater use of the experience which some of our best consuls have had, and make use of them for diplomatic purposes. There seems to be, looking at past years, almost an insurmountable barrier in the way of this, and the consuls themselves feel that there is little or no prospect of rising from the consular service into the more important diplomatic service, though they have shown very great aptitude in the most difficult negotiations. Sir Henry Parkes is one of the few who, commencing as a consul, has been raised into the diplomatic service; but there are other very distinguished consuls who certainly seem to have deserved well of their country, and yet by some system of etiquette, or through prejudice, they can never rise out of that position. Has your Lordship any opinion upon that point?—I do not think that there is anything like an absolute exclusion of consuls from the diplomatic service. Admiral Harris, for instance, the present minister at the Hague, began in the consular service, and Sir Charles Wyke, I believe, did the same. In the Chinese, and, what is now added to the Chinese, the Japanese service, it is, I think, becoming an understood thing, that those who do their duty well as consuls in those countries of which, owing to the very peculiar nature of the service, other diplomatists know very little, may fairly look forward to the mission at Pekin, or to the mission at Japan.

2484. Then you consider that the duties connected with an important consulship do remarkably fit a man, at all events in the East, for promotion to the diplomatic service?—There are consulships and consulships. There is, perhaps, no office of which the duties vary more in different parts of the world. In China and in the East, a consul is, to a great extent, engaged in what would be elsewhere called diplomatic business. So again, in South America, the consuls general have a great deal of diplomatic work upon their hands. In Europe, at great trading posts, the consular duty is quite distinct from the diplomatic.

2485. Then you see no objection to recruiting, on fitting occasions, the diplomatic from the consular service, but you think it would be rather an advantage to the diplomatic service to have so good a school in which to train its officers?—I think that a consul who had distinguished himself, say at an Eastern post, might very well be rewarded by a mission; I see no objection to that.

2486. Mr. Rylands.] In reference to the appointment of Admiral Harris as consul in the first instance, and afterwards as a member of the diplomatic corps, I wish to ask your Lordship's opinion whether it is desira le to take gentlemen from the services, the navy and the army, and to place them in the consular or diplomatic service over the heads of persons who have been trained to that particular profession?—With regard to the consular service, it has always been held to be an entirely open service, that is to say, that no special qualification was required; but any man who was supposed to have competent ability, might be placed in any consulate.

The Earl of Derby.

2487. But in the case of Admiral Harris, the appointment to the consulship seems to have been preliminary to a very rapid jump up into a minister plenipotentiary; perhaps your Lordship will allow me to call your attention to the dates: Admiral Harris was appointed consul to Denmark in August 1852; he was promoted in December of the same year to the post of chargé d'affaires and consul general in the republic of Peru; there he assumes a diplomatic character at once in the course of less than six months from the time of his first appointment as consul?—That is nearly 20 years ago; since that time the practice of reserving diplomatic appointments more strictly for the members of the service has generally prevailed.

2488. Then I gather from your Lordship's statement that you would not approve of the appointment, under present circumstances, of a gentleman in the army or navy to a situation of that sort without previous training?—I do not think that the fact of a man having served in the army or navy is any disqualification for a post in the consular service.

2489. But in this case the appointment as consul is the immediate occasion of an appointment to the diplomatic service in the case of a gentleman without the slightest previous training; does not your Lordship see an objection to that course?—The honourable Member is asking me, as I understand, to pass a retrospective criticism upon an appointment made 18 years ago.

2490. Merely in view of future appointments that might be made by the Foreign Office. I am asking your Lordship simply to lay down an opinion which might to some extent guide the Committee in their recommendations on a point of some importance?—I have no hesitation in saying, if I am asked as to the principle on which appointments should be made, that I think, as a general rule in the diplomatic profession as in every other, it is a good thing that a man should begin at the bottom and work his way regularly upwards. At the same time I do not say that I would absolutely exclude, on the contrary, I have said that I would not absolutely exclude those who are called outsiders, that is to say, men who have made for themselves a position and a reputation for their knowledge of business in other occupations. There may be cases where it is desirable to employ such men in the diplomatic profession, and I think it is very desirable that no rule should be laid down which should absolutely exclude them. At the same time that I say that, I think that such cases should be the exception and not the general rule.

2492. Then in fact this rule, if there is any rule, was over-stepped by Lord Malmesbury in the the appointment of his brother?—I have never said that it was a rule.

The Earl of Derby.

5 May 1870.

2493. At all events the practice has been generally against the appointment of naval and military officers to diplomatic posts; I think your Lordship will bear that out?—I think it will be found that up to 1852 and later, there was very considerable laxity in that matter, that is to say, that men were taken from various professions to be employed in diplomacy. It was customary, and was considered legitimate.

2494. Mr. Eastwick.] With regard to some questions that were asked you just now by the honourable Member for Perth, is it not a fact that there have been several other appointments made from the consular service to the diplomatic besides the one which he named; for instance, Sir Rutherford Alcock and Mr. Mathew?—The honourable Member is quite correct as to those two appointments.

2495. Then I would ask another question with reference to those questions put by the honourable Member; would it not perhaps be desirable to make a distinct service of the consular shipping service and not to promote to the diplomatic service out of that, and to, perhaps, consider the consular service, where political functions and judicial functions form a part of a man's duty, a service attached to the diplomatic service?—The proposal of the honourable Member, as I understand it, is to divide the consular service into two parts, one exclusively confined to duties connected with commerce, and the other discharging duties connected with diplomacy. I have not sufficiently considered that proposition to wish to give a decisive opinion upon it; indeed, in the form in which it is put, it is new to me. But I think it would not be desirable without a good deal of consideration to draw a hard-and-fast line of that kind. Practically, if a man's previous training and employment have lain in the one line he would not be very likely to be transferred to the other.

2496. Your Lordship is perhaps aware that representations have been made by the chambers of commerce, which suggest placing the shipping consulates under the Board of Trade; does your Lordship see any objection to that?—I think that there is a great deal of objection to a public servant being at the same time under two separate departments.

2497. I think the suggestion is that they should be moved from the Foreign Office and be in direct communication with the Board of Trade and under the Board of Trade?—Then the question resolves itself into this, whether there are functions performed by consuls at present under the Foreign Office which might be better performed by officers of the Board of Trade.

2498. I am speaking only of shipping consuls now, not of course of those who would have political functions?—I am hardly able to give an opinion upon that point; I think it was inquired into by a Committee of the House of Commons some years ago.

2499. You said, in answer to Questions 2264 and 2271, that the diplomatic service is little sought after; do you think that that is a satisfactory state of things?—I said that they were not sought after with the same eagerness which is shown in looking after appointments at home; I added that I do not at all complain that the supply of candidates for the diplomatic service is insufficient, for that is not the case; but I would rather put it in the other way, that the pressure to get into a public office at home is to my mind excessive.

2500. Would you say that the pressure to get into the consular service is greater than that to get into the diplomatic service?—On the whole, I should; but it must be remembered that there is a wide difference between the two cases, because a man up to the age of 40 is eligible to the consular service, whereas no one can enter the diplomatic service regularly except as a very young man.

2501. In answer to Question 2263, you attributed the paucity of applications for admission to the diplomatic service, partly to its not paying in a pecuniary sense, and partly to the banishment from England; would not the first consideration apply to the army and navy?—Certainly; all I can say is, that with regard to the army and navy there is something in the character of those professions which in this country, and I believe in most countries, is found peculiarly attractive to a large number of young men.

2502. Then your Lordship stated that one of the reasons why there was not so much pressure to enter the diplomatic service was probably the banishment from England; would not that apply with the same force, or perhaps with more force, to the Indian and colonial services?—To some extent, as far as I am able to judge, what I have said, as regards the diplomatic service, applies also to the Indian civil service. I believe that those who have had most to do with that service, especially those who established the free competition for it in 1853, and who have watched the working of that system, have been surprised, and not altogether satisfied, that there is not a greater rivalry to enter it; but I am speaking in that of what I only know from general knowledge.

2503. Still I imagine that there are at least three candidates for every appointment in the Indian civil service, and that many of those candidates come up time after time, showing a great eagerness to enter the service?—That may be so; it is not within my knowledge.

2504. Could your Lordship mention any other circumstances which prevent the public from applying for appointments to the diplomatic service?—No, I can give no other explanation than that which I have given, unless it were this, that there are many other careers open in this country.

2505. But is it not probable that another cause may be that the public are aware that unless applicants had some personal acquaintance with the minister, there would be no chance of their succeeding in getting an appointment?—I do not think that is the fact; of the few young men whom I appointed attachés, I do not think that there was one whose parents were among my personal friends.

2506. Do you think that that has been the general rule on the part of Foreign Secretaries?—I think that of late years ministers have been glad to get any well-qualified young men.

2507. Might not another circumstance tend to diminish the prospect, namely, that the prizes of the service, and the best stations, are generally reserved for members of influential families?—I think that the honourable Member is speaking rather of former than of present times.

2508. For instance, Mr. Thornton, who was, I believe, considered a very able servant of the Government, has passed his whole career, I fancy, ncy, in America, and he has never been employed in Europe, except for a short time, when e was first an attaché; and Mr. Alison, who as also acknowledged to be a very able servant f the Government, has been employed entirely n Turkey and in Persia, whereas we may aturally suppose that those gentlemen would ave applied for missions nearer home at some me in their career?—I am unwilling to discuss ndividual cases of promotion or non-promotion ithout further acquaintance with the details an I can command at a moment's notice; but should perhaps say that it very often happens at a man who has acquired peculiar familiarity ith the affairs of some one country prefers to emain there; he feels himself at home there; e knows that he is master of the subject there, nd he knows that he would not be equally aster of his subject if he were removed to nother part of the world.

2509. But with regard to what your Lordship aid as to secretaries being changed after two ears' or three years' residence at one mission, s it not the fact that the secretaries in the Per- ian mission have been kept there for something ke 20 years; in the case of Mr. Thomson, for nstance?—If that is so, I suppose that they ust have been appointed long before the rule f which I speak came into operation. The rule as not laid down by me, but I found it when I ntered the Foreign Office; I believe that it is ne of comparatively recent date.

2510. Would your Lordship think that, supposing a gentleman to have been kept, we will ay 10 years even, at one station, and that tation not a very desirable one, as in the case of ersia, if he made application to be exchanged, t would be reasonable to give him an appointment nearer home or in a better climate?—I ertainly think that, as a general rule, good service done at a remote post, and at one which is ot generally considered desirable, does give a laim to be removed to a more eligible situation fter a certain lapse of time.

2511. In one of the questions put to you last ime, the expression "discouragements of the ervice" has been used; now I would ask whether it is not rather a discouragement of the ervice that men without influence have (as they ave in some cases) been removed from employment and pensioned or left without pay and vithout employment, although their services may ave been acknowledged, and there is no reason why they should not be re-employed?—If I understand the question, the honourable Member uts it in this way, that it is a discouragement to diplomatists generally that those who have served or a good many years, and who by any accident re thrown out of employment, are not necessarily e-employed.

2512. I would hardly say "by any accident;" I mean cases where they have been pensioned without its being their express wish to be pensioned; when they have expressed their wish to be re-employed and have not been re-employed?—The Secretary of State must always be the judge whether it is desirable, in the interests of the public service, that any man whose employment has ceased should be re-employed; but the honourable Member must recollect that there are two sides to the question which he raises, because if these old diplomatists are, as a matter of course, to be re-employed, that will operate as a discouragement to the rising diplomatists, who will have one chance the less of being promoted.

The Earl of Derby.

2513. My question did not apply to old diplomatists, although I did ask the Permanent Under Secretary of State whether ministers, after a certain age, might not be pensioned; but it applied to such gentlemen as, for instance, Mr. Christie, who was minister at Rio, and who is still without employment?—Without referring to an individual case, I should say that I consider it absolutely essential that the Secretary of State should have the power of judging whether it is or is not desirable, in the public interest, to re-employ a diplomatist who for the time is out of employment.

2514. In your answer to Question 2288, your Lordship has said that "anything which comes to us sanctioned by the authority of the French is entitled to much consideration;" now no man can be admitted into the French diplomatic service without the diploma of licentiate in law, or some examination equivalent to that; should not that be the case in the English service also?—I do not know what the precise English equivalent to that diploma would be.

2515. I presume it would be a university degree in law; what is your Lordship's view on that question?—The objection to establishing special and out-of-the-way tests for admission to any profession is this, that you practically limit the admission to it to those who for years past have been trained specially with that view. I do not think that it would be desirable to exclude from diplomacy or from any profession those who have received a good general education. If it is necessary for professional purposes that they should acquire familiarity with certain special subjects afterwards, their knowledge of those subjects had better be tested by a subsequent examination.

2516. Then in that respect your Lordship would not give weight to the authority of the French system, and I may say of the continental system generally, because I believe the same thing exists in Prussia?—No, I would frame the test examination on the competitive examination, whichever it is to be, in such a manner as to admit the largest number possible of those who have received a good general education, as that term is understood in England. I think that the special knowledge may be acquired and may be tested at a later stage.

2517. You have said, in reply to Question 2273, that you are not inclined to favour the suggestion that a university degree should be made a qualification for nomination, because an ordinary pass degree is no test of high acquirements; but is there any reason why a degree in honours should not be made a condition, considering that that of course would be a test of high acquirements?—No; undoubtedly I should consider that a man who had taken high honours at either Oxford or Cambridge was a man who, as far as general training went, would be fully qualified for admission to the service.

2518. And supposing a man who possessed that qualification to be a candidate, would your Lordship be inclined to give him preference over another man who had no such qualification?—I should consider that a circumstance that ought to weigh considerably in his favour.

sity, and some who have taken high honours, as for instance Mr. Palgrave, Mr. Burton, Mr. Fane, Mr. Doria, and I daresay others?—Yes.

2520. Your Lordship is perhaps aware that a university education has been recommended by many authorities, as for instance by Lord Augustus Loftus, at page 103 of the "Reports from Her Majesty's Representatives respecting the British and Foreign Diplomatic Services"?—I will take that from your statement.

2521. And Mr. Hammond and Sir Henry Elliot recommended the same; your Lordship has not looked into that matter in these reports, perhaps?—No, I have endeavoured to explain my view upon that. I think that a university education in itself proves very little. I think that honours taken at the university prove at any rate a certain amount of ability and aptitude for study and for affairs; but I do not think that it would be desirable to exclude, even directly or indirectly, from the chance of entering the service those who from whatever cause may not have passed through the university.

2522. But your Lordship would be inclined to give a preference to a gentleman who had taken a degree in honours at the university, or to allow it to have some weight?—With regard to the pass degree, I do not attach much value to it. I should consider that a young man who had taken a degree in honours was a well educated man. I think that a university education, ending in honours, is a good education. What I say is, that it is not the only good education.

2523. To go to another point; would your Lordship be inclined to recommend that we should adopt the continental system in having houses at the principal courts for our ambassador or minister, the expense of which would be defrayed by Government, and where a table and lodging might be afforded to the junior officers, and that in case there being any objection, either on the part of the ambassador or of the secretaries, to live in that house, there should be an allowance made to them in lieu of it, as is done by the French and Prussians, and, I believe, other nations?—I am inclined to doubt whether for a minister to have all his staff resident with him in the same house is altogether a convenient arrangement. If there is any uncongeniality of disposition it is apt to show itself more, the more closely people are brought together.

2524. But of course there would be an allowance, in case that happened, in lieu of that arrangement?—The honourable Member must be aware that our practice has been very uncertain, very fluctuating, upon that point. At some capitals we have official residences; at others we have not. I think it might be desirable that an uniform system should be established one way or the other, but I do not think that it is very material which system is established, whether you find a house for your minister at the public expense, or whether you make him a certain allowance and leave him to find it for himself; but certainly I cannot say that there is any sound reason why the one rule should be in force at one capital and the other at another.

2525. I do not know whether your Lordship is aware that the transfer of the Straits Settlements (the application of this question will be seen directly) from the India Office to the Colonial Office was made by Sir Charles Wood?—The transfer of the Straits Settlements from the India Office to the Colonial Office originated, I may say, with me, and the arrangements were terminated by Sir Charles Wood.

2526. And the re-transfer of Persia from the India Office to the Foreign Office was also made by Sir Charles Wood; that is to say, that the superintendence of our relations with Persia was re-transferred to the Foreign Office when Sir Charles Wood was Secretary of State for India?—That is so.

2527. At that time Lord Russell was Foreign Secretary?—He was.

2528. Supposing Lord Russell and Sir Charles Wood to have agreed upon the re-transfer, is it likely that the Prime Minister would have objected to it?—The relations of various members of the same Cabinet are so entirely of a personal nature that I can hardly answer that question. Any act of that importance must be held to be the act of the Cabinet as a whole; that is a well-established principle.

2529. I put the question because some importance might be attached to the fact that Lord Palmerston was then Prime Minister, and it might be held to be his act; does your Lordship think that the opinion of the Viceroy of India is entitled to much weight with regard to the transfer of Persia from the India Office to the Foreign Office?—Yes, I should say that undoubtedly he was a person whose authority ought to have considerable weight.

2530. Supposing that the Viceroy of India had given a very strong opinion upon the subject, do you think that that opinion ought to have been considered?—Undoubtedly.

2531. And the opinion of the Council of India also?—Yes. You must of course in every case of that kind allow a little for the desire which every department generally feels to extend its jurisdiction.

2532. It has been stated that there is a totally different system of conducting relations with Persia when it is under the India Office from that which exists when it is under the Foreign Office; do you agree in that?—My experience of Persian affairs as conducted at the India Office was very brief, and during the time that I had to do with them nothing of much importance occurred.

2533. Sir Henry Lytton Bulwer.] Something was said about attachés being kept at distant places for a considerable period; I think your Lordship has stated that if they were so it was an affair of accident, and that they were entitled to be promoted; and if I understood the honourable Member's idea, it was that they ought to be so as a matter of course; now it very often happens that in those distant places men are peculiarly fitted for those particular posts, and that you may do a great deal of harm to the service if you take a man away from Persia, for instance, where he has been residing and knows the language, and put him to another place of which he knows nothing; in such a case the minister should consider the public service and not the particular individual, should he not?—I should agree generally in the doctrine that has just been laid down, only with this proviso, that if the individual in question were doing his work well, to the best of his ability, and efficiently, I do not think that it would be quite just to him to sacrifice his prospects to the convenience of retaining taining him at one particular post. But I pprehend that in the majority of such cases, here a man has become perfectly familiar with he work of a particular office, he himself is not n general desirous of being removed, and in that ase one would rather endeavour, I think, to give im promotion where he is, and to keep him in hat place than to remove him elsewhere. No oubt cases of that kind may occur, but they ould be the exception rather than the rule.

2534. As you have had experience in appointments, I would ask you to explain something hich has often struck me as strange, which is, hat when consuls are doing particularly well, at ome place where it is necessary that they should nderstand the language, all of a sudden you nd that they are removed, and taken away from hat place and placed somewhere else where hey understand nothing: some man, perhaps, taken from America, or Russia, and placed in Turkey or in Syria; is that done upon any particular system, or is it a question of mere hapazard: I believe that the troubles in Crete, or instance, were almost entirely produced by aving consuls there utterly ignorant of the lanuage and of the people; those who were acquainted with them had been removed, and other ersons placed there who knew nothing of the sland, without any apparent reason; your Lordhip, I suppose, would consult the Under Secreary of the Consular Department in such a natter?—I can only say that I should be exremely reluctant, if the case were mine, to emove any consul from a country the language f which he thoroughly understood, and from a ost with which he was familiar, in order to lace him in another to which he was entirely ew. The difficulty that sometimes arises in uch case is, that when a man has done his work ell for a considerable number of years, he easonably thinks himself entitled to expect adancement in some form, and it would not be ltogether just to say, "Because you have done our work well in a subordinate post, and because cannot find anyone else who can fill it equally ell, therefore you shall be condemned to remain or the rest of your days in that subordinate post." ou will always have that conflict between the mmediate inconvenience produced to the service y such a removal, and the injury, as I conceive, hat would be inflicted upon the service by a ystem under which you did not reward your est men.

2535. I presume that if it is once known in he consular service, or in any service, that if a nan does well at his post he will remain there, nd get an extension of salary, and, in fact, be nade useful where he can be most useful, that ill be better than placing him where he can be f no service; then I would ask your Lordship his question: I think a great part of the disconent which exists at present in the diplomatic ervice is owing to its being overfilled; I myelf, for instance, have sometimes expressed a ish to have an attaché with some particular ualities, and I have had two attachés sent to ne who have had none of the qualities which I sked for. I found very often that the assistance hat you receive has been an incumbrance instead f an advantage: then you fill the professson; ll these gentlemen expect to get on, and you ave no means of getting them on, and they are iscontented if any person is placed in their profession who has not been brought up to it, and they are anxious, naturally, that the person should be put out of the profession, in order that the thing may go on: that being so, I would ask your Lordship whether you do not think that it would be advisable, in appointing attachés to particular posts, to ascertain from the head of mission whether he requires any more assistance, and, if he does, what are the qualities that he specially requires in the persons to be named to his mission, because at present I think no attention is paid to the head of the mission at all, and he is never asked the question?—With regard to not appointing more attachés than are required for the wants of the mission, the best answer that I can give is to state my own practice. During the time that I was at the Foreign Office the retirements and deaths, taken together, were 13, and the number of new attachés appointed by me was four. Therefore, if there is an overcrowding in the profession, I am not responsible for it.

The Earl of Derby.

2536. That answers one part of the idea which I expressed; but there is this other question, whether you do not think that the head of the mission should be consulted in some degree when attachés are named to him, as to whether he wants any attachés, and, if he does, what are the particular qualities which he most desires?—I think, undoubtedly, that the convenience of the head of a mission, which is in fact the convenience of public business, ought to be considered; at the same time, there are two points of view in which you must look at an attaché who is entering the service. Looking at him from one point of view, you have to take into consideration the actual service that he is capable of rendering; looking at him from another point of view, he is a young man sent to a mission to be trained for future utility.

2537. I presume that the circumstance of our having had more men in the profession very often than you require, is due to the fact of not consulting the heads of missions as to whether they want more assistance; that you overburden the profession by sending them people that they do not want;—I, for instance, never required more than two persons to help me, and I have had treaties to carry on and a variety of other things to do; and I think that the great fault in our diplomatic service is that it is overstocked, and that it is overstocked without any reference to the requirements of those persons who have to conduct the diplomacy; therefore I should like to have your Lordship's opinion on the question, whether it would not be desirable in general, before adding members to a mission, to ascertain from the head of the mission whether he required that assistance or not?—I should certainly think that it would be desirable to consult the head of the mission. At the same time, in considering how many attachés are to be added to the service, the Secretary of State must look not to the wants of a particular mission only, but to the wants of the service in general.

2538. Then if you consult the head of every mission, you limit, to a certain extent, the whole number, and therefore that will restrain you from naming people as attachés who are not wanted?—I entirely agree with the right honourable Member that nothing could be worse for the young men themselves than to send them to a mission where they are not wanted, and where there is nothing for them to do.

The Earl of Derby.

2539. I do not know exactly now, because there have been some new rules passed, what the authority is which the head of a mission has over those persons that are under him; it seems to me that he, being responsible to the Government, should have a certain power of selecting those persons who have been named to serve under him, with reference to the services which they should perform; now there was an order that came out which I always found every secretary too sensible to insist upon, which was, that if a head of a mission wished to have anything done, a report to be made, or anything, in fact, of that kind, he must give it to the secretary of his mission, and then the secretary of the mission had to select out of the members of the mission the one who was to do it; I do not know whether your attention was ever drawn to that?—No. I do not know whether I have been exceptionally fortunate, but during my term of office I heard little or nothing of complaints or disputes between the heads of missions and their subordinates.

2540. There is a regulation, however (which I say is not enforced to that effect), that if I, as the head of a mission, wished to have a report made upon the army, for instance, or anything else in Turkey or Persia, I should have to send to the secretary of legation, and say to him, "I want this report made," and he would have to select out of the members of the mission the person to make it; is not that a thing which separates the head of the mission from the persons under him, and very much damages his authority?—I was not aware of the existence of that regulation.

2541. Then, in promotion, is the head of the mission ever asked his opinion as to whether the persons who have been under him are qualified for it, and entitled to it from their general conduct; and does his opinion tell for anything in their promotion?—I should say that it did.

2542. Did you ever know any example of any head of a mission being asked the question; in the second examinations, does his opinion ever count for any marks, and in that way go for anything in the chances of promotion?—No, I believe not.

2543. Mr. William Lowther.] With regard to one question that has been put to you, has your Lordship ever had any complaints of consuls being inefficient in consequence of having been moved from one post to the other?—No, I have no recollection of any such complaint; but perhaps that is rather one of the weak points of the consular system, that everybody's business is nobody's business, and inefficiency in a consul, as long as he does not get into scrapes, is not very quickly or very easily detected.

2544. If chiefs were consulted as to what gentlemen they wish to have at their particular mission, do you not think that that might lead to favouritism, and consequent bad feeling in the mission?—As long as you ask a superior, be he the head of a mission or a superior officer in any other profession, his opinion of the services of a subordinate, to that extent undoubtedly you open a door to what may be called favouritism; but that is a difficulty inherent in the very nature of things, I am afraid. Perhaps I may be allowed here to modify an answer which I gave just now to the Right honourable Member. A question was put to me as to the special case of an attaché, or third or second secretary, who had resided for many years at some one post, and as to the inexpediency of removing such an individual. I think that I ought, in my answer, to have pointed out that under present regulations, that is a case that could not arise; the case which is supposed in that question is one which could only exist under a past state of things.

2545. Sir Henry Lytton Bulwer.] My question arose out of a question put by an honourable Member, who asked rather in the tone of a complaint, whether a person who had been long at a distant mission, was not entitled to be placed somewhere else. I suggested that he might have peculiar qualities which fitted him for that distant mission, and that in such a case it might be the duty of the Secretary of State to keep him where he was. But how is the regulation altered now?—My answer should have been that, under the existing state of things, until a man had attained the rank of a minister, that supposed case of his being fixed or immovable at a particular post for a considerable number of years could not arise.

2546. Mr. Frederick Walpole.] In Question No. 2373, you were asked, "If he were wanted you would, I presume, send out a special officer." Then the rest of the question is, "you rarely have in Europe special requirements and pressure of business in more than one court probably at once; perhaps you may pass a year or two without having any special requirements whatever; and yet under the present system you keep up a staff which is sufficient for extraordinary emergencies." The question being a long one, your Lordship forgot to answer the latter part of it. May I ask you whether generally special requirements at one place abroad do not involve pressure at another, and whether special requirements abroad do not also involve pressure at the Foreign Office at home?—The latter part of the question I should have no hesitation in answering in the affirmative. Where there is a crisis going on in any European capital, if it is a matter of any international importance, undoubtedly some extra work is thrown upon the Foreign Office; but I do not think that, as a general rule, you are likely to have complications in all parts of the world at the same moment.

2547. In the case of the Danish war, were there not complications at work in more than one of the European courts at the same time?—In more than one European court undoubtedly.

2548. Sir Charles Wentworth Dilke.] I wish to ask your Lordship whether your attention was ever called to a suggestion made by Mr. Grant Duff before the Committee of 1861, with regard to a system of competition which was neither exactly open competition nor limited competition?—That was that "the Civil Service Commissioners shall once a year hold an examination, open to all British subjects who are desirous of entering the diplomatic service; that the Civil Service Commissioners should then certify to the Foreign Secretary the names of the 12 candidates who have distinguished themselves most highly in such examination, and that from these 12 the Foreign Secretary shall select the persons who are to be appointed to attachéships during the ensuing 12 months"?—No, I cannot say that my attention has been particularly called to it. Giving merely my first impression of that, I should say that it was open to this obvious objection upon the face of it, that the whole of the 12 candidates could not be appointed to attacheships during during the 12 months, and that those who were left out and who were not appointed in any succeeding year, would consider that they had a very legitimate cause of complaint; whereas on the other hand if their claims were carried on from year to year there would be no room and no cause for any fresh examination for several years to come.

2550. If it were distinctly understood beforehand that only the number of vacancies that year would be filled up from within their ranks, upon what ground would that grievance rest?—I should put it in this way. Hardly any man could make it a grievance against a minister that he individually has not been selected from the whole mass of the British public to fill a particular place; but when, by a process provided for the purpose, the total number of those who have claims to the place is reduced to 12, then every one of those 12 considers, especially as he has probably gone through great labour to prepare himself for the post, that he is more or less illused in having another man preferred to him.

2551. Would it not be an analogous case to the promotion of a consular or a diplomatic officer. At the present moment you would have a certain number of persons from whom, by the practice of the Foreign Office, a selection would be made to fill any vacancy. Those persons would represent their claims to the Foreign Secretary, or would get somebody to do so for them. Would each of those persons feel aggrieved if he were not the person selected to fill the vacancy?—I am putting it in this way, that wherever you give a sort of partial claim to an appointment to each one among a very limited number of persons, those who among that number do not get that appointment are more disappointed, and more inclined to think that they have got reasonable cause of complaint than they would have been if their expectations had not been raised.

2552. Does your Lordship happen to know the system that prevails at the École Polytechnique in France?—I believe that it is one of strict competition, but I do not know the details of it.

2553. I believe it is almost that scheme, namely, that among a certain group of persons so pronounced eligible, the Government select a certain number, and the others go into the civil professions?—I admit that a plan like that would exclude all very stupid and incompetent persons, and to that extent it would be a gain.

2554. Your Lordship is not disposed to think, on other grounds, that it would be a good system to adopt?—I have a very decided opinion that if open competition, to which I am not at all on principle opposed, is to become the system of admission to public offices in this country, it would be better to try it, in the first instance, in the Civil Service at home.

2555. Sir Henry Lytton Bulwer.] I think I understood, with regard to a question that I put just now, that there is some regulation now for moving attachés and secretaries. I do not think there is a positive regulation that they should be moved every two years, is there?—That they may be moved; and they generally are within every three years.

2556. If they are to be moved then, there is a rule to the effect. If they are not to be moved then it is open for the minister to leave them or not as he thinks proper. If it is to be a positive rule, do you think it right as a positive rule that every attaché and secretary should be moved every two years from his post?—I was examined on that point on Monday. I think that the rule of moving second and third secretaries from place to place at not very long intervals of time is on the whole a good one. Undoubtedly it is open to some objection; but on the whole I think it is for the good of the service. As I understand the working of the rule at present, it is this, that no man has a right to complain if he is removed at the end of two years; and in practice he generally is removed within the three years.

2557. Mr. Otway.] With regard to this transfer of attachiés and secretaries, on which your Lordship has so correctly stated the rule and practice, I should like to know whether you do not think that it would be desirable to extend the time shortly to that which it was before this regulation came into force, namely, three years?—I will explain the reason of my question. It seems to me that two years is a remarkably awkward time, because by removing a man after two years you are depriving the legation of him just at the time at which he would be most useful in it. We may take the first year to be that in which he would acquire some knowledge of the language, and the second year to be that in which he would perfect himself in the business of the legation and knowledge of the language, and then we remove him; whereas the other practice was to remove him after three years. Do not you think that it would be desirable to establish a regulation of removal at the end of three years rather than two years?—There are advantages and there are disadvantages in doing so. It would undoubtedly be considered as a boon by the individuals upon whom that rule operates, because removal at the end of two years, if it takes place, falls rather hardly upon them, as it involves expense and inconvenience. And a man who has served two years at a mission is probably in his third year a more efficient public servant than he was in either of the two preceding years. On the other hand, if three years is fixed as the term instead of two years, there will be fewer removals in all, and he will have seen less of the various countries with which in his future diplomatic career he will have to do.

2558. In addition to the expense caused to the individual there is a considerable expense caused to the public by repeated removal, as your Lordship is aware?—There is some expense to the public.

2559. With regard to a question put to you just now, is it not in your opinion open to the head of a mission, and is it not in your opinion his duty, if he considers any attaché or any member of his legation inefficient, to report it?—I should say so certainly. But "inefficiency" is a very vague word, and no doubt a kindly feeling would make a minister unwilling to do that without absolute necessity.

The Earl of Derby.

2560. Then I wish to ask your Lordship a question with regard to promotion by seniority; I think you gave an opinion the other day in favour of a mixed system of promotion to a certain extent by seniority, and to a certain extent by selection; is it not the case that a Secretary of State has ample means in his own office, the Foreign Office, of satisfying himself as to the capacity and the willingness of work of the men who are in the office; I should mention to your Lordship that the constitution of the Foreign Office and the system of promotion in the Foreign Office, have crept into our inquiry?—I do not think that a Secretary of State has very much opportunity of ascertaining from personal knowledge how the junior clerks do their work; he must take the opinion on that point of the head of the room; but I should say, speaking generally, that it is pretty well known in the office what every man is capable of, and what his general character as a worker is; the clerks are a small, a comparatively limited body, and among a limited number of men living together and working together ten months out of the twelve, every man's character and capacity become very well known.

2561. And you would have the further protection, if that word may be applied, of the opinion of the under secretaries who are brought more immediately in contact with the clerks?—Yes, I should say that the political head of an office, unless he has heen for many years in that office, will generally in questions of that kind lean very much upon the permanent under secretary, who is responsible to him for the discipline of the office.

2562. Does it not seem to your Lordship that it would tend to create emulation, and so improve the effective power of the office, if it were known that a certain number of promotions were to be made by the Secretary of State on selection, and on the recommendation of the under secretaries under whom the clerks work?—It cuts both ways. It would create emulation, but it would also create, I am afraid, a certain amount of jealousy and ill-feeling, because where the sphere of competition is so narrow it becomes every man's interest not only to make the most of his own services in the eyes of his employers, but to depreciate those of his colleagues.

2563. I wish to ask a question with regard to one observation that fell from your Lordship, in order to prevent any misapprehension; I think you have said that the few appointments you made to the diplomatic service were not appointments of sons of personal friends of your own, but I understand your Lordship rightly, no doubt, to mean that you were thoroughly acquainted with the character and antecedents, and that you had the strongest recommendation of these men?—Undoubtedly; I thought it my duty to inquire thoroughly into their antecedents and characters.

2564. You were satisfied that they were in all respects suitable persons to be members of the diplomatic service or you would not have appointed them?—Certainly.

2565. With regard to the constitution of the diplomatic service, many questions have been asked your Lordship as to the entry of young men into the service; is it not the case, from your own knowledge of the constitution of the diplomatic service in other countries and the state of society in foreign capitals, that it is essential that the young men in our diplomatic service should be men of a certain social position in, not alone that they should be gentlemen by mind and by character, which is of course all-important, but that really their social position should be good if they are to mix in the circles in foreign capitals which diplomatists generally are supposed to enter?—That would vary very much in different parts of the world; but I should say that, as a general rule, other things being equal, it was desirable to have in our diplomatic service men of the higher ranks of social life.

2566. At any rate, men suited to mix on equal terms with the diplomatic corps of other countries? — Yes, men of whom in point of manners and demeanour, and generally what constitutes gentlemen, you would have no reason to be ashamed.

2567. Mr. Rylands.] Your Lordship says "manners and demeanour," but I suppose we must not understand that you think that manners and demeanour are necessarily connected with birth?—No, certainly not necessarily with birth. I think that the society in which a man has lived and the kind of general culture he has had, have something to do with manners and social character.

2568. But if a young man, having had a good education, and subsequent training in the diplomatic service, came into a position as second or third secretary of the embassy in Paris, although he might not be connected with any family of a high station in this country, does your Lordship think that the mere fact of his not having that connection with a family of distinction in this country would prevent his being usefully employed if so attached to the embassy at Paris?—I do not think that the fact of a man having what is termed high connections is at all material.

2569. Viscount Barrington.] We were informed by an ambassador who was here the other day, Sir Henry Elliot, that he was in favour of admitting persons as attachés who had no intention of making the diplomatic service a profession, thereby intending that they should remain in the service a certain length of time, and not go through the second test examination, which he would make very severe, in order to secure getting good men; has your Lordship ever considered that subject?—I should not be disposed to alter the time or the character of the examination for the convenience of men who entered the service merely as a temporary pursuit; if such men will come into it, I think we may utilise them. I think it is so far desirable to have them that after serving a few years they retire, and thereby they do not block up the promotion; but I do not attach so much importance to such persons being in the service that I would alter, expressly for them, any arrangements with regard to examination that otherwise might appear convenient.

2570. Sir Henry Lytton Bulwer.] With regard to the statement that it is a rule and a practice to move from their posts the gentlemen in the diplomatic service every two years, does that mean that it is so without consulting with the persons themselves; that there is an imperative rule that even if the ambassador wishes them to remain, and they wish to remain, and they are useful there, they must be removed to somewhere else; is it, in fact, granted merely as a favour to the persons who are moved, or or does it follow as a matter of routine in the Foreign Office, that they must be moved whether it seems desirable to themselves or to the chief of the mission, or not?—Not absolutely at the end of two years; but if a man had been, say, nearly three years at one post, I think the Foreign Office would say that he had been there long enough. The limit of two years, as I understand it, is intended as the minimum; he is not to have any cause of complaint if he is removed after the expiration of two years; in practice it is generally between two and three years.

2571. Mr. Butler-Johnstone.] Has not Pesth become a very important place, in consequence of the transformation of the Austrian Empire, and is it not very much more important now than formerly?—Yes.

2572. The Hungarian Diet sits there?—Yes.

2573. The court resides there every year a certain number of times?—Yes.

2574. The Imperial Delegates sit there and at Vienna alternately?—Yes, I believe so.

2575. Such being the case, however, we have no consul whatever at Pesth. Has not the transformation in the Austrian Empire rather made it requisite that an English consul should be placed at Pesth, considering the great importance which of late years Pesth has assumed in the Austrian Empire?—I do not think that a consul there would have much to do; he would have no special consular functions to perform.

2576. But we have a commercial treaty with Austria, of which the Hungarians have been the chief supporters, and corn is produced there largely, and there are, therefore, commercial relations between the Hungarian, as distinguished from the Austrian, and the English countries?—Yes.

2577. Would not a consul be useful in any questions arising say in the working of the commercial treaty with Austria, besides being a kind of diplomatic agent for the English residents there during the time the court was there?—With regard to the commercial part of your question, generally speaking if there is the want of a consul felt anywhere, the Foreign Office is pretty sure to hear. Merchants and traders who find any inconvenience to their business from the want of an official to attend to it, are sure to complain (and they are quite right to do so) to the Foreign Office. All, therefore, that I can say upon that point is that, as far as my recollection goes, there never has been a complaint of that kind, and I infer from that that the want of a consul for that purpose is not felt. With regard to the political part of the question, I think it is one, in the first instance, for our ambassador at Vienna. I think that the ambassador at Vienna must be held responsible for supplying all political information of importance, whether the events occur at Vienna or at Pesth. He might find it expedient to detach some member of his mission at a time when any business of importance was going on at Pesth; and I think that would be better than sending a consul there.

2578. We have a consul general at Warsaw, and at other places with no very great commercial functions to perform, I think. It would be something between a diplomatic and commercial agent that I should point to. Would your Lordship approve of that?—Perhaps I may be allowed to say upon that point, which you have raised with regard to Warsaw, that I have a very strong opinion on the inexpediency of removing men without any fault of their own, from places into which they have been put, unless one has an opportunity of transferring them somewhere else. Whenever a consulship falls vacant, I made it my duty to look minutely first into the question whether it was necessary that that consulate should be continued, and next if it was so, what the salary ought to be; but I did not think it my duty to consider the question of whether all existing consulates ought to be retained until a vacancy occurred in them.

2579. Through the transformation of Europe it is quite possible that some consulates would no longer be required, whereas other places might crop up where it would be desirable to have a consul. Pesth would seem, would it not, from the late transformation of Europe, to have become one of those places where it will be desirable to have some sort of agent between a diplomatic representative and a consul?—If I were responsible for the management of foreign affairs, I should prefer to take the opinion of the ambassador at Vienna on that point.

2580. In the places where we have consuls general their functions are mixed, diplomatic as well as consular, are they not?—Yes.

2581. The leave of a consul general is the same as the leave of a consul, and the leave of a consul is under less advantageous conditions than the leave of a minister; but if the functions of a consul general are more or less diplomatic, would it not be a boon that they have a right to expect, that the consuls general should have the same conditions of leave as our diplomatic agents?—Undoubtedly it would be a boon. They are, as the honourable Member puts it, in a sort of mixed position, partly consuls, partly diplomatists. I can hardly say that it would be a boon which they would have a right to expect that for purposes of leave they should be treated as diplomatists, but undoubtedly it would be a boon which they would appreciate.

2582. A boon which they would appreciate, and which no very great inconvenience to the public service could arise by conceding to them; and, moreover, they have a good deal of hard work?—They are not many in number, and I do not think that the change proposed would be very material.

2583. Mr. Frederick Stanley.] I wish to ask your Lordship a question on the subject of Queen's messengers. Have you ever given your attention either to a reduction of their number, or to a reduction of the upper class of messengers, in favour of the constitution of a lower class of messengers?—With regard to the reduction of numbers, I am afraid that I never have looked into that question quite as closely as it deserves to be looked into. There is some difficulty about the subject, because in a time of general European peace you may, no doubt, dispense with a considerable number of these messengers, but if a time of general European war were to occur you might want them again, and then it might not be easy to lay your hand upon them. That is the general argument against a large reduction; but I believe that since I left the Foreign Office some reduction has taken place.

2584. A suggestion has been made that in case of an insufficiency of foreign messengers, in consequence of a disturbance such as that which you you have mentioned, the number could be supplemented for the occasion by clerks or other persons from the Foreign Office; in your Lordship's opinion would that be practicable?—A time of general disturbance, such as that contemplated in the question, would probably be a time which would not give much leisure to the clerks in the office. Again, a man may be quite conversant with Foreign Office work, but may not be a very good hand at making his way in a disturbed country, where, it may be, he would meet with all manner of obstructions and impediments.

The Earl of Derby.

5 May 1870.

2585. Then I gather that you would attach importance both to the habit of travelling, and to the acquirement of foreign languages, for the persons employed as Queen's messengers?—Certainly; a Queen's messenger ought to have a sufficient knowledge of foreign languages to enable him to make his way about the Continent, and he ought also to have the habit of enduring great fatigue, and generally to be accustomed to travelling, otherwise he would be at a great disadvantage.

2586. There is one question I wish to ask you upon another point; it was suggested by Sir Henry Elliot, in the evidence which he gave before this Committee, that in some cases a reduction might be made in the number of the junior members of embassies and missions by the employment of persons not in the service as private secretaries to the ambassadors or ministers; has that suggestion ever come before you?—I am not aware that it has; I suppose that there would be no objection to an ambassador or a minister employing any member of his family, or any person who might be staying in his house, as his private secretary; and to a certain extent, no doubt, that would lighten the work of his official staff. It would have to be clearly understood, I think, in the event of any custom of that kind being established, that a man did not, by serving in that way as private secretary, acquire any claim to be taken into the public service; that is always the difficulty of employing unpaid service, that those who receive no present pay generally imagine themselves to have some reversionary claim, so to speak, upon the State.

2587. It will explain it better if I read the question, which was No. 915: "Take Constantinople; could you reduce the number of the second secretaries if you had a private secretary?" And Sir Henry Elliot's answer was: "Yes; it would be no economy; it is not as a measure of economy that I propose it, because he would have as private secretary the same pay as a second secretary; but it is merely to prevent the block, and to relieve the service." Taking it in that point of view, would the suggestion meet with your Lordship's approval?—Not if the private secretary is to be paid; I would rather that the pay went, and that the training which that office gives went, to a member of the regular service.

2588. Mr. Arthur Russell.] Does your Lordship consider that a Foreign Secretary can be responsible to Parliament for his foreign policy if he is precluded from choosing his own agents for the higher posts of diplomacy, and they are imposed upon him by some rules and regulations?—I consider that he would be responsible to Parliament for the policy which he pursues, because that is a matter which ought to originate, and must originate, with the Cabinet; with the Foreign Office in the first place; and if it is in a matter of more than departmental importance then with the Cabinet as a whole. I do not think that anything that is done by ministers abroad ought to relieve him of that responsibility; but undoubtedly if matters have gone wrong, and he were able to show that they had gone wrong in consequence of the blundering of some minister or ambassador, it would be a very strong point in his defence if he had had no option as to putting that person in the post which he held.

2589. His action would be crippled if his agents were imposed upon him?—Yes, but I do not contemplate that by any plan that has been proposed it is intended that men should rise in regular rotation from one grade to another.

2590. With regard to Sir Charles Dilke's question as to Mr. Grant Duff's plan, I did not understand whether that applied to the higher ranks; what would be your view on that point?—Without expressing any opinion on the merits of the competitive plan of entering the service, I apprehend that any such plan would leave the Secretary of State perfectly free to regulate subsequent appointments.

2591. Mr. Rylands.] But in regard to the highest posts in the service, the agents of the Foreign Secretary are now to some extent imposed upon him by their being in the position at the time when he comes into office?—That undoubtedly is true.

2593. Does not that seem to furnish rather a strong argument in reference to the most important missions in Europe, that the persons filling those missions should be nominated by the Foreign Secretary actually in power?—I think that the inconvenience of that would be very great. I do not know who would devote himself to diplomatic work if his tenure of office was to depend upon the stability of a Government at home.

2594. But that is assuming that the occupants of these highest posts should be trained diplomatists; but in the event of their being filled by public men connected with the political party in power, the particular objection that you have just now raised would not apply, would it?—That question was partly argued, I think, on Monday. I object to the proposal now made on two grounds. In the first place, I have a most decided objection to widen the scope for political patronage. It is, I think, one of the great dangers of a Parliamentary Government like ours. Political patronage means this, that a man gets an appointment in a certain profession, not because he is thought likely ely to do the work of that profession better an another man, but because he has been of me use, or some relation of his has been of some e, at an election. Look to what that leads. In e first place, it is impossible to deny that there some element in it of corruption, and I think very undesirable for that reason. And there the additional disadvantage that practically it cludes one-half of the eligible candidates at ch particular time from the employment to hich that rule is applied. Putting aside all her objections, I think it is exceedingly objecionable that there being perhaps only a certain umber of men eminently qualified to hold cerin posts, one-half of those should, at any given me, be excluded because their opinions are not ose of the Government in power.

2595. Then would you say in regard to e six or seven leading missions of Europe hich must necessarily be filled, in the event of is plan being adopted, by men of such great minence as to prevent its being considered that here was corruption, that there would be much ompetition for those posts?—I am not prepared o say whether you would have a very keen competition for those posts. If you had, then they ould be looked upon as prizes and political rewards which could only be gained by political ervice; and we all know what that means. If, n the other hand, they were not looked to as reat prizes, then you would have a still worse tate of things, because they would be going egging.

2596. Mr. Otway.] Is your Lordship aware of ny service in any country, access to which is btained solely by merit; if it is not obtained y political or Parliamentary interest, as in this country, is it not obtained by the favour of the Emperor, as in Russia or Austria. Is not admission to the service in all countries regulated more or less by interest with some one in power, and in America especially so?—In America I believe that it is entirely a matter of party patronage; I have always understood so.

2597. With regard to the influence of politics in diplomacy; from your Lordship's experience, are you of opinion that the politics of any diplomatist has any weight with the minister in appointing him to a post?—I really think, speaking for the last 15 or 16 years, that this has not been the case to any appreciable degree; my own share in the distribution of patronage has been very small, and therefore I may say so; but I believe for the last 15 or 16 years diplomatic patronage has been distributed with little reference to party politics.

2598. Should I be far out if I were to affirm that your Lordship is entirely ignorant of the politics of many of our leading diplomatists, whether they are Conservatives or Liberals?—I think that many of these gentlemen have devoted themselves so entirely to the diplomatic career that they are not in any decided sense partisans.

2599. There is no relation in diplomacy more intimate, I presume, than that between a Secretary of State and an Under Secretary of State, or that between a minister and his private secretary. Am I right in saying that your Lordship and Mr. Layard, whose politics differ, both had the same gentleman as private secretary?—Yes; and I may take the opportunity of saying, that he discharged the duties of that position for both of us in a most efficient manner.

2600. In the diplomatic profession politics are not considered you may say?—You may say the same thing, I think, of the permanent Civil Service of the country. In the Foreign Office, till lately, the permanent under secretary was understood, I will not say to be, but to have been, a member of one political party, and the assistant under secretary of another, but I never understood that that circumstance caused the slightest difficulty in the working of that office.

2601. Sir Henry Lytton Bulwer.] There is only one position, I think, to which party feeling would be applicable. For instance, if an ambassador is a peer, he has certain duties to perform in Parliament, and those duties he cannot perform without being a party man. When that party goes out, ought he not to go out with it, and if he remains with the party which is opposed to that whose side he has been taking in his own country, does he not, to a certain degree, lose cast and weight with the government to which he is accredited?—I think that would be entirely a question for the individual to consider. I should take it for granted, as a matter of good taste and good feeling, that any man serving in a permanent diplomatic mission would not take an active part in home politics against the Government that he is serving.

2602. But, if he is a peer, does not his duty call upon him to do so?—That is a case of conscience. I should say that he might fairly consider that his functions as a peer were merged in the more active duty that devolved upon him as a diplomatist.

2603. Mr. William Cartwright.] I think that an honourable Member of the Committee has suggested the idea of dividing the consular service between shipping consuls and non-shipping consuls; I should like to know whether, from your experience of the Foreign Office, you think that the correspondence of consuls could easily be divided into the category of political and non-political correspondence, so as to separate the two, and to leave the one to the Board of Trade and the other to the Foreign Office?—Yes; I do not suppose that there is any necessary connection between the political and the commercial correspondence.

2604. The categories could easily be made out between the two classes of consuls?—I should apprehend so. If that were the only objection I do not think that that is a great one.

2605. Sir Charles Wentworth Dilke.] You expressed, I think, your preference for the Queen's messengers over Foreign Office clerks, used as special messengers, on the ground of Queen's messengers possessing a larger acquaintance with foreign languages?—No, I did not put it on that ground.

2606. The question was put into your mouth; it was suggested that that was the reason, and I understood your Lordship to assent to that?—No; I spoke of a greater acquaintance with the habits of travelling; a man may be an excellent clerk, who would certainly be knocked up if you set him travelling 1,500 miles, night and day.

2607. I believe as a matter of fact, with regard to the knowledge of foreign languages, only French and one other language is required from a

The Earl of Derby.

Queen's messenger; and, in practice, if he knows French, very little more is required?—That is the fact as a general rule; but it does not follow because they are generally only required to know French that none of them are ever required to know more, and of course if it were a question of sending despatches in times of difficulty through a disturbed country you would pick out a man especially qualified for the urpose.

2608. Could you not in the same way p out a man especially qualified from the Fore Office, and one not particularly likely to knocked up?—Undoubtedly you could find m whether in or out of the Foreign Office, w would be capable of undertaking that du but you would have to look for them, and i convenient to have a few such men ready hand, available at a moment's notice.

Mr. William Dougal Christie, called in; and Examined.

2609. Chairman.] How long have you been in the diplomatic service?—I was altogether about 15 years in it; first of all, for a short time, in what was the consular service at that time.

2610. Where did you serve in that department?—My first appointment was as agent and consul general in the Mosquito country, which is in Central America. I received that appointment in 1848, and about three years afterwards I was appointed secretary of legation at Berne.

2611. How long did you serve in Switzerland?—I was in Switzerland nearly four years, and for about two years of that time I was in charge of the legation; I was chargé d'affaires altogether for about two years. Then at the end of 1854 I was appointed chargé d'affaires and consul general at Buenos Ayres. My departure for Buenos Ayres was delayed for a considerable time, owing to a quarrel which had occurred with the government of Buenos Ayres, my predecessor, Captain Gore, having been expelled by the government, and also owing to civil discussions in the Argentine Republic, which ended in the separation of Buenos Ayres from all the other provinces of the republic; and ultimately I was sent out with the rank of minister plenipotentiary to the government of the other provinces. I was sent as minister plenipotentiary to what was then called the Argentine Confederation, of which Buenos Ayres did not form a part.

2612. Were you subsequently in Brazil?—I was in the River Plate as minister to the Argentine Confederation for about three years, and during that time I went up on a special mission to Paraguay; and in the end of 1859 I was appointed minister in Brazil. I may mention that, in the interval between my leaving Switzerland and my going out as minister to the Argentine Confederation, I was employed by Lord Clarendon for some time in the Foreign Office in connection with Central American questions, which at that time were rather prominent; and during the time that Mr. Hammond was away from the Foreign Office with Lord Russell at Vienna, I was employed in the Foreign Office on Central American questions.

2613. That was, I presume, in consequence of your knowledge acquired in the Mosquito country?—Yes, and there was a question of my being sent out on a special mission to the Central American Republics; but on representations made by myself to Lord Clarendon, that I thought that there was little or no prospect of my being able to be of any use there, he gave up the idea. I was appointed minister in Brazil at the end of 1859, and I continued to hold that appointment until 1863, when, after proceedings in Brazil which attracted at the time very great attention, the reprisals executed by me under Lord Russell's instructions, and after the suspe sion of diplomatic relations with Brazil, in co sequence of those proceedings, a pension w assigned to me, and I have not since been e ployed.

2615. Open to re-employment if the Forei Office should again wish to employ you?—T condition of the pension is liability to re-emplo ment, and I should forfeit my pension, at le according to the law I should do so, if I refus to serve in any mission of the same rank, or o superior rank to that in which I served before.

2616. Then I understand that you first reg larly entered the diplomatic service as a secreta of legation, and not in a lower grade?—Yes, was first in the diplomatic service as a secreta of legation, having been for three years befo agent and consul general in the Mosqui country.

2618. Are you aware, from your knowledg of the diplomatic profession, whether your a pointment in that way, from the outer wor into the diplomatic service, to a high post, was a singular nature, or have there been any othe similar appointments?—At that time it wa common; at least it was not at all unusual; ther were instances, I think, about the same time. may mention that I had been in the House o Commons for about six years before, and ther were instances at that time of ministers bein appointed from the House of Commons. For in stance, Mr. Shiel was appointed minister a Florence, and Mr. Wyse minister at Athen from the House of Commons.

2619. And Captain Gore also?—Captain Gor was appointed chargé d'affaires and consul gener from the House of Commons. But that offic was at that time under the consular establish ment. But there were instances of secretaries o legation being appointed who had not previousl been in the service. Sir Charles Murray wa appointed secretary of legation at Naples, no having been previously in the service; and Si James Hudson was appointed by Lord Aberdeen secretary of legation at Washington, having never been before in the diplomatic service And there were instances of similar appointment up to the year 1859; that is about ten year ago. Lord Chelsea, the present Lord Cado gan, was appointed in 1858 secretary o embassy in Paris; he had been an attaché many years before for a short time, but to all intent and purposes he was a stranger to the professior then.

2620. From your knowledge of the profession ould you say that those appointments at that ne were regarded with jealousy and disappro-tion by the profession?—Any such appoint-nts of course caused disappointment to several ntlemen who having been for a long time achés were looking for promotion. An ap-intment of that sort could not take place with-t causing disappointment to several individuals; t at that time it was common, and at that time was quite understood, that attachés had not the ne strong right to promotion which is now nerally conceded, and which, in fact, regulates e present practice.

2621. In those days the admission to the ser-ce was a pure nomination, without examination any test being applied?—Yes.

2622. And we have understood that there were great many gentlemen who entered the diplo-atic profession who did not intend to pursue it a regular professional career, but merely to quire a knowledge of public business and reign countries?—Yes; and that was very uch because promotion was not so much a right en as it now is.

2624. What is the amount of your pension?—900 a year.

2625. Was that calculated upon your length service, or upon what basis?—I should not ve been entitled to any pension if it had not en made out that I had had 15 years of service. he amount of the pension depended upon the ct of my having served as a minister for five ars abroad. That service was compounded of rvice in the River Plate, where the mission as a second class mission, in no case leading to ore than 900 l. a year, and of service in Brazil, here, if I had been able to make out five years service, I should have been entitled to a pen-on of 1,300 l. a year after 15 years' service together.

2626. It was a sort of composition of the two rounds of claim?—I could only benefit by the ve years of service in the rank of minister of a econd-class mission, because I had not served ve years in a first-class mission; but if I could ave served two and a-half years more in Brazil, r any other mission of the first class, I should ave been entitled to a pension of 1,300 l. a year.

2627. It has been suggested to the Committee at there would be considerable public and poli-cal advantage in the class of the South Ameri-an missions being of a higher character than ey are now; have you any opinion on that oint?—I may mention perhaps that I have had he advantage of reading the evidence given by Ir. Hammond on that subject, and I am aware hat he has expressed a strong opinion on it. I ust say that my opinion is decidedly contrary o his. I think that there is no reason for raising he rank of our representatives anywhere in outh America. In some cases I think it may e advantageously reduced, and I am of opinion hat some saving may be effected, and desirably ffected, by a reduction of the rank of our repre-entation in South America, which would of ourse involve more or less a reduction of pay.

2628. Are you prepared to go into particulars s to that, and to enumerate the cases in which ou think that a reduction might be advantage-usly effected?—I would say generally that the nature of the duties in the South American missions is very different from that of the duties in European missions.

5 May 1870.

2629. As you have had experience of both perhaps you will explain that further?—If you will allow me to make a few general remarks I think I could explain my reasons better in that way before descending to particular appointments. The duties of a British minister in the South American missions refer, I may say, exclusively now (for since the cessation of the slave trade in Brazil there are really no political duties there) to the protection of British subjects and of commercial interests. There are no questions of policy with respect to which you desire to influence the governments, or in which it is of any European importance that we should exert influence, and in that way it is not so important there as it is (and as I heard it, on Monday, explained by Lord Derby that it is) in European missions, that the rank of our representative should be determined by the rank of the representative of any other European government. I am quite alive to the importance in European missions of our having representatives of a rank which would enable them to hold their own with the representatives of other European courts. For instance, if I may be allowed (I think the Committee will see that it bears on the general subject) to refer to my own experience in Switzerland. I was in charge of the mission for a considerable time at two periods. At one time there was a very serious question, which might at any moment have led, and indeed was expected to lead, to hostilities between Austria and Switzerland. I was then chargé d'affaires. It was a very critical period for Switzerland. My responsibility was great, and I have the satisfaction of saying that my conduct was entirely approved, and in very high terms, by Lord Clarendon, under whom I then served; but being only chargé d'affaires, I should have been under a great disadvantage if the Austrian representative at that time had had the rank of a minister; he was only chargé d'affaires. At the other period to which I refer, there was a very serious question with France. It was immediately after what is known as the coup d'état, and it is a matter of public history that an invasion by France of Switzerland was expected then. It was stated in the House of Commons shortly afterwards, and therefore I am not telling a secret in mentioning it. I was in Switzerland in charge of the mission. A new French minister appeared; he was specially sent. I of course was disappointed when Lord Granville, who was at the time Secretary for Foreign Affairs, determined to send our minister to the spot and to relieve me of my duties as chargé d'affaires, but I am quite satisfied that Lord Granville did what was right, because it was very important that England should be represented at that moment by a minister who could take a sufficiently high tone with the French minister in the conversation that would take place. The mere fact of sending a minister at that time to Switzerland had a great moral effect, and I believe that it contributed in some degree to a satisfactory settlement of the differences between Switzerland and France.

2630. It was represented to us that, to a certain extent, though there may not be the same questions of international policy between us and the South American States, yet there are questions in which other nations also are interested, who have representatives there, and that we stand at a disadvantage compared with them in consequence of the superior position of their representatives?—Speaking of those parts of South America which I know (I was never on the Pacific side, in Chili and Peru), and specially of Brazil and Buenos Ayres, which are our two chief missions, there was no representative there of a higher rank than ours, and the emoluments of the English minister in Brazil and the English minister in Buenos Ayres are superior to those of the minister of any other country.

2631. I rather understood you to say that you would propose to reduce the position of the English ministers there rather than to raise it?—I believe that a chargé d'affaires at Buenos Ayres is all that is wanted. Lord Palmerston reduced the appointment from the rank of minister to the rank of chargé d'affaires at the time when he appointed Captain Gore to Buenos Ayres. It was done by him deliberately; and when afterwards I was sent out as minister plenipotentiary to the Argentine Confederation, then distinct from Buenos Ayres, it was done in consequence of representations made by an Argentine minister, who was sent over expressly for that purpose, that they would be very much gratified by having a representative of the rank of a minister. Those representations were made both to the English Government and to the French government, and I believe I am right in saying that the French government determined to accede to that representation, and in consequence of the course taken by the French government, Lord Clarendon determined to send me out with the rank of minister plenipotentiary. I of course was not sorry to have that superior rank; but I feel quite satisfied that in Buenos Ayres a representative of the rank of chargé d'affaires and consul general is all that our interests require.

2632. How is it now?—Now there is a minister; it has always remained so since. With regard to Brazil, Brazil is an empire. The Emperor of Brazil has family relations with European dynasties, and there are one or two ministers sent to Brazil for that reason. Russia, for instance, sends a minister to Brazil solely on account of family relations. I certainly do not think that there is any need for a change in Brazil in the way of increase of the rank of our representation, but my belief is that a minister plenipotentiary, that is, making it a second class mission, would be ample for Brazil. I am aware that it has been stated by Mr. Hammond in his evidence, which I have read, that representations were made from the South American governments that they would feel very much flattered by having higher representatives than chargé d'affaires and consuls general; that they would be very much gratified by having a representative of the rank of minister. My experience is that, in yielding to similar representations, we (I speak frankly) gratify the vanity of the South American governments; and when it comes to our wanting anything from them, when it comes to our requiring them to do what is right (because, of course, we do not want from them anything but what is right), we do not find them at all disposed to remember what we have done to gratify them.

2633. There is no greater facility, in point of fact, for the transaction of the public business in consequence of that additional rank?—I fear that, from peculiar circumstances, opinions which I may give on this subject may be supposed t be attended with prejudice; but I know tha there are statements before the Committee, bot in published reports from our representative and in the evidence which has been already given which quite accord with and support my opinio as to the character of the South American go ments. Sir Henry Howard, for instance, wh was formerly minister in Brazil, has stated i his report to Lord Clarendon, which is befor the public, that they are all of them semi-civilise communities. Mr. Hammond also has spoken o them as not well-ordered communities, and ha thus drawn a distinction between them an European governments. I quite agree in thos remarks; I do not go beyond them, but I quit agree in them, and I refer to them because, as said before, it may be supposed from peculia circumstances that I may be prejudiced agains the South American governments. You can ge nothing from a South American Spanish govern ment, in my opinion, except through the influenc of hope or fear. If you can lead them to hop for anything, or if you can inspire them with fea you may get what is right, otherwise you cannot 2634. Do you mean that nothing is to be go from their sense of justice when that sense i properly appealed to?—I am sorry to say that m opinion is that that is the case. Lord Russel stated publicly in a despatch with regard to thos events in Brazil which led to reprisals, that w had been mocked by the Brazilian governmen for a long period with "evasions, subterfuges and unfounded assertions." That is strong lan guage, but it really is not stronger than th occasion required, and it correctly describes th whole history of our proceedings with Brazil going back to negotiations with regard to th cessation of the slave trade and to the time o Sir James Hudson, who had similar difficultie with the Brazilian government to those which had afterwards to encounter, and whose repre sentations to it were always in as strong a tone if not stronger, than any which I had occasion t make to it.

2635. You have to settle no doubt several more or less commercial questions and commercia difficulties when you were in the River Plate a minister there. Should you say that you had no superior advantage as a minister to what you could have had as chargé d'affaires, if you had been merely chargé d'affaires; that that gave you no additional help in getting those things settled? —I went out to the River Plate at a peculia time, and I had peculiar advantages for settling a number of questions, which I did satisfactorily settle during the three years that I was there.

2636. But do you think that you could have settled those as satisfactorily and as conclusively if you had been a mere chargé d'affaires with a lower diplomatic rank, and therefore less important perhaps in the eyes of the government at that time?—I do not think that I should have had the same advantage then if I had only the rank of chargé d'affaires; but that brings me t make this observation: I think that with those governments, when you want anything special done it might be, and probably would be, sometimes desirable to send out a special representative with a higher rank, and a higher rank on that occasion would be the more appreciated on account of the ordinary and normal rank being a lower one. It would be considered, of course, a special compliment; and when a special object had had to be gained, there is no doubt whatever that that compliment would aid you: it certainly could not have the opposite tendency. I may mention, to show that this is not a new opinion, that during the time that I was minister in Brazil, after I had been there about 18 months I came home on leave of absence, on account of ill-health, and during the time that I was at home I represented to Lord Russell, and to the Foreign Office, that there were a number of questions which had to be settled (some had been very long unsettled), and having opened negotiations about these questions with the Brazilian Government, and being at that time on the best possible terms with them (indeed I was always on excellent terms with them until I was called upon to have reprisals executed), I yet thought that it would be desirable to send out a special representative even of the highest rank of an ambassador for the purpose of settling those or some other questions; and of course in giving that advice I was quite aware that I was not likely to be the person selected to go out with that additional rank. Lord Russell did not think it expedient to do what I suggested. I went back to Brazil, and I was unable to settle any of those questions, and none of them are settled yet. I see that statements have been made about the Prussian Government having resolved that they would give a diplomatic rank to their representatives in the South American States. I understand that merely to mean that, instead of having consuls they propose to send chargé d'affaires and consuls general to the South American Republics. As regards appointing ministers resident instead of chargé d'affaires and consuls general to the South American Republics, which has been recommended, I observe that it is stated that it would not necessarily lead to an increase of pay; but my impression is that an increase of rank always does lead in the end to an increase of pay. The increase of pay is not made at the time, but representations are afterwards made, and the increase of pay is afterwards granted. And there is no doubt whatever that every representative abroad proportions his expenses to his rank. For instance, when I was minister in Brazil, following many others, my emoluments were larger than those of any other foreign representative. It was of course necessary that I should live in a very expensive country in a manner proportioned to the rank which I held, and to the amount of my salary and allowances, which were not too much, I am sorry to say, for my expenses there. If I had been only a chargé d'affaires much less would have been expected from me in the way of representation; and practically it comes to this, that an ambassador, a minister, or a chargé d'affaires lives and spends according to his rank, and according to his allowances, which generally are proportioned to his rank.

2637. Speaking generally, with regard to your emoluments when you were in Brazil, were they adequate to the position which you were called upon to fill, as the representative of the English Government?—I cannot say that they were inadequate; the salary of our minister in Brazil is a large one, it is 4,000 l. a year, with an allowance of 700 l. a year for house rent.

2638. Did that sum provide a house?—It is intended for a town house and a country house; however, I may state that Brazil is a very expensive country. And I may mention that I made an arrangement which other ministers who succeeded me probably have not made; but my health rendered it impossible for me to live in Rio, because I suffered dreadfully from asthma when I was there, and was unable to live there two days without being prostrated by it, and therefore I lived all the year round in a place called Petropolis, high in the mountains, and made that my chief residence. I explained it to the Foreign Office, and had their sanction to this arrangement, and in that way I had only one house, namely, that at Petropolis. That was a house on a scale becoming my position; I had not a house in Rio; if I had had a house in Rio also no doubt that the expense would have been greater. I think that an additional 200 l. a year had been granted a few years before by the Foreign Office, on Mr. Scarlett's representation; he asked for an increase of salary, and they allowed 200 l. a year for a country house When I represented the matter to the Foreign Office, they allowed me to consider this additional 200 l. a year as a contribution to the general expenses of the minister.

2639. Mr. William Cartwright.] Were the offices at Rio?—All the work was done in Petropolis, and there was no occasion for an office in Rio; the work in Rio was of that nature that I had very seldom occasion to see individuals, and individuals very seldom had occasion to see me. The work with the Brazilian Government is done almost entirely by their own wish, by their own plan, and by their predeliction, by correspondence. They dislike interviews. There was, moreover, telegraphic communication between Rio and Petropolis. I could get down in four hours on a summons by telegraph; and whenever it was necessary to go down on public business, of course I went down, and whenever any British subject wanted to see me in Rio, it was understood that I was ready to go down.

2640. Where would you see them?—At an hotel, and with those members of the diplomatic body in Brazil who lived in Rio, who were single men (and several of the ministers were single men), it was the practice to live at hotels.

2641. To board at a public hotel?—As you would live anywhere else.

2642. Mr. Otway.] Had you no permanent public offices at Rio?—No, I had no office, except a room in my house at Petropolis. All the diplomatic staff were at Petropolis with me, and they came to my house, and to that room in my house, which would be the office, to do what work was necessary. Very often, perhaps generally, they took work home with them to do it; that was a very convenient practice.

2643. Chairman.] Is Petropolis a town of resort for the leading people in Rio?—It is a place where the court resides during the very hot months, and indeed all the leading people, and the members of the diplomatic body, go there during what they call the summer months. And there were other ministers who, like myself, lived there all the year round; for instance, the Russian minister.

2644. Do you think that it would be an advantageous plan that the public should provide residences at these missions for their representatives, rather than make an allowance for house rent, or is an allowance the preferable plan?—I think it is most desirable that a residence should be provided at every mission, and that that residence should be in the main furnished.

Mr. W. D. Christie.

2645. And should be the permanent place for the representative of England?—Yes, and that would be an immense convenience. My experience is mostly confined to distant countries and places where it is difficult to establish oneself. If a minister going newly to a country were to find a house in the main furnished, he would be relieved of a great deal of trouble and embarrassment. Of course he is subject to a great deal of unnecessary expense by being put to it to find a house when he first goes there, every advantage naturally being taken of him as a stranger and as a minister. There is not only trouble and embarrassment and expense for him at starting, but when he goes away (and ministers are apt to be often moved) he has to sell all his furniture at a very great sacrifice; and besides the advantage to the individual minister, I think such a plan as is suggested would be of very great advantage to the public service, because it would ensure a uniform establishment and uniform appearance in our foreign missions. If, to revert to Rio, I had found a house there such as I have recommended, I could not have discontinued it, and I should have selected a country house in Petropolis, going there as much as I could, but at the same time keeping the house in Rio as the head-quarters and as the office of the mission; but there being no such house I felt myself quite justified, and I was supported in that course by the Foreign Office, in arranging for one establishment at Petropolis, and I avoided the expense of buying furniture for two houses.

2646. From your experience in Switzerland, could you say the same thing as to Europe, that it would be preferable for the public service that the minister and the diplomatic body should have a house rather than an allowance for it?—Yes; being a stranger to Switzerland when I went to take charge of the legation there, I confess that I was surprised to find that there was no house for the minister or for the chargé d'affaires, and that all the archives were kept in a temporary lodging which was occupied then by a gentleman who had only the rank of an unpaid attaché, who had been there alone representing the legation. They had been moved to that lodging on the departure of the previous chargé d'affaires. And that is another advantage resulting from having a permanent mission house, that the archives will not be subject to continual removals, by which they cannot but suffer, and by which they do often suffer.

2647. Chairman.] UPON the question of leave of absence, have you any opinion to express to the Committee about the existing rules, which you are no doubt aware of?—I suppose you are asking with reference to the special complaints which have lately been made by ministers. I think that it is a decided grievance for ministers, first that they are not allowed any time of absence on full salary as secretaries are, and secondly, it is a grievance that while the ministers or ambassadors who are near England can come home very easily, and at little expense, distant ambassadors and ministers (and the question of distance does not refer only to the South American missions) are obliged to consume a great deal of time in travelling, and that therefore a regulation which appears to be equal is really not equal as between distant ministers and ministers who are near England. I have observed that Sir Henry Elliot and Sir Andrew Buchanan, the one at Constantinople; and the other at St. Petersburgh, have complained, and I think justly, that although they cannot come home easily every year (Sir Andrew Buchanan has a large family) as the ambassador in Paris or the minister at the Hague or at Brussels can, they are not allowed to run two years' leave of absence into one, which even secretaries are allowed to do, there being a special regulation for the benefit of secretaries in that respect. Certainly I think it would be fair that a distant minister, if he is unable to come home every year, should be allowed to have double the leave every other year that he might otherwise have each year. Myself, coming from Rio on leave of absence, I was mulcted, like every other minister, to the extent of what was necessary for the payment of the chargé d'affaires during 60 days from leaving my post, and after that I was put on half salary. But to come from Rio to England and go back, nearly 60 days are consumed in the travelling.

2648. As a point of fact, whatever leave of absence you practically got at home, you were upon half-pay all the time, or nearly all the time?—Yes.

2649. With respect to the question of reduction of staff in the larger missions, do you think that that would be effected in a way advantageous to the public?—I will answer that question by saying that I think that the system should be entirely changed. I am prepared to submit to the Committee a different scheme for the diplomatic service from that which now prevails. My belief is that all the objects of the service could be best attained (and my scheme would involve a reduction of staff, and probably some saving) by first of all allowing every ambassador or minister a private secretary.

2650. Paid by the public?—As the heads of departments at home and colonial governors are allowed private secretaries, for whom a salary is provided by the public, and such a private secretary should be the subject, if thought necessary, to a test examination; but I should say myself that the public would be safe in the hands of the ambassador or minister, who would naturally select a person whom he knew well and who would be likely to be an efficient assistant. I am very strongly of opinion that in any case ambassadors or ministers should be allowed private secretaries. The work which an ambassador or minister has to perform is, to a very great extent, of that nature which specially requires the assistance of a private secretary, a gentleman whom he knows well, with whom he is on terms of confidence, over whom he has an influence, because he has selected him, and because his position depends upon the approval and confidence of his chief, and who would live with him in his house; and an ambassador or minister would, of course, wish to have the power of selecting a person who was to live with him in his house. I do not at all agree, indeed I do not understand the tone which was taken by Mr. Hammond in his evidence given by him before the Diplomatic Committee of 1861, on that subject. He seemed to be quite astonished at the idea of an ambassador or minister abroad wanting a private secretary. He said, "What can he want him for? It can only be for his household affairs." Now private secretaries are granted to Cabinet ministers and colonial governors, not for household affairs; a Cabinet minister's private secretary is not a household household servant; he assists him, and assists him very much and in very important matters, in the conduct of public business; and I venture to add my very strong recommendation to that which has been given in the reports lately presented, in Lord Lyons's reports for instance, both in 1861 and now. Sir Henry Elliot also has recommended it, and Lord Wodehouse, whose opinion I have the greatest possible respect for, recommended it before the Committee of 1861. I think that the power of an ambassador or minister to have a private secretary is really essential for the good of the diplomatic service, and that the work would be very much better done in every way; much more to the comfort of the minister as well as to the advantage of the public service if a private secretary were allowed.

Mr. W. D. Christie.

2651. Would you have him a confidential employé of the minister himself, and not a gentleman in the public service?—I should consider the private secretary of an ambassador or minister just as the private secretary of the Foreign Secretary, or the First Lord of the Treasury, or the Governor General of Canada or governor of any other colony, is considered. And I think also that among these private secretaries you would have a nursery for future diplomatists; it would be an excellent training; and I think that, without giving them a right (and I do not think it at all desirable that such a right should be given to any class) of promotion to high and responsible appointments, you would get a number of young men well trained, having the best opportunities of seeing public business, and of whose character you would have, through their chiefs, the best means of gaining knowledge, who might afterwards be appointed to higher posts in the service.

2652. Is not the idea which you seem to have of a private secretary very much the idea of an attaché, a gentleman of honour and ability, and of good address, who can be in confidential relations with the minister or ambassador, and copy his correspondence, and write letters of a confidential character, a duty with which he could be entirely trusted?—I believe that he would essentially be exactly what the attaché in former times was really. The attaché of former times was a gentleman selected by the ambassador or the minister; but in process of time, and more particularly of late years, I think that the attaché has really been turned into what should be a clerk. The attachés are now put to perform duties for which in former days there was really only what is now called the first secretary of legation; the old system was that which is now called first secretary; the secretary of legation was the only subordinate appointed by the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, all the others were gentlemen selected by the chief to aid him in the way which he thought most desirable, more or less, according to the rank of the chief, or according to the importance of the mission; and he had his own friends around him, and they were, in fact, considered (it is the old phrase) members of his family.

2653. Then, in fact, you would be to a certain extent for going back to the old system which has been changed in recent times?—Yes; I think that we should be going back to one of the virtues of the old system which has been lost.

2654. The new system having developed a defect in the direction of which you speak from the want of intimate confidential relations between the minister and his subordinates?—Yes; an ambassador or minister now has generally no voice in the selection of any of the secretaries. That was stated distinctly by Lord Stratford de Redcliffe before the Diplomatic Committee of 1861.

2655. He is not consulted in any way with respect to the gentlemen who are attached to him?—If I had not heard Lord Derby's evidence the other day, I should have said in the most positive way that he never was. I have now served since Lord Derby became Foreign Secretary; I have no doubt that he stated what was his practice and his desire; but my own belief is, that, with very rare exceptions (perhaps for example in the case of the ambassador at Paris, who is near at hand and is an important personage), an ambassador or minister is never consulted; and I heard Sir Henry Bulwer's opinion to the same effect.

2656. Then I understood that you would accompany that change with a change of the character of the permanent officers on the diplomatic staff?—Yes; I think that the rest of the work should be done and would be better done and done more cheaply, probably to some extent though I do not attach so much importance to the mere saving of pounds, shillings, and pence, by having only a secretary of embassy or a secretary of legation who should superintend a staff of clerks such as are in every colonial governor's office, the secretary of embassy or the secretary of legation corresponding with a colonial secretary.

2657. These clerks would be permanent officers attached to each mission to do, as I understand, simply clerical work; is that the scheme?—They would be attached to each embassy or mission, but in carrying out any scheme and making any regulations you must take into account the different circumstances of missions. There are different classes of missions in Europe. I believe that in some of the smaller and less busy missions in Europe you may dispense with the secretary of legation altogether, and that the work could be easily done (for instance, in Switzerland, at Stuttgardt, and at the Hague, and there may be one or two other places, but I know more or less about those) by the minister with the assistance of a private secretary and a good clerk.

2658. When you were chargé d'affaires at Berne, what was the assistance that you had there?—For some time I was quite alone, and had no assistance.

2659. Did you do all the formal part of the correspondence yourself, the copying of despatches fair, and that sort of thing, with your own hand?—Often with my own hand, with the assistance of my wife sometimes. Sir Edmund Lyons had been there as minister shortly before I took charge of the mission, and I can state that Sir Edmund Lyons was for some time without any assistance, and copied out his own despatches, and had Lady Lyons to help him to do so. I do not think that was at all a proper state of things.

2660. What was the ordinary permanent staff there at that time, if it had been its full complement?—There was a secretary of legation (that was my appointment, but I was in charge then) and one attaché, and for a great part of the time the at attaché was an honourable Member of this ommittee, Mr. Cameron.

2661. Mr. Cameron.] There was one unpaid taché besides the secretary of legation?—Yes; was for some time alone, and it was necessary r me to be in Berne every day for passport ork; and I wrote to Lord Palmerston saying at I wanted to go away for a short tour in witzerland. There was then an attaché who ld the appointment, but he had not come, and was not convenient for him to come; and I ked Lord Palmerston to allow me to authorise n English resident in Berne, for whose respectbility I could vouch, to act for me in all formal atters while I was taking a short tour. That as allowed me, and after that he sent an taché, Mr. Berkeley, who afterwards died in exico, and I think Mr. Cameron succeeded r. Berkeley. And I think that I was in charge gain while Sir Charles Murray was minister, nd I then did all the work alone, without any ssistance at all, as Mr. Odo Russell says that he as been doing his. I should say that it would e very much better in the case of a mission like witzerland, and other similar missions, to let he minister have a private secretary, who would ve with him in his house and would be a friend f his, and to give him a clerk, who can in all uch places be generally selected on the spot, nd the place would be his home. There used be a clerk of that sort at Stuttgardt, I remember, at the time when I was in Switzerland. hat is with reference to the smaller missions; ut with reference to the large embassies, the mbassies now in Paris, Constantinople, and ienna, and such places, I should say that you ight have under the secretary of embassy two ts of clerks. The superior clerks might be erks of the same sort as you have in the oreign Office, and I should think that it would e a very desirable extension of the Foreign ffice clerk system if there were a number of erkships for the embassies and the superior issions, to be considered as on a par with the oreign Office clerkships. The young men spiring to them should pass the same exmination, and they might be drafted to Paris to Constantinople or to Vienna, as they hose, or as was thought desirable by the Secretary of State; and I would have in that way in ach of the embassies or superior missions of urope, two clerks, or one clerk of a higher chaacter, and others, copying clerks, clerks of a ower class who should not look to promotion, ut who at the same time should be paid enough o keep them, and keep them respectably. And am quite certain that there would be no difficulty in finding clerks of that sort, either in the oreign capitals, or you might choose them in ondon and send them from London to Paris, or ienna, or Constantinople.

2662. Do you think that the character of the ork of a mission should be so adjusted and ivided that that which was of a highly confiential nature should be intrusted to the one lass, and that of an ordinary nature to clerks of nother class, who are not quite so trustworthy r incorruptible?—I was not contemplating a disinction between confidential clerks and others. My opinion is that they should all be confiential. I remember the phrase of Lord Malnesbury before the Diplomatic Committee of 861, when he was recommending or acquiescing n the advisability of a permanent clerk at some of the missions, he said emphatically that it should be a confidential man; you must not employ anyone whom you cannot trust. And I believe that honour is to be found in all classes of Englishmen, and I do not believe that there would be any difficulty in finding copying clerks who can be generally trusted as well as gentlemen of the higher classes of society. At the South American missions of Buenos Ayres and Brazil I depended a good deal upon clerks for my assistance. There was a very excellent clerk at Rio, and there is a clerk whom I appointed myself at Buenos Ayres, with the modest salary of 150 l. a year.

Mr. W. D. Christie. 9 May 1870.

2663. An Englishman?—An Englishman of humble position, but he was educated, and of course I did not appoint him without ascertaining that he was a perfectly respectable man. He knew everything going on in Buenos Ayres; he went up with me to Paraguay; secrecy was desirable there towards the people of the country, and he never betrayed me, and I would not doubt his honour.

2664. Mr. Otway.] May I ask his name?—His name is [ ]; he is still clerk at Buenos Ayres.

2665. You are not aware that he has been dismissed?—No, I thought I saw his name in the last list. He had been there a great number of years, and Mr. Thornton had so good an opinion of him as to recommend him for the consulate at Rosario, which would be a very great promotion.

2666. I only mention the fact of his dismissal; you understand that I do not express any opinion as to the justice of the quarrel between him and Mr. Mathew?—I thought he was still employed; I thought I had seen his name in the late Foreign Office list, but still he was employed till comparatively recently. However, an exception proves the rule, it is said, and I retain my opinion that you may trust generally to the honour of clerks of that sort as much as to the honour of others.

2667. Chairman.] Do you contemplate economy in point of expense, or greater efficiency by such a change; what is the object of the change?—I contemplate much greater efficiency. As regards such a change in the European missions, I do not think that you would gain much in the way of economy, though I think probably there would be a saving rather than otherwise. But I contemplate a very great gain in respect of efficiency.

2668. In what way; would the clerks be more skilled and practised hands than the young gentlemen who are now sent out from this country to learn the business of diplomacy?—I think that they would work much more regularly, and they would be much more under the control of the ambassador or minister. First of all, I would in my plan make the secretary of embassy or the secretary of legation a much more efficient assistant to the ambassador or minister than he now is. I would put him at the head of this office consisting of clerks, and I would require from him much more regular work and a greater amount of work than he now does in most missions.

2669. Is not the work of a mission essentially very uneven and unequal in its distribution, sometimes very heavy and sometimes very light?—I should say that in an embassy or busy mission it was not so. Of course there must be differences; in a distant place a great deal depends upon the post day; but still in an embassy or a large mission there must always be work for a certain number of clerks more or less. In a small mission very often there is little or nothing to do, and certainly in such a mission I should say that there ought not to be more than a private secretary and a clerk to assist the minister. Sir Henry Elliot has said in his report (and there is not a better authority, and of course every ambassador or minister writing in that way writes with some reserve and moderation), "If the rules laid down by the Foreign Office Circular of November 1860, respecting the duties of the secretary of embassy and legation, were more commonly observed, it would facilitate the reduction"; that of course means that the rules are not observed generally by the secretary of embassy and legation; "for at present," he says, "in many missions the secretaries do no chancery work whatever, and simply remain in reserve in case of the absence of the chief." Then I should say in the Brazil mission, though a first-class mission, there is not enough to employ the secretary of legation if he has not to do chancery work, and has not to do copying work. I am far from wishing to subject a gentleman of the age and position that a secretary of legation generally is, to drudgery; but I say it is better not to have one at all, if you cannot so use him, but much better to have an efficient working man. You find, I think, in those reports from our representatives abroad, many statements by chiefs of missions, saying that they cannot think of subjecting a secretary of legation to copying work, and that he ought not to be put to copy. I quite agree in that sentiment, that the secretaries of legation, as they now are, are beyond the age at which it is at all proper that they should be put to copying work; but in an embassy, or in a busy mission, there is a very great deal of work to be done which the secretary of embassy or the secretary of legation can properly do, which he would take off the hands of the chief, and as to which he would assist the chief, but being, of course, always the chief's subordinate, and all the work that he does appearing in the end under the name and under the responsibility of the chief, just as all that is done by an Under Secretary in the Foreign Office appears under the name and under the responsibility of the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. In a great many missions, Sir Henry Elliot has told you, that the staff is larger than is required, if the men are kept really at work. Now Mr. French, who was for a long time in charge of the mission at Madrid, at a most important time, when there was a great deal of the sort of business which occurs at the Madrid mission, has written something very much to the point, and very strong. He says that during the whole of that time he had only the assistance of two gentlemen, "Mr. Ashburnham, attaché, and Mr. Hunt, clerk and assistant" (now this is a clerk who has been used for the general work of the mission) "to get through an amount of work," he says, "such as I have never seen in any other European legation, as it has been daily and without intermission;" and he adds, "two men who work so well, and with such good spirit, are preferable to double the number with less zeal and activity." I heard Sir Henry Bulwer state, the other day, in this room, that during the whole of his career, and in the most important post that he has ever held, and at the busiest time, he has never wanted the assistance of more than two men; and I may say that at Rio, during my busiest time, for all the time which preceded the termination of my career there, during all the negotiations and discussions which ended in the reprisals, I was really assisted only by one attaché.

2670. Mr. Otway.] What was the staff at Rio at that time?—The staff was a secretary of legation, one paid attaché, two unpaid attachés, and then there was a clerk and translator, Mr. Morgan, who was a very old man, but was an invaluable assistant for work, and did all, I may say, of the routine work of the mission, and a great deal of copying beside.

2671. To prevent any misapprehension, may I ask you to explain why you were only assisted by one; did the others decline to assist, or were they incompetent?—The secretary of legation was absent. The gentleman to whom I have referred, and who gave me this assistance, was the paid attaché; one unpaid attaché declined to come down from Petropolis to assist me, on account of his health; and either the other unpaid attaché was away on leave, or there was no appointment at the time.

2672. Chairman.] It would not do at a distant mission to have no reserve force, and to be always working at your highest pressure, I presume?—I am not recommending that the staff should be reduced to one attaché, but my belief is that at Rio all that is wanted is a secretary of legation, with two or three clerks. You may observe in Mr. Thornton's Report from the United States, that he refers to the Rio mission he succeeded me at Rio, and he says: "My experience certainly is that it might be reduced for instance, when I was appointed to Rio de Janeiro, the staff was a first secretary, two second secretaries, and one third." This nomenclature did not exist in my time, but the second secretaries correspond to the paid attachés, and the third secretaries to the unpaid; in my time it was one second secretary and two third secretaries. Then Mr. Thornton adds: "It was certainly more numerous than was necessary, and has perhaps been since reduced." I do not know whether it has been reduced or not.

2673. When you talk of clerks, I understand you to mean gentlemen who have no further hope of promotion to higher grades of the profession, who should be employed in that sort of work which you have described, and never look to rise to the eminent posts of diplomacy; is that so?—Certainly; in the case of a mission like Rio I should not recommend clerks who would look for promotion in the diplomatic profession; but the chief clerk, for instance the clerk corresponding to the clerk and translator whom I had when I was there, and who has since died, or any superior clerk, might be encouraged, I think, with the hope of a consular appointment.

2674. Then to that extent it would be little more than a mere change in name, as I understand?—I do not mean to say that necessarily they should be raised to consuls; that probably would be in rather exceptional cases; but the clerk would be a much more permanent and stationary assistant than attachés, or, as they are now called, secretaries are or can be.

2675. Then you would keep the service alive, as I understand it, rather by employing ultimately timately the services of gentlemen who you ommend should be first introduced as private cretaries; you would keep the current of the rvice going by a supply for the higher branches it from those gentlemen?—No; I think that u might also look to clerks in the Foreign lice as another nursery.

2676. Then you would have an interchange of rvice between the Foreign Office and the plomatic service?—I am not prepared to say at I would have a regular interchange between em in the way of going backwards and for- ards, but I think it would be a very good thing there were inducements held out for clerks in e Foreign Office of ultimately having appoint- ents of responsibility abroad. A diplomatic ppointment in Europe, for instance, would be a ry proper promotion for a Foreign Office clerk. ometimes it is an advantageous move to make ne of the junior Foreign Office clerks a secre- y of legation.

2677. That has been done in former time, not nfrequently, I believe?—I do not remember ny instance at present; it has not frequently een done; I have known a case of a Foreign ffice clerk being sent to be Consul General in ne Sandwich Islands, and another, Mr. Back- ouse, who went to the Havannah; and Mr. ridges Taylor was appointed Consul at Elsinore, nd he was formerly Lord Malmesbury's private cretary; that has not been frequent, I think.

2678. Mr. Kinnaird.] If I understand you ghtly a clerk would render much more assist- nce, and you could give him direct orders to do thing, and such orders as you could not give the same way to a gentleman in the position f attaché?—Certainly, there is a very important ifference, that one feels that one can obtain the ssistance of clerks on different terms from those n which one receives it from attachés who are ent out by the Foreign Office, who depend en- rely on the Foreign Office, who in a distant nd disagreeable mission look to getting away as oon as they can, and who have not any per- anent interest in the legation.

2679. And that clerk being resident, would arry on the traditions of the missions to the ext comer?—Certainly that is a very important oint, and I should like the Committee to allow ne to refer to the terms on which I made that ecommendation in 1861. I recommended then ery strongly that there should be always a per- anent officer at every mission. It was recom- ended also at the same time by Sir Alexander alet, though perhaps less strongly than by ne, and also by one or two others. Some f the Members of the Committee seemed to ke the idea very much, but Mr. Hammond was ery strong against it. I see now that Lord loomfield urges very strongly the necessity of permanent translator at Vienna. You may equire and expect from every member of the iplomatic service a sufficient knowledge of rench to enable him to be a competent trans- tor, but I should say that in every mission here the language of the country is not French, ou ought to have a perfectly competent trans- tor, on whom you can always count; and now ord Bloomfield, writing from Vienna, urges in ne strongest manner the importance of a perma- ent translator at Vienna, mentioning the great nconvenience which he has experienced during ne conduct of important negotiations from the ant of such a person, and from the continual moving of attachés, which renders it impossible for him always to have what he wants. In the same way Lord Cowley spoke before the Committee of 1861, of the great inconvenience that he had experienced in Paris from the want of some one always there. And now I observe that Lord Lyons speaks with great satisfaction of the advantage which he derives from having a permanent officer of that sort. Mr. Atlee is the permanent officer in the Paris embassy; he is registrar and librarian, and gives assistance in all sorts of ways. Now, with reference to a difficulty which I have heard suggested, that such a permanent officer would require leave of absence as attachés do, and want to go away to England, and then how is the work to be done; I should say that it would be very practicable and always desirable to find such a person whose home is on the spot. Mr. Atlee's home is in Paris, and his family live there. Lord Cowley made him first his private secretary; and, ultimately, on Lord Cowley's recommendation, through his interest, he was made an attaché in the service. I may point to him as an instance of a gentleman who, belonging to the middle classes, was selected for a permanent office in a mission, and who continues to enjoy the confidence of the ambassador; and I may mention him as a counterpoise to the instance which I mentioned of the Buenos Ayres clerk, whose appointment, as it appears, has not been quite so fortunate as I had hoped, and believed it to be. The Committee will allow me, perhaps, in support of my recommendation of a permanent officer, to refer to the words in which I expressed myself in 1861. Writing then to Lord John Russell for the information of the Diplomatic Committee of 1861, "I would suggest for consideration whether a plan adopted in some legations of having a permanent officer not belonging to the regular diplomatic service, and variously named clerk or keeper of the archives or registrar or translator, might not be extended and consolidated. There is no legation in which there would not be advantage in the presence of an officer of the class of clerk, or what is called in the French service, 'chancelier,' who, fixed in the country, or not liable to frequent changes of place like the attachés, would be familiar not only with the language, but with the customs of the place; would be well acquainted with the minor officials, and capable of advising a new minister in matters requiring local knowledge, and of settling many questions which only require for settlement a good understanding with police or other authorities; would keep the archives in order among the mutations of minister, secretary, and attachés, and would do much of the work usually done by attachés. There is hardly a foreign capital in which some respectable Englishman, already settled there, might not be found capable of filling such a post, and willing to undertake it for a reasonable salary, even without prospect of advancement. Hopes of advancement might, however, be furnished by occasional promotion to consular appointments. The duties of such officers would, of course, be more arduous and require higher intelligence and education in some missions than in others; where a translator is wanted, the clerk might also be translator, as in the case in the Brazilian mission. There would also be occasional opportunities of promotion of such an officer from one mission to another. Should the payment of all attachés be thought thought of, the number of attachés and the expense attending such a change might be diminished by the organisation of a class of clerks." This clerk has been called very often, I find, keeper of the archives; but there would be no work sufficient to occupy a clerk if it were confind to keeping the archives in most missions. I would have a person who could be useful in various ways, as keeper of the archives, as translator for copying, and for conducting the routine business. And with reference to a former recommendation of mine, that there should be always a residence for a minister, in the main furnished, and with an office, it would of course be necessary that there should be a permanent clerk who would look after the house and the furniture, and who would take care of the archives also, and take care that everything went on right between one minister and another. As to the confidentiality of persons of that sort, I would ask your attention to the persons employed in a large mercantile establishment. There is an honourable Member present, the head of a very great mercantile house, at the head of a very large number of clerks who come from the middle classes and not from the highest social class in England, and I am sure he would say, from his own experience, that he has no difficulty in finding generally gentlemen of honour for mercantile clerks; and I had the satisfaction when in Buenos Ayres of receiving there and of acting with a leading clerk in the house of Messrs. Baring, who was one of the most superior and estimable men that I have ever met with. He went out there as agent to settle the question of the Buenos Ayres loan, and I am sure that he would have made a very good chargé d'affaires there. Mr. White was his name.

2680. Mr. Rylands.] In your last examination, you informed us of the duties which you had fulfilled in connection with the diplomatic service, and stated that you were retired, I think, in 1863, on a pension?—In 1863.

2681. Since that time you have not been employed?—No, I have not.

2682. I believe that in an election address you stated that Lord Russell had endeavoured to make an arrangement for appointing you as minister to Switzerland on your return from the Brazils, but could not then make a vacancy?—Yes, I did state so, and it is perfectly true.

2683. Did that arise from the belief that, from your knowledge and experience in Switzerland, you might fairly expect an appointment to a mission there?—Of course I do not know what motive operated with Lord Russell. I am here in a position in which I always feel that opinions which I may give may be considered as tainted with prejudice. I am a pensioner against my will, and have not been employed for more than six years. I was put upon a pension at a time, and in a manner, and under circumstances which cast a slur, as I consider, upon my character. And wishing to say as little as possible on the subject, but asking for a few moments' indulgence from the Committee, I certainly am anxious to state, as I state very boldly and positively, that whatever may be the public impression (and I pretty well know what that public impression is), my conduct in Brazil, on an occasion which created I may say sensation in England, in calling upon the admiral to order reprisals on Brazilian vessels, was not only approved by the Government, but was approved by Lord Russell, under whom I acted, and whose orders I executed, i the most entire and cordial manner. My retire ment is in no way connected with anythin relating to the manner in which I performed m public duties; and my services, during the whol time that I served, were entirely approved o And as to the conduct of those reprisals, Lor Russell's words to me in private were, when came home, that I had done the right thing, an that I could not have done it better; that I had in respect of conciliation, exceeded my instruc tions, and that both he and the Cabinet though that I deserved great credit for the conciliator manner in which I had replied to the irritating and indeed provoking, notes addressed to me b the Brazilian minister for foreign affairs. I candour I should add, that I had a question a that time with Lord Russell, respecting th secretaries, or some of the secretaries, under m I have always considered (and I should be wan ing in proper courage, I think, if I were not t say here what I have said privately) that I wa ill-used after my return from Brazil. But I d not wish to dwell upon that subject, because am able to say that some 12 months or there abouts after my being put on a pension, I bein in correspondence with Lord Russell, and con tinuing to complain of my not being employed Lord Russell wrote to me that I mistook m position, and that he had desired, when I cam home from Brazil, to appoint me minister i Switzerland, and had asked Admiral Harris to g from there to Brazil, but that Admiral Harri declined doing so, and therefore the matter ha dropped; and he added words which I considered understanding them as I should understand an letter coming from an English nobleman or gen tleman, to mean that I was to look to re-em ployment.

2684. The question which I put to you ha entirely a public bearing; the fact is that yo have been on pension since 1863, and the pur port of my question was to ascertain whethe any circumstance had occurred which woul have enabled the Government of the day to giv you employment and so save the pension; I un derstand that you have not had any such employ ment offered?—I have had none offered m since; Lord Russell did not offer me any em ployment before he ceased to be Foreign M nister in 1865.

2685. And you have not had any offer fro any other Foreign Minister since that time?— have not had any.

2687. You were appointed minister plenipo tentiary on the 2nd September 1859, were yo not?—Yes.

2688. And you remained there until 1863?- I came away in the beginning of 1863, but at th time when I arrived in England I was not quit ripe for a pension, there were still a few month or a few weeks, I think about a couple of month wanting before a service of 15 years from m first commission, which was a commission a agent and consul general at Mosquito, could b made out; and I was informed by Lord Russe that I might look to having a pension as soon a that time of 15 years was completed. I was no put upon the pension until some month in th autumn, and I then received information that had been recommended for a pension on accou

f the discontinuance of the Brazilian mission by ie suspension of diplomatic relations.
2689. Is it your opinion that the rank of our epresentatives at Rio, and the expenses of our iplomatic and consular establishments in Brazil ight be reduced?—I stated that opinion the her day. The Chairman asked me then whether was prepared to go into detail and submit a heme, and I am quite ready to go into detail the matter, and I had indeed intended to ask be allowed at the beginning of my examinaon to-day to complete that part of my evidence.
have made out a memorandum on that subject.
2690. I am asking you about Brazil only, and e had better keep to Brazil for the present;
hat is your view as to Brazil on that question?
-I am of opinion that in Brazil as in Buenos yres, and in some European missions similarly tuated where there is a distinct consular estaishment as well as the mission, the consular tablishment should be suppressed, that is, at it should be merged in the mission; and plying that to Brazil to which I understand ie question refers, a considerable reduction ould be made by carrying out that plan. We ow have a minister there with a staff, and esides that a consul whose salary and allowances e 1,800 l. a year, making a total, I calculate, of 000 l. for the mission and the consulate. The dinary duties of the minister in Brazil (and it the same with the minister in Buenos Ayres)
e, as I stated the other day, duties almost en-rely relating to commerce and to the protection British subjects, and obtaining justice for em in the cases which arise continually, and ey are duties which could be ordinarily lequately performed by an officer of the rank chargé d'affaires and consul general, which I elieve is the highest rank which is really quired for our interests in Brazil; but apart om that, even if the rank of the mission were ot reduced from envoy extraordinary and inister plenipotentiary to a chargé d'affaires id consul general, you might still save a great al of money by suppressing the consular tablishment as a distinct one (and there really no need for two sets of correspondence, one om the consul's office, and the other from the inister's office) and having all the work done der the staff of the minister and under the neral superintendence of the minister, with the d of a secretary of legation, whose duties would such as I have before suggested, and who ould be called on to do more work than secreries of legation now ordinarily are.
2691. Then you would suggest that any conlar work that might arise in the Brazils, and fact in any other similar missions, should be alt with by a sort of consular officer within e mission?—I think that in all missions, hether in South America or in Europe, where e capitals are ports, and where you now have consular establishment distinct from the mis-on, all the work could be done and should be ne by the mission, and that the separate conlar establishment should be suppressed. I ve made a rough calculation by which it ap-ars that in that way you might save from 0,000 l. to 12,000 l. a year. That includes urope as well as South America.
2692. In the case of the Brazils, to which you e now alluding, I see that there is at Rio a consul at 1,000 l. a year, with an additional llowance of 800 l. a year, and a total of 1,823 l.

for consular duties, which in your judgment might be saved by the plan that you would adopt?—I think that there would be a great saving, a saving of from 4,000 l. to 4,500 l. at Rio alone, by carrying out that plan. I was asked the other day about my living in Petropolis, and not having an office at Rio. I may state that in Rio the greatest part of the work was work which went to the consular office, and was done by the consul; there is a large body of permanent residents there, very few visitors travelling through as there are in many European capitals, and really the greatest part of the current work is done by the consul. Now all that might be done by the mission under the immediate superintendence of the secretary of legation, with a clerk under him, or more than one clerk, who might be particularly assigned for consular work.

2693. You do not see any reason why a permanent official in connection with missions at places such as Rio should not attend to consular duties in addition to the keeping of the archives in the mission?—I would have the different subordinates, whether clerks or secretaries, employed by the minister under the minister, in such ways as he thought necessary for the work of the mission.

2694. But it would also appear, from your reply, that you thought there should be a permanent officer in connection with these missions, who, if he were permanent, would naturally, I suppose, be the proper official to deal with questions of a consular character; would not that be your opinion?—If the plan which I strongly recommend, of merging the consular establishment in the mission, were adopted, of course it would be necessary then to employ one or more of those immediately under the secretary of legation in consular work. But at this moment, if things are not changed, the clerk and translator of the mission already assists the minister in copying, as he assisted me; and I find that Mr. Mathew, the present minister in Brazil, talks of his assisting him; and certainly he would have no time to work in the consular office as things are.

2696. Then the same views which you have just expressed would equally apply to European missions similarly circumstanced; take, for instance, Copenhagen; you would say that in Copenhagen a similar arrangement might be made?—I think that there is no consul at Copenhagen; there is a consul at Elsinore, and I do not know the distance of Elsinore from Copenhagen. But there is a consul at Stockholm as well as a minister, and I should certainly say that all the work of the consul there might be

2697. You would of course recommend that in that case the fees for the fulfilment of the consular duties should be paid to the mission?—Of course the consular fees would be paid then to the mission as they are now paid to the consulate. But I would also recommend, and I recommended it in writing before the Committee of 1861, that fees should also be received for similar work in our missions as well as in our consulates. I cannot see any objection to fees being paid in missions for work done as fees are paid in consulates. Mr. Hammond before the Committee of 1861 strongly objected to that as an innovation. He did not state any reason for his objection, but I suppose he thought that it was degrading to ministers to have these fees received. But I do not see why there should be more degradation to a mission in the receipt of fees for passports and for notarial signatures than in having such fees paid to consulates. Other ministers have recommended the same thing; and something might be got in that way towards paying the expenses of a permanent officer, say in missions. I wrote at that time, "The levying of fees at legations, under the authority of the Legislature, for signatures of passports and notarial acts, similar to those authorised to be levied at consulates, would, in many legations, produce a considerable fund, and might meet much of any increase of expense. I was informed, when in Switzerland, that the fees levied in the French chancery at Berne, met the greater part of the expenses of the French legation in Switzerland. There appears to be no reason why passports or signatures, which cost four or five shillings in the consulates of Genoa or Marseilles, should be given for nothing at Turin or Paris. If it is proper to charge the public at consulates, the Government might gain by similar taxes in legations." These fees are paid (indeed such fees are taken in the Foreign Office for passports) by individuals for work that is done for them, and it would be quite understood that the fees did not go into the pocket of the minister, as they do not generally now go into the pockets of the consul, and it would be a customary, and I think a very unobjectionable way of taxing individuals, whether British subjects or foreigners (because foreigners also came to the consulates for work for which fees are taken) for work done.

2698. Have the ministers now in the South American missions control over the consuls in South America within the country to which they are accredited; take, for instance, your own case in the Brazils; had you any control over the consuls who were stationed at the various ports in the Brazils; Bahia, Pernambuco, and several other places where there are consuls or vice-consuls?—I may state that when I went out as minister to Brazil, at the end of 1859, that subject appeared to have attracted the attention of the Foreign Office; I had nothing whatever to do with originating the matter. What had turned their attention to it at that time I do not know; but I carried out with me instructions to the consuls, the object of which was to put them much more under my superintendence than they had ever practically before been in Brazil. The instructions were referred to by me in a letter which I addressed to the Foreign Office before the Consular Committee of 1859. They were to this effect, that the consuls were henceforward to send all their correspondence under flying seal to me, or to send copies of their correspondence to me at the same time that they wrote to the Foreign Office, and that they were to originate no discussions with the local authorities on any subject of importance without first communicating with me. I am anxious to state that I had nothing whatever to do with the origination of those instructions; I took them out with me, and a great deal of trouble arose in carrying them out, and they took the consuls by surprise. It was thought altogether a new thing; there was then a general notion, with which I was acquainted before, that a consul was entirely independent of the minister. Certainly these instructions went entirely against that opinion. A good deal of correspondence took place afterwards between me and some of these consuls and the Foreign Office, and in the end I had no difficulty except with one consul. As regards that consul certainly he did not, when I came away, send his correspondence through me or at all carry out the instructions which he had received; but I am bound to say, and being here as I am I think it right to say, that the fault was in a great measure with the Foreign Office.

2699. Did you complain of the fact with regard to any circumstance connected with the action of that consul?—I have read Sir Henry Elliot's evidence, and I see that he represents the state of things now in Turkey (any representation coming from him, I need not say I do not doubt for a moment is perfectly correct), and he describes a state of things with regard to the subordination of consuls to the ambassador which appears to me to be perfect, and quite right. Certainly that perfect state of things, as described by Sir Henry Elliot in Turkey, did not exist in Brazil, when I ceased to be minister there in 1863. I, of course, can give no information upon the state of things in Brazil since.

2700. But I am asking you for information with regard to your experience in the Brazil and I want to see how your position as minister bore upon the action of the consular representatives of this country, and I asked you, in question to which you have not replied, whether you made any complaint to the Foreign Office in relation to the conduct of any consul or consuls in South America?—I have stated already that there was difficulty to the last with one consul, and further that I am bound to say, and that I think it my duty to say, that the fault was, in my opinion, in a great measure with the Foreign Office.

2701. I want to know whether it was the fault that you complained; I do not wish to have your opinion whether the fault was with the Foreign Office or not, but did you complain of the conduct of any consul in South America?—What I have said I have said deliberately, and with the full expectation that the Committee might wish me to go further, and I am prepared to go further, with reference to the consul to whom I have alluded, and to the circumstances of the case. I did complain of the conduct of Mr. Morgan, the consul at Bahia, in associating himself with railway enterprises and speculations and injuring his position very much by doing so. I had had a long correspondence with nsul on the subject, hoping to persuade him to andon this railway enterprise, and at last, ile this correspondence was pending, for it came a long correspondence, I wrote a letter Lord Russell, which was an unofficial letter, the subject.

2702. Will you merely state the result generally?—I made a compliant, which was immediately attended to, and which, at the moment, d the desired effect, or I believed it would ve, and the matter being thus disposed of, as thought, I terminated the correspondence with e consul. I came home afterwards, on leave r a short time. During my absence he forarded the unfinished correspondence, with a tement of his own. I was at that time at me on leave, being near London, very near, it happened, the assistant under secretary, ho was in charge of the consular service. I ard nothing of this statement which had been nt home by the consul, enclosing the unfinished rrespondence, but I found when I returned to io that he had received a reply to his despatch, forming him that his explanations were satisctory. The consequence was, that he had ain entered upon his railway scheme, and was sy about it. I wrote to him again, trying to plain to him that that statement could not be tended to supersede the order that he had preously received to disconnect himself from the ilway scheme, but I was unable to persuade m to take that view. I then wrote home again, mplaining, hoping, and expecting that things ould be put on their former footing, and that would be ordered to disconnect himself from is railway scheme. That was not done. I came me soon afterwards, and I regret extremely e course which was taken in upsetting the cellent order which Lord Russell had, in the st instance, sent out on my unofficial representation to him. The consequence of it has en most serious, most injurious, to the public terests.

2704. And you believe that it is not to the blic interest that consuls in the South Ameri- n States should be mixed up with operations that kind?—As a general rule I think it is rong; that it is objectionable in calling away a nsul from his duties and mixing him up with ople of the place and giving him pecuniary terests, besides interests of other sorts, for glecting his duties or performing them rongly; and it is objectionable in the same y that it has been held objectionable (and the nsular Committee of 1858 so reported) that nsuls should mix themselves up with trade. has all the same effects as those, indeed some fects more mischievous than those, of a consul's ixing himself up with ordinary commerce.

2705. Has it ever been the practice of the reign Office since you have been in England consult you in reference to South American fairs, taking advantage of your experience ere?—No; I have never been consulted since returned from South America.

2706. There was a case of a very painful character in connection with Paraguay, for instance; I think you were at one time stationed there; were you ever consulted by the Foreign Office in connection with Paraguay?—I was in Paraguay twice; once I went up unofficially to make a sort of reconnaissance, and the next year I went up on a special mission.

2707. And during the recent unfortunate affairs there, were you ever asked by the Foreign Office to give them the benefit of your experience?—No; I have never been consulted on any matter relating to South America, or anything else since I was put upon a pension.

2708. The Committee have before them the reports of Her Majesty's representatives abroad, and I find that amongst them there is a report from the present minister at Buenos Ayres, Mr. Stuart; have you read that report?—Yes, I have read it; I have read the whole volume.

2709. Have you any remarks to make from your experience in respect to the recommendations contained in his report?—I am quite sure that what Mr. Stuart states about the expenses of living in Buenos Ayres is correct. Buenos Ayres was an expensive place when I was there, and has probably become more expensive since; and while recommending economy and believing that economy may be carried out in the way that I have suggested at Buenos Ayres, I should certainly agree with him that the salary of the secretary of legation at Buenos Ayres might be raised and should be raised, and the scheme which I have ventured to sketch out to the Committee would include a higher salary and more work for the secretary of legation.

2710. And in fact it would also include a different arrangement altogether in the mission; you do not recommend that the present staff should be maintained, and that the salary of the secretary should be at the same time increased?—I certainly do not recommend that there should be a mission and a consular establishment both. I think that the minister should be reduced to a chargé d'affaires, as there was during the whole time that Captain Gore represented us there; but if a minister is retained, and he has a secretary of legation, that secretary of legation would be at the head of a staff for consular work as well as diplomatic work, and his salary should be higher than it now is.

2711. I understand that you would cease to have a minister plenipotentiary with a salary of 3,000*l.* a year and additional allowances; that you would make the secretary of legation chargé d'affaires with an increased salary; and that you would have a reduction of the consul's salary and allowances, which are now 1,500*l.* a year?—With regard to reducing the minister to chargé d'affaires, I know the expensiveness of those countries, and I am satisfied that an officer like a chargé d'affaires and consul general is better suited for them than a minister; but I would rather pay a chargé d'affaires more liberally and make his position more comfortable in proportion to the inferior ranks. A chargé d'affaires and consul general would be comfortable with 2,500*l.* a year; a minister is hard put to it with 3,000*l.*

2712. In regard to your appointment to the South American missions, you will probably be able to give to the Committee some information with regard to outfits; there is a discrepancy in the amount of outfit allowed to Mr. Lowther and that allowed to Mr. Forbes, in the one case being being 1,100*l.* and in the other 800*l.*; can you give any explanation of that; what was your outfit allowance when you were appointed to Buenos Ayres?—My attention has been pointed to that question, and I can state exactly what I believe you want. Mr. Lowther was appointed minister to Buenos Ayres, being promoted from the rank of secretary, and he would have received the full scale of outfit, which was 1,100*l.* I was removed from Buenos Ayres, a second-class mission, to Rio, a first-class mission; and according to the rule of the Foreign Office I was entitled to receive two-thirds of the full outfit, namely, 1,100*l.* also. Now there must be some mistake as regards Mr. Forbes, and there may have been a mistake at the time. Mr. Forbes, in the same way, was removed or was named from a second-class mission, Dresden, to Rio, a first-class mission, and his outfit in the same way, according to the rule, would have been two-thirds of the full scale, and would have been 1,100*l.* I see it is stated that he only received and paid back 800*l.*, and I conclude that the mistake was at the time in the Foreign Office, and that they gave him only a half the full outfit. He ought to have had 1,100*l.* when he went to Rio from Dresden, as I received it when I went to Rio from Buenos Ayres. I conclude that it is a mistake, and that the chief clerk of the Foreign Office would set it all right if his attention were called to it.

2713. A matter has been before the Committee upon which you can perhaps give us some information, namely, as to the control of ministers abroad over their subordinates; I should like to know from you whether the present system is, in your judgment, sufficient to enable the ministers abroad to have sufficient control over their subordinates?—That is a subject upon which I speak with reluctance and (I wish to be quite frank with the Committee) with the feeling that any opinions which I may give will be exposed to the suspicion of prejudice. I have stated already I was anxious to state it, and I wish it to be publicly known, that I had trouble with secretaries, and that that alone troubled my career. But you will have before you the opinions of Lord Lyons very unequivocally given, as unequivocally as an ambassador or minister could give them, and of Lord Cowley and others; and there is no doubt whatever that a minister (of course a person like myself, with no advantages of rank or high position, could not have the same advantages that a person like Lord Cowley or Lord Stratford de Redcliffe would have) has not the control over his subordinates which a colonial governor has over his clerks; and I am quite certain that it would be very much better for the efficiency of the service that a minister should be assisted by persons whom he can control and govern, as the Secretary of State at home can control the clerks who are in his office.

2714. We have been told by Mr. Hammond, in reply to Question 42, that if a minister does not report his subordinate on having any ground of complaint, it is his own fault; do you think that that is a fair description of the position that a minister abroad holds in reference to the Foreign Office and in reference to his subordinates?—Mr. Hammond said the same thing, or very much the same thing, before the Diplomatic Committee 1861, when his attention was called to Lord Lyons's very strong statement as to the want of subordination of consuls to the minister in the United States, as he found it then. I am sure that the Members of this Committee will see at once that it must always be a very disagreeable thing for a minister to complain; and certainly my own experience leads me to say that it may bring a minister into serious trouble, for instance, with regard to the case to which I have referred, of the consul at Bahia, of whom I complained with the greatest reluctance; he was the son of one servant of the mission and the father of another servant of the mission in the consulate, of whom I had the highest opinion, and with whom I was on the most friendly and confidential terms, but that brought me into trouble, and I had experience of the disagreeable consequences of doing my public duty in complaining of that consul; you have asked me the question and I have answered it fairly; I heard on the best authority, authority that I could not for one moment dispute (and it is very aggravating for a minister abroad to hear these things), that a gentleman in power at the Foreign Office who had a great deal to do with this case, said that I had a spite against this man, and that all my complaints were from prejudice. I mention that as an instance of the way in which it is disagreeable for a minister to complain, and in which sometimes a minister may be injured, and I say boldly in my case has been injured, by doing his public duty.

2715. But my question had reference more particularly to the management of a mission abroad, and I wanted to know from you whether, in relation to the members of that mission, the present system prevents the chief from having sufficient authority and control over them?—Of course a minister appointed under the present system must take the system as he finds it; but I have no hesitation in saying, and I have already said, that it would be very much better in every way if ministers had more control over their diplomatic subordinates. Sir Henry Elliot has lately spoken of the irregularity in the work which he says is partly the fault of the not very strict discipline over the subordinates. I forget whether he said that in his evidence or in the report.

2717. Do you think that the head of the mission can utilise the secretary of legation to the extent which, in your judgment, would be desirable in order to get full work out of the members of the mission?—It is now the regular practice that the secretary of legation should do nothing except prepare the commercial reports, which have lately been assigned as a special duty to the secretaries of legation. I have a very strong opinion that the assigning of that special duty to the secretaries of legation, in a manner which virtually makes them independent as regards that work of the minister, is not satisfactory, and that it is a mistake. All work of that sort is a proper part of the duty of the ambassador or minister. Of course the amsador or minister cannot do everything him-, but he would assign a great portion of his k of that sort under the usual system, that is ay, under the system which prevails in other artments, to his secretary of legation. I k that those reports should come to the eign Office, and should go forth to the public he reports of the minister, because the minisis the only public servant abroad whom the eign Office knows; and those commercial orts, of course, are most important, and efore I think that they should be prepared the minister employing the secretary of lega-, or anyone else in the staff that he wishes to oloy for the purpose. He would have, of rse, afterwards to read them, alter them, and d them home with his own name and under own responsibility; and in that way they uld be very much better, and more authentic the public. And as regards the training for secretaries derived from that work, their ining would be accomplished in the same way the secretaries got together the materials and pared the reports for the minister to revise l perfect. The secretary of legation or bassy is said by the exponents of the Foreign ice to be in a position analogous to that of the der Secretary. Well, the Under Secretary of rse does a good part of the work of the cretary of State, but his name never appears; that he does goes before the Secretary of ate before it goes forth to the public, and it is ne under his authority; and in the same way colonial governor sends home reports every ar, the greater part of which has been pre-red by the Colonial Secretary, or his sub-linates, but the governor is the responsible rson.

2718. You consider that the work of the office uld all be under the responsibility of the head, d that he should have sufficient control over s subordinates to enable him to completely ilise them?—He should employ them in the ay which he thinks most beneficial for the blic service, and he would assign to the secrery of legation, as his chief officer, the work quiring the most capacity; he would generally disposed to treat the secretary of legation ith the respect due to his character and position;
d things would go on, I think, on the whole, ore satisfactorily if his authority over the secrery was more clearly defined.

2719. And you would expect that, under ecial pressure of work, the head of the mission ould have the power and authority to make use the secretary of legation in such a way as he might think necessary, in order to get through the especial work falling upon the mission?—Certainly.

9 May 1870.

2720. Is it your judgment that altogether, if the head of the mission occupied a higher and more controlling position in relation to his subordinates, the work of the office might be done efficiently, and probably with fewer hands?—Yes, certainly; but that would require assistance of a different class.

2721. But still you would say that if the head of an office has not sufficient control to utilise the services of his subordinates in such a way as he may find at any particular period to be the most useful, the want of that power must interfere very much indeed with efficiency of the subordinates in the office?—Certainly.

2722. With reference to the last question, in order to complete that point, I wish to refer to the despatch of Lord Clarendon in reference to the duties of secretaries, in which he laid down the rule that secretaries of legation should be subordinate to the heads of missions: the exact terms of the despatch, which is dated 1857, are these: "While assigning this specific duty" (that is, the preparation of commercial reports) "to Her Majesty's secretaries of embassy and legation, it is not intended in any way to release them from the superintendence and control of the heads of missions. They will remain, as now, wholly subordinate to their chiefs, and they will report exclusively to them. On the other hand, Her Majesty's Government expect that the heads of missions will give effect to the object which they have in view, by obtaining for their secretaries access to all sources of information by encouraging them by their support and advice, and by pointing out to them the matters to which their attention may most usefully be directed." I wish to ask you whether from your experience you think that those instructions and recommendations are carried out in foreign missions?—There is no doubt whatever that that despatch did express clearly the principle of the subordination of the secretary to the minister with regard to those reports; but there is also no doubt that in many missions it was not so understood, and that it came practically to be a work done by the secretary independently, and there were cases even in which secretaries conceived (but of course they ought not to have done so, for those words are sufficiently clear) that they were independent of the minister as regards those reports. I think you will find that many of the earlier reports were addressed by the secretary of legation direct to the Foreign Secretary; at least they appeared so in print.

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE EDWARD PLEYDELL BOUVERIE, IN THE CHAIR.

The Right Honourable CHARLES Viscount HALIFAX (attending by permission of the House of Lords); Examined.

Viscount Halifax.

2723. Chairman.] YOU have been Secretary of State for India?—Yes, for between six and seven years.

2724. When did you first enter upon that office?—I was President of the Board of Control for two years, 1853 and 1854, and I became Secretary of State for India in the summer of 1859, and remained so till the early part of 1866.

2725. The last transfer of the Persian mission from the Indian Department to the Foreign Office, we have been told, took place in 1859?—Yes. The Committee are probably aware that it had been transferred to the Foreign Office from the Board of Control and the Court of Directors some time in 1834 or 1835, and had remained so till the year 1858. That transfer took place with the entire concurrence of the Court of Directors, a body who, naturally looked mainly to the interests of India. When I became Secretary of State for India, in the summer of 1859, I found that the Persian mission had been transferred in the year before to the India Office. I had a good deal of conversation with Lord Russell, who was then Foreign Secretary, upon the subject, and he and I agreed that there was no sufficient reason for having upset an arrangement which had worked, I believe, to the satisfaction of all parties interested for upwards of 20 years, and as the transfer had been made so recently, we thought it far better to put the mission back on the footing on which it had been ever since the year 1835 or 1836.

2726. As I understand, you had been President of the Board of Control during the period when it was upon that footing?—Yes, for two years; from the autumn of 1852 till the spring of 1855.

2727. And your experience then, as at the head of Indian affairs, was that that arrangement worked satisfactorily?—I never heard any complaint against the satisfactory working of that department under the Foreign Office after the transfer of 1835 or 1836.

2728. Then I understand that upon consultation with the Foreign Secretary you arranged that it should go back, in 1859, to the footing in which it had stood previously to 1858?—Yes.

2729. As being best for the public interest?—Yes.

2730. With regard to Indian interests, as well as with regard to Imperial interests?—I entirely concurred with Lord Russell that it was far better that the direction of the whole of the diplomatic service should be in one hand, rather than in two; and that inasmuch as there is a good deal of connection between Turkey and Persia, and Russia and Persia, the same person who wrote the directions to our ministers at Constantinople and St. Petersburgh should write the directions to our minister at Teheran, on those subjects on which the three countries were interested.

2731. I presume that when you were President of the Board of Control, you were always consulted in reference to all important matters that related to Persian diplomacy?—In all matters in which India might be affected; and, indeed, much more generally than that, because action against Persia must almost certainly take place on the Indian side.

2732. Then I wish to ask you about your experience of the result of the transfer during the seven years subsequently, when you were at the head of the Indian Department; did it work satisfactorily?—Certainly.

2733. You see no ground for transferring it back again to the India Office?—I do not recollect any difficulties of any sort or kind occurring; if I wished a representation made to the Persian government, I wrote to the Foreign Secretary, who made the representation which I desired to the Persian government or to the Persian minister here.

2734. Were you consulted at all with regard to the personnel of the Persian diplomatic corps with a view of suggesting the Indian officers who might be of use there?—I think I was, but I do not remember; I am pretty sure that I gave an opinion ion about the appointment of one Indian ant who was employed in Persia.

735. At any rate, you would have been ready orm an opinion and express one at the request e Foreign Secretary?—Certainly; any request nat kind of course would be a private com- lication to me, and would not appear officially ny way.

736. You are, no doubt, acquainted with Mr. e, who has been a witness here?—Yes.

737. What department had he charge of in office when you were at the head of it?— was the head of the department in which t is called the political correspondence is ied on.

738. The despatches with respect to Persia uld come under his cognizance?—Certainly, the correspondence in reference to Persia as eference to all political matters in India would under the direction of the Secretary of State, letters or despatches on them would be hin the department of which Mr. Kaye is the d.

739. It would not be for him to decide in any y upon questions of policy?—No; the Secre- y of State would consider the question, or it uld be considered by him and the political mmittee of the Council, and then by the uncil, the directions could then be given, and execution of the order so given would be in department of Mr. Kaye.

2740. Neither would he be consulted about y arrangement with regard to the transfer of e business, in one way or the other?—He ght have been consulted by me. I probably ked it over with him, as I should talk it over th the members of the Council, in order to m my own opinion.

2741. I understand, then, your Lordship to y that you still have a very distinct opinion at the arrangement which you made in 1859, the right arrangement, and one which ought continue?—I think that the arrangement ade in 1835, and which was disturbed for a ar only, in 1858, is the best arrangement at can be made, for the reason that I ve mentioned. I think it is far better to have e entire direction of the diplomatic service in e hand. We have had a good deal of double overnment in matters relating to India, and I ink it is far better that the direction should be one hand; and I do not see the least reason suppose that the Indian interests are not suffi- ently represented or taken care of by the Per- an minister appointed by the Foreign Secretary, ho, of course, in all matters connected with ndia, acts very much with the advice and the oncurrence of the Secretary of State for India.

2742. I presume that before that transfer was ade, Lord Palmerston's opinion, too, was ex- ressed, and he approved of it?—Entirely; I do not remember whether any official correspon- ence took place, but certainly Lord Palmerston, ord Russell, and myself, talked it over, and greed that the arrangement which had subsisted or so many years, until 1858, was the best.

2743. Mr. Butler-Johnstone.] Granting that he interests of the whole service are as much aken care of by the Foreign Office as by the ndia Office, the knowledge of Persia would reater in the India Office, no doubt, than in he Foreign Office?—Of course it would.

2745. No doubt, but in dealing with our representatives abroad generally the Foreign Office must act by general rules; they must lay down definite rules for the guidance and the conduct of our representatives generally; if the same rule applies to our minister at Teheran that applies to our ministers in European courts, it may act differently when applied to the one and to the other, may it not?—I certainly never understood that the Foreign Office would direct a man at an Eastern court to behave exactly as he would at an European court, if the Foreign Secretary thought it advantageous that he should not do so.

2746. Some such general rule as this, for instance, might be applied by the Foreign Office, that our ministers abroad should not receive presents from, or give presents to, ministers abroad?—I believe that the same rule applies to Indian officers, and that no Indian officer can receive presents.

2747. No minister in Persia can, by the rule of the Foreign Office, receive or give presents, can he?—I do not know how that may be as to the Foreign Office.

2748. It is, as a matter of fact, the rule of the Foreign Office, but it was not the rule of the India Office, was it, when Persia was under that office?—I do not know that it was.

2749. It might be advisable, in the opinion of people acquainted with Indian matters, to adopt that practice in dealing with such a semi-civilised court as Persia, and that would depend upon the nature of the Persian government?—If the Secretary of State for India was of opinion that it was desirable that it should be done in any particular case, he would make a representation to the Foreign Secretary. Whether he would comply with it I cannot say; the question never arose in my time.

2750. The case never arose when you had to consider whether it would be a good thing to give presents?—I never recollect a case, in which a recommendation was made to me by a private individual even, that presents should be made.

2751. You were at the India Office when Persia was transferred to the Foreign Office?—I was at the India Office in the year 1859, when we re-transferred to the Foreign Office from the India Office the mission in Persia, which had been for 20 years and upwards under the Foreign Office, and had remained so with the exception of only a short time.

2752. Sir Henry Rawlinson was our minister at Teheran at the time?—Yes.

2753. And he resigned immediately after the transfer?—Yes.

2754. And he stated his reasons for resigning?—Not to me.

2755. He made no representations to you upon his resignation, but to the Foreign Office?—Not to me.

2756. In dealing with Persia, and sending Viscount Halifax.

12 May 1870.

ministers out there, would not a more competent set of men be found among those of Indian experience than among those in the staff of the Foreign Office of European experience?—That very much depends upon circumstances.

2757. In your Lordship's opinion is not a knowledge of Indian experience rather an indispensable condition in dealing with a country like Persia in the employment of people out there, or do you think that is not so?—I do not think it indispensable. In dealing with the Turks, for instance, we are dealing with an Oriental nation. I do not know that there is much difference from the character of the governments of the two. The amount of political service in India now is very much less than it was; I mean political service as separated from our administration of provinces under our control.

2758. You do not think that public interests would be advanced by the employment exclusively of people of Indian experience in Persia?—No; I think it very desirable that there should be in Persia a person, supposing such a person could be found, with a certain knowledge of Indian matters; but I do not think it at all indispensable.

2759. Sir Charles Wentworth Dilke.] I believe that India has considerable relations of a diplomatic kind with Affghanistan?—The diplomatic relations have very much ceased of late years. Since the Affghan Expedition our policy has been not to have a minister or representative of either England or India resident in Affghanistan. The only person in Affghanistan who is at all employed, is a man called a news writer, a person of a very inferior description, who has no communication with the Ameer.

2760. During the negotiations in Lord Lawrence's time, native envoys were employed, or persons who were practically envoys, were they not?—As far as I remember, their position hardly amounted to the dignity of an envoy; but at any rate, whatever it was, and I do not remember at this moment who the people were, it was only for a time. There has been no permanent diplomatic communication or resident in Affghanistan since the Affghan War. It was Dost Mahomed's particular wish that there should not be, thinking that the residence of an English envoy at Cabul might lead to quarrels between the two countries, and Sir John Lawrence was entirely of the same opinion.

2761. I was not speaking of strict relations, but I should like to ask your Lordship whether you do not think that there are likely to be considerable relations practically of a diplomatic kind between India and Affghanistan in future?—Certainly.

2762. And therefore the necessity for putting India under the Foreign Office, which would be founded on the Foreign Office having relations with Russia and with Turkey as neighbours of Persia, would also apply, would it not, to India having relations with Affghanistan, also a neighbour of Persia?—No, I do not think that the same reasons apply to Affghanistan as apply to Persia.

2763. Might I ask on what grounds?—Persia has a settled government, at least a so-called settled government, and is a comparatively large country, with which we have had permanent diplomatic relations for many years. Affghanistan is a country very much divided against itself; one hardly knows from year to year what the state of Affghanistan will be; and my opinion, which was Sir John Lawrence's too, is that it is far better to abstain from any permanent diplomatic relations with Affghanistan, and to rest upon being able to do whatever we may think may be necessary at the time and under the existing circumstances; and in point of fact during the whole time that I was at the India Office, that was the footing on which we stood with regard to Affghanistan.

2764. Mr. Rylands.] I think I understood your Lordship to say, in reference to the point under the notice of the Committee, that you objected to double government, and thought it was far better that the diplomatic service should be in one hand?—I think so.

2766. But with this difference, I think, that supposing that any question of Persian diplomacy having reference to Indian interests to arise, that question, in the first instance, would be considered by the Indian Department in conjunction with the Foreign Department, before the minister in Persia received his instructions?—It seems to me to be precisely the same case as if a question arose between Canada and the United States. In all probability the Colonial Secretary would communicate with the Foreign Secretary before any instructions were given to our minister at Washington to act in any matter concerning the interests of Canada.

2767. But we have been told that a very large proportion of questions connected with Persia have reference to Indian interests, rather than to European interests; I daresay your Lordship will not dispute that?—There are a great number of questions between Persia and Turkey, in which India has no interest at all. With regard to the other great power to which I have alluded, namely, Russia, no doubt the action of Russia upon Persia may materially affect India; but it is hardly an Indian interest, as apart from the interest of this country, because if Russia was to assail India in any way, of course it would entail a war with this country, as well as with India.

2768. But in relation to questions upon which the opinion of the India Office might fairly be taken as most important, we have been told that a very considerable proportion of the questions having reference to Persia are of that character; that the India Office is appealed to in reference to their settlement?—I do not think that there are any of those of very great importance; certainly none in which the directions from the Foreign Secretary would not be quite as effective as directions given by the Secretary of State for India.

2769. But might it not be the case that the Foreign Secretary might not have the same amount of information in connection with Persian questions as the Secretary of State for India had, and that in consequence there might be a difference of judgment in regard to the directions given to the minister in Persia?—I can hardly conceive that; because the Foreign Minister inister would be hardly likely to give any rections to the minister in Persia on any ques- ns connected with India, unless he had agreed th the Secretary of State for India as to what e directions should be.

2770. Then you would not be disposed to an- ipate that the Foreign Office would refuse to fer to the opinion of the India Office in cer- n questions affecting the Persian mission upon ich the India Office and the Foreign Office fered?—In that case the question must be re- red to the Prime Minister or to the Govern- nt, and the decision of the Government must decisive for both.

2771. We have been told that within a recent riod questions have arisen in which there has en a difference between the Foreign Office and e India Office, and that in consequence of the al government, as it was described, which at esent exists, there has been considerable delay d difficulty in the settlement of those ques- ns; what is your Lordship's view on that tter?—All I can say is, that I never remem- r such a case occurring during the time that I s Secretary of State for India.

2772. I noticed that in reference to your ex- rience at the Board of Control, your Lordship ted that if you wished to make any represen- ion with regard to the Persian mission to the reign Secretary, you would do so, and no ubt the Foreign Secretary would act in accor- nce with that representation; that accords th your last answer, that there was no diffi- lty between those two departments of State? I never remember any; I do not believe that the two Secretaries of State are men of sense, d will take the trouble of talking to each ner, there will be any difference between em.

2773. With reference to the diplomatic service ing in one hand, are you prepared to say that nere there is a special character in the kind of lomacy required, such as there is in the case Eastern nations, it is desirable that that should in the same hand with a diplomatic service of entirely distinct character as it exists in uropean and constitutional countries?—I think far better that the whole diplomatic service ould be in the hands of the Foreign Secretary. think the Secretary of State for India has ite enough to do in managing the affairs of dia and its relations with immediately coter- nous countries, Affghanistan and other coun- es similarly situated.

2775. And we have been told that the aracter of the courts in India resembles very uch the character of the court in Persia, and at therefore the diplomatic action in Persia ght to take the same form as the diplomatic tion in the courts of India connected with the dia Government; is that your Lordship's inion?—I do not think that the relations be- veen any of the native courts in India with the dian Government very much resemble the lations of the court of Persia with the Indian overnment.

2776. But the question is as to the mode of eating these courts, an Eastern court requiring different kind of diplomacy from an European ourt; and we have been told that the course of iplomatic action in Persia is of the same nature in most important particulars as the kind of action which the Indian Government has to take in reference to native Indian courts?—It seems to me, if that be so, that it would lead to the appointment of another Foreign Secretary who would direct the diplomacy with all Eastern courts, Turkey, Egypt, Persia, China, Siam, and other Eastern nations.

2777. I am asking your Lordship particularly in reference to Persia, because on that matter the Committee have had some very important evidence from Sir Henry Rawlinson, and I think you will agree that Sir Henry Rawlinson's position and character and experience justify the Committee in paying attention to his recommendation; he states very distinctly that the principles of diplomatic action as applied to the court of Persia are very different indeed from the course of diplomatic action with European courts; and if you will allow me, I will read a portion of his despatch, and ask your Lordship's opinion about it. It is a despatch, stating the circumstance under which he retired from the position of minister in Tehran; he says, "In the first place I find myself taken out of the line to which I belong, and attached to a department on which I have no claim, and with the regulations and traditions of which I am comparatively unacquainted; and, secondly, I am required to observe certain principles of action as established for the general guidance of Her Majesty's diplomatic service, which I conscientiously believe to be inapplicable to Persia, and to be incompatible with the acquisition or retention of influence at this court;" and on those two grounds, that he found himself "taken out of the line" to which he belonged, and that he could "no longer indulge a hope of being able to serve" in the country either with credit to myself "or with advantage to the Government," he took the first opportunity of resigning; that is a very strong opinion; is your Lordship still inclined to say that there is not that great difference in the diplomatic action in Persia, as compared with European countries, that would lead to any difficulty on the part of a representative of this country there who was under the Foreign Office?—I am not at all prepared to say that the action of a minister at a perfectly despotic court is the same as it is in a constitutional monarchy; but I am prepared to say that a person may, without previous knowledge acquired in India, be the most proper person to deal even with a despotic court; knowledge is not all that is required in dealing with such courts.

2778. And you still think that the fact of the judgment of the Foreign Department, with their traditions, having arisen out of their experience of European courts, does not render it undesirable that they should control under similar regulations the representative at an Eastern court like Persia?—It is not true, I conceive, that the only experience of the Foreign Office is in dealing with constitutional or European courts. As far as the tradition and experience of the Foreign Office, handed down from one Secretary of State to another, goes, they have had to deal with a great number of Eastern nations, as well as European, and it seems to me that the knowledge that has accumulated in the Foreign Office would apply both to the one and to the other.

2779. But the experience of the Foreign Office has mainly reference to the action of European Viscount Halifax.

12 May 1870.

European diplomacy, which occupies a different position from that of Eastern diplomacy?—No doubt; but there are traditions for dealing with barbarous, or semi-barbarous, nations as well.

2780. Sir Henry Rawlinson states that the regulations of the Foreign Office are not applicable to our mission there; that, I think, you do not agree with?—I do not agree with Sir Henry Rawlinson in that respect.

2781. Sir Henry Bulwer.] What I understand you to say is this, that the concentrating of the power of the Foreign Department in the hands of one person does not prevent that person from employing a different system, and appointing a different sort of person at those places where it may be necessary to do so?—I do not conceive that it at all follows, because the direction of affairs is in one hand, that the same descriptions of person should be appointed to all places, or that the same system should be applied in all cases, however different the circumstances may be.

2782. And then I understood you also to say, that if the minister for India had under his orders and direction a minister in Persia, there might be different European questions in which a European ambassador might have to act, and in which he would feel embarrassed if he had to refer to another minister than the one under whose department he was: for instance, many questions, as you have observed, arise between Persia and Turkey; we are interested in those questions, inasmuch as we wish to preserve peace between Persia and Turkey: supposing that I am ambassador at Turkey, and that I am questioned whether I will interfere in a particular manner to make up a quarrel, if I know that I am under the same authority as the minister in Persia, I feel that I can act without any other reference than to my own minister, whose policy I generally know; but supposing I was to feel that I was not able to act without reference to the policy in India of the Indian Government, I then should feel more embarrassed in taking a decided part; I think that is what I understood you to mean?—I think it is more likely that there would be entire accordance between the directions given to the ministers in the different countries if they proceeded from the same source. In point of fact, that was the reason why the Persian mission was transferred to the Foreign Office, and that is the reason why, in my opinion, it ought to remain under its guidance.

2783. Diplomatic agents acting under the Foreign Office might have to interfere in questions relating to India, and they can do so much more easily and more readily if the Persia mission is under the same direction as themselves, than they could if it were under a separate direction?—Our minister at Persia must on many occasions communicate with the Russian minister, the French minister, and the Turkish minister. The conduct of those ministers would be guided by the directions from their own courts, which may more or less be influenced by the action of our ministers at those courts, and then there will be a greater accordance, I think, between the conduct of our ministers in all four courts (Russia, Turkey, Persia, and France) if the directions to our ministers there proceed from the same source.

2784. That does not imply at all necessarily that you are to pursue the same system in Persia, or that you are to have the same sort of agent there as in other courts?—Certainly not. My opinion is simply this; that the guidance of a great department is far better in one hand than in two.

2785. You do not mean to say by that, that the same system is in every case to be pursued because it is all under one minister?—No, of course not.

2786. Viscount Barrington.] Your Lordship agreed that there is a difference in their diplomatic action between European courts and Eastern courts; in the East we have been given to understand the system of presents is frequently carried out between the minister and the court to which he is sent: are we to understand that you disapprove of that system of giving presents in regard to Persia?—It is a question which I have never had to consider.

2787. But Sir Henry Rawlinson retired upon that question?—In India presents are given and returned. It is a matter of bargain. If the Governor General meets a native prince, it is a matter of bargain beforehand what presents each should give; they are always supposed to be of about equal value. The public pays for the presents given to the native prince, and the present made to the Governor General is put into the public Treasury and sold for the benefit of the public.

2788. But was not there some reduction made in that respect at the time that Sir Henry Rawlinson gave up his appointment?—Not that I know of.

2789. If such reduction were made, would it not be likely to place this country in a less advantageous position than other countries continuing that practice in Persia?—For 24 years preceding Sir Henry Rawlinson's appointment, the mission in Persia was conducted under the management of the Foreign Office. Therefore any advantage which could occur under the system which he seems to have recommended must have taken place during the very short time that he was there. Whether he wished to make any presents and was debarred from doing so, I do not know.

2790. You do not know whether, supposing any such reduction to have been made by the Foreign Office, that would place us in regard to Persia in a less advantageous position than other courts?—The Committee will see that for 24 years before Sir Henry Rawlinson went to Persia the mission was under the Foreign Office; and their regulations consequently would, I presume, have applied during those 24 years. If they were debarred from making presents before that time, they would be debarred afterwards. I never heard that a change was made when Sir Henry Rawlinson was appointed.

2791. Mr. Otway.] I wish to ask your Lordship one question with reference to the question which has just been asked you by Lord Barrington, and the answer which you gave with regard to the presents; your Lordship stated that it was a matter of bargain between ourselves and the princes in India; but you do not mean by that to state that although the giving of presents is a matter of no importance to the Anglo-Indian functionary, inasmuch as he has to return them and they go to the public Treasury, it is not a matter of considerable importance to the Eastern who receives them and does not return them to any public treasury, reasury, but retains them?—During my period of office I have never had to consider the question of a present being made to the sovereign of an entirely foreign country, as, for instance, the Shah of Persia; on that question I have given no opinion at all. I was asked what my experience was of the system of giving presents; that experience is entirely confined to presents given within Indian bounds, and there, as I said, it is a matter of bargain between the two sides what the present shall be. The public treasury pays for one and receives the other.

2792. I wish to ask your Lordship's opinion on this matter, whether this giving of presents is not a matter of very great importance to an Eastern court; the value of them to the potentate, or to the minister who is to retain them, may be of very considerable importance, and therefore the withdrawing of a custom of that kind would affect the influence of a representative, would it not?—I am not at all aware that the custom is withdrawn. In point of fact, the answer which I gave just now pointed to the impossibility of an established custom having been withdrawn, inasmuch as the Persian mission had been under the Foreign Office for 24 years before Sir Henry Rawlinson was appointed. If it is the rule of the Foreign Office that under no circumstances shall presents be given, I apprehend that the rule applied during that period of 24 years. I should be disposed to believe that if the Foreign Secretary conceived that it would be for the interests of this country that presents should be made, he would give directions for its being done; but what the fact is I cannot say.

2793. Mr. Butler-Johnstone.] As a matter of fact, when you were at the head of the India Office, were you frequently consulted by the Foreign Secretary as to filling up vacancies in the personnel of our diplomatic agents generally in Persia?—Not frequently, because I do not remember more than one vacancy at most; but there was one appointment, the employment of one officer, on which I certainly was consulted.

2795. However desirable it may be to put the whole of our diplomatic action in the hands of one man, the Foreign Secretary, do not you think it is desirable that Indian experience should be brought to bear upon the Foreign Office in dealing with these matters in Eastern courts?—That is effectively done by the knowledge which the Secretary of State for India has at his command, and, acting upon which, he recommends to the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, or requests the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, to act in such a way as he thinks desirable.

2796. If he is only consulted once in five years by the Foreign Secretary, that Indian experience is not of much use to him?—I understood you to ask me whether I had been consulted about the personnel of the diplomatic service in Persia, and my answer was that I did not think there were frequent occasions for my being consulted on the personnel.

2797. Were you frequently consulted in other matters of Persian policy besides the personnel?—Whenever any question arose in which Indian interests could be supposed to be involved, I was, as a matter of course, consulted; and more than that, upon almost every question connected with Persia or affecting the neighbourhood of India, the probability was that the Foreign Secretary would have consulted me, and that we should have talked the matter over together before any orders were executed.

2798. Mr. Eastwick.] You have said that it is desirable that all our foreign relations should be under the superintendence of one department; now is that a matter of theory only; and in case, in practice, injurious effects were found to result, would you still maintain that theory against the practical results?—I should not be prepared to maintain a theory which was proved in practice to be deficient; but it must be very clearly established that the injurious effects arose from the concentration in one hand of the direction of the diplomatic service.

2799. Is it not the fact that the Persian War took place while Persia was under the Foreign Office?—Yes, certainly; when the Persian War broke out Mr. Murray was minister in Persia.

2800. And Mr. Murray was an European officer; he went to Persia without a knowledge of the Persian language, and without a knowledge, except what he had acquired in Egypt, of Oriental people?—He was one of those persons employed under the Foreign Office who happened to have had special experience in dealing with Orientals, calling the Egyptians Orientals, which practically they are.

2801. With regard to the Oriental character of Turkey and of Egypt, as compared with the Oriental character of Persia, I would ask your Lordship, in the first place, is it not the fact that in Turkey and in Egypt, particularly in Turkey, there is an immense population of Christians, or of non-Mahommedans at all events, whereas in Persia there are no non-Mahommedans comparatively, with the exception of a few Armenians, and a very few Parsees, or fire worshippers?—I do not see that the existence of a large Christian population in Turkey affects the official members of the Government, who, I believe, are exclusively Turkish.

2802. But it might affect the Government in other ways: for instance, it might induce European Powers to interfere much more largely in the government of Turkey: for instance, Russia interferes, and France also, very much, on account of the Christian population, and there is no such ground of interference in Persia?—No; but the mere fact that there is a Christian population in Turkey would not render a Christian minister more able to deal with Turkish officials than if there were none.

2803. I will come to that point directly; but, at all events, there would be much greater ground, I presume, for interference, and for bringing Turkey into the circle of European diplomacy: in point of fact, the Crimean War and other wars were very much owing to interference with reference to the Christian population?—With reference to the Turkish government, that has been within the pale of diplomatic action for the last 300 or 400 years, quite independently of the amount of Christian population in Turkey.

2804. But Persia has not been within that pale for anything like that time?—No.

2805. With regard to the officials in Turkey, is it not the fact that most of them speak the French language; that, in point of fact, you can converse with the Grand Vizier in French, and that the French language is very much used in Viscount Halifax.

Turkish diplomacy; that the character of the Government is very much less Oriental than that of the Persian Government, and that the heads of the Government have actually visited European capitals?—Yes, no doubt.

2806. The Viceroy of Egypt, for example, has continually visited Europe, and adopts very much European manners in many respects?—Certainly.

2807. That is not at all the case in Persia; the Shah has never left his own dominions; the population is entirely Mahommedan, with the strongest possible Mahommedan prejudices, and you must conduct the business there in the Persian language?—Yes, I believe so, though I am not personally informed on that subject.

2808. Then your Lordship said that there is considerable business in Turkey connected with Persia: now I would like to ask your Lordship what questions there are between Persia and Turkey?—There was a question which lasted for some time about the boundary. I think there were also some questions about the country on the lower part of the Euphrates, and I think a question as to some matter in the neighbourhood of Erzeroom.

2809. The question with regard to the boundary is now settled, is it not?—I believe so.

2810. I think Sir Henry Elliot, our present ambassador at Constantinople, has said that it was only a small portion of the correspondence from there which had reference to Persia?—Of course it would be a very small portion as compared with the other interests in which this country deals with Turkey.

2811. In point of fact the Persian correspondence with reference to India is very extensive, is it not, much more considerable than that with reference to Turkey or Russia; that is to say, that Indian questions, questions connected with India, occupy a much greater portion of the correspondence of the Persian mission than Turkish or Russian questions?—My answer to that question must a good deal depend upon how far questions between Russia and Persia are considered merely as Indian questions. I do not consider them so at all; and I should think that the correspondence upon questions connected with India, excluding Russian and Turkish matters, would not be very great as compared with those in which Russia and Turkey were concerned.

2812. But supposing that it could be shown that, we will say nine-tenths of the whole correspondence, had reference to India, and that only one-tenth had reference to Russia and Turkey, would not your Lordship then be inclined to think that the management of our Persian relations had better be under the Indian Office?—No, I do not think that the question of who are the best people to manage our diplomatic relations at Teheran entirely or mainly depends upon what the questions are.

2813. I believe I am right in saying that the ministers in Persia, and the greater part of the staff, have been Indian officers, with the exception of Sir Charles Murray and Mr. Allison?—I think they have. If I remember right, one of the most serious differences with the Persian court arose under Sir Henry Wilcock, an Indian officer.

2814. It did not come to an actual rupture?—No. Nor should I be prepared to admit that the rupture in the time of Sir Charles Murray was owing to his not being an Indian Officer.

2815. Is there anybody on the staff at the Foreign Office with any acquaintance with Persia, who can speak the language, or who knows the feelings and customs and habits of the people?—That is a question that I am not competent to answer.

2816. At all events your Lordship can answer this, whether at the India Office there are such persons?—Yes, some.

2817. The Council of India, of course, contains some such persons; Sir Henry Rawlinson, and Sir Bartle Frere, and others?—There are a number of Indian officers who are conversant with the questions which may arise between India and Persia; they have a knowledge of them.

2818. At the Foreign Office then they would be ignorant of the state of feeling in Persia and of the state of feeling in the Persian Government, except they got it at second hand; whereas the India Office would probably know it at first hand?—Take Sir Bartle Frere; I do not know that Sir Bartle Frere has any knowledge of the court of Persia or the state of feeling in Persia. He was governor of Bombay, and knows what business arises between the Bombay merchants, for instance, and the merchants of the Gulf of Persia; but he has no knowledge of the Persian court, and I do not even know that he speaks Persian.

2819. We will take Sir Henry Rawlinson and Sir George Clerk?—Sir Henry Rawlinson was at Teheran, and therefore he knows the language. Sir George too, probably, speaks Persian, because he is an old Indian servant.

2820. He has been employed on the frontier, has he not?—He has never been employed beyond the boundaries of India, I think. Take Sir George Clerk and Sir Bartle Frere; on any question which arose about Persia and India, of course the Secretary of State for India would consult Sir George Clerk and Sir Bartle Frere and probably other persons, and he would get thus a competent knowledge of what the Indian interests and views were with regard to the question, and he would make up his mind upon the information so derived, and thereupon communicate to the Foreign Secretary, and the despatch written by the Foreign Secretary would probably be in accordance with the views derived from that communication.

2821. But with reference to the double government, is it not the fact that the resident at Bushire is an Indian officer; that the resident at Bagdad is the Indian officer; that the resident at Bushire is under the orders of the Indian Government; that he takes considerable action in connection with the Indian Government: that lately he has taken action with reference to the Island of Bhrein, and that there are a number of other officers employed in Persia who are entirely under the Indian Government?—I am not at all prepared to deny that there are a great number of anomalous cases in the Persian Gulf, the Red Sea, and the eastern coast of Africa. All that was very much under the Indian Government, and it has only been changed to a certain extent.

2822. But if there were a variety of semi-commercial questions which were not merely diplomatic questions, as in point of fact there are, and if there are a number of Indian officers, namely, all those employed upon the telegraph, the e resident at Bushire and other civil officers, e native news writers and any officers who ight be sent, and who were sent formerly to scipline the troops, under the Indian Govern- ent, while only the minister at Teheran, and rhaps the consul at Tabreez, would be under e Foreign Office, it is quite clear that there ould be a double government after all, would ere not?—One hardly applies the term "dou- le government" to the action of a resident at a nall place. It may be a double action to a rtain extent.

2823. Would you not give considerable weight the fact that the Viceroy of India has stated at it is almost impossible for him to carry on ffairs in India, unless Persia is placed under the ndia Office?—I am not aware of that; it as not so stated during the time that I held ffice.

2824. But supposing that to be the case, your ordship would give weight to it, I presume?— t would weigh with me very much. I am not t all prepared to say that I would give way to t without knowing more of the grounds on which he opinion is formed.

2825. Your Lordship would attach weight to he opinion of the Council of India, I presume? —Certainly.

2828. Would your Lordship attach weight to the fact that, owing to Persia being under the Foreign Office, and consequently our dealings with Persia not being so well known as if it was under the India Office, there are continual false statements and exaggerated rumours in the Indian press, with regard to the employment of the Persian troops, and the action of the Persian Government?—No, I do not attach any weight to that. I am strongly of opinion that the Govern- ment in India should have as little to do beyond its own frontiers as it can possibly have. It has quite enough to do within them, and the less it meddles beyond, the better.

2829. Then your Lordship would not consider the feelings of the people of India at all in the matter, that is to say, supposing that the feeling of the population of India, and the intelligent feeling, the feeling of the press of India, was in favour of the transfer, your Lordship would attach no weight to that?—I said that I did not attach weight to the rumours to which your ques- tion referred.

2830. You think that they would not be liable to excite and disquiet the population, and per- haps even lead to ruptures?—I do not believe that they would be less disquieted if our minister in Persia was under the direction of the Secre- tary of State for India.

2831. But if it could be shown that rumours of that kind were less disseminated when our Persian mission was under the India Office than when it has been under the Foreign Office, you would attach some weight to that circumstance then?—If it could be proved that the rumours were more circulated and more believed because, and only because, it was under the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, there might be some ground for giving weight to that circumstance; but that is putting a hypothetical case, which I do not believe to be the fact.

2832. Then, I would ask, is it right that those who pay for a mission should have the direction of it or not?—I think that India pays far too highly towards the Persian mission now.

2833. In point of fact it does pay much the largest portion of the expenses?—Yes; that was not intended when the transfer was made, but I hear that it turns out that it is so.

2834. But that being the case, would you not say generally that those who pay for a depart- ment should have the principal part in the admi- nistration of it?—I always thought it perfectly fair that the payment should be, as I always hoped and expected it would be, about half-and- half, and it is only quite recently that I have learnt that the payment by this country is a very small proportion of the cost of the Persian mis- sion.

2835. Of course you would apply that not only to the mission, but all the other expenses con- nected with Persia, the telegraph and the officers for the telegraph, the resident at Bushire, and the rest?—I am not so sure about the residents at the small places, because they are the remains of a former state of things; and with regard to the steamers running up and down the Persian Gulf and Euphrates, I think it is very de- sirable that there should be an officer at Busso- rah to look after that; but that is a different thing from diplomatic action. The telegraph is a matter which has been established by the Indian Government; I do not put the telegraph and the packet communication on the same foot- ing as diplomatic action on matters of political interest.

2836. You think that the expense of the diplo- matic part ought to be halved between the two departments?—Yes.

2837. Mr. Baring.] Did I rightly understand you that you consider that the Government of India is so distinct from our policy with regard to the neighbours of India, that it has enough to do in its own government and ought not to take any interest in what the policy of this country is with Persia or its neighbours?—No, I did not say anything of that kind; what I said was that I thought that the Government of India had enough to do in managing its own affairs, and those of the immediately coterminous states, and that the communication with the states be- yond it ought to be directed by the Foreign Office, and not by the India Office.

2838. But we have communication with the Government of India, I suppose?—Of course; but that is the practice now.

2839. You do not suppose that it is quite in- different to the Government of India what the directions of the Foreign Office are to its representatives in courts in the neighbourhood of India?—I have stated exactly the reverse, namely, that all those questions were considered by the India Office, and their opinions communicated to the Foreign Office, and the orders sent to the agents of the Foreign Office were practically agreed upon by the two Secretaries of State.

2840. I thought that your answer was that the less the Government of India had to do with any communication beyond its own territories the better?—As the Government of India, I mean to say that the less the Governor General has to do with questions beyond India the better. Take the case of China; there has never been any question of an Indian officer being sent to China, and yet the interests between India and China are many times as great as those between India and Persia.

2841. There is a great idea that the action of the Foreign Office produced the war in Affghanistan without the concurrence of the Indian Government; is that well founded?—The fact is that the order going out from this country to undertake the war, crossed on the road the letter from Lord Auckland announcing that he had determined on it..

2842. Mr. Eastwick.] With regard to the case of China, the interests between India and China are only pecuniary?—Commercial.

2843. But the interests between India and Persia are political, are they not?—Yes, as well as commercial to some extent.

2844. Is it not the fact also that the language and the customs and the habits of the Chinese are altogether different from the language, customs, and habits of the Indian people?—Clearly.

2846. Is it not the fact, that the Indian Government has external relations with all the countries on its frontier, and that it does send envoys to them; that, for instance, an envoy has now gone just lately to Yarkund, in Turkestan, and that we have also sent officers into Thibet and into Burmah; that lately we had an officer at Khelat, and that we have had envoys at Affghanistan; so that in the whole circle of countries bordering on India, there has been a diplomatic action on the part of the Indian Government?—I am not quite sure whether the person sent to Yarkund is sent in the character of an envoy or not. No doubt there must be constant communications with the countries immediately contiguous to India. But I think that the practice of having a resident envoy has been very much discontinued. There may be one at Burmah, but if so I think that that is the only country in which there ever has been, for many years past, a resident envoy.

2847. Does your Lordship think it desirable, in a political point of view, that Persia should be drawn into European diplomacy, rather than placed the other way within the pale of Indian diplomacy; I mean with reference to the interference of the great European Powers, is it for our interest that that interference should be encouraged or discouraged?—If you could surround Persia with a wall of brass, and exclude the action of all European Powers upon it, no doubt that would be much better for us and for India; but in practice you cannot do that, and you cannot exclude the action of European Powers upon it. I think it is best that our minister in Teheran should be equal to cope with the ministers of the other European powers who are resident there; and I think that, upon the whole, that object is more likely to be attained by having a minister under the Foreign Office there than by having an Indian servant sent from India.

2848. Mr. Otway.] Your Lordship has expressed an opinion as to the desirableness of restricting the action of the Government in India within its own limits; but is it possible to do so, or rather is it not impossible to do so?—It has been done to a considerable extent. Take Affghanistan; no resident envoy has been there for many years. If any communication has to be made, a person is specially sent on one side or the other, and we have not had any diplomatic resident in Affghanistan for many years past. I do not at this moment remember, but I do not think that there is a resident envoy of the Indian Government in any of the external countries. There may be one at Burmah, but I am not quite sure.

2849. But I take the existing questions; take, for instance, these frontier questions; take the question of Khelat; now supposing that the Viceroy of India has made a treaty with the Khan of Khelat, binding him to certain action on certain conditions, and supposing that those conditions are likely to arise in consequence of the action of Persia, how would it be possible in such a contingency to restrict the action of the Indian Government, and would not any action of necessity which took place then be exclusively action on the part of the Indian Government if it is to be forcible action?—Take that particular case; supposing the Persian Government were disposed to act towards the Khan of Khelat in a manner which would render interference on the part of the Indian Government necessary from the treaty which has been made with the Khan of Khelat, it would be the business of the Secretary of State for India to represent to the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs that such was the state of affairs, and that he must desire our minister at Teheran to represent, in the strongest possible way, to the Shah of Persia what the consequences of any such action on his part would be.

2850. But supposing that the conditions of the treaty, which no doubt are well known to your Lordship, to be such as to require action, and that the treaty was one made by the Viceroy of India, and not a treaty made by the foreign minister of this country, surely in that case the Indian Government must of necessity take action, and you could not possibly restrict it in its honourable fulfilment of the treaty. If the Indian Government had a treaty with a frontier chief, that being a treaty between the Viceroy of India and that frontier chief, the action must be taken by the Indian Government, and not from this country; and if the Indian Government failed to take action, they would not fulfil the conditions of their treaty?—I do not quite see the bearing of that argument.

2851. I understand your Lordship to say that we should restrict the action of the Indian Government within its frontiers?—No; I say that the less it has to do beyond its frontiers the better.

2852. All the outstanding questions with regard to Persia and India are frontier questions; on these frontier questions arise questions of conditions, nditions, of treaties between these frontier iefs and the Viceroy of India, and the Viceroy India, in fulfilment of those treaties, must of cessity take certain steps; would it be right at under those circumstances the action of the oreign Office should be brought to bear to strict the Viceroy of India in the fulfilment of ose treaties?—No; but what I said was, that e action of the Foreign Office would be a presentation to the Persian Government re- mmended by the Secretary of State for Foreign ffairs, but the Secretary of State for Foreign ffairs could not possibly restrict the Govern- ment of India in performance of a condition of a treaty.

2854. We cannot get rid of those treaties already made?—It is impossible to get rid of the obligations under which you are at present.

Viscount Halifax.

12 May 1870.

Mr. Francis Beilby Alston, again called in; and further Examined.

2855. Mr. Rylands.] The questions which I ve to put to you have reference to some replies at you made to inquiries which arose out of r. Bingham's case; on a former occasion when ou were examined, I took occasion to ask you, reference to certain pensions, Mr. Bingham ving had a consular superannuation of a con- derable amount granted to him: I asked you hether that superannuation was granted as a atter of course under the Superannuation Act, nply upon a report as to his age or infirmity, d without reference to the conduct that might ve characterised the fulfilling of his duties; and understood you to say that Mr. Bingham, or y other consular officer, had a right to a con- lar superannuation allowance, provided he had ached 60 years of age, or was disqualified by -health; is that a correct statement?—I rather ink that I stated on that occasion that any idence of bad conduct would tend very much interfere (I think those were my words) with e grant of a pension; at all events, that un- ubtedly would be the case.

2856. Then if you did not state it so it was nply an omission?—It would have been an ission. I certainly did not intend to state that y consular or diplomatic employé who had herwise qualified himself for a pension must cessarily obtain a pension if his general conduct d not been such as to warrant it.

2857. I did not suppose for a moment that ere was any intentional inaccuracy, but the ct was that you stated in reply to me that the anting of a superannuation to a consular officer llowed upon the report of the chief clerk, which d reference simply to the age or state of health the party concerned?—I rather think that I as drawing at the time a distinction between e pension accorded to a diplomatic officer, and e superannuation allowance assigned to a con- lar officer. I stated, or I intended to state, at the one was in point of fact an act of Royal ace and favour, not dependent upon age or in- mity of mind or body, whereas the other was pendent upon the applicant having reached the e of 65 years, or otherwise being incapacitated ysically from continuing his duties.

2858. I will draw your attention to section 8 the Superannuation Act, which gives the con- tions under which superannuations to public rvants, not heads of departments, are to be anted. It states, "It shall not be lawful for e Commissioners of the Treasury to grant the ll amount of superannuation allowance which an be granted under this Act to any person not ing the head officer, or one of the head officers of a department, unless upon production of a certificate (signed by the head officer of the department, or by two head officers if there be more than one) that he has served with diligence and fidelity to the satisfaction of such head officer or officers." That, I suppose, you admit is the requirement of the Act?—That is the requirement of the Act.

2859. I wish to ask you whether in the case of Mr. Bingham, there was any such certificate granted that he had fulfilled his duty with "diligence and fidelity"?—There must have been such a certificate; the Treasury would not have granted the pension without it.

2860. And will that certificate be in the possession of the Treasury?—Undoubtedly.

2861. So that we shall be able to get from an officer of the Treasury that there was such a certificate, and that it was signed by some head officer of the department?—Signed by the Secretary of State.

2862. Would the certificate be signed by the Secretary of State in the case I mentioned?—In all cases the certificate is signed by the Secretary of State.

2863. Then I suppose I am correct in taking your answer in reference to Mr. Bingham to be, that so far as you know the Foreign Office was not aware of the character of these proceedings of his in Venezuela?—No, I do not say so. On the contrary, the Foreign Office was aware that there had been certain proceedings in which Mr. Bingham had been mixed up in the Acker's case; and it is right that I should add that the Foreign Office for a period of two, if not three, years abstained from proceeding with the question of Mr. Bingham's pension while those proceedings were under investigation and consideration, and it was only when it had been established to the satisfaction of the Government that nothing could be alleged against Mr. Bingham which should invalidate his claim to a pension, that the pension was granted to him.

2864. Are you aware that he was for some- time in prison at Caraccas, in Venezuela?—No.

2865. If you are not aware of the antecedents of Mr. Bingham in connection with this large pension, that will have a very material bearing upon the circumstances under which the pension was granted; could you tell us who can give us information as to Mr. Bingham's previous career before getting this pension?—Mr. Bingham's career was one of upwards of 40 years' duration.

2866. But as to the circumstances which I have alluded to, the circumstances under which he was moved from Naples, for instance, and generally generally his career in the diplomatic service?—I cannot answer that question offhand. Mr. Bingham's career, as I have stated, extended over a period of 40 years or more. At the time of his retirement he had reached the age which qualified him for a superannuation allowance. He applied for his pension, and the Acker's case being at the time under investigation, and it being considered that Mr. Bingham's conduct in that matter was open to question, his pension was withheld for a period of certainly two years while the matter was being investigated. At the conclusion of that investigation, namely, in the year, I think, 1860, a pension was assigned to him.

2867. Then you do not know that he was recalled from the consular service under circumstances arising out of dissatisfaction on the part of the Foreign Office with his conduct?—No, I do not know that; I am not prepared to say that.

2868. Mr. Eastwick.] Is it a fact that there was any suspension of relations at that time between the government of Venezuela and our own Government?—I cannot say; I should imagine not, because Mr. Orme was at the time chargé d'affaires at Caraccas.

2869. I am speaking of the time when Mr. Bingham was there; just after he left was there or was there not any interruption of good relations with the Venezuelan government?— That is a question I cannot answer offhand.

2870. And you are not aware whether the consul, Mr. Stacey, was put in prison by the Venezuelan government?—The matter is not present to my mind.

2871. Who could give any information on that subject?—I could procure it.

2872. Mr. Lowther.] Mr. Bingham entered the service in 1818, I see by the Foreign Office List?—Yes.

2873. And he became secretary of legation in 1831; though towards the end of his career he may have been wanting in judgment, I should imagine that he still would have a claim to his pension for his "diligence and fidelity" for the period up to the time at which he was failing in judgment?—I doubt whether the fact of a man's judgment having erred would be held to be a bar to his obtaining a pension under any circumstances. If a man had been guilty of malversation, that would be, I should think, a good ground for withholding his pension; but if a man had pursued his instructions, or had acted to the best of his ability, but had erred in judgment, I do not think that it would be a ground for refusing the man a pension merely because his judgment had been at fault; and I am not aware that anything more has been proved against Mr. Bingham in that matter.

Mr. Theodore Walrond and Mr. Edward Headlam, called in; and Examined.

Messrs. T. Walrond and E. Headlam.

2874. Chairman (to Mr. Walrond).] Are you Secretary to the Civil Service Commissioners?—Yes.

2875. (To Mr. Headlam.) And are you an Examiner?—Yes; I am the Senior Permanent Examiner.

2876. Sir C. W. Dilke (to Mr. Walrond).] With regard to the examination generally, what proportion of candidates are rejected in the first examination for the diplomatic service?—Should I take the whole number since 1855, or the number for the last three years?

2877. The number for the last three years?—The number of candidates passed since the beginning of 1866 has been 11; the number of candidates not passed in that time has been 10; I ought to say that that is a very much larger proportion than usual; looking back to 1855, I find that the total number passed since that year has been 63, and the total number not passed 34.

2878. Can you give the Committee any reasons why the proportion of rejections should have increased as it seems to have done?—I am afraid that there is a general tendency in pass examinations for the candidates not to do quite so well; probably, à priori, anybody would say that it must be so, and I think that the experience of these examinations rather shows it.

2879. That the tendency of pass examinations as distinguished from open competition is to steadily reduce the standard of efficiency of the candidates?—I think it is so; of course the number of rejections does not prove it, but I think there is a tendency in all pass examinations to lower the standard; they produce that result in three different ways. First of all, if a man does very well in all subjects except one, it is very natural that the Commissioners should a little, so to speak, lower the bar in that one; and having done so, it is not always easy to raise it again; then another way in which the system of pass examinations acts, is this: candidates and their crammers, if I may so call them, make it their business to find out how little will pass, and they gradually get to content themselves with only just getting up to the mark in every subject; there is that tendency naturally. And then besides that, there is this; if a candidate comes up and fails, supposing that he passes satisfactorily in every subject but say, two, then although he is always warned that if he is re-nominated he will be liable to be re-examined in all the subjects, still as a matter of practice, the Commissioners usually do not re-examine a man in the subjects that he has passed satisfactorily in, and therefore the candidate has only two subjects to devote his whole attention to, and of course can pass in those two with much less mental effort than if he had to carry the whole in his head together.

2880. Can you state the subjects in which the 10 candidates failed who have failed in the last three years?—I have not got it here divided so that I could state that specifically for the last three years; but I could state it for the whole period since 1855.

2881. I will ask a more limited question then: what number of candidates failed in French?—The number that are set down as failing in French alone during the whole time is six; that is, six out of the 34 who have failed since 1855.

2882. But there are some who failed in French and other things?—Yes.

2883. You have yourself, I think, had experience of the character of the French examination?—Yes.

2884. In your opinion, is the standard high?—That is a very difficult question to answer; I ot think it is so high as it might be.

85. In the matter of French conversation, istance?—Conversation is no longer a part e test.

86. For what reason was that dropped?— ver understood that.

87. Your opinion would be that it ought ave been retained?—Yes; but still more, ink the writing of French from dictation, he translating of English into French ought ave been retained; it used to form part of ntrance examination, but now does not.

88. (To Mr. Headlam.) Could you, from ory, without the figures before you, say her, since the change, there have been any res at all in French, or any number of res?—I am sure that there have been some res in French since that change.

89. Although the standard has been lowered? lthough the standard has been lowered.

90. (To Mr. Walrond.) With regard to the nd examination and the international law h is required, have you any personal exence of the character of that examination?—ve had no personal experience in conducting the examination since the new system was tuted, but Mr. Headlam has.

91. (To Mr. Headlam.) What have you to upon that point?—With regard to the rnational law, we have a special examination hat subject by a reader in law at the Inner ple, and he could answer that question better I could as to the performance of the can-tes.

92. I merely wished to ask whether the dard in that subject was at all high?—Lately e have not been any examined in internaal law at all. For two years there has not been ngle candidate for the second examination, there was only one in 1867.

93. (To Mr. Walrond.) I do not know ther it is a subject which you have paid any ntion to, but I would like to ask you whether ddition to the general international law which second examination now comprises, it would be very desirable to examine the candidates private international law; for instance, the ing of the marriage laws of one country on e of another?—I am afraid that my opinion hat subject would be worth nothing at all.

94. With reference to competition geney, I would wish to ask you whether your ntion has been called at any time to Mr. nt Duff's suggestion to the Committee which in 186i upon the subject of a kind of open petition?—I was examined before that Comtee by Mr. Grant Duff, and he stated then views on the subject.

95. I think in consequence, to some extent, he evidence which you then gave he suggested he Committee a system which I will read to , in order to ask your opinion upon it: "The il Service Commissioners shall once every r hold an examination, open to all British jects who are desirous of entering the diplo-ic service; that the Civil Service Comsioners shall then certify to the Foreign retary the names of the 12 candidates who e distinguished themselves most highly in h examination, and that from these twelve the reign Secretary shall select the persons who to be appointed to attachéships during the ensuing 12 months;" what would be your opinion upon that suggestion?—I have no doubt that in that way you would get on the average a more highly qualified class of candidates. I do not mean to say that you would get better than we sometimes get now, for sometimes we get as good as it is possible to hope for; but you would get perhaps a higher average, and certainly the minimum would be higher.

2896. On what subjects do you think in such a case it would be advisable that that first examination should be held?—I suppose that the most important subjects are French and modern history and international law; but besides that there ought to be, as there is now, something of arithmetic; Latin certainly, I should think; and it seems to be thought desirable that there should be something of Euclid, probably rather more than the first book, which it is now.

2897. Do you concur in the opinions that the first book of Euclid, or even several books of Euclid, are of much use in an examination for the diplomatic service?—I think that so far as the study of Euclid tends to clear the head, it is as useful for the diplomatic service as it is for any other service; but it has no special relation to the diplomatic service.

2898. Perhaps the study of international law, scientifically conducted, would be equally valuable?—I have no doubt that it would be.

2899. There has been an objection stated by Lord Derby to this scheme of Mr. Grant Duff's, and that is, that those of the 12 candidates who might not be chosen by the Foreign Secretary during the year would consider that they had a grievance against the country, or against the Foreign Office; do you think that there is weight to be attached to that objection?—I should not be disposed myself to attach any weight to it, because I think it is very desirable indeed, that not only in the Foreign Office, but in every office, not only the power but the right of the head of the office in that respect should be distinctly recognised and understood; and if that were very openly stated as one of the conditions of the competition, I do not think that there would be any grievance at all.

2900. Do you think that your colleagues generally would concur in the advisability of some such scheme as this of Mr. Grant Duff's?—I was not authorised to speak for anyone but myself.

2901. Mr. Eastwick.] Do you think that the examination as it now stands, in French, shows a knowledge of the language so well as conversation, and writing a French letter?—I should say, as far as my experience goes, that the best test is translating into French, and, next to that, writing from dictation; I think that those are the two best tests, on the whole.

2902. But do not you think that a gentleman who could write a French letter without dictation, and without reference to a dictionary, and could write it without mistakes, and in good idiom, must know the language perfectly?—Yes, no doubt; but it always seems to me that it is a better test to confine the candidate within narrow limits than to leave very wide limits; for instance, he might write a letter on some subject that he had often written upon before, and that would not then be so good a test as, say, a page of Macaulay, or something of that kind, to translate into French.

2903. But supposing that you added to that translating from English into French, writing a letter and conversation, would you not consider that a much better test of scholarship?—Yes.

Messrs. T. Walrond and E. Headlam.

12 May 1870.

2904. For the Ireland scholarship at Oxford they give you a theme, and you write a dialogue or essay in Greek, do you not?—Sometimes that is done, but not habitually.

2905. Are you at all aware of the system of examination in India, and do you know that it is a fact that they examine in the colloquial, and also in translating from English into the colloquial, and that they make that a most important feature of the examination?—Certainly; I have always understood so.

2906. I would like to ask you whether you think that, supposing that the appointments to the diplomatic service were open to the universities, there would be competition for them, and that you would get candidates from the universities; I am not speaking simply of the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge, but we will say Trinity College, Dublin, and other places?—I think that the fact that the service is unpaid, and also the fact of the peculiar duties which have to be discharged in it, which many even clever men must know perfectly well that they are not well fitted for, would debar a great many men from coming. I think it would never be a very large number that would compete.

2907. You would get some, at any rate?—Yes.

2908. Would you get any that had taken degrees in honours?—I think so.

2909. And supposing that you could get candidates having taken degrees in honours at the universities, do you think that upon the whole they would be a better class of men to be appointed than the men now appointed?—I could hardly say that; I would rather leave it to be decided, according to Mr. Grant Duff's plan, by the Secretary of State, after having seen them and inquired into their antecedents.

2910. I would just like to ask whether there have been any failures in orthography?—Going back to 1855, I find that there have been, during these 15 years, as many as three failures in orthography alone, one in orthography and handwriting together, and 15 others where orthography and handwriting and arithmetic were involved, but not exclusively due to those subjects.

2911. Have there been any of late years in that subject?—I am not able to say that, not having the returns.

2912. (To Mr. Headlam.) Are you able to state that?—I know for a fact that there have, in the last two years, been some candidates who have failed in orthography.

2913. Mr. William Cartwright.] Do you know what proportion?—I have only got it made out for the whole time from 1855, and not for the last three years.

2914. Mr. Eastwick (to Mr. Walrond).] Do you think that, supposing you made it a condition of appointment that a man should have taken a degree in honours at the university, you would have failures in orthography and general intelligence?—Even the highest degree at Oxford in my time was not an absolute guarantee against a failure in orthography; it was a thing that was not regarded, but I do not think that with such a condition the chance of failure would be very great.

2915. It would be less than at present?—Yes.

2916. Mr. Rylands.] You have stated that the present condition of the service you thou it probably might be the case that there wo not be many applicants for the open examinat upon which you have been asked?—Yes.

2917. The circumstance to which you h mainly alluded being the fact that the servic unpaid?—That was one, but by no means only one.

2918. But that is one?—That is one.

2919. And if under new arrangements pers entering the diplomatic service were paid fr their first appointment, according to the nat of their duties, you would consider, of cour that that would remove entirely the objection which you have just now alluded?—It wo remove that one objection; but not by any me the only one. I think that the peculiar nat of the duties, which many persons must feel th are not well qualified to discharge, would a deter many persons.

2920. From your experience do you find t persons contemplating entering into any bra of the public service are affected by conside tions as to whether they are specially adap for it?—With regard to the ordinary civil s vice clerkships, in most of the departments t duties are of such an ordinary character th I do not think this consideration does act; I the peculiarity of the diplomatic service, I thi is that it requires qualifications such as are developed in clerks.

2921. And you think that the knowledge that would tend to limit the number of pers coming forward for such an open competiti examination?—Yes.

2922. But do not you think that if the serv were paid there would be a sufficient number persons coming forward under the conditions the service to enable the Civil Service Comm sioners to select candidates according to the pl of Mr. Grant Duff?—Yes; and I think that ev without paying the service there would be a su cient number to give a considerable area for lection.

2923. Then you think that under the pres circumstances of the case, this plan would rea be found to be a practicable plan, and wou secure results rather better than the pres mode of appointing to the diplomatic service? Yes.

2924. There is one point that I did not gath from your examination; but I think that t Civil Service Commissioners are quite alive the fact that where there are intellectual quirements, such as secure passing a competiti examination, it is generally found that high mo character accompanies such intellectual p ficiency; has your attention ever been direct to that point?—So far as it is a patent fact. is I believe recognised that diligence and dev tion to study generally go along with orderly h haviour and conduct; I do not think that y can go very much further than that.

2925. But still your experience would le you to go to that point, at all events?—Yes.

2926. And that such an intellectual traini has the effect of producing refinement of manne in most cases?—Yes.

2927. Mr. William Lowther.] Do I understa you correctly, that a man who passes a very go examination is more likely to be moral than man who passes a less good one?—I think if y look at the universities for instance, and take t cl

-s of men who go in for honours and the class men who do not, while I do not mean to say t there are not quite as good men in the ond class as in the first class, if you look for orderly conduct, it is generally in the second ss, and not in the first.

2928. With regard to French in the examina- h French conversation is now not included? t is now no longer an obligatory part of the rance examination.

2929. And is there no speaking of French?— e candidates are only examined in translating paper passages of French into English, and in swering questions on French grammar.

2930. And there is no means of judging of ir French accent?—As an obligatory thing re is none; they may, if they choose, present mselves, as an extra and voluntary thing, for amination in French speaking.

2931. It would not give them any number of rks?—It would not.

2932. When was that altered?—In July 1865, Lord Russell.

2933. Do you think it advisable that that uld be put back again to its former footing? Yes, certainly; unless there are some reasons at I do not know of against doing so.

2934. That is not confined to French; there no vivâ voce examination in German or in any her language?—No.

2935. Mr. Otway.] A young man might be rfectly competent, I conclude, to pass the amination before the Civil Service Commis- ners for an attaché, and thereby qualify him- lf, and yet be totally deficient; to your know- dge in moral qualities and in tact, and in ticence, in short in all the qualities that would him for the diplomatic profession?—No can- date could get the certificate of the Civil Ser- ce Commissioners who was totally deficient in me of the moral qualities, because one of the ints on which they certify is that his character such as to fit him for public employment. But to tact or reticence, or the peculiar qualifica- ons required for diplomatic duties, I do not ink that our examination is the very least uarantee of those things; and it is for that reason, it seems to me, that if there were such a scheme, it is essential that the Secretary of State should have the freest choice among the candidates presented to him.

2936. Indeed, you stated before that there are peculiar qualifications for that service which you thought, with your knowledge of the universities (which I know to be very extensive) and public schools would prevent many men from competing for it; because they would be aware of their own deficiency in those respects?—Yes.

2937. Mr. Kinnaird.] How are the certificates of character that you have just mentioned obtained; what are the requisites of the examiners? —That is not a very easy question to answer, though it seems so. The Commissioners are required to satisfy themselves that the candidate's character is such as to fit him for public employment; and they address questions on the subject to the candidate's referees, and other persons well acquainted with him, and if he has been in any Government office, to the heads of the office, and, in short, to every person that they think has anything to tell them about it, until they are satisfied.

2938. And therefore as to character, you have the usual guarantee given by any other persons entering a public office?—Yes, far more than the usual guarantee of character, I think.

2939. As far as your present experience goes, I think that there has been no such great failure in that respect or in the reference to the Commissioners?—None at all for the diplomatic service.

2940. Sir C. W. Dilke.] And in reference to the point of tact, which was put by Mr. Otway, the leaving the Secretary of State to select from the 12, as proposed by Mr. Grant Duff, would secure that?—I should suppose so.

2941. Mr. Otway.] But if those candidates came up in any public competition, the Secretary of State could know nothing about them, could he?—I think that it would be very unfortunate if, among 12 presented to him as having passed a severe examination for one vacancy, he were not able to find out one about whom he could get tolerable security that he had those qualifications.

Mr. WILLIAM DOUGAL CHRISTIE, again called in; and further Examined.

2942. Mr. Rylands.] I WISH to call your attention to the last question that I put to you on the 9th of May with regard to the commercial reports of secretaries of legation, and to ask if you assisted your secretary of legation by pointing out subjects that he should attend to, and in getting information?—Certainly; I felt it to be my duty to do so. I never had anything to do with the reports of secretaries of legation till I found myself minister in Brazil. Probably the regulation did not exist before. I directed the secretary's attention to subjects which I thought he might usefully report upon; I suggested to him a tour, for the purpose of obtaining additional information, and when he had made his report he sent it to me to read; I went over it carefully, and made suggestions to him, which he, I may say, accepted in all cases and thanked me for, and I forwarded the report to the Foreign Office. Mr. Baillie is the secretary of legation to whom I am referring, and he made some very valuable reports on Brazil, the first that had been made.

2944. I wish to call your attention to a statement made by Mr. Hammond in reply to Question 559 put to him by me in reference to this point; I asked Mr. Hammond this question: "I am anxious to be satisfied that under the instructions of the Foreign Office in relation to this important matter, the heads of missions are expected to take an active personal supervision of those material interests which come within these reports?" and Mr. Hammond's reply was: "If you mean by supervision, correcting and amending the secretary's report, I do not consider that that is the duty of the head of a mission, and it would entirely defeat the object of the regulation." Subsequently he says: "Supervision, as I understand it, means seeing that the report is sent in at a certain time, and, if you choose to carry it still further, that the secretary of legation has those facilities afforded to him for collecting materials for his report which it is the desire of the Foreign Office should be at his disposal;" is that your view —No; I certainly take an entirely different view from Mr. Hammond of a minister's duty in the way of supervision, and I should say that Mr. Hammond there has not correctly stated the object of these reports. I think that the instructions given in Lord Clarendon's circular certainly mean that a minister is to exercise a supervision over these reports, for the purpose of improving them. I do not know exactly what Mr. Hammond conceived to be the object of these reports. It is stated that they are intended for the training of secretaries, and for publication, in order to make the English public acquainted with what it was important for them to know in respect of foreign countries. Certainly in regard to the latter object, I should conceive it to be of the utmost importance that if these reports are made by secretaries, they should be supervised and improved and perfected by the ministers. The report must be very much more valuable to the public, and more authentic if it goes before the public with the minister's responsibility.

2945. I see Mr. Hammond also says that "The head of a mission would report generally upon industrial and commercial questions; but these reports are things special to themselves; they would cease to be secretaries of legations' reports if you made them, as you assume they should be, ministers' reports." And he also says, "The report of the secretary of legation is upon a particular subject; he does not treat of the whole commerce of the country. Very often his reports have been upon matters having nothing on earth to do with commerce;" have you any remark to make on that?—I do not know what the commercial reports made by ministers are. Certainly I should conceive that these reports made by secretaries of legation who were directed rected specially to devote their attention to ie making of those reports, should be so made to supersede the necessity of other reports nt by the ministers. The plan has been introuced since I served of dividing ministers' desatches into commercial and political, and Mr. Iammond may refer to the commercial despatches f ministers; but I should certainly say that all hat is sent home relating to commerce should ome from one official, and that official the chief f the mission. It occurs to me to mention that here is no doubt that it has become the belief the service, or it had become the belief in the ervice (I am speaking in the presence of a genman who has had long experience as a secreary of legation), that the secretaries were indeendent of the ministers as regards these reports, nd I think that so far as it extended that was a ery pernicious opinion; and I may mention (it nvolves no imputation on character, but I think hat it illustrates the management of the Foreign ffice) that it did happen to me with regard to a ecretary, that he not having made any report t all, after having been eight or nine months in he country, and the rule being that it should be ade after three months' residence, I called Lord ussell's attention to the fact, and that being ommunicated to the secretary, he replied that s to those reports he was responsible only to ord Russell, which meant that I had no busiess to interfere in the matter.

2946. Then whatever the practice is you, from our experience, would say that you are deidedly of opinion, in relation to these reports resented by secretaries of legation, they should e done under the immediate supervision and ontrol of the head of the mission?—I think it tands to reason that these important reports on ost important subjects, made for the purpose f publication, made for the purpose of enlightenng the British public as to the various comercial interests of different countries, should e made under the supervision and with the ctive assistance of the chief of the mission, and hat they should go forth as the authentic reports f Her Majesty's ambassadors and ministers broad who are the responsible officials.

2947. You are aware that the idea of the oreign Office is, that the preparation of these eports is a means of education for the secretaries f legation; are you aware that there was a ircular sent out in 1864, telling ministers to mploy their junior secretaries in drawing up eports in order to improve their minds?—I do ot know what you refer to.

2949. You would not consider that the fact of the head of the mission taking an active superintendence in directing these commercial reports would in any way interfere with the educational effect of the employment of the secretaries of legation in that work?—I think that it ought materially to assist it; certainly it must enhance the value of the reports made, their real value and their value as authorities.

2950. I gather from your previously stated opinion that in relation to the secretaries of legation generally, you would say that the head of the mission ought to have the control of the employment of the whole of them in the preparation of these reports, in such a way as he might think fit at the time?—There ought to be one chief authority in every embassy or mission, and any assignment of independent duties, or of duties which are supposed to be dependent, must tend to interfere with discipline, and does do so. You find many ambassadors and ministers writing that the secretaries are entirely occupied with these reports; and of course there is a very natural tendency in secretaries, or any other officials to whom a particular duty is assigned, to exaggerate that duty, or (to put it in another way) to try and do their work in the best possible manner, and so to give more time to it than is necessary. If the preparation of those reports were made, as I conceive it ought to be (and I mentioned before the analogy of the annual reports sent home by Colonial governors) the duty of responsible chiefs, you would be able to preserve a certain proportion in that part of the work of the mission to other parts; you would keep it properly subordinate. I believe that the original object of these circulars directing the preparation of reports (and my belief is founded on a statement in the first circular addressed by Lord Clarendon) was to give some employment to the secretaries; it was considered that they did nothing, or that they had nothing to do before.

2951. But the main points in addition to the matter affecting more particularly the commercial reports to which I want to direct your attention is this; from your experience I gather from your replies you are very strongly of opinion that the head of the mission ought to have directing control over his subordinates with a view to the effective working of the mission?—I have no doubt about that; and being anxious always to support my opinion by the authority of gentlemen of more experience and greater authority, I refer to statements made by, among others, Lord Lyons and Sir Henry Elliot, as to the want of sufficient discipline and the inconvenience felt by ambassadors and ministers in not being able to command the services of the secretaries of legation as they would desire, and as even the instructions as to their duty require; that has been distinctly stated by Sir Henry Elliot in his late report.

2952. In connection with that subject I should like to know whether practically, from your knowledge and experience, you can say that the conduct conduct of the missions is of a very harmonious character, or does the want of control on the part of the heads of missions lead within your knowledge to quarrelling and differences amongst the members of legation?—My experience does not extend beyond the year 1863. I certainly say without hesitation that during the time that I was in the service, which was 15 years, quarrelling at embassies and missions was very frequent. I am not sure that I would not go so far as to say that perfect harmony at any embassy or mission was the exception rather than the rule. A right honourable Member of this Committee, who has had much greater experience than I, the late ambassador at Constantinople, could be asked on the same subject. I am speaking in the presence of a gentleman who was secretary of legation and of embassy for a long time, and I give you my opinion, which is that quarrelling at embassies and missions has certainly been frequent. In all these cases generally there are faults on both sides, but it does arise from the system which gives an impaired or weakened authority to the chief, which puts him in the position of not being able to command (and I do not use the word command in any sense that could be considered offensive), the services of a subordinate as a Colonial governor can command the services of a clerk, or as a Secretary of State can command the services of members of his department; and there is no doubt whatever that there is or has been much disposition to appeal to the Foreign Office against particular orders, the minute instructions which of late years have been issued as to the way in which ambassadors or ministers should employ their secretaries, and the assigning to them of specific duties, and trying to enumerate the duties has increased, I think, the tendency to disunion. These things are generally best proved by an instance; and here again I can mention an instance within my own experience and knowledge, showing what probably was not sufficiently considered when these minute circulars were framed. It happened to me to be obliged to call on a secretary to proceed to a port not very far from Rio, to take the temporary charge of a consulate. The consul had leave of absence on account of his health, which would have been endangered by his remaining. I was unable to find anyone but the secretary to take his place, and I called upon the secretary to do so. He declined to go and persisted in declining in spite of all my advice. No doubt he felt that he was justified in declining. I did all I could to get him to retract his refusal, but in vain. I was then obliged to apply to the senior naval officer in the port, to supply me with a lieutenant, which he did, and that got over the difficulty. This gentleman to whom I have alluded is now dead, and he was in other respects an excellent secretary; but I was obliged to report this circumstance, which caused a good deal of ill-will; and I mention it because his reason for refusing was this, "Here is a circular defining my duty; there is nothing said in this circular as to my being called upon to perform consular duties, and with all respect I decline to do so."

2953. And in order to make up for the want of his performance of this public duty connected with your department, you got a naval officer of a ship of war to do what one of your own staff refused to do?—Yes, and when, subsequently, the matter came before Lord Russell, he said at once that the secretary ought to have done what I called upon him to do.

2955. Passing now to another subject, I wish to ask whether you are acquainted with the Act of last year, chapter 43, for the payment of diplomatic salaries and pensions?—Yes, I know the Act, and have paid some attention to it, being, in fact, personally interested in it, or thinking myself so.

2956. Will you explain, shortly, if you please, the position of pensions under that Act, and any changes introduced by it, as compared with previous Acts?—It is rather a large subject to go into. Under the Act which before regulated pensions, only two years' service as an ambassador in the foreign country to which the ambassador was accredited was required, with a total of 15 years' service, to entitle an ambassador to the highest pension of 1,700*l.* a year; and so far as ambassadors were concerned, a change was made by the late Act, extending the time of an ambassador's service from two to three years. No change was made as to the second class of pensions, the pension of 1,300*l.* a year, for which was required before, and is required now, an actual service of five years, at what is called a first class mission, in the country to which the envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary is accredited. But a very considerable change was made as regards pensions for chargé d'affaires. Formerly the third class of pension, a pension of 900*l.* a year, was due only to an envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary, or to a minister plenipotentiary of what is called a second class mission, or to a minister resident; but this Act raised the pension of 700*l.* a year formerly due to a chargé d'affaires, from 700*l.* a year to 900*l.* a year, and it also introduced, for the first time in legislation, into the diplomatic service for a pension, a chargé d'affaires and consul general, and an agent and consul general. Before the passing of this Act no diplomatic pension could legally be given, except to ambassadors, ministers of first and second class missions, ministers resident, and secretaries of embassy or legation, and other members of the diplomatic service.

2957. Is there any special point in connection with the system of pensions to which you wish to direct the attention of the Committee; are there any modifications of that Act that you think would be desirable in connection with the diplomatic service?—Perhaps you would allow me to add to the answer to your previous question that changes were made bearing on the question of transfer from the civil to the diplomatic service which will, I should say, have a very good effect as tending to facilitate such transfers; there was previously no difficulty under the Act of William the Fourth in the case of transfers from the diplomatic service to the consular service; for instance, taking Mr. Griffiths and Mr. Bingham, all their diplomatic service counted when they came to be pensioned under the Consular Superannuation Act as chargés d'affaires and consuls general, the appointment of chargé d'affaires and consul general being then on the consular establishment; but until this Act was passed there was no provision which would serve for a gentleman transferred from the Foreign Office or from the consular service to the diplomatic service; that that is to say, all the time in the Foreign Office and the consular service would have been lost for a person who afterwards became a diplomatist and who could only get his pension under his diplomatic character, and I should say that that is a very great improvement, and that it will tend very much to facilitate transfers from the Foreign Office to the diplomatic service and from the consular service to the diplomatic service; you have also asked me whether there is any point to which I would wish to direct attention with regard to changes which might be made; I should say that I think there has been and continues to be an unfairness as regards envoys extraordinary and ministers plenipotentiary between those who are holders of first-class and those who are holders of second-class missions; now, that distinction of first-class and second-class missions is, I think, an arbitrary distinction, and one dependent entirely upon the power of the Foreign Office; the former Pension Act provided, indeed the words of the former Act were, that every one having the rank of envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary should be entitled, when he had completed the condition of 15 years from his first commission, ten years' total service and five years in that particular rank, to a pension of 1,300 l. a year; the Foreign Office has made a distinction, no doubt for good reasons, at least intending what was right, between first-class and second-class missions; now here I think an instance will show the hardness of the operation; there is Sir Alexander Malet, who at the end of something like 40 years' total service, and at the end of 20 years' service as an envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary in a second-class mission, when at last he was obliged to retire from the service by force of circumstances and lost his mission in that way, was entitled only to a pension of 900*l.* a year, simply because he had only served in a second class mission; and I should say there is no doubt whatever that Frankfort was, while Sir Alexander Malet was holding his position there, a mission of very great importance; I would recommend an equalisation of the pension for first-class and second-class missions which need not necessarily remain at the present standard of 1,300*l.* a year, but a medium of 1,100*l.* a year between the 1,300*l.* and 900*l.* might be selected; and I am anxious to state that I should not benefit by any improvement with regard to the pension, as I was only minister plenipotentiary for a portion of my five years and not an envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary.

2958. Now, with regard to a recommendation which you gave to the Committee the other day when as a measure of economy you spoke of the desirability of putting the consular duty under the mission in capitals which are ports, I wish to ask how you propose to deal with consulates at outports; do you think that any economy could be effected with them by bringing them more under the control of the mission, or in any other way?—I think that great economy might be effected with regard to consulates other than those of which I spoke the other day, the consulates at ports which are capitals and where we also have a mission, that would be effected partly by bringing them more closely under the supervision of the mission, but it would be chiefly effected by the introduction of a new plan.

2959. Would you carry that out to the extent of giving the minister a greater amount of control over consuls elsewhere in the district to which he is accredited than he has at present?—He has control now, and it is laid down now by the Foreign Office that the consuls are entirely subordinate to the minister. Still I think that the mission in the country might be made more completely the head and central office to which all consuls should send their reports, and to which all consular information should converge; and that being thoroughly carried out, I think you might change very considerably indeed, if not entirely, your plan as regards most consulates in outports; I am speaking with reference to my own experience, and I particularly wish it to be understood that I am giving no opinion about the consulates in the East, about which I know nothing, and where consuls have judicial functions; and I give no opinion about consulates in China and Japan, and those countries where there is a special service. But speaking of Brazil and Buenos Ayres, and countries which I know, and feeling myself safe in extending my observations on those countries to European countries, I think that we might avail ourselves to a great extent of resident merchants of respectability and intelligence, for the performance of what is necessary consular work, under the effective superintendence of the mission of the country.

Mr. W. D. Christie. 16 May 1870.

2960. Mr. Holms.] You have said that you believe that economy might be effected by consuls sending their communication to a central mission; would those communications be merely of a political character, or would they be both political and commercial?—Their political communications necessarily are sent to the mission; but I think that they might be made very much more subordinate to the mission at the capital; and I have mentioned a plan for effecting that object; I will not go further into it now, but perhaps it may be considered hereafter, if it is thought desirable. Perhaps I may mention that having made a calculation if my plan were adopted, I think that in Brazil alone a saving might be made, reducing the sum of something like 4,500*l.*, which is at present the expense of the five consulates of Bahia, Pará, Pernambuco, Rio Grande do Sul, and Santos, to 1,500*l.*, which would be a saving of 3,000*l.* a year.

2961. Mr. Rylands.] I quite understood you to say, on a former occasion, that any duty performed by the mission of a consular character would be paid by fees, and therefore that you think that in reference to other duties that are now performed by missions, fees should also be received; have you formed any opinion as to the best mode of collecting those fees, whether by stamps or otherwise?—I think that the stamp system is the best that could be adopted. As you have alluded to my recommendation as to fees being received at embassies and missions as well as at consulates, may I add that there is another case in which the receiving of fees at consulates and not receiving them at missions shows an anomaly. With regard to marriages, for instance, a considerable fee is required for a marriage performed at a consulate, but for marriages performed at missions, the mission exacts no fee, and has no power of exacting any; and I can see no season why fees should not be received at embassies and missions when marriages are performed there.

2962. With reference to the clerical management of a mission, and the archives more particularly, particularly, within your experience are the despatches carefully filed, bound, and placed in such a position as to be easy of reference?—They are certainly carefully filed, and wherever I have been I have found them all carefully arranged in bundles. I stated before that I have seen the inconvenience of a continual change from one minister's house to another, or from one minister's house to the lodging of a chargé d'affaires. Continual changes occurring in that way affect the order in which the archives are kept. I have observed, that it has been stated that the despatches are always bound, but that certainly is not the case according to my experience. I do not know whether Mr. Cameron remembers how it was in Switzerland, but both in Buenos Ayres and in Brazil the despatches have not been bound. I remember writing to the Foreign Office recommending that they should be bound, but I never received any instructions to bind them.

2963. In transacting the work of a foreign mission, do you think that copying machines might be with advantage used?—I should say that copying machines might be advantageously used to a great extent; and if there is any difficulty with regard to important political despatches which are sent home, and which circulate among the Cabinet and go before Her Majesty, I have no doubt whatever that it would be a very great advantage that copying machines should be used by ministers and consuls abroad, for subsidiary and local correspondence; and my own experience is, that the actual manual assistance which a minister has is very much less than the number of the staff would lead you to expect.

2964. I will not ask you in reference to anything connected with the internal management of the Foreign Office; but in your position as minister, you must have had many opportunities of seeing how the operations of the Foreign Office act upon the diplomatic service, and I should like to ask you whether you can suggest any changes in the arrangements of the Foreign Office which would contribute to the better management of the diplomatic service?—I should certainly say, in answer to your question, that the efficiency of the management of the diplomatic service depends so very much, if not mainly, on the Foreign Office, that the question of the Foreign Office is perhaps the greater part of, or the root of the question of the diplomatic service; and I should further presume to say, that any gentleman who has served abroad in diplomacy would have very good opportunities of judging of the Foreign Office. I should be prepared, in answer to your question, and would desire to make several suggestions, and I would make them as briefly as I can; but I am afraid that, if the Committee will allow me to mention, in answer to your question, all the points of change which I would suggest, the answer to the question might be a long one. I will make it as short as I can, but I certainly would wish to suggest various changes in the management of the Foreign Office which I believe would contribute to the efficiency of the diplomatic service.

2965. Will you be good enough to prepare and put in a memorandum in reference to the points on which your experience of the action of the Foreign Office upon foreign missions suggests certain improvements?—I should be very happy to do so, and I would much prefer expressing my views in writing to expressing them in evidence.

2966. I asked you the other day whether you had ever been offered employment since you had a pension assigned to you, and you said that you had not; have you applied for employment since Lord Russell was Foreign Secretary, to his successors?—Yes, I have done so; and having heard a question put by an honourable Member of this Committee to Lord Derby, when he was here the other day, I may say that I was surprised to hear the question, but I am thankful to the honourable Member for having put it; and having heard Lord Derby's answer I shall be particularly thankful to the Committee if I may be allowed to make a short statement bearing on the honourable Member's question and Lord Derby's answer. I have applied both to Lord Clarendon and to Lord Derby; I may say that I appealed with some hope to Lord Clarendon, remembering all his kindness to me when I served under him before, and knowing the high encomiums which he had always given to me for my services. It is due to Lord Clarendon to say that he has had very little patronage indeed, and I believe really that both during his former last tenure of the Foreign Office and during the present he has only had two missions to give away. I think I may say that Lord Clarendon, treating me with the kindness which I always experienced from him, gave me and my friends some hope that he would at a suitable moment offer to re-employ me. I am not at all surprised at his not having done so. I know the difficulty under which he is placed, and I wish the Committee to understand that I am not making the least complaint as regards Lord Clarendon. I feel that not having been re-appointed by Lord Russell before he left office, although he wrote to me privately that he had intended to appoint me minister to Switzerland, but having been shelved on a pension, as I was after the service I did in Brazil, the public had an impression that I was discredited, and Lord Clarendon or Lord Derby would be under the great difficulty of sending to a foreign court a minister who, although his conduct had been entirely approved of as regards that public transaction, appears to the public as one discredited. I know that the general impression is that I mismanaged the Brazilian matter. On the contrary, I know and state boldly, that my conduct as to that was entirely and cordially approved by Lord Russell, whose private expressions to me were as strong as anything Lord Palmerston said in the House of Commons. As regards Lord Derby, I am glad to have the opportunity to say that I can only thank him for the manner in which he received the application which I made to him, and for what I believe to have been his sincere desire to re-appoint me if he had an opportunity. He told me, on the first occasion that I applied to him, that it would give him great pleasure to give me employment again if he had an opportunity. The year after I called upon him and the subject was renewed, and he said frankly that notwithstanding his desire, which remained the same, he found a great difficulty in consequence of the number of secretaries then existing who were pressing for promotion, whose claims he felt to be strong, and he wished me to understand distinctly that if he did not give me employment it was not in any way on account of what had happened in Brazil, or of the manner which I had performed my duties, but solely entirely on account of the claims of the retaries pressing for promotion. And I think the Committee will remember that Lord by made substantially the same remark here, I am anxious to have the opportunity of ing that if it was necessary for me to have my ef in his frankness strengthened, it was ngthened by what I heard him state here.

967. I will now call your attention to the stion of Brazil: in answer to a question of e on Monday last, you told us how long you been minister in Brazil; will you now tell what was your work there?—My work was y various. I am afraid that I could not tell what the work was without entering into ay details. I had two very important subjects handle, which had been going on for a very g time, and which I found in a very unsatis- tory state. One was the pressing for the lement of claims of British subjects, to the ount of 200,000*l.* or 300,000*l.*, many of which ms were 30 or 40 years old; and the other the obtaining from the Brazilian Govern- nt justice to a very large number, some 10,000 free blacks as they were called, slaves who had merely been liberated by a mixed British and azilian Commission, and handed over to the azilian Government to treat as free men, but o were treated as slaves, and had been kept slaves for a very long time. That had been subject of very strong remonstrances for a eat number of years by Sir James Hudson and er predecessors of mine, and I had to continue t correspondence. Then other questions arose, complaints of British subjects, and in the end se two questions, the question of the plunder the wreck, and the murders of the remnant of crew of a merchant vessel called the "Prince Wales;" and the offence, as the admiral con- ved it to be (and I entirely agreed with him his opinion), offered to some officers of the itish flagship.

2968. My reason for putting the question was, t in answer to a question which I put to him, r. Hammond, in reference to the slave trade, l the employment given to our mission in the azils in connection with that subject, stated, t though the slave trade had ceased in Brazil, re was a great deal connected with slavery ll to be watched over, which occupied the ssion there: in answer to Question 588, Mr. mmond says, in reference to those questions slavery, "They have subsided as regards the ve trade entirely, but there is a great deal in azil which those persons in this country who ze an interest in matters connected with slavery nk ought still to be watched over;" is that a rect statement of the case, in your opinion?— is an entire mistake of Mr. Hammond's that ere is so much time taken up in watching very, and that a great deal of business remains the mission in connection with the watching slavery. A comparison of the size of the nual Slave Trade Blue Books, before the ces- ion of the slave trade, with those issued now ll at once show any Member of the Committee, l an inspection of the contents of the last nual Slave Trade Blue Book, class B, will ow that there are very few reports indeed from e mission. In the last year's Slave Trade Blue ook I saw only one despatch from the minister. e consider ourselves bound and entitled, under treaty, to interfere with the Brazilian Government on the question of the slave trade, but we are not entitled to interfere with them on the question of slavery; and as regards watching slavery, I see no signs of that being done. There are interesting questions as regards the slavery of the Indians in the north of Brazil, about which no information is given in the late Slave Trade Blue Book, and I presume that the despatches contain no information on that subject, although travellers, Mr. Agassiz, for instance, have given very interesting information with regard to it.

2969. Then I gather that it is not correct to say that there is a good deal remaining to be done by the mission in Brazil on that subject?—There is now very little in the way of reports on slavery.

2970. Mr. Otway.] That is your opinion?—It is my opinion; but my opinion is founded on facts which are open to every member of the Committee, the despatches published in the Blue Book, and what I know of the policy and the rights of Great Britain with regard to slavery in Brazil.

2971. Are you aware of all the matters connected in any way with the slave trade claims, or the despatches that may have been addressed to the Foreign Office?—I think I know all about the claims with regard to the slave trade; those are old claims on which I myself made an extensive report, and that has nothing to do with the watching of slavery in Brazil.

2972. The correspondence on this subject now does not pass through your hands, I presume?—I read the Slave Trade Blue Book every year.

2973. Are you of opinion that that Blue Book gives an account of all the correspondence on claims connected with the slave trade, which the Foreign Office may deal with between the Brazilian legation and the Foreign Office?—I was asked about watching slavery in Brazil, and I say that the correspondence about claims has nothing to do with that.

2974. The honourable Member asked you about an answer of Mr. Hammond's, given in reply to Question 588, which was this, "Those questions have subsided as regards the slave trade entirely; but there is a great deal in Brazil which those persons in this country who take an interest in matters connected with slavery think ought still to be watched over; I allude to the domestic slavery; the descendants of that system which is now happily abolished are still to be found in Brazil;" and he asked you, with reference to that question, whether that is an incorrect account of the matter, and you say that it is?—My answer was, that I thought it an entire mistake, and I adhere to that.

2975. Then I asked you whether it was not merely your opinion; and thereupon I asked whether, in support of Mr. Hammond's opinion, although the slave trade itself has ceased, there are not many questions still pending connected with the slave trade which would afford occupation to the legation at Brazil?—There is a correspondence going on now, I know, about claims of the Brazilian Government founded on slave trade claims in former years, a correspondence which was going on in my time.

2976. Which is, for all you know, now going on?—Yes; but Mr. Hammond's answer had reference to the question of watching over domestic slavery. This subject of the claims is entirely distinct from the question of domestic slavery.

2977. But would not that subject of the claims connected with slavery form occupation to the legation at Brazil; and may there not be correspondence between the legation at Brazil and the Foreign Office on the subject of these claims connected with slavery?—I am not saying that there is no occupation for the Brazilian mission; I know well what that occupation is; but I am saying that there is really little or nothing done in reference to watching domestic slavery.

2978. Mr. Rylands.] Something else has been said with reference to the amount of attention necessary on the part of our minister in Brazil in connection with British claims for debts due to this country; and I find it stated in a pamphlet just published on the diplomatic service, written, I believe, by a member of the service, that "when diplomatic relations were re-established with Brazil, after having been discontinued during some two years, it was found that the accumulated British claims to be settled by the legation at Rio amounted to about two and a half millions sterling;" seeming to imply that that had arisen in consequence of our not having a representative there; is that so?—That is altogether a fiction. The two and a half millions may be the figure at which the claims brought forward by Brazil, founded on the former slave trade transactions, may be estimated, but as regards British claims I never heard of their exceeding the sum of 300,000 l. They did not accumulate during the time of the suspension of diplomatic relations; unfortunately they existed before that suspension; some of them were 40 years old then.

2979. My question of course had reference entirely to the allegation that owing to the absence of our minister at Brazil, these great claims had accumulated; the writer goes on to say that claims of a similar amount are now accumulating in Mexico, in consequence of our not being represented there; can you say whether that is the fact?—I know nothing about Mexico, but I have no doubt that there were a large amount of claims before the suspension of relations.

2980. Then there has been reduction in the character of our mission at Monte Video, and I wish to ask you whether from your experience of South American missions you approve of that course?—I think that the change which has been made is a very ill-advised change. I quite see the justice of the complaint made by Mr. Consul Munro, of the salary which has been assigned to him, which is obviously insufficient. The representation at Monte Video is now reduced to a consul with a salary of 800 l., and an allowance of 150 l. for a clerk. At Buenos Ayres there is a consul besides the minister and the minister's staff, who receives a salary and allowance of 1,500 l. a year. But I will go further than that; I think that the arrangement which has been made for the minister at Buenos Ayres to take Monte Video under his charge is an objectionable arrangement. Monte Video and Buenos Ayres have always been rivals. In former times Monte Video was favoured by the French, Buenos Ayres by the English; and now all their interests are rival. The same objection applies to an amalgamation of Buenos Ayres and Monte Video, as I have heard stated, to a suggested amalgamation the missions of Denmark and Sweden. T Republic of the Uruguay, as it is called, is an inferior extent to the Argentine Repub But the English population in the Republic Uruguay is a very large one; I suppose the would be a hundred British subjects in Mon Video to one in Venezuela. There is a gre deal of sheep farming going on there unc Englishmen. I think it is very important th Monte Video should have an independent rep sentative, at least of the rank of consul gener I think that the change which has been made certainly an injudicious one. And another p of the arrangement strikes me with great s prise, and that is that our minister at Buen Ayres is accredited as chargé d'affaires; that with an inferior rank to Monte Video. I shou think it an unprecedented thing in the dip matic service that a man who is a minister in c place drops down in another to an inferior ran It cannot be a temptation to him to go to Mon Video, and it cannot be pleasing to the Mon Videan Government that he should come to the with a rank inferior to that which he holds Buenos Ayres.

2981. But I thought you considered that t rank of the officer was formerly too high, a that in reference to the South American missio generally, you would reduce the representati from the rank of envoy extraordinary or minist resident, to that of minister or chargé d'affaire —It has been recommended strongly that whe we have now chargés d'affaires and consuls gener we should make them ministers resident. I ha expressed my opinion that it is not necessary raise the rank in that way; but I should say th it is quite inconsistent with that proposal to rai the rank of chargé d'affaires in Venezuela, Peru, and in Chili to the rank of a minist resident, when at the same time the char d'affaires and consul general at Monte Video reduced to a consul. Venezuela has not o British subject, I suppose, to 100 in Monte Vide and yet the consul general and chargé d'affair at Monte Video is to be replaced by a consu while it is proposed to give Venezuela a mini ter resident.

2982. Mr. Otway.] In point of fact, the Sou American Republics which you have named ha not ministers resident, but chargé d'affaires?- Yes.

2983. And at this moment Monte Video h a chargé d'affaires?—With deference, it has not distinct chargé d'affaires; the minister accredit to Buenos Ayres is accredited also as a char d'affaires to Monte Video. I was asked abo that arrangement, and was expressing my opini against it.

2984. Is it not the fact that the very last th you have mentioned of these South American R publics have accredited to them chargés d'affair and consuls general, and that Monte Video h also accredited to it at this moment a char d'affaires and consul general?—There are charg d'affaires accredited to those other places whi have been named, and they are accredited those places exclusively; the difference is th Mr. Stuart, the minister in Buenos Ayres, accredited also as chargé d'affaires to Mon Video, that Monte Video has not a chargé d'a faires to itself to reside at Monte Video.

2985. I did not ask whether Mr. Stuart w accredit credited anywhere else; I asked whether the Government of Monte Video had accredited to it a chargé d'affaires; I presume that that is the fact?—The others have an integral man; Monte Video has only a fraction of a man.

2986. With reference to accrediting the same chargé d'affaires to rival states, are you aware that the Argentine Republic and other Republics accredit the same minister to France and to England, which I presume may be considered to be in the same position, and in a sense, to rival states?—I am; but I do not think that England is to follow the example of the Argentine Republic. The interests of the Argentine Republic in England are not like the interests arising out of the necessary protection to British subjects in the Argentine Republic; they do it for economy, but they are very poor governments.

2987. The consideration therefore of rivalry, as between two states, would be of no importance; it is a matter of economy?—I think that a vagrant diplomatist, a shifting representation of that sort, is very objectionable; I think that it weakens the character and the force of a minister when he is accredited to several places; of course the importance of an Argentine representative here is not to be compared for one moment to the importance of the English chargé d'affaires at Monte Video; there are a great number of British subjects to be protected, and very important interests to be looked after in Monte Video; but the Argentine minister here cares so little for the interests of his country in England that he chiefly resides in Paris; and Mr. Hammond has stated as one reason why we should send a minister resident, that one of the Spanish Governments has said, "If you do not send a minister instead of a chargé d'affaires, we shall tell our minister to live in Paris only."

2990. Viscount Barrington.] I think you have said that in the different missions clerks would be as good persons to appoint as attachés?—I think that all that is wanted to be done by attachés would be done much more conveniently and better for the minister, by the private secretaries whom I recommend. I think that one private secretary would do for the minister very much better all that he peculiarly requires from the class of attachés that now are sent to embassies and missions, and that all the copying work, and the routine work, and all work which is independent of the social duties in which a minister requires to be assisted, would be very much better done by a clerk or clerks under the secretary of embassy or legation.

2991. But you stated, did you not, that the secretary of embassy or legation was no use at all unless the chief was absent?—That is so now, but I think that the secretary of embassy or legation should be made an efficient working man, and that arrangements should be made (and would be made if the scheme which I suggest could be carried out) for having younger men as the first secretaries of embassy and legation.

2992. Supposing that there was any great pressure of business, do you suppose that the secretary of embassy or legation would absolutely refuse to help to do the work (I do not allude to his acting as consul, because the secretary would presume that that would not enter into his work)?—I should think that they generally would not; in my own case (and it is mentioned in one of those despatches which have been put in) I wished to know whether I could require work of that sort from my own secretary, Mr. Baillie, and I then stated distinctly, in asking that question, that Mr. Baillie made no difficulty, and I wished it to be understood that I meant no complaint of him. I think that the fact of secretaries doing nothing does not arise from actual refusals of individuals, but from the general feeling of chiefs that gentlemen of their age and position cannot be called upon to do copying work; and it has come to this, as you will see in many of the reports of the ministers and ambassadors, that it is considered that they are not to be counted upon for assistance in that way; indeed, I may mention (it is well known in the Foreign Office), that I remember at the time Mr. Cameron was with me, receiving a circular of Lord Malmesbury's from the Foreign Office, to the effect that secretaries, who then considered generally that they had nothing to do, were to take their fair share of the work; that has not been published, probably by inadvertence; but there is a circular issued by Lord Malmesbury in 1852, requiring secretaries to take their fair share of the work. That has been superseded by the subsequent circulars; but that shows the feeling that then existed in the Foreign Office on the subject.

2993. You quoted the opinion of Sir Henry Elliot and Lord Bloomfield, and Mr. Ffrench, with regard to these clerks; you are aware that Sir Henry Elliot stated, before this Committee, that it would not be safe to trust to the ordinary run of clerks in Russia?—I was not aware of that. I thought that Sir Henry Elliot had recommended an archivist, as he called him, a permanent officer, just as I recommended a permanent officer who would be a clerk.

2994. Lord Bloomfield, although he recommends mends that a clerk should be attached to each embassy, says that he does not in any way complain of the attachés he has under him now, and that they are perfectly competent to translate all German documents?—He does say that, but I think you will find in Lord Bloomfield's report that he speaks of objecting to attachés or secretaries being employed as drudges. I think that points to the difference. After all, what is called drudgery is honourable work; but you cannot put young men of family and fortune, who are your secretaries, to the same sort of work that you could put a clerk to, nor can you require, at least many ministers say that you cannot require, or expect them to work with the same regularity. I wish to see a system combining the advantage of the present system of secretaries or attachés with clerks, who would do, more quickly and regularly, inferior work; routine work in the mission. You must remember, that the business at embassies and missions has changed very much within the last 20 years; a great deal of commercial work has been introduced which did not formerly exist. I was talking to Sir Henry Elliot about it the other day, shortly before he came before this Committee, and Sir Henry asked me if I did not agree with him that the business now has immensely increased in every embassy and mission, and, of course, it is so. The same assistance, which was sufficient before, is not sufficient now. You cannot put new wine into old bottles.

2995. Mr. Ffrench, with regard to reducing the amount of his staff, gives an account of the immense deal of work that he had to do on a recent occasion at Madrid; but he adds, that "their attendance from 12 to six o'clock, and often later every day, including Sundays, has never failed"; and that if any of them had been incapacitated, by illness or accident, the work of the mission would have been very materially impeded?—That shows that with a large nominal staff now a minister abroad has not sufficient assistance, and I have endeavoured to suggest what I think would give the minister sufficient assistance with a smaller staff.

2996. Sir Charles Wentworth Dilke.] Are there not many missions at which there is already practically a permanent officer almost of the kind that you desire?—Yes, I believe there are. In Buenos Ayres there is a clerk; at least I presume that that gentleman who was spoken of the other day has been replaced. In Rio also there is one, and he was an invaluable aid to me. In Lisbon there is a translator who also acts as a clerk, of the insufficiency of whose salary Sir Charles Murray complains. And when I was in Switzerland I remember that there was one at Stuttgardt.

2997. At all the Eastern courts the dragoman or interpreter accomplish pretty much the same thing, do they not?—I daresay they do, but I was never at Constantinople, and therefore I cannot speak to that.

2998. In Madrid is there not a clerk?—In Madrid there is a young gentleman, the son of the consul at Rio, whom Mr. Ffrench speaks of as a most efficient assistant. Would the Committee allow me to take this opportunity of stating what I really think is fair to myself and to the Buenos Ayres clerk whom I named the other day, namely, that I have had a correspondence with Mr. Otway on the subject since, and that Mr. Otway has written me to say that as regards that Mr. Williams, whose name I mentioned and who he said had been dismissed, the cause of his removal does not involve the slightest imputation on his honour or moral trustworthiness.

3000. There is another passage in the same Report, at page 100; have you observed the statement made there by Sir Charles Murray on the salary of Mr. Duff, the translator to the legation at Lisbon?—Yes, I have just alluded to Mr. Duff and to Sir Charles Murray's complaint. I am in favour of assistance of that sort, as you know, to a mission. In a mission where Portuguese is the language, it is most important to have a paid translator, and a perfectly competent one. You cannot count for good translations upon attachés who are frequently moved, and who never remain more than two years, except under special reasons (that is the rule of the Foreign Office), and I should be for paying a translator, or clerk and translator, highly enough to keep him well, and to insure a good man, and I should try to reduce expenses in other ways. I should say that there is reason for Sir Charles Murray's complaint as to the small salary given to the translator at Lisbon.

3001. You said, I think, that you would maintain the mission in Switzerland; you think it important that we should have a minister there?—I do not know whether it has been mentioned to the Committee that not only does France keep a minister in Switzerland, but France has a representative there of the rank of an ambassador. Of course Switzerland is a very important diplomatic post for France. The representative of France in Switzerland is a representative of the highest rank, namely, an ambassador. I should not recommend that under the circumstances the same rank should be given to our representative there, but I do not think that we should reduce his rank. We are parties to a guarantee of the integrity and independence and inviolability of Switzerland, and our moral influence exerted in Switzerland is of the utmost importance perhaps for the prevention of an European war. The position of Switzerland in the centre of Europe makes it a most important point with regard to European questions, and with regard to the balance of power which we must still think of, I suppose.

3002. Would you suppress the missions at Dresden and Darmstadt?—As regards Dresden, you have heard Lord Derby's opinion, the opinion of he Secretary of State who, having suppressed mission, revived the representation there by us of a chargé d'affaires. I suppose that it ld not have been done at the time, but I ld have thought that if there was to be a chargé laires at Dresden, the same chargé d'affaires ght have been accredited both to Dresden and Coburg, as the minister formerly was accred to both, and that he might have resided at sden. But Mr. Barnard, the chargé d'affaires oburg, receives a salary which is not much er, if at all, than the pension to which he ld be entitled if he retired, and therefore as g as Mr. Barnard lives no saving could be cted by withdrawing him from Coburg. But egards Dresden and Darmstadt, I would say that I think there is a use in those places as ining places for ministers. I think that you y find very much better training for future nisters in small independent posts of that sort n by the present system of long attachéship long secretaryship in various countries. There y are the heads, and they have business to end to; and I think the keeping up of those ces can be put on larger and better grounds in necessity for our court. Germany is a great t of art and science and literature, and I nk that one of the best objects of our diplotic representation abroad is to provide interional links for the promotion of literary, entific, and artistic interests, and all the high rposes of civilisation; they are not merely for litical objects. I should say that a representae of the rank of a chargé d'affaires at Dresden or rmstadt, or Coburg, might be of great use to s nation, beyond being what has been called a litical watch-dog for the country.

3003. Mr. Butler-Johnstone.] In your opinion uld the tendency of having a permanent staff ached to our missions be to throw the whole rk on that permanent staff, and to leave the ner gentlemen attached to the mission in a nply ornamental capacity?—I would have, beles those clerks, only a private secretary for e minister, and a secretary of legation, who ould superintend them at their work; but I ink you would find now that a great deal of e work of the mission is thrown upon the clerk.

3004. Where there is no clerk, at Paris, for stance, that would not apply?—The amount work at Paris is very large, and there it is cessary to have an organisation, but Lord yons says that he derives great assistance from r. Atlee, in the embassy. There is no doubt at if you had a number of young secretaries, d a clerk also, who would be on good terms ith them, there would be a tendency to throw e work on him, but you would get the work tter done, and you would have a man always ere to do it.

3006. Mr. Arthur Russell.] Would he have to ass the same examination as members of the gular service?—I think that he might pass he pass examination at the outset, when appointed private secretary. I should not myself think it necessary, because I should think that the ambassador or minister would take care to get a man sufficiently qualified. But I object to examinations at an advanced age. I do not think that it is at all desirable to subject gentlemen of the age of 30 to examination, and I should not consider it necessary. I should consider that the private secretary would fit himself for the duties of a secretary of legation by the training which he has undergone as a private secretary of ambassadors and ministers at important embassies and missions. I hope that I may support my opinion by good authority, and without quoting it, I may say that you will find in Lord Lyons's Report, appended to the Report of the Diplomatic Committee of 1861, an admirable passage, in which he points out the great advantage that a private secretary would have for training, and how he would there fit himself in the best possible way for the performance of higher duties.

3007. Mr. Butler-Johnstone.] You would approve of the private secretary of the minister being also a member of the diplomatic profession?—While the profession exists as it is, and with what they call the block existing, it would certainly be hard upon the third secretaries for anyone else to be taken as a private secretary; but it is crippling the choice of the minister; and I do not think it is right that, according to present regulations, the private secretary of an ambassador or minister should be debarred, as the circulars debar him, from entering the chancery at any time. I think that the private secretary of an ambassador or minister even now, whether a third secretary or not, should have the same privileges and position as the secretary of any chief of an English department has, namely, that he should represent the person of his chief in the office.

3008. Mr. Cameron.] As to these private secretaries, as I understand you, you would have secretaries of legation and secretaries of embassy, and the rest of the work would be done by clerks; where would you get your secretaries of embassy or legation from if you had no attachés in the regular service?—The private secretaries would be attachés; I should also like to see junior Foreign Office clerks promoted to be secretaries of legation.

3009. The private secretary would be appointed by the ambassador or minister, according to your plan?—He would be chosen by the ambassador or minister.

3010. Then they would be promoted to be secretaries of legation and secretaries of embassy?—Yes; but not necessarily.

3011. That would throw the whole of the patronage eventually into the hands of the ambassador or minister, would it not?—It would divide the patronage, and it would give one piece of patronage to each ambassador or minister, and they would have the strongest inducement to appoint a fit man; and I think also that it would be desirable to let junior Foreign Office clerks look to these posts, and I think that the Foreign Office would be an excellent training for those posts. And besides that, I would revert to the old system which I think has its merits, of the Secretary of State choosing from time to time a stranger, taking say, one who is not an old man, from Parliament. For instance, I was selected myself myself not from any private interest, but Lord Palmerston selected me from the House of Commons to introduce me into the service as a secretary of legation, beginning my diplomatic service in that rank. Admiral Harris was sitting in the House of Commons when he was apppointed consul at Elsinore, and in a few years he became minister at Berne. I think it desirable to revert to the old system of enabling a Secretary of State to choose from outside; sometimes new blood does a great deal of good when introduced into a small service.

3012. You were in Parliament before you served abroad?—Yes.

3013. And your political principles were what are commonly called those of an advanced Liberal?—Yes, and are now.

3014. Therefore you hold principles which would lead you to advocate a reduction of expenditure in administrative departments?—Yes; but I should make a distinction between wise and unwise economy.

3015. From your diplomatic experience, gained in the diplomatic service, are you of opinion that the salaries given to the diplomatic servants, taking them from the highest to the lowest, are at present too high?—No, I think not. I have advocated a reduction in the South American missions, which I believe can be safely made. I think that the South American Governments are not understood in the Foreign Office, not more than Persia, perhaps. But I think that in Europe certainly I do not see my way to any reduction, unless by a reduction of expenses in the staffs by the plan that I have suggested, and by the introduction of fees. I think I should say even, that the ambassador at St. Petersburgh certainly is underpaid, and it strikes me as a very hard thing, as I have seen it stated, that 200*l.* a year should have been taken from Sir Andrew Buchanan's salary to eke out payment for a house. I should say that, in Berlin and Vienna, and also in Constantinople, the salaries of the ambassadors should all be placed on the same footing as at Paris.

3016. You cannot point to any instance where you think that a reduction could be made in the salary or allowances to any member of the diplomatic service in Europe?—There is no doubt whatever that the junior members of the diplomatic service are paid low.

3017. I suppose that they are rather underpaid than otherwise?—They are paid low, and they naturally all grumble at their payment. But on the other hand you must consider this also, that they do not give, in return for the payment which they receive, the same sort of work as you would have from clerks, and that is admitted by all ambassadors and ministers.

3018. But taking into consideration the position of these gentlemen, which the present system renders it necessary that they should hold, you could not safely or fairly reduce the salaries of any of them?—They go into the service knowing the service will not keep them; they go into the service knowing that under the present system (which differs from what it was when I entered the service) no one can begin as attaché unless he can count on 600*l.* a year; they go into the service from motives other than motives of remunerative pay. But the result is not satisfactory I think, because they grumble and think that they ought to be paid higher. I should have only a sufficient number of assistants enable you to pay each one enough to meet l expenses.

3019. With regard to the regulation in t diplomatic service about stationery for the u of the missions, what is the regulation; w supplies the stationery?—The stationery generally supplied by the minister, and I thi that that is an objectionable arrangement in self. It appears that in Paris and Constan nople the ambassador is allowed to charge t stationery to the public, but I think that those a the only two missions where stationery is allowe I should say that it is very desirable that every mission the stationery should be paid b by the public.

3020. Mr. Otway.] The minister has allowance for it, has he not?—No; and it certainly fair that if the stationery at Paris a Constantinople is paid for, it should be paid at the other missions also. I think that there no public office in England where all the e ployés are not allowed to use public statione Now there is a very good remark made in one the reports from secretaries, Mr. Thurlow, which he complains very much of the gene belief that a diplomatic servant is invested w various privileges, that he gets his postage fr and is allowed stationery and so on, and wishes the public to be disabused of that id I do not know of any service in which there s so few privileges for the junior members as t diplomatic service.

3021. Mr. Holmes.] You stated to the Co mittee, at a previous examination, that the Brit minister at the several South American missic has no political duties to perform, but that work really refers to the protection of Briti subjects, and to our commercial interests: a we to understand from that, that it is qu unnecessary, in your opinion, to have both dip matic representatives and consuls in the ch towns of those countries which are ports?—I not think that it is unnecessary to have a dipl matic representative, but the diplomatic rep sentative need not have a higher rank than th of chargé d'affaires. I would combine the dipl matic and consular functions, as they are n at most of them, in a chargé d'affaires and cons general. By saying that the minister has political duties to perform, I meant no dut with reference to great questions of policy.

3022. Our commercial transactions with t different states of South America are very larg I believe, much greater than those of any oth nation, either in Europe or America?—Yes, believe they are.

3023. We have also a large carrying tra with those states, that is to say, a large propo tion of the trade between them and other cou tries is carried on in British vessels?—Yes.

3024. The money value of the exports ar imports between the United Kingdom and th South American States will not fully represen therefore, the extent of the duties discharged b our consuls there?—I have no doubt it will no I am not at all for under-valuing the duties wi reference to commerce which devolve on o representatives in South America.

3025. When you went out to Brazil in 185 you have explained to us that you carried ou certain instructions which placed the consuls i that country under your superintendence; wi y explain to what extent you exercised super-ndence and control over the consuls under r instructions; they were to correspond with

. you have explained, but to what extent did consider yourself warranted to interfere with n, independently of the Foreign Office?—I sidered that the consuls were entirely subinate to me, under my responsibility to the eign Office. The instructions which I carl out were in entire accordance with that
n. I may tell you that though those instrucs were then newly framed, and though, as I the other day, they excited very great sure in the minds of some of the consuls, there o doubt whatever that the principle of entire subordination of consuls to the minister had been frequently laid down in the Foreign Office, in despatches written in individual cases. I remember distinctly a despatch of Lord Palmerston's arising out of a difference of opinion between the consul at Buenos Ayres and the minister, in which the principle of the entire subordination of the consul to the minister was most clearly laid down; but though it appeared from time to time in despatches, arising out of particular cases, it was never published in a clear and distinct form; and I can quite understand that the consuls may have been honestly and fairly under the delusion that they were independent of the minister.

Mr. Christie.

3026. Mr. Holms.] I PRESUME that you are aware that Sir Richard Pakenham spoke or wrote most approvingly to the Consular Committee of 1858 of the arrangement by which the consuls of South America were placed under the superintendence of the resident minister?—Yes, I remember reading that in Sir Richard Pakenham's evidence before the Committee on Official Salaries; but that probably refers to some special instructions given to him in Mexico, and I do not know how they were carried out.

3027. The correspondence carried on between the Foreign Office and our missions in South America will relate almost exclusively, I suppose, to commercial questions?—It relates almost exclusively to general questions of commercial interest, and to cases affecting individuals, cases involving the necessity of protection of individuals, merchants most often, against illegal or unjust acts.

3028. Chiefly arising out of their commercial transactions?—The British residents in the capitals of South America are generally persons carrying on commerce.

3029. Do you consider the present mode of selecting our consuls, that is to say, through political influence, a good one for securing men with the special qualifications that would enable them to discharge their duties satisfactorily?—Your question assumes that consuls are now appointed entirely or chiefly through political or private influence, and I am not prepared to contradict you on that point; I think that nothing but improvement could arise from giving more power to ministers in the different countries for recommendation of fit persons to be appointed consuls, and more particularly for the promotion of vice consuls to consulates in the different countries in which ministers are placed.

3030. Would not the danger of having purely commercial questions dealt with by gentlemen trained in politics and diplomacy be greatly increased also by your proposition to abolish the consulates and retain the political missions only?—I am recommending, for economy and for the better and more consistent conduct of business, that in capitals which are ports, the consular establishment should be merged in the diplomatic mission; that is, that the consular work should be done under the superintendence and responsibility of ministers who are highly responsible persons, and who ought to be fit for the posts to which they are assigned.

3031. In most cases those ministers are not acquainted with commercial life; would they be, therefore, as efficient in such posts as men who were accustomed to commercial life, which our consuls usually are?—The greatest part of the work would not be done by the ministers themselves; the work would be done under the superintendence and responsibility of the ministers by trained persons, persons accustomed to the detail of consular business, and capable of managing it; and, again, the ministers, however they may be originally appointed, are persons who have gone through a long training, and if they are not they ought to be fit persons for their posts.

3033. But have you not found, from your experience, that gentlemen trained in politics and diplomacy receive with some considerable indifference any applications made to them on commercial matters, and do not take them to be so much within their duty?—I can speak for myself, and from my own experience, and I feel confident that I was never open to the charge of indifference rence to any commercial interests which were ought under my notice. I may say that your estion suggests the observation which I am now out to make. For our representatives in South merica, who I have recommended should be iformly of the rank of chargé d'affaires and nsul general, not higher ever, sometimes per- ps of the rank of a consul general instead of chargé d'affaires and consul general. I think at the plan which has been carried out in later ars of sending almost exclusively secretaries of gation to those appointments, is not so good as at which was before adopted. There was a fferent class of men when first I knew South merica. Some of them had been appointed Lord Palmerston, who selected men that ew South America. These were men who d served in the Wars of Independence of South merica, and knew the South American service as then open; and I should say, generally, at for those appointments, persons who had d a consular training, who had filled consulates South America, would be fit persons for pro- otion.

3034. Mr. Frederick Walpole.] Would you ame any one of those officers who fought in the War of Independence who succeeded in his di- lomatic services in South America?—I can ame two whom I can remember as having heard Sir Belford Wilson and Mr. O'Leary. Sir elford Wilson was at Venezuela, and Mr. O'Leary was in Colombia. I corresponded with Mr. O'Leary, and the impression which the cor- espondence produced on my mind was certainly at he was an able man.

3035. Mr. Holms.] But the political duties of ur representatives in those countries being so ominal as, in my opinion, you have established ey are, would there not be less difficulty in aving those duties performed by a commercial epresentative, than there would be in having e more important commercial work performed y a diplomatic representative?—I am much bliged to you for saying that I have esta- lished what I stated. I said that there are no reat questions of policy arising in the South American missions with reference to which ou would desire to influence your diplomatic olleagues, as well as the Government itself; ut I am not prepared to say that there are o political questions to be dealt with. There re political questions relating to South America, political questions between the En- lish Government and the particular South American government; and with reference to he protection of British subjects, and securing stice for individuals, it is necessary that the epresentative should not only be a person ac- uainted with commerce, but that he should be like- ise acquainted with questions of international aw. You want not a mere merchant, of course do not speak disrespectfully of merchants, but ou want a man of general education and attain- nents, and a man of general ability. You may ind such men among merchants certainly, but hose men are to be found elsewhere also. You want also persons well acquainted with the lan- guage.

3036. In the answer that you gave to Question 2690, you speak of the consular establishment as being suppressed, and "merged in the mission;" do not you think that if we had in those parts a man thoroughly well acquainted with commerce, and at the same time understanding perfectly well any political duties of the character that they have to perform, he would do the work of the country far better, because really the main work he has to do relates to commerce, and the cases are so few (you say yourself that there are almost none) in which they relate to diplomacy?—Certainly, if you had a person well acquainted with commerce, and also an able and well instructed man in other respects, he would be a fit man for such posts.

3037. Have you found in your own experience any difficulty in getting such men, good commercial men, who really could manage any of those difficult questions?—It has never fallen to me to look out for persons to appoint to those posts.

3038. Mr. Eastwick.] With reference to the abolition of the consulships, or their being merged in the political department in South America, that refers only to head-quarters, I suppose; because there are a great number of consulships, indeed a majority of them, so distant from head-quarters that they must necessarily be filled, I suppose you would admit, by consular officers?—I have spoken only of capitals. Of course with reference to distant posts, there must be a distinct office at them; but that consular office would be under the superintendence and supervision of the minister; and I need not tell you that of late years, in all countries, the means of communication between out-ports and the capital has increased by railways and telegraphic wires.

3039. With reference to the plan which you have mentioned of having a clerk to assist the chargé d'affaires, or consul general, or whatever he may be called at the seat of Government, do you see any objection to having a junior diplomatic officer as private secretary to that chief instead of a clerk?—I do not think that there would be any material difference between a clerk and a private secretary; and one whom the chargé d'affaires would select, would be a person whom he knew well, and whom he would trust, and whom he could thoroughly rely on, and who would be his friend as well as his secretary.

3040. And in case of the absence of the chief that junior officer, as private secretary, might, I suppose, take charge of the office until his chief returned?—If he were a fit man.

3041. That would obviate the necessity of the consul's coming up from very distant parts, as for instance from Maracaibo to take charge of the chief office at Caracas; there being a junior diplomatic officer as private secretary at Caracas, it would obviate the necessity of that long journey?—When you speak of a junior diplomatic officer, you speak, of course, with reference to the existing system. I have in my mind the system I have recommended, and if a private secretary were appointed, I think he would be to all intents a junior diplomatic officer. If he were a fit man he would be a very proper person to replace his chief when away; but then with regard to bringing consuls from out-ports to take temporary charge of the mission, there is an advantage in that system. A consul can, more or less, easily find a person to replace him while he is away from the inferior consulate; and the consul is a known man, and might be a fitter man to undertake the temporary charge of the mission, and it might also be an opening for him to make himself known to the Foreign Office and the Secretary of State.

3042. Still there would be, I suppose, the disadvantage in the first place of expense, in the second place of delay, and in the third place of ignorance of the immediate interests going on?—Sometimes there may be inconvenience in the bringing away of consuls; sometimes you may not be able to get a consul to come.

3043. Now, I wish to turn to another subject. We have been told in answer to Question 590, that the Foreign Office, as a general rule, "abide by a dictum of Lord Palmerston's, that the Government is not bound to extricate bondholders in this country from the difficulties in which they are involved." I wish to ask you, in reference to that answer, whether your experience can suggest any instances of interference on the part of our diplomatic or consular officers to obtain a settlement of the claims of bondholders?—I was no sooner appointed chargé d'affaires and consul-general at Buenos Ayres, but I was applied to by the Buenos Ayres bondholders to assist them, as a predecessor had assisted them, to get a debt, and great arrears of interest paid. I did so; and I did so under instructions from the Foreign Office; I corresponded on the subject with the Foreign Office, and I was fortunate enough to aid in bringing the affair to a satisfactory conclusion, and to enable the bondholders to get better terms than they had expected. It was a very old debt, amounting to about 2,000,000 l. altogether, and the Buenos Ayres bondholders were so pleased with what I had done that they presented me with plate to the value of 500 l., which I received with the permission of the Foreign Office.

3044. Are there any other cases besides your own in which diplomatic officers or consular officers have successfully interfered for the settlement of such claims?—I do not remember at present any other case, but I should think it most likely that in other South American countries ministers have assisted bondholders to get payment; I do remember now that during the time that I was in Buenos Ayres there was a matter going on in Monte Video, the details of which I forget, but our chargé d'affaires there, Mr. Thornton, was very much occupied with the settlement of a debt question, and he succeeded also.

3045. Do you think that if there was no interference on the part of our diplomatic officers the South American governments would conscientiously discharge their obligations?—Well I am afraid that the general rule has been that they are not conscientious in the discharge of their obligations, and therefore it has been necessary to call in the aid of our representatives to assist bondholders to get what was right. It stands to reason that if a British representative is to endeavour to get justice in a foreign country for one, the case becomes very much more important when a large number of British subjects are interested.

3046. Are you at all aware whether the representatives of other European powers, too, support the claims of bondholders and take up their cases?—I think that Englishmen have been the great lenders; a large number of these loans were contracted soon after the States became independent, and then the loans were obtained exclusively in England, and it has been much more an English question than a question interesting any other government. But in the case of Monte Video, to which I have referred, and the details of which I do not remember, I forget how the debt arose, but it was a government debt; there the French were also interested, and I know that Mr. Thornton being our chargé d'affaires acted with a French commissioner who was specially sent out for the purpose, a member of the French diplomatic service, who afterwards became minister in Mexico.

3047. Have you ever received any instructions, or any circular, calling upon you to abstain, as a general rule, from such interference for bondholders?—Certainly not; the only circular on the subject which I know was the circular to which I was about to allude, and that was in a contrary sense. That circular tells every government that the English Government have never given up, and that they claim their right of interfering in these questions, and that it is only a question of convenience and discretion whether in a particular case they interfere officially, and with force, or not. That is published in Dr. Phillimore's book on International Law, at the beginning of the second volume.

3048. Are you at all aware whether consuls in South America have been allowed by the Foreign Office to assist in arrangements made by British capitalists for lending money to the South American governments, and do you know any cases in which they have received a per-centage for collecting payments from those governments for the dividends of the bondholders?—I know this, that very soon after I was appointed at Buenos Ayres, I received a letter from a gentleman of high position connected with the Buenos Ayres bondholders, and largely interested in Buenos Ayres (it was not Mr. Baring), requesting me to undertake their work there, and offering me a per-centage which he told me had before been offered, and allowed by the Foreign Office to be accepted by a predecessor of mine, at Buenos Ayres. My reply to him was that what he said surprised me, and that it seemed to me that the acting in that way was quite inconsistent with the duty and position of a minister; and I thought it right to send the letter with my answer to Lord Wodehouse, who was then Under Secretary. And I have heard of other cases, and I know that it has been the practice with chargés d'affaires and consuls in South America to receive per-centages, or to receive remuneration.

3049. Mr. Rylands.] Do you say that that had been done before with the consent and concurrence of the Foreign Office?—The statement made to me in this letter to which I refer was that a predecessor of mine had acted in this way with the consent of the Foreign Office; but I say that I sent the letter, and my reply to it, to Lord Wodehouse, who was then Under Secretary. I am quite certain that if my predecessor acted in that way, he acted so believing that he was acting rightly.

3050. Mr. Richard Shaw.] May I ask what answer you received from Lord Wodehouse?—My impression is that I did not receive any answer; he may have spoken to me on the subject, but I was in frequent communication with Lord Wodehouse at that time; I do not think that my letter required an answer.

3051. Did he ever express any opinion to you on the subject?—I do not remember that he did, but I think I could be pretty sure what Lord Wodehouse's opinion would be. He knew that I had declined to undertake this commission.

3052. Mr. Otway.]

3052. Mr. Otway.] Did your letter ask for any opinion at all?—No, it did not. I had declined, and I sent the correspondence to Lord Wodehouse for his information, and for my protection, if necessary.

3053. Mr. Eastwick.] I wish now to turn to another subject; I wish to ask, whether while you were at Rio or at Buenos Ayres there were many marriages celebrated at the consulates or missions, either between English subjects and other English subjects, or mixed marriages between English subjects and natives of the country?—There were not many either in Buenos Ayres or in Rio. It so happened that in the River Plate I was accredited to the Argentine Confederation, which was then distinct from Buenos Ayres, and their capital was a place called Paraná. At Paraná there were one or two marriages celebrated in the mission; and in Rio, I think, there were two or three while I was there; but I may tell you, as regards Buenos Ayres, that there there is a special Argentine law, making marriages celebrated according to the English law and English rites in the English chapel at Buenos Ayres valid marriages in that country; and therefore in Buenos Ayres there is no necessity for persons going to the mission or to the consulate.

3054. But if there was not that special law, there would, of course, be an absolute necessity for going to the consulate or mission to ensure validity; there would be a necessity for going to the consulate or mission, if marriages were not made valid as they are by a special Buenos Ayres law when celebrated in the English chapel.

3055. Are mixed marriages performed in the consulates and missions recognised by the South American governments as valid?—No; at least there is this special provision for marriages between British subjects performed according to the English rites and law, in the chapel in Buenos Ayres; in Rio there is no such provision. But marriage, for instance, between an Englishman and a Roman Catholic lady, celebrated at a mission or consulate, would not, under any circumstances, be held valid in a Roman Catholic country unless the requirements of the Roman Catholic religion were fulfilled.

3056. Do you know any cases of marriages being so celebrated in which the requirements were not fulfilled?—No.

3057. But in case of such instances, I suppose the succession to property and inheritance on the part of the wife would be lost?—The inheritance would be lost if the marriage were not a valid marriage according to the laws of the country.

3058. Did you receive at Rio or at Buenos Ayres from the Foreign Office any recent instructions or circular with reference to marriages?—No, I do not think I did. I remember a circular with reference to marriages performed in foreign countries according to the lex loci, and I think I was in the service when that circular was sent out, a circular informing us that any such marriage performed in a foreign country according to the lex loci would not be held valid in England if it were a marriage contrary to the provisions of the English law.

3059. Are any precautions taken at the missions to prevent irregular marriages?—The state of the case with reference to marriages performed at missions, I think I may briefly tell you, is this. It is necessary that the marriage should be celebrated by a clergyman of the Church of England in the house or chapel (if there is a chapel, as at Paris, attached to the embassy) of the ambassador or minister. I found, when I went to Switzerland in 1850 (I think you have got before you Mr. Hammond's evidence before the Marriage Law Commission, and I have read it), a practice existing, and forms furnished to the mission, I believe, from the Foreign Office, requiring from any two persons wishing to be married, before they were married, that they should make a declaration on oath that either they were both of age, or, if not of age, that there was the consent of parents, and that there was no impediment from consanguinity or affinity, or any other legal impediment to their marriage. The forms of that declaration were furnished, I believe, from the Foreign Office; indeed, I know they were. I found none in Brazil, and I had occasion to write to the Foreign Office for these forms, and they were sent out to me immediately. This declaration on oath was required; but there was no time of delay prescribed; and as Mr. Hammond has stated in that evidence, two persons might come and ask to be married, and it was a matter resting with the discretion of the minister or ambassador how soon or how long after their first appearance they were married; they might have been married within an hour after their first appearance, if the minister chose. One or two cases arose in Switzerland when I was there as chargé d'affaires, and I felt a difficulty about them. I remember one case occurring, where I thought it very desirable to make as much delay as I could, and I did so, and I then wrote to the Foreign Office, submitting to them certain points on which I thought it was very desirable that we should have more precise information. My despatch was referred to the law advisers, and the answer was sent to the mission at Berne just after I left (it was sent about the end of 1854), and the point of it was, that it was the duty of a minister to exercise considerable discretion, and to make inquiries on certain points, and to warn parties coming before him, on certain points, before he consented to the celebration of the marriage at the mission. One of those points was the question arising out of the requirements of the Swiss law for a valid Swiss marriage, and I was told, or my successor was told, that it was the duty of the minister to warn parties who came to be married, an English man with a Swiss woman, or an English woman with a Swiss man, as to the requirements of the Swiss law, and as to the inconveniences which might arise from those requirements not being fulfilled by the Swiss party to the marriage.

3060. I just want to ask whether there is any printed form of warning to be given to parties in such cases?—No; and I think that there is a defect here; I think that the Foreign Office administration has been imperfect here; I think it is a defect that there has been no proper form of instructions from the Foreign Office supplied to ministers as to their duty with regard to these marriages; I think there was no information on the subject supplied to missions until the year 1867, that is to say, until then there was no instruction whatever to ministers. And I may state with reference to that instruction of 1867, that it refers to the very point which I had raised in the year 1854, and with reference to which the law advisers had given a very distinct opinion; and I was surprised to find

Mr. Christie. find that in 1854, the law advisers' opinion had not been turned into a circular.

3061. You refer to the circular of February the 28th 1867?—Yes.

3062. Then I would ask you whether you think it desirable that the notice which is required in the consulates as to marriages, that is to say, seven and 21 days should be extended also to the missions?—I do not mention any precise time, but I think that there should be some period of delay within which inquiries might be made, and some publicity given to the intention of two parties to be married at the mission. A case arose, I remember, in Berne, which gave great trouble to Sir Andrew Buchanan, of an Englishman being married under a false name; married, according to the practice, a very short time after he first presented himself. When it was found that he had been married under a false name, great alarm was felt by the Swiss family, a daughter of which had married this gentleman; but the matter was referred to the law officers, and the marriage was held to be valid.

3063. Do you think that attention might usefully be called to this subject in the examination of the junior diplomatic servants?—I think it is most important; I heard the question put the other day by a Member of this Committee to Mr. Walrond; I think it most important that not only the examination for attachés, but that the examination for Foreign Office clerks also should include the subject of what is called private international law.

3065. Do you propose to impose greater restrictions on British subjects in Paris or other places where embassies or legations exist than are imposed here?—I do not know if there would be the same facilites for adopting the license plan at missions, but I think in foreign capitals a minister would be likely to be imposed upon; a minister does not, of course, know all the persons coming to a capital wishing to be married; I do not remember the details of practice here, but I presume that license is not given without knowledge of the parties, and without some requirements that would test the propriety of it. I am quite satisfied of this, that it would be very desirable in every way that there should be a time of delay; and the Legislature and the Foreign Office have recognised that in the delay which they interpose in the case of persons wishing to be married at consulates.

3066. Do you propose that such a period of delay should be imperative?—Certainly, as it is in consulates.

3067. Take the case of persons, one of whom is approaching death, and who wish under those circumstances to be married; supposing the case of persons coming from India, and, under the circumstances which I have supposed, staying at Cairo, it may be very desirable that the marriage ceremony should be performed immediately, may it not?—One cannot provide for all possible cases; often legislation is but a choice of evils; but I am recommending only what has been adopted as to marriages performed at consulates; I am recommending that there should be some delay, and the minister knowing his duty, being instructed by the Foreign Office as to what his duty is, knowing what discretion he can exercise, would, I should think, in most cases interpose some delay; I have said that in a case which arose at Berne, where I had particular reasons to think that it was very desirable to interpose delay, I did do so, but I felt some uneasiness about it, and that led me to write to the Foreign Office to ask how far I was right in exercising discretion; the matter was referred to the law officers, and they stated that I was right in exercising discretion; I think that that opinion should have been turned into a circular.

3068. Do I rightly understand you to say that the delay should be prescribed in order that the ambassador might make inquiries?—That would be the object. In the case I have alluded to, it struck me that if I had a discretionary power, it was most important for me to try and make some delay in order that the friends of the lady might get some information as to what was going on. I exercised that discretion, and took on myself the responsibility, and I feel now that I did right.

3069. But does not that very circumstance to which you allude show that it should be left in the discretion of the minister, or any person acting for him, rather than that there should be any imperative delay?—In that case there were no instructions, and I did not know whether I was justified in exercising the discretion which I did.

3070. There is nothing to prevent a minister, is there, from stopping a marriage in his discretion, where he thinks that circumstances might render it desirable; but if you made the delay imperative, on the other hand, and required a certain time to elapse before any case of marriage, you might subject parties to great inconvenience?—I think that a week's delay (it is 21 days at consulates I believe) would not be a serious impediment.

3071. You would make the law of marriage for British subjects abroad different from the law of marriage here?—If it is so (which I am not prepared to say), the difference already exists; you have made a law for marriages performed at consulates, which is different from the English law as you state it.

3072. Mr. Rylands.] Leaving out of question the delay, does the circular of February 1867 cure the defect previously felt in regard to instructions on this subject?—That instruction of 1867 applies only to the point that a marriage between, say, an Englishman and a Swiss lady, or an English lady and a Swiss man, would not be valid in Switzerland unless the Swiss law were complied with. That is the only point to which the instruction of 1867 goes. The despatch which was sent to Berne in answer to my application to the Foreign Office for instruction on some points, went beyond that.

3073. Then, in your judgment, the Foreign Ministers have not sufficient instructions from the Foreign Office to enable them to act in relation to marriages at missions?—I thought, decidedly, in 1854 that they had not, and I think so still.

3074. And the deficiency that you thought existed in 1854 in the instructions, you do not think is cured by the instructions sent out in February 1867?—Not entirely; with regard to the question which Mr. Otway has put to me, I wish to read a statement of Mr. Hammond's (made

19 May 1870.

…e before the Marriage Laws Commission), … which I agree, and in which he supports … I have been saying: "With respect to …iage in Paris," he means in other capitals … "I think it would be a very fair condition …one of the parties should reside in the locality …e same way as in England, a certain number …ys before the marriage takes place, for there …thing, as far as I know, to prevent any two …le starting from London by the mail to-…t, making their declaration to-morrow, and …g married the next morning at the embassy …el; this of course gives very great facility …landestine marriages."

…075. Mr. William Cartwright.] You have …tioned the case of a marriage in which a false …aration was made, but which proved to be …l?—No, the man did not make a false de…ation; he was married under a false name; … that point has been decided over and over …n, that if a person is known, he cannot …fit by the fraud of a false name, and the …iage is valid.

…076. Mr. Otway.] You have just read an …act from an answer made by Mr. Hammond; …t that extract distinctly an opinion as to the …nilation of the conditions of marriage be…en British subjects abroad and those that … at home?—Not if you are right in saying … a person can obtain a license at home with…any term of residence or any delay.

…077. Did I say so?—I understood you to say …

…078. You misunderstood me?—If so, then … make no objection to the proposal which I …e made, that at missions delay should be in…osed.

…079. Mr. Kinnaird.] We have heard of the … of audience conceded by foreign sovereigns …n ambassador, but not to a minister of infe… rank; do you attach any importance to that? …ertainly; it is impossible not to attach im…ance to that right; as long as it is con…d to the ambassador, it is of course very …ortant.

…080. You would keep up the ambassadors …n at St. Petersburgh and Constantinople, and …uld give them additional salaries?—I would …tainly keep up ambassadors as long as foreign …opean sovereigns give a right of audience to …ambassador and will not give it to an inferior …ister; but then you might, by negotiation …h foreign governments, obtain an agreement … the purpose of extending that right to …isters of inferior rank. We were for some …e without an ambassador at St. Petersburgh … Vienna, and that was in consequence of …ssia having discontinued an ambassador.

…081. There would be nothing discourteous to … foreign courts if we were to negotiate that …isters should have that right of audience?—I …not see that there would be anything dis…pectful in an application to the Emperor of …ance or to the Emperor of Russia to come into …cert with us as to the rank of our represen…ives.

…082. Your impression is that it would be …nted?—That, of course, I cannot say; when …vent out as minister to the Argentine Republic, …was in consequence of an arrangement between … English Government and the French govern…nt as to the rank that our representatives there …uld hold.

3083. You have dwelt at some length on the private secretaries that you have recommended being a better aid for ambassadors or ministers than the attachés or secretaries now provided?—I think that the private secretary would be a better aid, for all social purposes, and one private secretary would do all that the minister could want for those purposes.

3084. Would that scheme bear on the block, or in any way cure the block, that we have heard of in the service, which is a block of second and third secretaries waiting for promotion?—Of course, if that scheme were adopted, it would diminish very much the number of aspirants for promotion, and I agree with Sir Henry Elliot who has said that the only way of getting rid of this block is to diminish the number of persons looking for promotion.

3085. How would you propose to provide for junior secretaries in carrying out the scheme of private secretaries?—First of all, there are some 30 embassies and missions, and one of the junior secretaries would probably be taken by each ambassador or minister for his private secretary, and many junior secretaries would then get better posts; then, I have recommended that some clerks of the same grade and education as the Foreign Office clerks should be sent to European embassies; that would provide for some; I think that some of them should be put into the Foreign Office as vacancies arise.

3086. Would you rely on the consular service for drafting junior secretaries into it?—No, I think that the consular service is capable of very great reduction; as Lord Malmesbury told you it requires revision, and Lord Derby says that it wants organisation. You may reduce a great deal in the consular service, and I should not look to that in the way that you suggest.

3087. Mr. Hammond told us that there is a difficulty on account of the different pension systems obtaining in the two departments, in moving men from the Foreign Office to the diplomatic service; is that so?—No, it is not so, and it is not so in consequence of the Act passed last year; there is a special provision in that Act which facilitates transfer from the Foreign Office; there is a special provision enabling the Treasury to deal with those cases, and to provide a proper superannuation allowance.

3088. I did not quite understand what you said on the last day as to pensions for ministers at first and second missions, and for chargé d'affaires; will you be kind enough to state that again?—What I said was, that I thought that the pensions for first and second-class missions should be equalised; with one single exception, and that is the minister at Buenos Ayres, who is only a minister plenipotentiary, all the holders of second-class missions have the title of envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary; and the former Pension Act assigned simply the pension of 1,300*l.* a year for every envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary who having been 15 years in the service had served five years in that rank, and I think that they should be equalised; and I do not see why a chargé d'affaires who, according to the rules of diplomatic rank settled by the Congress of Vienna, holds an inferior rank to envoys extraordinary and ministers plenipotentiary, should be placed on the same scale for a pension with envoys extraordinary and ministers plenipotentiary of the second class.

3089. Can you tell me as to the conditions of the diplomatic pensions, how the condition of 10 years' service is estimated; is it 10 years of actual service abroad, or is it 10 years of holding an appointment, whether on leave or not?—I believe I may say, indeed I know, that the 10 years are not 10 years of actual service abroad; but 10 years of service holding an appointment, whether on leave or not, are sufficient to satisfy that condition.

3090. I think that you were agent and consul general during a part of your 15 years of service?—Yes, for about three years in Mosquito, in Central America.

3091. And was not Sir Charles Wyke in the same position; was not he also agent and consul general and chargé d'affaires during a portion of his career?—He was chargé d'affaires and consul general for a portion of his time; but he was also only consul general for a portion, and his case is not on all fours with mine; but a pension having been given to him for 15 years' service, part of which was a consul general, he has been recalled into active service, and at this time, if there was any doubt as to the legality of the pension given to him, it now makes no difference to him, because he has served, or may serve, long enough as minister to be entitled to the pension.

3092. You spoke of a correspondence when you were in Brazil about the blacks, former slaves, liberated or promised to be liberated by the Brazilian Government; would that be a part of the correspondence spoken of by Mr. Hammond as occupying the Brazilian mission so much, and now still occupying it, in connection with slavery?—There was a great deal of correspondence on that subject in my time; but that correspondence, I may say, has entirely ceased. If there were any correspondence on that subject it would come within the Slave Trade Series, and I may say that in consequence of what passed the other day I have referred to the Slave Trade Blue Books, and I can give some accurate and minute statements as to the quantity of correspondence now with regard to slavery from the Brazil mission. First of all, I would say that in the year 1860, during which I was minister, I find that I wrote home 164 despatches on general subjects, which would include all the correspondence about claims, and 23 despatches under the Slave Trade Series. I have here the number of despatches of the Slave Trade Series for three years since the renewal of relations. In the year 1866 Mr. Thornton sent home 10 despatches of the Slave Trade Series; in 1867 he wrote home seven; and in 1868 Mr. Mathew wrote home one.

3094. Is that still in force?—There is still a Slave Trade department.

3095. What has been the rank of our representative in Paraguay?—In Paraguay, when I was there, there was a consul; and President Lopez, the father of the Lopez who has just died, was very anxious that we should send him a chargé d'affaires. It was a mere matter of vanity on his part, but he was very anxious that we should send him a chargé d'affaires, and he would do nothing unless we sent him a chargé d'affaires. However, there were very few British subjects there, and it certainly was not desirable to appoint a chargé d'affaires. Later, the minister of Buenos Ayres (thi think, was in the year 1865) was also accred to Paraguay with the rank of minister, same rank which he held at Buenos Ay not as he has lately been accredited to M Video with the lower rank of chargé d' affai But he never went up there, and it was one the complaints of the last Lopez that he was properly treated, because the minister ne went up to present his credentials.

3096. During the recent disturbances were ever consulted?—No, I stated the other day I was never consulted about Paraguay. W you, I presume, refer to is, the imprisonments, murders and tortures of British subjects wh took place lately, and on which very little been said in this country; but, I look on th imprisonments and tortures and murders British subjects as quite derogatory to our c racter as a nation, and destructive of our pres in those parts.

3097. How do you account for the fact that notice was taken by the Foreign Office of th murders?—I do not say that no notice whate was taken by the Foreign Office of those murde but the public generally do not interest the selves very much in South American countri Members of the House of Commons have not terested themselves in them, and it would extremely desirable that there should be m interest taken in those countries. And, certain speaking with feeling upon this subject, for, I clare that I shudder when I think of what been done to humble British subjects in Pa guay, of which no notice has been taken blush for my country almost when I think of I think that our relations with Paraguay (I sp deliberately) would be found, if investigated a Committee of the House of Commons, to b proof of bad management on the part of Foreign Office.

3098. Is there any specific recommendat that you would make for improvement of management of our business in the South Ar rican States?—I think that the great thing t is wanted in the management of our business the South American States is more continu attention, on fixed principles, by the Fore Office to South American countries, and to c interests there. I am able to revert with v great satisfaction to the time when I was mi ter in the River Plate during three years. Dur that time the senior clerk of that department the Foreign Office, who is a man of very gr ability, paid great attention to the River Pl subjects, under Lord Wodehouse, the Un Secretary, who gave as much attention to Bue Ayres affairs as to European affairs. L Wodehouse was a very remarkable man, a Lord Clarendon, assisted by Lord Wodeho and Mr. Spring Rice, gave minute attenti also to those subjects. But I have known tim when the department has not given by a means the same attention to South Americ subjects; and in an office like the Foreign Offi of course a great deal must depend on t way in which the clerk of department and t Under Secretary manage the business. There a in these countries a great number, more or less, old subjects of claims, claims which excite continu irritation, which may, for a considerable tim have been neglected, and the neglect of whi causes other claims to arise. When I was in t River Plate I was aided by the minute attenti giv by Mr. Spring Rice, Lord Wodehouse, and Clarendon, to settle the claims of British ts, some of them very old claims, to amount of 200,000 l. When I went to I found claims there of 300,000 l., many em 30 or 40 years old. I was not able to ed in getting a settlement of them. I say impossible that claims of that sort should accumulating and arrive at that age with- nismanagement on the part of the Foreign e; and I would recommend, certainly before ing into any question of raising the rank r representatives in South American mis- that a Committee of the House of nons should inquire into, and have before all the pending questions with regard to s, and that some decided steps should be to get a proper settlement of them before ng any alteration in the nature of our diplo- relations in those countries.

99. There is an increasing number of British cts settling in those countries, is there not? ere is a great emigration to the River Plate. a fine healthy climate, and I was mentioning ther day that there are a number of young of family who go out to Monte Video for farming, and also to some of the provinces e Argentine Republic.

00. The trade is increasing also, is it not?—

01. Would you have a limit of age or of when a minister should retire; have you view upon that point?—I should say that if have a very good and experienced minister mbassador in an important place, probably n certain limits and certain conditions, he d improve with age and experience. I ld say that it was most desirable that you ld in important embassies and missions profit ie wisdom which experience has given.

02. Then you would not fix any period at h the minister should retire?—I should not ny limit certainly.

03. Mr. Richard Shaw.] When you spoke ther day of a consul in the Brazils who was ected with a railway speculation, did you tion that as a personal charge against the ul, or as a case illustrating negligence in the ign Office?—I did not mention it in any as a personal charge against the consul. I mber that I was checked at the time, and I d a remark made about "a grievance." I not mention it in any way as a grievance ny own; but I mention that case as a case ting the Foreign Office, and the Foreign e alone. The consul, not acting according to the minister required of him, was enabled he action of a subordinate member of the ign Office to continue his connection, a very esirable connection, with railway speculations, spite of an order previously sent by Lord sell, and I mention that as a public grievance; I did not represent the whole extent of the vance, but I desire to do so, for it illustrates stem of bad management. The full extent ie grievance is, that the consul obtained from Brazilian government a concession for his way enterprise, and came home here on leave bsence, and sold it in the Stock Exchange for 00 l. in money and shares. Now it is con- y to all rules and principles of administration llow any consul or minister to receive favours hat sort from the government to which he is redited; and having exhausted all means of 51.

getting the Foreign Office to attend to that, I mention it now as a matter of public duty to this Committee.

3104. Mr. Otway.] These are facts within your knowledge?—Yes; and I take for granted that this consul could not have acquired this pecuniary favour without the knowledge of the Foreign Office. However, it has been made known by me to individuals in the Foreign Office, giving them permission to mention it.

3105. Is the consul alive?—He is alive, and is the consul at Bahia at this moment; and, as you will have an opportunity of ascertaining if you make inquiry, the consequences are injurious to our consulate and to the interests of British subjects at Bahia.

3106. Mr. William Cartwright.] Is that a singular case, or are there similar cases?—I have heard of another case in Brazil, but I do not know the circumstances, and, therefore, will not mention it. But I know of other cases in South America where consuls are allowed, I presume, by the Foreign Office to act in that way. I know one case where the consul is also the managing director of a local railway.

3107. Is there not some regulation in the service against that?—I presume that this has been done by official permission. I wish to be quite frank with the Committee, and I wish to state that this is a matter which has weighed upon my mind very much. I have exhausted all the proper means available to me for letting the Foreign Office know what I think wrong. I have endeavoured several times to get Members of Parliament to obtain a Return from the Foreign Office as to the private employments of consuls, and they have always been told (they are gentlemen of high character, but I am not going to name any of them) that the Return could not be granted. In the end the Return was moved for by the honourable Member who was just now questioning me. It was not I who suggested it to him, but such a Return was moved for by him after the motion of Mr. Rylands last year. It had been previously refused by the honourable Under Secretary to another Member, to whom I suggested asking for it; however, it was granted to Mr. Shaw, and the Return (a copy of which I have here) gives no information as to these other appointments, and says, that "there is no information in the Foreign Office" about them, and I say that there must or ought to be such information.

3108. Mr. Otway.] If I understand you rightly, that is a false Return, you say?—I say that it is a Return which does not give the information asked for; and that that information, which it says is not in the Foreign Office, must or ought to be in the Foreign Office.

3109. Do I rightly understand you that the Foreign Office are in possession of information which they could give, and which they have not given in that Return, and which is ordered by that Return?—Yes; I have a copy of the Return (handing it to the Chairman).

3110. Chairman.] Are we to understand you to impute bad faith to the Foreign Office?—No, I am not imputing bad faith; it is not for me to impute motives; this is a very serious matter, and I must not be misunderstood; what I have referred to is, that it is said in a foot-note through every page of that return, "There is no information in the Foreign Office which would enable the department to answer this part of the Return."

The column is headed "Other appointments not belonging to the public service;" and there is a foot-note throughout to the effect that there is no information in the Foreign Office which would enable the department to answer that part of the Return. Now, as regards "other appointments not belonging to the public service," I wish to state that this consul at Bahia, of whom I have spoken, was, and is now, according to my information, manager for this railway in Bahia.

3111. That is not a public appointment?—That is an appointment "not belonging to the public service;" again the consul at Buenos Ayres is a managing director of a railway; that is an appointment "not belonging to the public service." Now I cannot conceive but that information with regard to those "appointments not belonging to the public service" must be in the Foreign Office. It ought to be there. But then with reference to the first part of the Return, "Return of all consular officers restricted from trading who hold other appointments," there are a great number who hold other appointments not mentioned in the Return. First of all, they hold appointments as Lloyd's agents; that was considered by the Consular Committee, and approved of; a great number again hold appointments as Post Office agents, and that is not given.

3112. Is there any column for "other appointments" simpliciter?—No, but there ought to be; there are also appointments held under mail steam packet companies; I object to appointments of that sort, and all these appointments ought to have been mentioned in this Return.

3113. As I understand it the Return is framed rather skilfully to elicit certain information with respect to consular officers, and that information has not been elicited by that Return?—Yes, that is what I say. I impute no motive particularly; as regards Mr. Hammond, I wish to say at once that Mr. Hammond is a gentleman incapable of trickery, a gentleman of honour; I have the greatest possible respect for him personally; I do not believe that there is a more honourable man on the face of the earth; he may be mistaken in some matters and prejudiced, but I am quite sure that Mr. Hammond is an honourable man, incapable of treachery or simulation. But I felt very strongly about this business at Bahia, and the great injury to the public service arising from that consul having been allowed to accept a pecuniary favour from the Brazilian government to the extent of 30,000 l. or 40,000 l., and I regard this Return as not giving information which was asked for and which the Foreign Office could have given.

3114. Mr. Cameron.] He is not a trading consul, I suppose?—No, he is restricted from trade; he was always at this speculation; the Brazilian government complained of it. In fact, I moved in the matter and represented it to Lord Russell, in consequence of complaints from the Brazilian government; after the suspension of relations when this consul was in charge at Rio, the Brazilian government were anxious to make him their friend, and gave him the concession which they had always before refused, and that was sold by him for 40,000 l. in money and shares. He has since been the manager of the company there, and there is nothing but trouble arising out of this connection.

3115. Mr. Richard Shaw.] I think you said that of your own knowledge you are aware that several of our consuls hold Post Office appo ments?—Yes, under the Post Office.

3116. Is it not the fact that their holding appointments was condemned by the Cons Committee of 1858?—No, I do not think it and I should say myself, that as the Post O is a Government department, I do not see objection on principle to their doing so. different with mail steam packet compa where the consul should be our protector, and that the conditions of the mail company are filled.

3117. Mr. Rylands.] I wish to ask you was the railway in which this consul speculat —I think it was started as the Paraguassú T Railway Company, and the chairman of company was Mr. Sheridan, a Member of House.

3118. Do you happen to know the position wh Mr. Morgan occupied in connection with Paraguassú Tramway Company?—I do not k what position he occupied; my attention directed to it in consequence of the inte which I had taken in this question out there. remember that I saw a long statement which circulated by "John Morgan, Esq.," who been "40 years resident in Bahia," not stating t he was consul; and then there was an extract fr one of his commercial reports in which he rec mended this scheme, and that of course printed as coming from Mr. Morgan, the con at Bahia. And there again is an illustration the mischief of this. A consul is under the tem ation to make his commercial reports the me of recommending a private speculation of own.

3119. But did he take a position either as m nager, or as a director of the board?—He w I presume, what is called a promoter; he wa person peculiarly interested as vendor in the s cess of the company, and he went back to Ba to be the manager of the company there with salary.

3120. And did I rightly understand you say, that he received a considerable sum of mon for promoting this company?—No; he receiv the price of his concession. He got a concessi from the Brazilian Government, and he sold it this company, and according to the prospect he obtained a sum amounting in money & shares to 40,000 l.

3121. Mr. Otway.] Is he still consul? Yes.

3122. And salaried?—Yes, and receiving fe on his own account.

3123. Mr. Rylands.] I wish to ask you wh ther you are aware that the Paraguassú Railw Company is at present being wound up in t British courts?—I was not aware of it.

3124. You are not aware that a number people in England have lost considerable sums money by it?—I think it is extremely likely.

3125. Mr. William Cartwright.] Is he t same person who was left in charge of the a chives at Rio when the relations were suspecte —He was sent there as consul when the cons died; his father was John Morgan, who was t clerk and translator to the mission; a most e cellent man, and an invaluable servant; and had a son in the consular office at Rio, also a ve good man, and it was particularly painful to m to be obliged to complain of him under those ci cumstances.

3126. Mr. Richard Shaw.] When you were service, had you any agent at the Foreign e?—Yes.

127. Might I ask his name?—First, Mr. es Murray, who became afterwards assistant r secretary, and then when he ceased on being assistant under secretary, Mr. Spring
e.
128. Have you one now?—No, I have none
; when I was placed on a pension, Mr.
ng Rice, my agent, very handsomely said, u do not want me to get your pension for you can do it yourself, and save the com-ion."
129. At the time that you were in the ser-, did you consider the employment of an t optional?—No, I did not; I always underd that it was necessary.
130. Do you consider the system of agency a l one?—I think it a bad one.
131. Sir Charles Wentworth Dilke.] I wish to you whether you have ever paid any attento the subject of the entrance examinations ither the Foreign Office or the Diplomatic vice?—I have considered both.
132. Did you hear the scheme that we have ed here Mr. Grant Duff's plan, as to which I ed Mr. Walrond his opinion?—Yes, I was sent when you examined Mr. Walrond, and rd what passed.
133. And should you agree with that scheme erally?—Without confining myself to Mr. nt Duff's scheme, I should certainly say that ystem of open competition is the best for rance into the Foreign Office; and I can see valid objection to a system of open competi-
n for entrance into the diplomatic service.
134. With regard to the examination, have u any personal knowledge of the present racter of the examination?—I do not approve,
I said the other day, of second examinations; ink that one examination at starting is quite ough, and I object to bringing gentlemen of advanced age to a second examination; I nk, certainly, that the examination for the reign Office should embrace a larger number subjects; the Foreign Office is said to govern service, to check and regulate the service, l I certainly think it very desirable that those o are to check and regulate should pass an amination at least as severe as those who are be checked and regulated by them; I think t an examination for entrance into the Foreign fice should certainly include international law, l private international law also, which I think a very important subject; I would have two sses of clerks in the Foreign Office, superior rks, and copying clerks; and the superior rks I would subject to an examination of ger scope than that which they undergo w.
3135. And then it should not merely be a pass amination, but competitive?—Competitive, and en competitive; I think that open competition much better than limited competition.
3136. Mr. William Lowther.] With regard to nsions, should you consider that you would ve been entitled to a pension after 15 years' vice without being minister?—I do not quite derstand what you mean by the words "with-t being minister."
3137. Without having been named minister; you had only served 15 years, do you consider t you would have been entitled to a pension?
0.51.

—If I had served 15 years in an inferior rank as a secretary, I should have had the same sort of claim for a pension corresponding with that rank, as I had for a pension after having served five years as a minister; I should have considered so, certainly; I wish you to understand that I did not ask for my pension, it has been forced upon me.

Mr. Christie.

3138. In your first day's examination you say with regard to South America that "in some cases you think the rank of our representatives in South America may be advantageously reduced"?—Yes.

3139. Have you ever represented that when you were in South America?—I had no call to represent it, and, of course, I have given very much more consideration to the subject with reference to coming forward here to give evidence. When I was resident in Buenos Ayres I was originally appointed with the title of chargé d'affaires and consul general, and I was unexpectedly sent out with the rank of minister; and I have no hesitation in saying that when there was a separation between the Argentine Republic and Buenos Ayres, which itself gave us an opportunity of settling a great number of questions which I did settle, I was assisted by the superior rank, as the Chairman suggested the other day; but ordinarily the rank of chargé d'affaires and consul general would suffice for any South American mission.

3140. You would not think it advisable that we should reduce the rank of our representatives there if other governments did not do the same, I presume?—I do not think that the course taken by the governments matters there so much as in European courts, where it is very important for any of our representatives to be able to enter on equal terms into conference with his colleagues, on questions affecting not only that particular country, but European interests generally, interests, for instance, affecting the balance of power; but in Brazil and Buenos Ayres there are no questions of that kind. I imagine that almost all other governments would be very glad to follow in our wake; economy is generally of more consequence to them than it is to us.

3141. You stated in answer to Question 2636: "I think that with those governments when you want anything special done it might be, and probably would be, sometimes desirable to send out a special representative with a higher rank, and a higher rank on that occasion would be the more appreciated on account of the ordinary and normal rank being a lower one"; it takes sometime to get to South America, does it not?—Not so long as it used to do. You get to Rio in less than a month; in three weeks nearer than a month.

3142. First of all, there would be the statement that somebody would be wanted?—I am not speaking of his being sent out for anything urgent that requires to be dealt with in a day or a week; I am thinking of some subject of great commercial interest; the fact is, that I am thinking of a case such as occurred when Lord Aberdeen sent out Sir Henry Ellis on a special mission to Rio with the rank of an ambassador; and you will remember that I stated that I advised Lord Russell, when there were a number of these questions, old questions of claims and other questions, which it was very desirable to settle, and when I found that I was not likely to be able to settle them, that he might send out an ambassador on a special mission; and I had in view the right which an ambassador has, of audience of the emperor; I thought that that might enable the ambassador to deal better with those questions.

3143. With regard to your living at Petropolis, is there not a Foreign Office regulation with regard to the houses of ministers, that they should live in the town?—Yes, there was a Foreign Office regulation which, I remember, came to Berne when I was there in 1852.

3144. And did you still live at Petropolis?—It was long before I went to Brazil that that circular was issued; it was in 1852, during Lord Malmesbury's first administration of the Foreign Office; but I think I can say (and Mr. Cameron is present as a witness) that even in Berne that circular was not attended to. The minister, Sir Andrew Buchanan, lived out of the town, in a suburb, and I, as chargé d'affaires, did the same, and we had not an office in the town. I felt that, as regards all these circulars, as I state in one of my despatches put in, the minister had a certain discretion; and, as regards myself and my residence at Petropolis, I distinctly brought the question before the Foreign Office, and had their sanction.

3145. Where were the archives kept?—All the archives that I thought necessary were carried up at my expense to Petropolis, and the remainder were taken care of by the consul. The nature of the business in Rio is such that really all that was required in the way of an office in Rio was met by the consul's office.

3147. And no affidavits?—No, they would go to the consul; the provision for affidavits in missions has been made to meet those cases where there is no consulate; and it was better for the public that they should go to the consulate, because there they paid fees, and when they came to me there was no fee to pay.

3148. Mr. Otway.] Did you make your communication to the Foreign Office before you took your residence at Petropolis, or had you established yourself there when you wrote to the Foreign Office?—When I arrived at Rio it was the very hottest time of the year, a time when yellow fever prevailed, and, as a matter of course, I went straight up to the mountains and got out of it; and it being then the very unhealthy season, I took this house, intending it, in the first instance, as my Petropolis house, and established myself there. Before the end of the season I found that it would not be possible for me to go and live in Rio. There was also a difficulty in getting a suitable house on any reasonable terms, and I then wrote to the Foreign Office about seven months after my arrival, and I was minister there for three years, and, therefore, there was ample time for the Foreign Office to write to me to have a house and office in Rio if they had thought fit to do so.

3149. The custom of the Foreign Office would be to trust very much to the statement of the minister on those matters, provided they were satisfied that he was conducting the business properly?—And I say, with some confidence, that I deserved their confidence, and my statement deserved to be taken on trust, and the Foreign Office did right in receiving it as they did.

3150. Mr. William Lowther.] I think that that circular stated that any British subjects were put to expense in going to see a mi could call upon the minister to defray thos penses?—Certainly; but I was never called to do so. It was known to the consul th anyone wished to see me I was ready to g could get down to Rio in four hours; there telegraphic communication. There never any complaint made of my hindrance to p business.

3151. But your predecessor had a hou town, had he not?—My immediate predece as minister, was Mr. Scarlett, and when I ar in Rio, the chargé d'affaires was Mr. Stuart was at that time in the hotel that I have m tioned, and had the archives in a room th but the minister next before me was Mr. Scar he took a house in town on his arrival, but he l a great part of his time in a house in the m tains, much more distant from Rio than n from which it took him nearly a day to ge Rio.

3152. Where did the secretaries live when were at Petropolis?—They lived there with or near me at Petropolis; the secretary of l tion, who was a married man, was delighte being able to live in Petropolis instead of at and he took a house there. Two other secr ries, one paid and the other unpaid, lived small house there, within a stone's throw of m and the old clerk of the legation came up t too, to reside.

3153. And did the rest of the corps diplo tique live at Petropolis?—Not all, but s did. Almost all did for six or seven mon The Russian minister did all the year round, had no house in Rio. The United States nister followed my example, and established h self at Petropolis, and had no house at Rio; there may have been others, but some single n (and most perhaps of the corps diplomatique w single men) used to live at this hotel, the Str gers' Hotel it is called, in a suburb of Rio; really Rio is a city that covers such an imme amount of space, that the house which Scarlett took in the suburb, was perhaps miles from the Emperor's palace at Rio.

3154. He having no office whatever in Rio He had no office besides his house.

3155. Mr. Rylands.] Was there not a c sular establishment at Rio?—Yes, the consul w there, and all the current business there w business which chiefly devolved on the consul.

3156. Mr. Otway.] The Russians have ve little intercourse, I suppose, with Brazil; th are not many Russians there?—No; not ma Russians.

3157. But there are a great many Engli are there not?—Yes, a great number of resident merchants mostly.

3158. Are there many Spanish?—No; not many at Rio. The Spanish minister lived a up in Petropolis.

3159. Where did the United States minist live?—The first one was a single man, and liv at the Strangers' Hotel, and came up to Petr polis a great deal; and the second lived entire in Petropolis.

3160. Did you always go down on every occ sion when you were informed that your presen was desirable at Rio?—Certainly. At one tim when business was very important and requir my constant attention, I was a long time in Ri a

I was at that time so ill that I was obliged o and sleep on board the flag-ship, the admikindly allowing me to do so. I suffered from ma, and I was better on board ship than in

161. Who would inform you that your pre-ce was desired at Rio?—The consul. Any would say it to the consul, and the consul ld inform me.

162. But take the case of a British subject, had occasion to look for the protection of is minister, and who found that that minister not at hand?—He would go to the consul at
. If I had been in Rio, I should have been blished in a suburb where all the ministers minally in Rio were. But the consul is the t person that any British subject would hear
It is a port, and they would come there by
, and they would hear of the consul imme-tely, and if the consul thought that my pre-ce was required, he would at once inform me he fact.

163. I may take it for granted then, that it your opinion that a minister might at all es reside four hours' distant from the capital, ving it to a consul to tell him when he would wanted?—Certainly not in all cases; but in he may do so.

164. You think that it would be no inconvence to a British subject for a minister to be ing up in a mountain four hours' distant from city?—No; and if the Foreign Office require inister with intellect and head, and to be able ays to use it, it would be much better that minister should keep his health by living in mountains.

165. I presume that Mr. Gordon and Lord nsonby and others may be supposed to have l intellect?—Sir Robert Gordon and Lord nsonby were men of intellect; but yellow fever s not known in Rio at the time when they re ministers there. Every minister has lived re or less in the mountains, and others of m have lived at Teresopolis, a place a good l further off than Petropolis.

166. Viscount Barrington.] In fact there was thing exceptional in your living at Petropolis?
It was exceptional in this way, that as I ex-ined the other day, I did not in the end take house in Rio besides my house at Petropolis; would have been impossible for me to live in and I found that there was no need.

167. Mr. Rylands.] Have you any knowledge ether the present minister lives at Rio?—He d a house in Rio; but I understand that he s been obliged to give it up; but he adopted e plan of living in Petropolis during the hot nths. Rio may suit him, I could not live ere.

168. Do you think that at the present time has not a house in Rio?—I do not know.

169. Mr. William Lowther.] I think that the sult of your experience is, that there is in neral a want of harmony in the legations road; have you heard that that is a general mplaint, or do you speak from your own ex-rience, and consider that you have been per-ps unlucky in the staff you have had?—I cer-inly was unlucky in some of my staff; but I have ard of other cases where there has been quite as uch want of harmony as there was in my time Rio. I wish to put it moderately. During the 15 years that I was in the service, hearing of course what was going on at other missions and embassies, Constantinople and Berlin, for instance, I should say that perfect harmony was the exception rather than the rule.

19 May 1870.

3170. Did you find that when you made representations on the subject to the Foreign Office, the Foreign Office generally supported the chief?—Certainly; I think the general tendency is to support the chief; the general tendency.

3171. I think that you are in favour of copying machines at legations?—I think that they might be used advantageously to a great extent; I said for local and subsidiary correspondence.

3172. Correspondence with consuls?—For correspondence with consuls and with individuals resident in a place, and for a great deal of routine work they would be of great use; and then when you come to such cases as my own and that of Sir Edmund Lyons in Switzerland, to which I referred the other day, when we had no assistance, there, also, they would be advantageous; and in Mr. Odo Russell's case I should say it would be an act of simple humanity to let him have a copying machine if you do not give him a clerk.

3173. You do not want many copies of the same document in a legation, do you?—You may want many; I had occasion to send circulars to the consuls under me.

3174. Not very often?—No; but even if you have only to make one copy a great deal of time is saved by a machine, particularly if you have not a sufficient staff to aid you. Then as to the consuls, there were instructions to the consuls to send copies to me of all the despatches which they wrote, and one of the difficulties raised was that they had not help enough.

3175. This was in Brazil, where the people who wrote English are few?—These were non-trading consuls with 800 l. or 900 l. a year, and if they could not write English they were not fit to be consuls.

3176. You stated, in answer to Question 2991, that secretaries of embassy or legation are now of no use unless the chief is absent; is the secretary of no use in the way of having interviews with strangers who come on business (we must not talk of South America here, because they are not apt to have many travellers there I suppose)?—I can only, of course, speak of missions where I have not been from the information that I have gained as to them from the reports laid before Parliament, the reports appended to the report of the Diplomatic Committee of 1861, and those which have been lately published; and I have referred to various statements of ministers in those reports, in which they say that they cannot call upon the chief secretaries of legation to do ordinary work, and that their time is entirely occupied by the commercial reports which are specifically assigned to them, and that generally gentlemen of their age cannot be called upon to take part in the ordinary work of the chancery.

3177. But still he would be of use in the case of the illness of the chief?—He might be of use. Of course a great deal would depend upon the relations between him and his chief. It is very possible that the minister might prefer, in case of illness, depending on some other member of the mission; but, of course, if the chief were incapacitated by illness, the secretary could take the place virtually of the minister.

3178. Would he never be called upon to go and watch a trial?—He might be so, and I think it very desirable that he should be. I think that in all those ways the first secretary of legation or embassy should be employed. I think that generally there should be a new organisation which would provide us with younger men in those posts. The first secretaries, you must know, are gentlemen very much advanced in age. You were yourself a secretary of embassy up to the year when you went into Parliament. I should say certainly that a gentleman of your age and position, and experience, is not a gentleman whom his chief could call on to do work which it is desirable he should be able to call his secretary to do.

3179. You can imagine circumstances under which a secretary of legation could go to the Foreign Office of the country when it is not desirable that the minister should go?—Yes, and I think it is desirable to have secretaries of embassy and legation who can be used in all those ways without any disinclination on the part of the chiefs to troubling them.

3180. And in a so-called constitutional country he may be called upon to make reports of what goes on in the chamber?—I think it most desirable to have efficient secretaries of embassy and legation.

3181. Your experience is that you did not get much work out of your first secretary?—I stated in a despatch, which has been put in by Mr. Otway, that I had no complaint to make of Mr. Baillie, and that he was quite willing to take his share of the general work; I have a case before me at this moment of an old friend of mine, lately named by Mr. Hammond; I remember that Mr. Hammond stated that he was of such long standing (I allude to Mr. Herries, the chief secretary at Florence), that he would probably be made a minister if an opportunity occurred; he is a gentleman who has been 30 years in the service, and has for 16 years been a secretary. He was secretary under Sir Henry Elliot for some time at Florence, and I remember that Sir Henry Elliot told me of him that he was a model secretary, and that, unlike most other secretaries, he was always happiest when his chief was present, and he was able to help him.

3182. Mr. Otway.] When did Sir Henry say this?—In conversation with me.

3183. Mr. Rylands.] I understand the practical effect of your evidence to be, that whilst you think that secretaries of legation might do a very large amount of work in the mission, practically they are not of use when the chief of the mission is present, that they do not render themselves generally useful?—That I should say is the general practice, that by mutual consent the secretary does not assist the minister beyond the commercial reports.

3185. You have stated that you are in favour of private secretaries; if there is now a want of harmony in legations, do you think that it w conduce to harmony to have a private secr at a legation?—I should say that it cert would, and, if in no other way, by a red staff; I think you will find that harmony legation is generally in inverse proportio the number of the staff; small mis are generally more harmonious, I think, large ones; I can refer to my own e rience in Berne; I was there for three y I had three successive ministers over me, Arthur Magenis, Sir Andrew Buchanan, Sir Charles Murray; and Mr. Cameron attaché there for a considerable time, during all that time there was no quarrellin Berne.

3186. Have you ever been at a legation wh there was a private secretary?—I had a pri secretary of my own in the River Plate, an was an efficient assistant, and Lord Claren was kind enough to introduce him into service.

3187. Do you think that there is no diffic in separating what is called the private w from the public work of a private secretary? look upon the work to be done by a priv secretary as public work; I should use private secretary of an ambassador or ministe the same way, and I should regard him in same light as the private secretaries of Colo governors, and Cabinet ministers, and head great departments at home; all that a priv secretary does in a public department is pu work; a minister's position depends very m upon social matters, and for those matter private secretary is specially adapted.

3188. You stated that you were selected Lord Palmerston from the House of Common be introduced into the service. Was that your application?—I was on those terms w Lord Palmerston that he was kind enough treat me always when I was in the House Commons with confidence, and having lost seat in the House of Commons I expressed him my desire to be introduced by him, if could do so, into the diplomatic service. He ceived my suggestion very kindly, and in a sh time he proposed to me to go out as agent a consul general to Mosquito. It was just af the naval engagement in Mosquito, where C tain Loch commanded a British force agai Nicaragua. Lord Palmerston told me then wanted a gentleman of some constitutional kno ledge, to settle the affairs of Mosquito, and l me to expect that after a little time he would troduce me into the service as a secretary legation, and he fulfilled his promise, as he alwa did.

3189. With reference to the pay of a secreta of legation, you are aware that when a man h been secretary of legation for more than 10 ye he receives, if he is not promoted, an additio sum of 250 l.?—Yes.

3190. You are aware that when he is promot to be secretary of embassy he loses his 250 l., account of his promotion?—I have come to kn it lately by reading the evidence.

3191. Do you consider that that is a good a just arrangement?—Well, I should say that t secretary of embassy at Berlin should be bett paid.

3192. That is not the question. Do you co sider that a man should lose pay by promotion?

I should say that that was one of the anoes of the service.

193. With reference to your answer to ques- 3017, I wish to ask, did you know, when were at a legation, cases of work being left one if it could possibly be done?—I have ainly known such cases. I should be very y to have to enter into particular cases, but ve known of idle secretaries, and of inefficient etaries, and others have suffered by their not g their work as they should do.

194. And do you think that grumbling is ined to the diplomatic service as regards pay? Ve are said to be a nation of grumblers; but ve mentioned this grumbling as not unreason- ; I think that it is what you are to expect. retaries receiving really very inadequate pay their expenses, although they have entered service knowing its conditions, yet naturally for higher pay, and grumble at what they k so much being required from them when receive what they think so little.

195. You have stated that you know cases of k being left undone; did you ever report any ose cases?—I would rather, unless the honour- gentleman insists on pressing the question, d entering into particular cases, involving ctions on the character of individuals.

196. Mr. Otway.] Does this case differ in its onality in any way from your answer with introduction of the consul's name?—The oduction of the consul's name was in inucing a very important public question, an existing public grievance, and I have d that I look upon that as a question the Foreign Office, not for the consul; the ul was allowed to do what he did; I did not rd that as in any way a personal attack upon consul; I have mentioned two other cases re a difficulty was made about my requirets or instructions, and those cases involved reflection on character of any sort. I have deliberately considered what I have stated ; I would rather not enter into any icular cases, in answer to the honourable nber's present question.

197. Mr. Rylands.] Could you, without ring into any particular cases, tell the Comee whether, as minister, you ever complained ne Foreign Office of any inattention or want ttention to duties on the part of the gentle- attached to your mission?—If the question ressed I will answer it, but I only wish to that I do not desire to enter into cases, a rence to which may open the door to a very e inquiry; I shrink from nothing.

198. But could you not answer my question, er affirmatively or negatively, whether as ister you have ever complained of such a case? have complained.

199. You have complained to the Foreign e of inattention to duties on the part of one ther of your subordinates?—Yes, I have so.

200. Then I wish to ask you whether in conence of your complaints, the Foreign Office action in the matter, so as to prevent the rrence of the ground of complaint?—The eign Office has generally taken action; I mened the other day a case of a secretary, who my calling Lord Russell's attention to his not ng made any commercial report, replied to Foreign Office that he considered that in that matter, he was responsible to Lord Russell alone; whereas it was quite clear that it was my business to look after it, and I only did my duty in mentioning it; as regards that case, I will say at once that I wrote to Lord Russell in answer to the statement, mentioning that this statement of the secretary, that he was responsible to Lord Russell alone in that matter, which was obviously an incorrect one, was in the archives of the Brazil mission uncontradicted, and I requested that it should be contradicted. I did not receive an answer to that letter, and, so far as I know, the statement remains there uncontradicted. I wish it to be understood that in mentioning Lord Russell's name, I make no charge against him, because we know quite well that the Secretary of State must depend on subordinates in the office for work of detail of this sort.

3201. Mr. Otway.] I see that in answer to Question 2669, on this point, you stated: "I heard Sir Henry Bulwer state the other day in this room that during the whole of his career, and in the most important posts that he has ever held, and at the busiest time, he has never wanted the assistance of more than two men; and I may say that at Rio, during my busiest time, for all the time which preceded the termination of my career there, during all the negotiations and discussions which ended in the reprisals, I was really assisted only by one attaché"; and when I asked you what the staff at Rio then was, you told me that "the staff was a secretary of legation, one paid attaché, two unpaid attachés, and then there was a clerk and translator"?—That was the nominal staff.

3202. Upon that occasion, when you were carrying on such important negotiations, and when you had the staff which I have now read, and when, as you said, you only received the assistance of one attaché, did you complain of the neglect of the other gentlemen?—First of all, you will allow me to observe, that in saying that I was assisted at one time only by one secretary, I was only following up the remark which I had heard Sir Henry Bulwer make in this room; I did not say that by way of complaint against the others, but in order to show with how few assistants the most important and the heaviest work might be done. That was the object of my remark. With reference to my complaining of the neglect of the others, you will perhaps remember that, in answer to a question which you put to me then, I explained how it was that there was only one assisting me. I told you that the secretary of legation was away; he was away in England. The person who assisted me was the paid attaché. The unpaid attaché who was there had declined to come down from Petropolis to be with me, on account of ill health; I made no complaint even of that in answering your question. As regards the other unpaid attaché, I was unable to say at the moment, and am still unable to say whether there was then an unpaid attaché appointed, or whether he was away on leave; but perhaps you will allow me to supplement or correct my answer by saying, that besides this paid attaché who assisted me in all my work, and who was my right-hand man, the clerk and translator was carrying on at Petropolis the routine work of the mission.

3203. Did you complain of the gentlemen who declined to assist you?—I tell you that they did not decline to assist me; one was away.

19 May 1870.

3204. One declined to assist you?—He declined on account of ill health.

3205. In point of fact, there was no blame to be attached to any member of the legation?—I do not say so; but I did not mention it as blame, I mentioned it as a proof of what little assistance you required for the heaviest work; I did not mention it in the way of complaint.

3206. Mr. Lowther.] The regulations with reference to marriages at a legation must, I suppose, very much depend upon the laws of the country?—You mean, I presume, as to mixed marriages, a marriage, say, in Switzerland of an Englishman with a Swiss Protestant lady, or vice versâ.

3207. You would not marry them direc they came, if the laws of the country say t before people are married at the legation, banns shall be published in the church; th would have to bring a certificate from the poli or from their parents, would they not?— that is not the custom at all of a mission; a you will see that that is more strongly stated Mr. Hammond in his evidence before the Ro Commission than I state it; we really ha nothing to do with the requirements of country for a valid marriage at an English m sion.

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE EDWARD PLEYDELL BOUVERIE, IN THE CHAIR.

MR. JOHN GREENWOOD, Q.C., called in; and Examined.

Mr. J. Greenwood, Q.C.

3209. Chairman.] WHAT office do you hold?—I am Solicitor to the Treasury.

3210. Are you the legal and confidential adviser of the Treasury, in regard to the Treasury business?—I act as the medium of communication with the law officers, where it is necessary to consult the law officers. In other matters I have the honour to advise the Treasury myself.

3211. Being yourself a Queen's Counsel?—Yes.

3212. Mr. Rylands.] The attention of the Committee has been directed to a certain charge which appears in the Supplementary Estimates laid before Parliament this year; it is an account paid to Mrs. Mary Ackers Cage, "Settlement in full of her claims against Her Majesty's Government on account of the mal-administration of the estate of her late father, Mr. W. Ackers of Venezuela, 3,404*l.* 17*s.*," and we have reason to suppose that that mal-administration occurred while Mr. Bingham was consul at Venezuela; can you give us any explanation of the matter?—I should wish the Committee kindly to consider that all that I know of Mrs. Cage and the Ackers' affair is derived from written communications made to me by the Lords of the Treasury, and all the advice that I have tendered to them has been in the shape of reports; and those communications between the Treasury and the solicitor have usually been considered confidential; I have not the least personal objection to tell the Committee everything that I know upon the subject, but I wish the Committee to consider how far it is proper to examine me as to matters that have passed between my principals, if I may so call them, and myself.

3213. Chairman.] Have you had any communication with the Lords of the Treasury about your giving evidence here?—None whatever.

3214. The professional privilege is the privilege of the client, I believe, and not the privilege of the adviser?—I think that is so laid down in the books; but I have not the slightest personal objection to go through the whole affair; if the permission which the Committee has received, and which has not reached me, satisfies them that I am at liberty to disclose everything that I know, I am perfectly ready to do so.

MR. PETER RYLANDS (a Member of the Committee), Examined.

Mr. P. Rylands, M.P.

3215. Chairman.] HAVE you been in communication with the Treasury with regard to Mr. Greenwood's giving evidence here?—I have.

3216. Have you seen one of the Lords of the Treasury on the subject?—I have seen one of the Lords of the Treasury, and I have also had a note from Mr. William Henry Gladstone, who is one of the Lords of the Treasury, stating that Mr. Greenwood would give evidence before the Committee on behalf of the Treasury.

MR. JOHN GREENWOOD, Q.C., called in; and further Examined.

Mr. J. Greenwood, Q.C.

3217. Mr. Rylands.] WILL you be good enough to say whether the circumstances of this case came under the notice of the Treasury in connection with the pension which was proposed to be given to Mr. Bingham?—I might say that in 1859 a sack of papers which had been sent from the Foreign Office to the Treasury was forwarded to me, endorsed "referred to the solicitor." I went entirely through those papers, and made a long report on the 4th of March 1859. Therefore those papers which I had came from the Treasury, and my report upon them went to the Treasury.

3218. Can you state, in the first instance, whether the claim of this large sum of money arose out of mal-administration under the direction of Mr. Bingham whilst he was consul at Venezuela?—

23 May 1870.

Venezuela?—It is difficult to state, in a short way, the history of this long and entangled case; but I may say that I think for four years Mr. Bingham assumed the administration of that estate, and at the end of about the fourth year he gave it up, and the parties who were interested in it complained that their property had been much injured by that, and eventually, I believe, the injury sustained by Mrs. Cage was assessed at that sum which you have mentioned, and the Lords of the Treasury, as I understand, directed that that amount should be paid to her.

3219. But did any matters come under your notice as solicitor to the Treasury, bearing on the question how far Mr. Bingham was legally responsible for the result of his administration?—I thought myself that he was legally responsible to all the parties whose property had been damaged.

3220. But you are aware that the country, by a supplementary estimate, has paid that 3,400 l., which you in your judgment consider Mr. Bingham was legally responsible for?—I have heard so, and I think that they were bound to do so, so far as Mrs. Ackers Cage and the other individuals were concerned, because the whole of this administration had been carried on by Mr. Bingham with the knowledge of the Foreign Office, and they had not repudiated it. I am not aware that he concealed anything; he rather, I think, prided himself upon what he had done; and I thought that if a Government official undertook, contrary to law, the administration of another person's estate, and that was done with the knowledge and apparent sanction of Her Majesty's Government, it was a matter of plain justice that Her Majesty's Government should at all events reimburse the individuals injured. That was my judgment.

3221. Then I gather your opinion to be that it was right that the amount should be placed in the supplementary Estimates, because the Foreign Office had to some extent become a party to the administration of this estate by not discountenancing Mr. Bingham's action?—I do not think that I can do much more than repeat my last answer, that as the Foreign Office, to whom he was constantly reporting, appeared to me to have had full knowledge of what he was doing, and had not taken the matter out of his hands, it appeared to me that it was a matter of plain justice that the Government represented by the Foreign Office ought to make good to the private parties the injury which they had sustained.

3222. But while you were of that opinion did you think that Mr. Bingham was legally responsible to make good to the Government the amount which he had lost, owing to that administration?—No; I thought that he was legally responsible to the parties. What remedy the Government could have had would be a nicer consideration.

3223. You are aware that Mr. Bingham has received a pension?—I have heard so, and of course I know it in the same way in which almost everybody knows those things; I had nothing on earth to do with it.

3224. I thought that we should have been able to get from you, as the Solicitor to the Treasury, whether your advice had been taken as to how far Government should attach his pension for the payment of this sum of money?—It had.

3225. What was your advice on that matter?—I would rather, if the Committee will permit me, as it is a written document, put in my unworthy opinion; I could, however, give you t substance of it, if you will trust to my recolle tion. What I thought was, that before the Tre sury could assume to deduct from his pensi the amount that they had paid to Mrs. Cage, h at all events, ought to have a full opportunity controverting the materials upon which she h founded that claim, and that it was not at a right to look upon it as a liquidated sum, admi ted to be due from Mr. Bingham; and, secondl I thought that as he had constantly report everything that he was doing, and had not bee reproved by his superiors at home, that it wa extremely questionable whether, as a matter justice, if he had acted according to the best his judgment, that sum ought to be deducte from the pension. That was the substance of m opinion, as far as I can recollect. The first pa was a question of law, and the second a questio of justice.

3226. Now, I understand you to say that thi administration of Mr. Ackers's estate was contrar to law; that is to say, that the consul had acte contrary to law in administering it?—In m judgment, entirely.

3227. Can you tell us, shortly, in what wa he acted contrary to law?—Mr. Ackers was person who, I think, had lived for 20 or 30 years i Venezuela; he had been engaged in commercia occupations of all sorts at Liverpool and variou other places, and he died in full old age in Vene zuela, leaving a will, which had been drawn u by his solicitor in Liverpool, attested by two of hi solicitor's clerks, disposing of his property. He lef upon the actual spot Mrs. Ackers Cage, who wa his illegitimate daughter, but who had been re cognised as his daughter at the time of her marriage in his house, and by that recognition, I was informed, had acquired a status, according t the law of the land there, to the whole, according to the opinion of some of the lawyers, to a portion according to the opinion of others, of his unde vised estate; and he left besides a grandson, who had for a long time had the management of his estates there; and, therefore, it appeared to me that Mr. Bingham had not the slightest right of any sort, legal or equitable, to interfere with the estate.

3228. Chairman.] Did this all arise from Mr. Bingham's administering the estate under Mr. Ackers's will?—Not under the will, because the will disposed of the whole property; but it arose entirely from the fact that he assumed to administer it.

3229. He took possession of the property, and as we say administered to the will?—He administered the estate.

3230. Mr. Rylands.] In fact, he pressed himself into the administration of that estate?—He assumed the administration contrary to the desire of the family.

3231. And in consequence of that administration of the estate, there was this large loss of money?—There was undoubtedly a loss; what the amount was I have no means of telling; if that is a true claim, then I have no doubt it arose from the administration of the estate by Mr. Bingham.

3232. Can you tell us, shortly, in what way this deficiency happened; was there a deficiency of funds, or was there a loss in some transaction arising out of a disposal of the assets of the estate?—It would, I am afraid, mislead you if I were to attempt to give anything like minute details on that point; but among other things it was said t the cultivation of certain sugar plantations been assumed by Mr. Bingham, and that y had not been properly cultivated, but were rgrown with weeds; that the large mercantile irs, in fact, had been mismanaged.

3233. Upon the face of the documents did re appear to be any absolute abstraction of perty in connection with the estate?—There e disputed disbursements, according to my llection. For example, there was a conerable sum of money, I think, paid to the laws employed by Mr. Bingham, which he charged, which the family said ought not to have been rged against the estate by a man who assumed administration of the estate without any legal ht. And then afterwards there was, I believe ite of late years), a dispute about the payment non-payment of one particular sum which was to have been received on account of the es- by Mr. Bingham, and not duly accounted by him; but, according to my judgment, en I came to read the papers I thought that Mr. gham was free from any imputation of malsation there.

3234. You state that the justice of the case is ected very much by the fact that the Foreign fice was cognisant of these proceedings; but ve you reason to suppose from the papers that the circumstances under which Mr. Bingham d taken charge of this estate were fully known the Foreign Office?—Certainly; they were in mmunication with him for four years before papers came to my hand.

3235. But was not that after the mal-administion had taken place; were they acquainted th them during the course of the mal-administion?—Perhaps, in answer to that question, I d better give you two dates. Ackers, the testa-, died in January 1855; from that time until the rly part of 1859 Mr. Bingham was in constant mmunication with the Foreign Office, and it s not until the early part of 1859, after the adnistration had been going on four years, that papers were sent to the Treasury. They ere acting up to that period under the advice the Queen's Advocate, the late Sir John arding.

3236. But if Mr. Ackers died in 1855, I preme that Mr. Bingham at once entered into the ministration of his estate?—Yes.

3237. And he continued to administer the tate up to 1859?—Yes.

3238. With the knowledge during the whole that time, according to your evidence, of the oreign Office?—Yes.

3239. Mr. Eastwick.] Was there any other aimant of the estate?—Yes; it was a very rge estate, and there were a vast number of editors; one claimant I recollect was to the nount of 70,000 l., founded or unfounded.

3240. Do you recollect the name of that cretor?—No, I do not recollect his name at this oment; as far as I could judge, if one-half of e creditors, whose claims, I think, amounted to out half a million of dollars, had sustained the nole of their claim, the estate would have been solvent, though it was a very large one.

3241. Do you know who was put in actual charge the estate to look after the cultivation, and so a?—Mr. Bingham principally himself took the harge of them, because I recollect that he hoisted e British flag at one of the plantations; and there was a person of the name of Huizi, who was said to be part owner of one of these estates with Mr. Ackers, and I think he was put in possession, under some arrangement with Mr. Bingham, of one of these estates; but, according to what I could infer from the papers, Mr. Bingham himself personally superintended the administration of the whole estate.

3242. And was any money paid to these creditors?—That I cannot tell you.

3243. Mr. Rylands.] Did anything come out of the papers to show that Mr. Bingham received out of the estate any salary or allowances, or perquisites of any kind?—He sent in a very long account indeed at the end, which was rather a matter for the consideration of the Lords of the Treasury and of their financial officers than for me; I have seen it, but I think I am hardly in a position to speak upon that; payments, no doubt, were made in administering so large an estate, but that they were in the shape of salary exactly I cannot say.

3244. Mr. Eastwick.] You cannot say whether the claims of these creditors were satisfied or not, or whether any payment was made to them at all?—I have not the slightest doubt that some must have been paid; whether there was anything like a winding-up of the estate I should think extremely doubtful; that really was a matter that did not come under my observation, except incidentally.

3245. Mr. Rylands.] In the course of your evidence you mentioned that a sackful of papers was sent to your office from the Foreign Office, in connection with this case of Mr. Ackers?—I was describing the circumstances as nearly as I could, in order to give you the exact facts as to the way in which, four years after the transaction had begun, it first reached my hands. There came to the Treasury, without any preparatory information, a large sack of papers, which was referred to the solicitor, and for a long time, of course, I had to go through the papers to ascertain what it was that was referred to me. It was a very complicated case, and took me a long time reading through.

3246. Is it not the fact that the Foreign Office, when they wish the advice of the law officers of the Crown, make a practice of sending sackfuls of papers in that way?—They do not send them through me to the law officers, and therefore I cannot say. The Foreign Office are in the habit of communicating with the law officers directly, without going through the Treasury; but in this case the senior law officer, the Queen's Advocate, had been in communication with the Foreign Office for some years, and then, for some reason unknown to me, the whole of the papers were transferred to the Treasury.

3247. I suppose you found it rather a troublesome and lengthy affair to digest such a mass of materials?—Yes; but I have a great number of long and troublesome matters.

3248. But would you not consider, supposing the Foreign Office required the advice of the law officers of the Crown, that the proper course would be to send in a case, instead of a sackful of papers?—It would save them, no doubt, a vast deal of trouble; but occasionally, unless you have a lawyer to do it, there is a difficulty in saying whether this or that paper can be safely omitted; and it has been the practice of several of the offices which communicate directly with the law officers rather to send them the facts undigested than to affect to draw up a case setting out the particular points. If papers are sent to us at the Treasury, we feel ourselves bound always to make such a précis of them as we can, and submit actual questions upon them; but I am not sure that that could fairly be expected of the Foreign Office.

Mr. J. Greenwood, Q. C.

3249. It could not be expected of the Foreign Office under the present system, that is to say, as they have no legal officer connected with them; but it might readily be done, I presume, in the event of their having such an officer?—Yes.

3250. I think the payment for the legal advice obtained by the Foreign Office goes through your office?—It does now entirely. I think up to 1854 the senior law officer, as he was then the Queen's Advocate, was paid by the Queen's Proctor, and the Attorney General and Solicitor General were paid in what is called the report account by the Solicitor of the Treasury. Now all three are paid by the Solicitor of the Treasury out of "law charges."

3251. In making out the accounts are the law charges in connection with the Foreign Department carefully separated from the other law charges of the Crown for the Queen's Advocate, and the Attorney General and Solicitor General?—In making our payments we have very broad distinctions, but there is what they call the report account (which is perhaps not a very accurate phrase, though it has been in use almost from time immemorial). The report account is an account sent in by the Queen's Advocate, the Attorney General and Solicitor General, of the reports made to the Foreign Office, to the Colonial Office, and various other offices upon matters referred to them directly, without communication with the Solicitor of the Treasury, and the Solicitor of the Treasury has only to make the payment. That report account is all kept as it were in one lump.

3252. I presume that the report account really means, in the main, the account for giving opinions upon cases presented to them by the respective departments?—I have no doubt that that is the great bulk of the account; but under that head "Report Account," are included fees for attendance at the Cabinet, at the Board of Trade, at the Home Office, and for Orders in Council submitted to them for approval in church cases and others. Those are matters which do not pass through our hands at all; they are sent in by the law officers' clerks to us for payment, and from time immemorial they have been always put into one account called the "Report Account."

3253. Then, if that account, for instance, always amounted to 20,000 l., you as Solicitor to the Treasury, although you pass the account for payment, do not know what proportion of that account belongs to the Foreign Office, and what proportion to the Colonial Office or to the Privy Council?—I have no doubt that our clerks could find that out, because there are sufficient papers to enable them to say whether an item comes from one office or another; practically we have no means of ascertaining what degree of labour or learning or trouble is involved in the answer of a case submitted by one office or another. There is a rough scale by which the clerks ascertain the fees to be paid, and if anything unusually troublesome, or involving greater responsibility t usual, should make it seem necessary to the officer's clerk to put down a fee rather larger t the usual scale, it has been the custom to beg law officer to have the kindness to put his ini in the margin; but we are obliged, of course take a great deal of that, trusting to the hon of the parties with whom we deal.

3254. Chairman.] Do the law officers t settle their own fees?—Their clerks, I have doubt, in nine cases out of ten, put down usual fee. There have been occasions, howe where a fee has been suggested by a clerk wh is a little more than usual; we do not see papers, but only the paper on which the quest has been referred, perhaps, and for our own sa faction we ask in that case that the law officer be good enough to affix his initials. The cle in our own office receive from the clerks of the officers an account of these cases, and the cle in our office have a sort of rough scale which been in use for about 50 or 60 years for the p ment of them. Sometimes that scale is a li exceeded, and in those cases (it is a most uncc fortable duty for us) we say, "We should glad for our own satisfaction if the law offi would put his initials to this."

3255. Mr. Richard Shaw.] Then I underst that the Foreign Office would send a bundle papers to the Queen's Advocate or any other the law officers of the Crown; in due time would receive a report from the law office clerk of the work done, and you have a scale your office on which your clerk would ascert the amount to be paid for that work?—Y there is one particular clerk in our office on wh that duty falls.

3256. Mr. Rylands.] And you having a rep of all the business done by the law officers of t Crown, the amount is not separated, but add up altogether in one lump sum?—The rep account comes in not quite quarterly, but I thi about quarterly; that report account shows t there is so much for the Attorney General, much for the Solicitor General, and so much the Queen's Advocate, but there is no furth analysis made in our books.

3257. So that you cannot give me any idea what proportion the law charges paid on accou of the Foreign Office bear to the total amou of the charges of the law officers of the Crow —I could find out what sum in the course of t year is paid in the report account, and possib the report account might be split into tho several heads of the Colonial Office, the Hot Office, attendance on the Cabinet, and the oth items which I just now mentioned.

3258. Chairman.] I suppose you could get return of what has been paid on the Forei Office Account for the last five or six years?— this moment I am unable to tell you that; the is a perfectly separate account of the fees pa for Government prosecutions, and opinions tak by the solicitor of the Treasury, by direction the Treasury or of the Home Office; that co stitutes no part of what is called the report a count; the report account includes the answe to communications made directly by the differe departments to the law officers, and whether th can be separated into Colonial, Foreign, Priv Council, and so on, I am at this moment unab to tell you.

diting of these accounts, I presume from the dence that you have just now given, that the counts are audited in a lump under the Appro- ation Act, and there is no separation of them? They are paid out of law charges, and audited detail.

3260. And the whole sum of law charges go the Appropriation Account, without any sepa- ion as to the different departments in which ey have been incurred?—The fees paid to nsel are left entirely to the judgment of the icitor to the Treasury.

3261. So that, in fact, you hand in a total ount of law charges?—No; the law charges separated into various heads, including the es of counsel, and are all vouched at the Audit fice.

3262. Mr. Otway.] The fees paid on cases to e law officers do not vary very much, do they? No, very little; it is almost an uniform scale, d the exceptions are very rare; and when I y that occasionally you have the initials of the y officer, I do not know that it has gone even yond the Queen's Advocate, who generally has e largest fee, I think.

3263. Mr. Richard Shaw.] Supposing that e solicitor were to prepare the case from the ndle of papers instead of sending that bundle papers to the law officer, then the law officer ould have no right, would he, to charge a fee five guineas for perusing the case?—Certainly, at would be so if you had a case submitted ith a distinct question. But I do not know hether that could be done satisfactorily from the oreign Office. I could not say that it could, cause there are a great number of cases where is better that the particular expressions in par- ular despatches, the ipsissima verba, should be nt to the law officers, that they may judge for emselves. In a great number of cases there ould be no great loss of time in doing that, nor ny additional trouble to the law officers, and a an would write an opinion with greater comfort his own mind, if he saw the very documents n which the opinion was to be founded, than he ould if they were abridged by a person in hose judgment he might not have entire con- dence. There may be other cases in which me brief point of law might be skilfully evolved om the facts by the person who brought the uestion to the law officers; but I do not think at it would do to test the communications etween the Foreign Office and the law officers y the same rule which in ordinary life would be ursued between solicitors and counsel.

3264. Mr. Rylands.] Then, on the whole, you o not disapprove of this practice of the Foreign ffice?—I am not sufficiently acquainted with to be able to pass judgment on it; if I were sked to do so, I should say that, as far as I am judge, occasionally some little labour might be sefully laid out in sorting papers, and arranging acts even in the Foreign Office; but whether ey do that or not, or to what extent they do it, am not able to say, because I do not see the mmunications that take place except when they appen to be brought back to the Treasury.

3266. Mr. Rylands.] You would consider that you have a good system at the Treasury?—A good system, certainly.

3267. But it is a very different system from the system of the Foreign Office?—We deal with very different matters.

3268. Chairman.] Was there, as far as you know, any substantial question of malversation against Mr. Bingham in this administration of Mr. Ackers's will, or was it merely mismanagement?—It was more than mismanagement, because of course the whole thing, according to my judgment, was assumed by Mr. Bingham, without the slightest right for four years; whatever damage did occur arose, in my judgment, from his assuming to himself an administration without any pretext for doing so; but I saw nothing against the honour and honesty of Mr. Bingham, and when of late years this question arose about some matters in his account, according to my judgment it was not only incapable of being proved against him, but he had not received the money.

3269. Mr, Eastwick.] The reason why I asked whether there was any payment on the part of the creditors was to ascertain whether Mr. Bingham assumed the administration of the estate in order to settle with the creditors, because if he did that of course there is a legitimate ground at once?—It necessarily followed, from his assumption of administration, that he was the person to be looked to to settle the estate so far as the assets of the estate went.

3270. But if he made no attempt to settle these claims?—I am by no means sure that he did not.

3271. Chairman.] Is the whole thing wound-up now?—The whole thing has been handed back to the family. At the first stage the tribunals of the country decided that Mr. Bingham had no right to interfere. He appealed to the President rather in an official way to stop the tribunals, and ultimately the court of appeal decided that the first decision of the local tribunals was correct, and that Mr. Bingham had nothing to do with the administration, but that Mrs. Ackers Cage ought to be put into possession.

3272. But whatever Mr. Bingham had done in that matter was done, as I understand you, with the knowledge and sanction of the Foreign Office?—When I was reading the papers I found an immense number of reports of what he had done, and I saw nothing like secresy or concealment on his part.

3273. Reports by him to the Foreign Office, do you mean?—Yes, and those were submitted almost invariably, according to my recollection, to the Queen's Advocate.

3274. And, in fact, upon the strength of those numerous reports, and the knowledge of the Foreign Office, you recommended the Government to pay the deficiency?—Yes.

3275. How long ago was it that you made your report?—I made, I think, seven or eight reports, but the first report, in which I went into the whole question, was on the 4th of March 1859.

3276. And when was it all concluded?—My last report was in June 1861, but then that was upon these claims of Mrs. Ackers Cage to be reimbursed.

3277. That last report was the report recommending mending that she should be reimbursed, I presume?—Yes, I gave it as my opinion that Government ought to bear her harmless, because I was satisfied that unless the Government had so far supported Mr. Bingham as not to interfere, she would have been in possession of the estate from the first moment that her father died.

Mr. J. Greenwood, Q. C.

3278. Viscount Barrington.] Did the pension to Mr. Bingham date from 1861, after your last report?—I really do not know; I had nothing to do with that; I heard that there was a question about the pension, and some papers were sent to me, and I said that I had made all my reports without the slightest reference to pension or no pension, and that I was totally unacquainted with the principles on which the different departments recommended pensions. It was upon the 21st of August 1860 that I sent a short memorandum back, which I can hardly call a report, saying that I had nothing to say one way or the other about the pension, that all my reports were made without reference to any such question, and that I was unacquainted with the principles on which the Foreign Office, or any other office, recommended pensions; I did not wish to assume the responsibility of saying that a gentleman ought not to have a pension; it was no concern of mine.

3279. Mr. Richard Shaw.] Can you tell us what motive influenced Mr. Bingham, in the first instance, to interfere in the administration of this estate?—I cannot really tell you what motive influenced him.

3280. Would it be the desire to receive a commission for his services?—I do not impute that to Mr. Bingham, but he made that a charge. Two-and-a-half per cent. is by Act of Parliament payable to an English consul in a foreign country who administers the estate of an intestate person. Strictly, this was not within the Act, because it was not the estate of an intestate person.

3281. Can you tell the Committee whether Mr. Bingham did receive a commission of two-and-half per cent., or any other per-centage for winding up this estate?—I think it was charged in his accounts.

3282. Can you give us an idea of what that per-centage would amount to?—I cannot.

3283. Could you, from any papers that you have in the Treasury, state the amount of it?—I could, with the permission of the Lords, if the Committee choose to desire me to ask that permission, give the account sent in by Mr. Bingham.

3285. Mr. Rylands.] What Mr. Bingham would get would be 2½ per cent. upon the amount of money which passed through his hands in the administration?—That is the rule laid down apparently in the Act of Parliament.

3286. And did the accounts placed in your hands show the actual sum of money which he got in the form of commission?—The accou of the early period were not actually placed my hands, and it was no part of my special du to go into those accounts. The Act to which refer is the 6th of George the Fourth, chapter which allows a consul to charge 2½ per cent. administering the estate of an intestate perso 3287. Mr. Eastwick.] Can you explain hov consul could take charge of an estate as intestate estate, when there was a good will? No, I cannot; it was assumed without the le authority whatever; at the same time I can help thinking that he honestly believed that had the right to do it, because he constantly ported it.

3288. Mr. Rylands.] The effect of the wh matter is this, that in your judgment he illega assumed the administration of the estate, up which he would receive a commission of 2½ p cent. amounting to a large sum, and that in end the nation has to pay 3,400*l.*, and there is remedy whatever to protect us from paying th gentleman's full pension?—I think that M Bingham, like a good many consuls, really m understood his duty or authority. I think that great number of consuls imagine that they ha a right to take to the administration of an esta when a British subject dies abroad. Accordi to the advice however that I have humbly offer to the Lords over and over again, they have not a such right whatever, except in the cases of the being a local law to that effect. What they is done to prevent plunders, and in the certain that the proceedings which they take will sanctioned by the family or relatives at home; a when they have done that and have remitted th amount to the parties at home, they get their 2 per cent. They think it a right rather than permissive interference on their parts.

3289. Viscount Barrington.] If not a right, appears to be a custom?—Yes; they do not co fine themselves to the terms of the statute, whic only applies to an intestate case. If a man di with a will in his pocket he wants the assistanc of the consul just as much as if he dies without will, and therefore in practice no distinction made there between testacy and intestacy. Th Solicitor to the Treasury has, if necessary, to fin out the next of kin.

3290. Chairman.] Do you have many of thes cases of British subjects dying abroad intestate —We have a great number of cases of Britis subjects dying abroad. The class of cases is calle "British subjects deceased;" and whether inte tate or not does not make much difference.

3291. And it is the practice of the consuls, understand, to interfere in these cases?—Yes.

3292. And Mr. Bingham did nothing out o the common, therefore?—Yes, because the whol family was on the spot, as well as there being will. Mr. Ackers was not a man whose life ha dropped on a sudden, but he had been living i the country for a long time, and he left a will, an his family on the spot.

3293. Mr. Otway.] Are you aware of the in structions to consuls; I presume that they woul not come under your notice?—I have severa copies of them, I think.

3294. They are very precise with regard to the cases where the families reside in the place, are they not?—Yes; they have from time to time been put into shape.

3295. Mr. William Lowther.] If Mr. Bing-

had not taken the administration of this property into his hands, I suppose these claimants would at once have come upon the property, and the property would not have been much the better for it?—There was the property on the spot, and the tribunals on the spot, and the whole family too.

3296. If he had not taken on himself the administration what would have become of the estate; would it have gone into the law courts?—There was no reason why it should have gone into the law courts, except as far as the disputed claims were concerned; it was like the case of any other person dying with large property in England.

Mr. J. Greenwood, Q.C.

Mr. THEODORE WALROND, re-called; and further Examined.

3297. Chairman.] YOU were asked some questions the other day with reference to forms of competition for the Diplomatic Service; but I did not gather that you were asked your own opinion as to what would be the best mode of conducting such a competitive examination?—I was asked whether a certain plan that was mentioned seemed to me practicable, and an improvement on the present plan; and I answered that I thought it was; but if I am asked whether that is what I should recommend, I should not say so.

3298. What is it that you would recommend?—Although that plan is founded on a true principle, namely that of letting everyone who is fit for the situation come forward and show what he is worth, without needing to be backed by interest or influence, and then letting the Secretary of State select on his own responsibility out of a number of persons reported to him as intellectually fit the one that is best qualified; it seems to me hardly safe yet to apply that system to the Diplomatic Service. The system of open competition has not been tried to any considerable extent with regard to the ordinary branches of the Civil Service, and certainly the Diplomatic Service is not the one in which one would like to see the experiment first tried; and therefore if I were called upon to submit a scheme of competitive examination for the Diplomatic Service, it would not be open competition, but limited competition that I would suggest.

3299. In what way would you limit it?—The limitation that had occurred to me as the most obvious and natural was to have a competitive examination at a stated period every year, but to limit as competitors only persons who were nominated either by the existing Secretary of State or by any of his predecessors; I think that in that way you would have a sufficient number of candidates, and you would have the very same guarantee that you have now, that no one came in who did not possess all those nameless qualifications which the Secretary of State is the best judge of.

3300. You would have a limited number of names and limit the nomination to bygone Secretaries of State with the existing Secretary of State?—If all Foreign Secretaries, not only the one for the time being, but also all ex-Foreign Secretaries, had the right of nominating competitors, it would be hardly necessary to fix any limit to the number of competitors; the more you got that had the guarantee of such a recommendation the better.

3301. I suppose you would look upon the nomination of the Secretary of State as a sort of indorsation of those qualities which cannot be ascertained by competition?—Yes.

3302. Have you any experience of anything of that kind actually in work which would at all satisfy the Committee by experience that it would be satisfactory in the result?—I am not aware of anything of the kind actually in operation.

Mr. T. Walrond.

3303. Is there any system of perfectly open competition at work now, with regard to any department in the State except the India Civil Service?—The only one in which it is habitually practised is, I believe, our own office, the office of the Civil Service Commission.

3305. These, I suppose, are merely clerks doing ordinary clerical work?—Merely clerks.

3306. Not filling any confidential position, either as regards the matters coming within their knowledge, or as dealing with large sums of money?—The peculiar duties of our office are rather confidential, but I do not know that I could draw any great distinction between our own and any other office in that respect.

3307. How many clerks have you in your office?—About a dozen.

3308. Is there about one vacancy a year?—Hardly that.

3309. Have you a very keen competition?—Yes.

3310. What is the largest number of competitors you have had?—It is rather difficult to say, because a great number put down their names; then we put them through a preliminary examination to see whether they are worth sending in to the competitive trial.

3311. And that chokes off a great many?—Yes.

3312. Can you tell us what is the largest number which has ever been entered into final competition of that kind?—I should think from a dozen to 15.

3313. And is the test very severe; is the scale high?—It certainly is high.

3314. And the result in every respect satisfactory?—In every respect most satisfactory.

3315. Both in respect to general qualities and moral qualities, as well as intellectual ability?—Yes; I have been very much struck, I may say, with the good results in other qualities than those that can be tested by examination.

3316. Do you think that that system stands out signally as superior to the other system, the nomination system, that you have seen so much of in other offices?—I should be sorry to express an opinion on that point, because I have not the same experience of clerks in other offices that I have of the clerks in my own; but the clerks in my own office certainly discharge their duty in a most remarkably satisfactory way.

3317. I will ask you a question in reference to a point sometimes urged against open competition; do you find discontent and dissatisfaction among men under that system, in doing the ordinary duties of a clerk?—No; we have never found that at all.

3318. You do not get a class of too ambitious men?—No.

3319. As regards that limited amount of experience, as I understand you, the result of the experiment is perfectly satisfactory in every respect?—Yes.

3320. Mr. Otway.] What is the process by which you determine who is to come for competition; may anybody inscribe his name?—Yes; we advertise in the papers.

3321. Is the examination severe?—Yes; the severity of an examination of that kind of course depends very much on who likes to come forward. We take the best that come, and certainly the best that come do very well in the examination.

3322. Can you give us shortly any idea of the extreme test to which these clerks are put?—The subjects are not of a very high order; not of such a high order, for instance, as for the diplomatic service; they are more the things that everybody learns at school; but I mean that the candidates who come up show themselves very well taught in those ordinary subjects.

3323. Do you make any inquiries as to the character and previous conduct of the competitors?—Only the ordinary primâ facie evidence is required to admit them to competition, and then we make the same inquiries with regard to them that we make with regard to all successful candidates afterwards.

3324. Will you, shortly, state the nature of the inquiries, how far they are pursued with regard to their former education and habits of life?—Every candidate that comes up fills up a certain form, in which he states particulars as to his previous life; if he has been in any sort of employment, he mentions his employer; he names the schools that he has been at, and he names two referees; then the commissioners select out of this list of persons those to whom they think it desirable to write for information about him.

3325. As a rule, you obtain full information of their former life?—I think very full information, far more full than is possessed in general by the head of the department who nominates.

3326. But from your experience, which I believe is very considerable in all matters of education, you still are of opinion that that unlimited competition is not suited for the Diplomatic Service?—I think that ultimately it will be found to be a good plan, even for that service; but what I meant to say was, that at present, until the system of open competition has been more extensively tried, I should hesitate to recommend its adoption in such a very important branch of the service as the diplomatic.

3327. Would not you go the length of saying, that that ought almost to be the last branch of the Civil Service in which that system should be introduced, if it is to be generally introduced?—I think that it is the last.

3328. Sir C. W. Dilke.] With reference to the limited system that you have proposed, you did not say what you would do with the candidates after examination; would the first persons upon your list then receive the appointments in order?—That is what I should propose.

3329. Therefore, your plan merely differs from Mr. Grant Duff's plan, by being the exact converse of it; the limitation is at the other end; there is nomination first, followed by competition among those nominated, instead of competition first, followed by nomination amongst the co petitors?—Quite so.

3330. You were asked a question just now Mr. Otway, with regard to the character of t examination in one open competition exa nation of which you were speaking, namely, t in your office; although the number of subje is limited, and the papers do not go very hi in the India Civil Service examination, they exceedingly far, do they not?—Yes.

3331. It is an examination altogether of a ve difficult character?—Yes.

3332. One quite as difficult probably as wou be adopted for the Diplomatic Service, thou different from it?—Yes; so far as examinatio so different in character can be compared, it stan on quite as high a level.

3333. You were asked the other day this que tion in reference to Mr. Grant Duff's plan: " those candidates came up on any public compet tion, the Secretary of State could know nothir about them, could he?" And you answered th you thought that " it would be very unfortuna if, among 12 presented to him as having passe a severe examination for one vacancy, he were n able to find out one about whom he could g tolerable security that he had those qualific tions." You have not seen any reason to modif that opinion, have you?—No, that is my ow opinion, but it is formed somewhat in the dark, be cause there has been so little experience on th subject; and therefore, if asked whether I shoul recommend the adoption of a plan based up that, I should hardly say that I should, becau there are not yet facts, it seems to me, sufficien to substantiate it.

3334. But you would strongly recommend th plan which you have suggested yourself?—think that it would be of the greatest importanc that the element of competition should be intro duced in some shape or other, partly in order t widen the area from which the Diplomatic Servic would be fed, and partly to stimulate the young men who are looking forward to it, to acquire a greater amount than hitherto of the knowledg which may be useful to them in their profession.

3335. Do you adhere to the opinion that it is impossible to keep up the standard without competition in some form?—Practically, I think it is impossible.

3336. Mr. Rylands.] With reference to the answer that your plan would widen the area from which the Diplomatic Service could be fed, does it not occur to you that the effect of your plan would be to restrict the nomination of candidates to very much the same class as that from which the present unpaid attachés are nominated by the Foreign Office?—I was not thinking so much of classes; it does not seem to me, from my point of view, that that is a desirable question to import, but I was thinking of ability, that if there are five Secretaries of State nominating, you are more likely to get an able man than if all depends on the one person that the one Secretary of State chances to nominate.

3337. That is to say, that if five Secretaries of State, or ex-Secretaries of State, each nominated five candidates, out of whom five had to be appointed by competitive examination, you would naturally suppose that the five so appointed would be of a better class, probably, than five who might be appointed simply under the nomination and at the will or discretion of the existing Foreign Secretary?—

ary?—I think that you would have a greater ce of getting men of ability.

38. But as a matter of course the five nomi- d by each of the Foreign Secretaries, or ex- ign Secretaries, would naturally be very a of the same class of young men as those are now nominated by the Secretary of State he time being?—I should suppose so.

39. Then, with a view to widen the area, do you think that you might so far modify your with advantage (taking your plan to be pping-stone to ultimately a greater and wider petition) by having, in addition to the nomi- ns of the Foreign Secretaries, and ex-Foreign etaries, nominations from universities, so as to a wider area of class, and to break up to some nt the sameness of character of the nomina- s which would proceed from Foreign Secre- es?—I should not, myself, see any objection aving a nomination given to the heads of the ersities.

340. You would not at all object to present to the Committee as a part of your plan (that say, of course I am suggesting it to you, but ou approve of it you would not object to adopt that in addition to the nominations to be ed in the hands of the Foreign Secretary and Foreign Secretaries, there should also be a cer- number of nominations placed at the disposal he heads of colleges?—I should think that not all a bad plan.

341. You would then have a wider area; it would l be a competition of a very limited character, it would be a much wider and better compe- on, in fact, than a competition which would be tricted to the nominees of Foreign Secretaries ex-Foreign Secretaries?—It would be wider, probably now and then a higher kind of lity might in that way be introduced.

3342. And do not you think that there is her an advantage in that wider character of petition that would be given by this importa- n of a new element into the list from which nominees had to be selected?—It seems to that there are very great advantages in reading the net as wide as possible; but we st always bear in mind the counter considera- n, namely, that there are qualifications re- ired for this service which no examination is ed to test.

3343. I do not wish to weaken what you have d on that subject, but I want to get your ma- re opinion as to whether this addition might t very safely, in your judgment, be made in nnection with the limited competition which u have suggested?—I think it might.

3344. Mr. Butler-Johnstone.] "Heads of col- ges" is a very wide term; would you propose t the heads of all the colleges at all the uni- rsities should have an equal right to nominate; re are universities at Oxford and Cambridge, Scotland, and at Dublin; and at Oxford and at mbridge there are a great number of colleges; uld the heads of all of them have an equal ht to nominate, and, if not, what is the prin- le that you would adopt?—I confess that I was inking of the two old English universities.

3345. On what principle would Dublin, Edin- rgh, Glasgow, and St. Andrews be excluded m these nominations to the Diplomatic Service the United Kingdom?—I am afraid that I ould find it very difficult to state any principle which the line could be drawn; and that is one reason that has always stood in the way of any such plan being adopted.

Mr. T. Walrond. 23 May 1870.

3347. And candidates who had been successful at the examination would have to wait till vacancies occurred in the Diplomatic Service?—Yes. I understand that at present after passing the examination, every young attaché goes into the Foreign Office, and works there for several months unpaid; and therefore in that respect this scheme would not greatly differ from the present practice.

3348. Mr. William Cartwright.] You would make an annual examination, whereas now there are only examinations when there are vacancies?—Yes, there are only examinations now when there are vacancies; but the advantages of an annual examination would be very much greater than perhaps they appear at first sight to any one that is not specially conversant with the subject. There are great advantages to the examining board in being able to make their arrangements, and command the assistance of the best examiners, and it is a great advantage to the candidates if they are able to look forward and know exactly when they are to come up; and I think that everybody gains by it.

3349. On the other hand, would there not be disappointment created in the minds of those candidates who come up year by year to be examined, and for whom no appointments are found?—The number of vacancies might be pretty well calculated beforehand. I do not think that the disappointment would be very great.

3350. Mr. Sclater-Booth.] I understand your proposal to be that ex-Foreign Secretaries should nominate jointly with the working Foreign Secretary?—Yes.

3351. Would you be inclined to extend that to ex-Secretaries of the Treasury, nominating to appointments made by the Secretary of the Treasury?—I have not thought of that plan for other departments of the State, because in other departments I think it would be desirable for open competition to exist, that is to say, that any one who likes should offer himself for examination, and that the selection out of those who passed creditably should be left to the head of the department.

3352. Mr. William Cartwright.] Would you vest nomination in the ex-Secretaries while they were ex-Secretaries, or would you merely that a nomination made by a man while secretary should hold good after his retirement?—My notion was that any time all the ex-Secretaries of State living at that time should have the right to nominate.

3353. Having once held office that that power of nomination should remain?—Yes.

3354. Mr. Eastwick.] Would you approve of the Secretary of State nominating for any office, and his nominees remaining in the list after he had ceased to be Secretary of State?—I think that the other plan would be better, of allowing him to retain the right of nominating after he leaves office.

3355. With reference to the number of colleges at Oxford and Cambridge, and the one of Trinity College, Dublin, and Edinburgh, might not that difficulty be solved by allowing the Chancellors of the Universities to nominate, so that there would be one authority nominating at Oxford and Cambridge and at Dublin and Edinburgh?—I suppose that that is the way in which it would be worked if such a plan were adopted.

3356. Sir C. W. Dilke.] I suppose that you do not know a case in which a Foreign Secretary did ask for a nomination from Oxford and Cambridge?—Not for the Diplomatic Service.

3357. I mean for the interpreting service in China and Japan, which is semi-diplomatic?—Yes, I believe that has been the practice; officially we know nothing of how nominations have been obtained; but I have understood that Foreign Secretaries have been in the habit of trying to get nominations from the Universities for such appointments.

3358. Mr. Eastwick.] You remember, perhaps, that Lord Palmerston and Lord Aberdeen did give diplomatic appointments to Oxford and Cambridge?—No, I was not aware of that.

3359. Mr. William Lowther.] From your knowledge of Oxford, do you think that there are many men who take a tolerable degree who would care to go into the Diplomatic Service?—I have known several Oxford men who have got tolerably good degrees who have gone into the Diplomatic Service.

3360. What do you call a tolerably good degree?—I was thinking of second class at the moment.

3361. In the Diplomatic Service, who is there that has taken a second class?—The one that I was thinking of at the moment was Mr. Morier; Mr. Dillon too was at Oxford, and I think he got a second class.

3362. I think Mr. Morier did not go straight from the university to diplomacy?—No.

3363. Do you recollect what interval of time elapsed in his case?—No.

3364. Mr. Butler-Johnstone.] You may lay your net as wide as you like, but you must catch what you can; you will not get very many of the best men at Oxford to compete for the Diplomatic Service or the Civil Service generally, will you?—It was only of the Diplomatic Service that I was speaking; I think that for the ordinary home Civil Service you could hardly expect it.

3365. Mr. Eastwick.] I think you are forgetting Mr. Palgrave, who took a first class?—He took a double first, if I remember right; I had forgotten that he had a regular appointment.

3366. Mr. Rylands.] In reference to the heads of colleges nominating, my object really was to ask in reference to nominations from the universities; and I had running in my mind that heads of colleges would no doubt have a voice in recommending certain young men who had come under their notice; but I will put it in this way; I understand that you would think it a good plan of limiting competition that the Foreign Secretary for the time being should have the right of nominating a certain number of candidates, and that the ex-Secretaries (at the present moment Lord Malmesbury, and Lord Russell, and Lord Derby) should all have an equal right of nominating candidates; and then, in addition to that, would you not think it a desirable plan that the lists should be increased by nominations from the various universities (I do not wish to exclude any of the universities) through the acting heads of universities, the vice-chancellor in some cases, and I suppose different officials in other cases; would not that furnish a desirable opportunit applying the principle of competitive exam tion to the appointments to the Diplomatic vice?—If the heads of the two universities which alone I know anything, namely, Ox and Cambridge, were called upon whene there was a competition to select and send one or two men to compete, I should have great confidence that they would be good m and worthy of joining the Diplomatic Serv and that probably they would be at least equa ability to the other competitors; but whet that is a scheme that could be worked harm ously, is a question that I should not like pronounce upon.

3367. Mr. Otway.] Would you apply t scheme also to the university itself; would not be desirable that the Secretary of St should nominate a certain number of curates compete for any living that the university hac its disposal, if the plan is good in the other ca —The whole idea of the appointment to situation in the Civil Service being a matter patronage at the disposal of the Secretary State, or any one else, has always appeared to an unsound one. The real thing is, that whoe has the appointment to make, ought to try to the best man that he can get; and if he we assisted in doing so by the universities, I thi he ought rather to be grateful to them than ask for one of their curacies to give in exchan 3368. But why should not that system also good, and even in a greater degree, for the u versities themselves; why should not the head the university be grateful to the Secretary State if he knew a hardworking and deservi curate from the neighbourhood of Golden-la say, or anywhere else in London, and suggest to the university that that curate should compe for one of the best livings in their gift?—W are getting on ground on which it is a litt difficult to talk, because the universities hav you may say, no livings in their gift; the c leges have, but the universities as universiti have nothing to do with ecclesiastical patronag with the exception of course of livings th lapse to them owing to their being in the han of Romanists.

3369. If the system is to be applied to on branch of the service, and if the Secretary State is to give up a portion of his patronag on the recommendation of any corporate body individual, may you not equally apply that to th corporate body or individual giving up a portio of their patronage to the Secretary of State?— My view is that the sooner the whole idea patronage, in that sense, at the universities an elsewhere is abolished, the better.

3370. Mr. Butler-Johnstone.] The head of th University of Oxford or Cambridge generall being a distinguished statesman (Lord Salisbury for example, being now the Chancellor of Oxford giving him patronage is but giving patronag in another form to a Secretary of State, is i not?—It would be so if he chose to exercise it a such.

3371. But if the Secretary of State choose to exercise it in the right way, it does not muc matter who the individual is who has the patron age; and whether you give it to one Secretary of State or another it makes no great differenc in practice?—No.

3372. Mr. Rylands.] Did you understand from my question that I was proposing to give to the ncellors of the universities the nomination of se candidates for competitive examination?— say the truth I had no very distinct idea of it was proposed to work that plan; if it re made a matter of right and regulation that University of Oxford should nominate, I pose it can hardly be doubted that the Chan- or would have the right to exercise that ination; but as a matter of practice I have y little doubt that he would leave it as those gs generally are left, in the hands of the -chancellor.

3373. And that, in fact, the nomination would of the character recommended by the dis- guished men who are actively engaged in the cation of the universities?—I should sup- e so.

3374. I understood you, in recommending your n, not to have any view in relation to the dis- ution of public patronage, bnt that you were ing us your opinion with a view to promote efficiency of the public service?—Entirely.

3375. And the opinion that you have given is, t by such a course as that suggested, of limited petition, the public service would be bene- d, although some small patronage on the part he Foreign Secretary might be withdrawn?— ite so.

3376. Mr. Butler-Johnstone.] With reference he amended form of Mr. Rylands' question, I uld ask whether the vice chancellor of an versity, being the head of a college also, as head of Pembroke, for example, may be Vice ancellor of Oxford, is likely to know much of moral character and ability of a young man Oriel or Christ Church; is he not, with the best entions, likely to exercise his patronage for the antage of the young men of his own college? think less so now than in former times.

3377. But he is not likely to know the young n at Christ Church, is he?—When one speaks a certain appointment to be made from the ole university, I think one has in view that men who would be spoken of in connection h that appointment would probably be men o are well known in the university, known to ers besides those of their own college.

3378. And do you think that in the practical rking of the system the vice chancellor would sult the heads of colleges as to the young n most qualified to fill such vacancies?—I uld think so.

3379. And you would not think it likely that e knew a young man at his own college who med qualified for it, he would give it up to n?—I should hope not; I think he would be s likely to do so now than 20 years ago.

3380. Mr. F. Walpole.] Or less likely than Secretary of State?—Yes, because I con- ve that he would feel that he was acting for orporate body and should act as their repre- ntative.

3381. Mr. W. H. Gladstone.] He might, very ely, look to the law and modern history school the man?—Yes.

3382. Mr. Butler-Johnstone.] Does it not all pend on the man and not on the system; that, fact, a good vice chancellor will make good pointments, and a bad one bad ones; and that good Secretary of State will make good ap- intments, and a bad one bad ones?—That is so, it is left all to one individual; and that is one reason why it seemed to me desirable that a number of individuals should be concerned.

3383. Mr. W. H. Gladstone.] Would a person who had passed the examination and failed to get a nomination that year have to go in for examination next year again?—My notion was that the competition should take place each year.

3384. So that he would have to go in again?—Yes.

3385. You do not think that that would be a hardship?—Supposing that the average number of vacancies in the year were two, it would be easy to select at each annual examination the two best, and then keep the two next vacancies for them.

3386. With reference to the first examination now, do you expect some knowledge of German?—Knowledge of the grammar of Germany is required.

3387. That is not sufficient to enable an attaché who goes to a German mission to translate?—No.

3388. Do not you think that that is a defect?—Yes, certainly.

3389. Did not you say, on the last occasion when you were here, that it was a very long time since you had had a second examination?—Yes.

3390. Is that usual or unusual?—I do not remember any time when there has been so long an interval as recently.

3391. To what do you attribute it?—I suppose that it is partly owing to the number of appointments which were understood to have been suppressed, owing to the suppression of different courts in Germany; but it may have been purely accidental, because when an attaché is appointed to be third secretary, I understand the practice is not to force him to come back at once to be examined, but to wait till a convenient opportunity occurs.

3392. Have you any reason to believe that the fact of the second examination being severe deters people from prosecuting their diplomatic career?—I have not had any reason to think that; at the same time, if I might be allowed to say so, it has always seemed to me that it would be a very great advantage if that second examination were brought a great deal nearer than it is to the first examination; it hangs over the heads of men after they have got into the practical work of their profession, and I have certainly heard some of them say that they regard it as an incubus which they would be glad to get rid of; and it would be (speaking from an examiner's point of view) much more satisfactory if the second examination were nearer to the first; it is rather hard for an examining board to be called upon to pronounce by examination whether a young man is or is not fit for the duties of his situation, after he has been performing the duties of that situation for a good many years.

3393. Mr. Sclater-Booth.] May you not even go further, and say that the examiner might be quite wrong in the view he would take?—I think it quite possible.

3394. Mr. Eastwick.] If you had a very high examination for the people whom you seem to expect to bring into the service, might you not dispense with the second examination altogether?—Some of the subjects required for the diplomatic service are rather peculiar, and out of the line of young men's ordinary reading, as for instance, international law and political economy, which are hardly studied widely, even at the universities; and on that ground, I suppose, it is that those subjects have been separated from the first examination; but it has always seemed to me that if the second examination came six months after the first that would be an ample interval, and I should not myself see any great objection to the two examinations being passed together.

Mr. T. Walrond.

3395. But men who had taken a degree in honours at the university would be quite able, I suppose, in the course of a year or two years after leaving the university, to satisfy any examiner in those extra subjects?—Certainly.

3396. Viscount Barrington.] I think you stated, in answer to Mr. Sclater-Booth just now, that you were not prepared to recommend your system of competition for other branches of the Civil Service?— Of limited competition I am not, because it seems to me that with regard to the ordinary branches of the Civil Service, the system of open competition is so infinitely preferable.

3397. Then may the Committee from that take it as your decided opinion that there is something superior in the nature of the duties of diplomatic servants that would make it very much better that they should be selected by the Foreign Secretary and ex-Foreign Secretaries?—Certainly, as an immediate measure; whether ultimately the plan of open competition, after it had been tried and found satisfactory in the other branches of the Civil Service, might not be applicable also to the diplomatic service, is a different question.

3398. Mr. Butler-Johnstone.] What is the peculiar character of the Diplomatic Service that takes it out of the category of the other services; what are those points which differentiate it from the other services?—It is very difficult to state shortly, because it would require one to epitomise all the duties of a diplomatist; but I think every one feels that the duties of an attaché at a foreign court are very different indeed from those of a clerk in a Government office, and require very different qualifications.

3399. In other words, the importance of the diplomatic service differentiates it from the other services?—There are many services that are important.

3400. But its complicated importance is its peculiarity?—The complicated importance and the peculiar nature of the duties before its members.

3401. The difference is more in degree, than in kind?—In kind also.

3402. Then the objections which apply to open competition for the Diplomatic Service would in a less degree apply also to the other services, though in perhaps so much smaller a degree as to constitute the whole difference?—Quite so.

3403. Sir C. W. Dilke.] Do not you think that, as applied to the other branches of the public service, the advantages of the system of open competition would more than counterbalance its disadvantages?—Certainly.

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE EDWARD PLEYDELL BOUVERIE, IN THE CHAIR.

The Right Honourable GEORGE WILLIAM FREDERICK Earl of CLARENDON, K.G., G.C.B. (attending by Permission of the House of Lords); Examined.

3405. This is not the first time that your dship has held that office?—It is not.

3406. Can you tell us how many years you e served Her Majesty in that capacity?—I Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs from 21st of February 1853 till the 26th of Fe- ary 1858, making five years; again from the of November 1865 to the 5th of July 1866; from the 9th of December 1868 up to the sent time. I have therefore, up to the pre- t time, been Foreign Secretary, at different iods, for seven years.

3407. I believe that your Lordship com- nced your public career in the diplomatic vice?—I did.

3408. And went through the various grades it?—I was attaché at St. Petersburg for ee years, and afterwards I was minister at drid.

3409. Were you ever secretary of legation? No.

3410. How long were you minister at Madrid? For nearly six years from 1833.

3411. So that you are acquainted with the fession from the Foreign Office point of view, from the foreign service point of view also? think so; and I think I have derived great antage from having actually been in the vice before I became Foreign Minister.

3412. You know the details of the working foreign missions?—I think I do, and that that great advantage to me.

3413. What is your opinion of the present tem of admission into the service; do you nk it a satisfactory one, or have you any sug- tion which you could make for its improve- nt?—With respect to the examination, I nk that the present system is a good one. I ould not like to make the service entirely en; but I think that the present system of npetitive examination between three indivi- als, any one of whom the Secretary of State might be glad to see employed, is a good system, and I think that the public thereby get as good a servant as they can obtain.

The Earl of Clarendon.

26 May 1870.

3414. You are speaking now of admission to the Foreign Office by competition?—Yes.

3415. But the admission into the diplomatic service is by a pass examination?—Yes.

3416. Should you be disposed to extend the limited competition which exists in the Foreign Office to the diplomatic service?—I see no objection to it, but I do not see any reason for it.

3417. You are satisfied with the quality of the men you get under the present system?—I am, as I think it works very well. If any improvement occurred to me, I should adopt it or suggest it to the Committee.

3418. Was it not your Lordship who established the system of examinations originally?—With regard to the examinations in the Foreign Office, I suggested that there should be three competitors, any one of whom the Secretary of State might be glad, at all events not sorry, to see in the service, and that the best of those three should obtain the vacant office.

3419. Do you find that there is as much pressure to get employment in the diplomatic service as there is to get employment in the Foreign Office at home?—No, I do not think there is.

3420. Lord Derby told us that he thought there was a marked difference in the desire to get into the diplomatic service; that is in accordance with your experience too?—Yes, quite so; and the service is so very expensive that I should not recommend any parent of a young man appointed to be an attaché to allow him less than 400 l. a year for the first three years that he is unpaid; afterwards, of course the 150 l. a year that he gets would be a deduction from it. Living abroad is now very costly indeed.

3421. We have been led to understand that till a diplomatic servant reaches the higher grades of employment, a great part of the expense is out of his own pocket?—Certainly.

The Earl of Clarendon.

26 May 1870.

3422. And that it is the temptation of distinction, and the chance of rising to that higher employment, which induces gentlemen of means to enter into the service?—I cannot exactly state what their motives may be; that may be one; but it is certainly, for the junior branches of the profession, in the early days of their career, a very expensive thing. There are one or two courts to which we have great difficulty in finding anybody to go, because the 400*l.* a year that I indicated just now is really not sufficient for them there.

3423. The answers to the circulars addressed by your Lordship to Her Majesty's ministers abroad convey a general impression of universal complaint, at all events among those in the lower grades, that the salaries are inadequate?—I cannot wonder at it.

3424. You think that those complaints are well founded?—I do indeed.

3425. Carrying back your recollection to the time when you were a diplomatic servant in one of the lower grades, do you think that the same ground for complaint existed then as now?—I can scarcely say, for I was lodged and fed in the ambassador's house, which of course makes a very great difference, especially in such a place as St. Petersburg.

3426. You were with him as one of his family?—Yes.

3428. Were the attachés at that time at all personally selected by the ambassadors and ministers abroad?—No; they were selected by the Secretary of State at home.

3429. The old practice of all was that they were the personal friends of the minister, was it not?—Yes, and there was no restriction of the number; we used to have five or six attachés to an embassy; they did not, of course, all live at the ambassador's expense, but there was no check upon the Secretary of State on the number that he liked to appoint.

3430. Many young gentlemen who liked to see a little business in public life, after a few years returned home, and did not pursue it as a profession?—That was so; and now the gentlemen who enter it intend to pursue it as a profession.

3431. It has become now a profession?—Yes; the examinations tend to that. A man does not prepare himself first for the first examination and then for the second examination, without intending to pursue the profession.

3432. Should you be disposed to retain the system of second examinations, as it is now, for these gentlemen; we have had a suggestion that it might be desirable to have one examination after a certain interval of service, which should be a pretty stiff one, instead of two examinations; has that been suggested to you?—That has been suggested to me, and there are a great many opinions for and against it. I think that if you were to subject a young man of 19 or 20 to a very severe examination upon entering into the service, you would be requiring almost more from him than he could give you. It is pretty severe as it is, judging from the number of persons who do not pass. I think also that the second examination may be necessar but even that has its disadvantages, because i man spends four or five years in service abro and gives his attention to the business of h mission, particularly if it is an important missi where there is much to do, he cannot keep that sort of knowledge that would be required the second examination; and yet I am not prepar to say that the two examinations would not better than a very severe one at first.

3434. Then I gather that you do not attac such very great value to the second examinatio —Not very great value; I have no objection it; I think that possibly the public might be i disposed to dispense with that examination; a I do not object to it providing that it is not mad too severe; when I say too severe, I mean travel ing into subjects that are not likely to be essenti or useful to the man in the profession.

3436. We have heard something, I may say good deal, of the slowness of promotion in th service now; that is the case, I suppose?—The is no doubt about it.

3437. There is almost a stoppage of the rise t the higher ranks?—I must certainly say that i is a stagnant profession. In the first place it seems to be a very wholesome profession, becaus nobody dies; and, in the second place, it mus be a pleasant profession, because nobody resigns and therefore there is a good deal of stagnation It is thought, at least I have heard that i is considered, that there is a great deal o stagnation in consequence of the number of at tachés appointed. Now I think that that is a error. I have had a note taken of what the number of unpaid attachés has been, and I find that in 1853 there were 28, in 1861 there were 44, and there are now 14. Since I came into office, which is nearly eighteen months ago, I have appointed seven; not because I desired to exercise patronage, for every friend of mine I recommend not to put his son into the diplomatic profession. The period of time which must elapse before an attaché can go abroad is nine months; three months in preparing for the examination, and six months in the Foreign Office; and I do not think that six months in the Foreign Office, spent in seeing all the varieties of business to be seen there, is more than is necessary. And then it must be remembered that in the examinations a man often fails. Many circumstances umstances besides ignorance may contribute at; and I think it is almost an invariable tice that a man who has failed should have ther examination. Three months are again in that case before he can have any cer- ty of getting an appointment; it is there- almost necessary to have, if I may use expression, a stock in hand of attachés who qualified themselves and who are fit for ling on service; and although I have ap- ted seven, which may appear to be a great ber in eighteen months, it has only been to ply the urgent requests of the different mis- s, which have been short-handed. I may the instance of this recent unfortunate case Greece. The secretary had been removed to ther place, his successor had not yet arrived, r Mr. Herbert had been captured, Mr. Watson secretary of legation was still at Constanti- le, and during the first three days of that ancholy occurrence Mr. Erskine was entirely e to do everything, to cipher and decipher. d I cannot give the Committee a better idea what must have been the nature of his em- yment than by stating that some of his de- tches, although they were deciphered by some he ablest men in the Foreign Office (and I pose there can be no better decipherers any- ere), took four or five hours to decipher. Mr. kine had not only to decipher, but to cipher, he was entirely alone, owing to the secretary egation not having arrived. I say that for h cases it is necessary to have what I may a stock in hand; and Mr. Erskine being en- ly alone, a gentleman who had just completed period of service in the Foreign Office, a son Lord Napier's, was sent out to assist him.

3438. Then I gather that you do not think t the subordinate staff, generally speaking, of diplomatic service could be very well re- ed?—Indeed I do not think it could. Nobody uld be more ready than myself to reduce them thought it could be usefully done. I am ays looking out to see how reductions can be de, because I do not think that judicious re- tions in the least impairs the efficiency of the vice. I might mention that in the consular vice, which is partly connected with the diplo- tic service, the savings that I have been bled to effect are nearer 6,000*l.* than 5,000*l.* ear; many consulates have been reduced, and ave entirely given up all patronage of my n, in order that the persons who are turned of these consulates for which there does not ear to be absolute necessity, should fill the ancies as they arose. In the Foreign Office, ce I came back to it 18 months ago, there has en only one vacancy, which I have not filled I merely mention these cases in order to e the Committee an assurance that whenever ee an opportunity for economy I avail myself it, and that if I thought that the staff of the ssions could, with utility for the public service, reduced, I would not wait for a recommenda- n of the Committee to reduce it.

3439. We have had it suggested to us that re might be more economy, and also an increase efficiency in the service, if the heads of the gher missions had a private secretary, who was t permanently in the diplomatic service, but s always present, and would assist the head dispatching confidential business; is that a actical suggestion of any value, in your opinion? I ought to say that it is a practical suggestion, 0.51. because when I was appointed at Madrid, at a time when there was a good deal of work doing, I did take out a friend of my own to act as private secretary, who became so efficient that Lord Palmerston afterwards appointed him minister at Rio. But I do not see the absolute necessity of adopting that plan. I think it quite necessary that the head of a mission should be able to avail himself of the services, in that sort of capacity, of some person attached to the mission. For instance, it is quite impossible that he should copy his own letters, and see all the people who call upon him; and in a legation where the business is active and heavy you cannot expect that the minister should be able to do all that for himself. I paid my private secretary, Mr. Southern, who died as minister at Rio, out of my own pocket; I think that you cannot expect a minister to do that. I think that he ought to have that sort of assistance that really is necessary for the prompt and punctual transaction of business, and that he ought not to pay it out of his own pocket. I think it is a very fair assistance to get from the staff of the legation or embassy, but it is also a reason why you cannot make the staff of these legations much lower than it is. Of course, in former times, when the diplomatic service was not a regular profession, and when the Secretary of State could appoint just as many persons as he pleased, and anybody that liked to go to Paris or Florence was appointed an attaché, it was a different thing, but now that only the number of attachés or secretaries are appointed that is thought to be necessary, if one of the gentlemen attached to the mission is employed by the minister for the necessary business of the mission, it is another reason for not reducing the staff. Moreover, the secretaries of legation, as you are well aware, are employed in making reports every year upon any important subjects that they take up in the country where they are resident (they are generally commercial reports, and sometimes they are of a social and industrial character), which I think have proved extremely useful, but which take up a great deal of the time of a secretary of legation; and a secretary of legation or embassy cannot be expected to do the mere drudgery of the chancellerie work.

3440. Have there been complaints with respect to secretaries of legation, that their time was too much devoted to that work instead of the usual business of the mission?—I do not think I ever heard any complaint. It does not signify what amount of work is put upon them; I have never heard any complaint, or observed anything but a spirit of willingness to do whatever was required of them. Last summer, knowing that the Irish Land measure was to be brought on this year, I, in conjunction with others, persons most interested in the land question, framed a series of questions which I dare say the Committee are well aware of, which were sent to every country from which I thought that light could be thrown upon the subject that was to engage public attention this year. I sent those questions out to the secretaries of legation; I did not inquire whether one secretary of legation was competent, or whether the other secretary of legation was competent; I reckoned that they would be so; and I think that the result has fully justified the confidence which I felt; I think that the Land Tenure Reports are very instructive and satisfactory, and a great addition to our industrial literature. I do not believe that all the chambers of commerce in this country combined, or any other machinery that could have been devised, would have been able to command the means or the ability of producing such reports as those. And with reference to the Industrial Reports I may say that I have received from the chambers of commerce of the manufacturing districts the thanks of those communities for the information which those reports have given, and for the light that is thrown by them upon the question where British industry might be most conveniently carried; I say I do not believe that you could have got that by any other machinery. I may state to the Committee tbat I inquired about what the cost of those reports was; I cannot yet tell the cost of the reports about the industrial classes, but the whole of those Land Tenure Reports, which I think will be satisfactory to those who have read them, supplying as they do a great deal of information upon that important question throughout the Continent, have cost the country but 186*l.* 4*s.* I do not think that you could have got the thing done by any other means, certainly not as well done; and knowing that this Committee was to sit this year, I must say that those reports gave me very great satisfaction, because I thought that they would afford the best and the most practical answer to that sort of stigma which has been thrown upon the diplomatic body generally. I believe that that stigma mainly results from ignorance of what is the real nature and what are the real duties of the diplomatic body; and therefore it was with infinite pleasure that I heard of the appointment of this Committee, considering it the only way in which evidence as to the realities of the profession could be brought out, and what I thought justice done to it.

3442. And the result has been highly satisfactory to you, as I understand?—It has been highly satisfactory to me, and I am sure that those reports have been highly useful to the mercantile community; they could have got the same knowledge from nowhere else. Each secretary of legation takes up a particular subject, say wine in Portugal, cotton spinning in Switzerland or in Germany, or in other countries where they enter into active competition with us, and so on. I say that there are no other means by which information, which it is essential to our own manufacturing interests to have, could be as readily obtained.

3443. I rather gather from what you say that you think that the diplomatic service more than makes a return to the public for its pay by that kind of information?—It is really not because I am connected with it that I say so, but I do think that they are valuable public servants; I think that they perfectly earn their keep, so to speak. I can assure the Committee that if at any time I thought that any economies could be introduced in respect to the diplomatic service, I should be the first person to introduce them; but I do not think that by stretching that desire for economy very far, you secure the efficiency of the service. I think that the sort of stigma that has been thrown upon the diplomatic service, and the sort of general disposition that there has been on the part of the public and the press, resulting, simply, from want of inform tion, has been (I must say naturally) very c couraging to the members of the diploma body, and I think they will be just as well sat fied as I am that the realities of their serv and of their work should be brought out much the best way in which they can be brou out, the only way that we in England c about, namely, by examination before an i partial Committee; and therefore the appoi ment of this Committee was to me a matter sincere satisfaction.

3444. You think that they are moderate paid, hard worked, and very useful; may I su up your evidence in that way?—I think so. am certain that they are moderately paid, b cause I know that the generality of them ca not meet their expenses from their pay. W all know that both at home and abroad the c of living has been very much increased in lat times. I can speak from my own experien when I was in Spain; I was there for a peri of nearly six years. I do not mean to say th there were not then exceptional circumstanc which rendered living rather expensive there; was expensive then because it was in the time a civil war. I kept my accounts pretty acc rately, and each year I spent 1,000*l.* more th my income from the service, so that I came ba from Spain exactly 6,000*l.* poorer than I we to it.

3445. And being a bachelor at that time?—Yes, I did not make any complaint as to th amount of the salary; that was the salary allott to the place. There were certain duties of ho pitality which I had to discharge, and the cost living was, I admit, increased by the civil wa but that was the result of my banker's book, th I was 6,000*l.* poorer at the end of the time tha at the beginning.

3446. Is the pay the same now for the minist at Madrid as it was then?—I believe it is; an you must take the fact into consideration th except at places where the missions have bee changed into embassies the salaries are nearl the same now as they were 50 years ago. Ther are not many of the Committee who can r member the state of things 50 years ago, bu those who cannot must know how very much th cost of living has increased everywhere since th time; and even those countries that used to b economical, and where people used to go wit their families for purposes of saving, are entirel altered now in that respect, and are becomin extremely expensive.

3447. There is one incidental question whic has been raised here about the leave of absenc of the heads of missions; we have had state ments made that the rule of not being allowe to run two years' leave of absence into on operates hardly on those who come from a dis tance, and might with advantage be altered have you considered that subject?—Yes, I hav considered it, and I think that in the case o those who come from a distance (and there ar many who do) it is hard that they should no have more leave, or that they should not hav more leave without being mulcted so severely a they now are. I know that many persons in th profession and in the Foreign Office too, think that they ought not to be allowed to run the tw years' leave into one; that is to say, to take th last two months of a year and run them into th first two months of the following year. I canno hat I see any great inconvenience in that. a always sorry when the head of a mission sent from his post; but you must make ances; there must be leave of absence, and must be considerations of health: and ink it very desirable indeed that anybody is employed in the diplomatic service, pararly in the higher branches of it, should not o long absent from England. I think that hould come and be retrempé, if I may use an expression, in constitutional ideas and in abits of this country; I think that it is usefor the man himself, and also for the position hich he is placed.

48. For the sake of the public it is desirable think that there should be proper facilities n for his returning home periodically?—Yes, ink so. If a man has been four or five years ad, living always in the same place, running round of the same ideas, it is impossible that man should not become rusty, and compel him to become rusty if you do not him facilities for leave of absence. And it be remembered that many of our ministers uen of very small means, and generally small ns are accompanied with large families, and makes their taking their leave a subject of serious consideration to them, and renders it rable that they should be able in certain cases ave two years' leave in one. I know that I expressing an opinion which is not shared by y persons; but I do not see an objection to r running two years' leave into one. Cerly there is now a heavy fine upon them when take that which it is essential that they ld have, namely, a certain time to come back refresh themselves with constitutional ons.

449. Mr. Rylands.] Your Lordship was tioning, in reference to the nomination of aid attachés, that you considered that the em worked perfectly well. Still the fact is, esume, that the nomination depending upon will of the Foreign Secretary, there is a conrable amount of pressure for the patronage ch so rests in the Foreign Secretary's hands? could not say that there is a great deal of ssure; I think that people are beginning to a little afraid of the diplomatic service, ause of the very great expense that it entails. ink that the fact that if you put your son in diplomatic profession, as a profession in which expect him to earn his bread, you are iged to start him for the first three or four rs with 400*l.* a year out of your own pocket, kes a good many parents hesitate before they ide to embark their sons in that way. Of rse there are a good many who apply, and list is a tolerably long one at this moment; I cannot say that there is any very great ssure to get into the diplomatic service.

450. Still there are a considerable number of olications for admission into it, are there not? have been back in the office for nearly 18 nths, and I have had during that time a good ny applications, but I cannot say that there is very great pressure to enter the diplomatic vice. There is more pressure for the entry into Foreign Office; that is home employment, and t immediately makes some return, though not rge one. I am endeavouring to make every nomy that I can with due regard to effincy, and I may tell the Committee, in gene terms, that in regard to consulates, and other posts, I have made a saving of nearer 6,000*l.* than 5,000*l.* a year. I think that the average number of vacancies in the Foreign Office is hardly three in two years, and there has been only one vacancy since I returned to the office, and that I did not fill up.

3451. Does your Lordship think it a desirable course to have unpaid officers connected with the diplomatic service?—To tell you the truth, I do not like unpaid service at all. I think that gratuitous service is never as good as that which is paid, and where, in return for the payment, the public has a right to expect efficient service. I can only say that at present, as the system now exists, it is a great improvement upon what it was formerly, when a man used to be 10 or 12 years an unpaid attaché, and that not counting for his pension. If I remember right, I think that the alteration which is now in force, and which is beneficial to a certain extent, by which a man is now only about three or four years serving the country at the expense of his friends, was the result of the recommendation of a Committee of the House of Commons.

3452. I suppose you would consider that if an arrangement were made, under which the services of attachés were paid, then it would be a proper course to take to open to wider competition the appointments to the diplomatic service?—I could not say that. I think that the diplomatic service is a very peculiar one, and you must look to a little more than a man's mere knowledge of French or German; you must look to his complete respectability and to his fitness for forming a member of the minister's family; that is what an attaché ought, at all events, to be fit for for. I do not see that there would be any more advantage in open competition than there is under the present system. There is not the least distinction now of classes or otherwise. Anybody that wishes his son to enter the diplomatic profession will not meet with any difficulties of that nature; but I think that if you had open competition you would be liable to lower the standard which you want in the diplomatic service.

3453. Practically we have found from the evidence presented before the Committee that the nominations are very much within a certain class of society; those who have aristocratic connections or who are wealthy?—Those are the only people who wish their sons to enter the diplomatic service. Those who are not either in what are called the upper classes or wealthy do not wish their sons to enter into a profession in which the best years of their life, from 20 to 24 and 25, and going on to 30, will be spent without any remuneration. It is by no means attractive to persons, except those who are wealthy, or who take it up as a necessary occupation for young men who wish to see something of good society.

3454. I was supposing that an alteration were made by which remuneration would be given to those who at present have no remuneration; would not your Lordship think that in that case it might be desirable so to change the mode of entrance into the profession as to give a wider scope to the classes who might be disposed to take advantage of it?—There is a great deal to be considered on that point. You want for the diplomatic service a particular class of man. You know it is, after all, a very limited profession, and the tendency is to reduce it still more; but what you do want is a class of man who has been accustomed to the good society ("good society" is a general term, but my meaning will be understood by the Committee) of this country, and who would be immediately fit to mix in the good society of the country to which he is sent. I do not think that you could have security for that with open competition. Of course open competition would mean making it open to the whole world, and I do not think that under that system you would get the sort of man that we have hitherto had and that we have found to succeed in the profession. I think that it would lower the stamp of the service, and that we should feel the effects of that in the countries to which these persons were sent.

3455. A suggestion thrown out by Mr. Walrond the other day was, that a certain number should be named by the Secretary and the Ex-Secretaries of State, and he adopted a suggestion of mine that a certain number should be named by the heads of universities; that the nominees should then be presented for a limited competition, and that out of that number the Foreign Secretary should select for appointment; that is a mode of limiting competition; does your Lordship see any objection to that?—No, I do not know that I see any particular objection to it, but I do not see the smallest advantage in it. I think that you have a system now which works just as well as that would work, and unless you can point out any patent evils arising from the system as it exists now, I should be unwilling to change it. I do not think that you would get any better men by throwing the responsibility off the Foreign Secretary as you would if that system which you suggest were adopted. To show that I have no objection to that sort of origin of appointment, if I may so express myself, I may state that when I have had an opportunity of appointing student interpreters, for instance, in Japan and China, I have addressed myself to the universities, and every now and then they have sent me some very good men, particularly from Ireland. Being Chancellor of the Queen's University in Ireland (I do not mean that I gave them any undue preference for that reason) I was glad of an opportunity to give a studentship to any of those who came from that university. I do not say that that has answered ill, but a student interpreter who goes to China or Japan to study the language, or to qualify himself for a consulate, is a different person from a person that you want to begin with as an attaché to be an inmate of a minister's house, to be employed in confidential service, and, in short, for all those requirements of the diplomatic profession that I should not like to throw open to the whole world. Speaking as the Secretary of State, and as the head of the Foreign Office, I should rather prefer being myself personally responsible for every appointment, and blamable for every appointment that was made and did not answer the requirements of the public service, to having it left open to me to be able to shake off from myself all the responsibility on the ground that the persons had come into the service by competitive examination.

3456. Passing from the examination of the attachés, and proceeding to the position of the under secretaries of legation, I suppose we are correctly informed that progress in their profession depends upon seniority, and that if there is no very gross case of impropriety or inefficiency, practically there is no reward for any extraordinary ability on the part of the subordi of missions?—I think you have stated the very correctly. Now that diplomacy is a re profession, and you require men to qualify f and put them through a severe examination, acquire certain rights in the profession, unless you can show that some one man is eminently fit for a post, I think that the a tion of seniority is the only way by which can inspire a feeling in the service that they dealt with fairly. That, of course, makes advance very slow. I cannot but consider profession as a stagnant one; I do not say other professions are not also stagnant, b think that the diplomatic service is much so.

3457. Assuming that there is a block, w has been acknowledged by many witnesses fore this Committee, does it arise from the n ber of juniors being so large in proportion to number of the highest appointments in the fession?—The same thing might be said of military profession; there is a great disproportion between ensigns and generals. But, r ring to that memorandum which I just now r I may observe that there are no juniors, attachés appointed except where it is absolu necessary to fill up the staffs of the missi The staffs of the missions, to the best of knowledge (and if I thought otherwise t should be reduced), are not more than suffic to perform the business of the office, and to g that sort of necessary leave and allowance sickness that you must have in every establ ment. I know that if ever an attaché is abs or promoted to any other appointment, there v soon comes from the head of the mission earnest request that the place may be filled I really do not think that the establishmen over-manned.

3458. But this stagnation of which you sp must, as a matter of course, very much dest the energy of the members of the profession No doubt.

3459. A system which offers so little expec tion for the future must, in the very nature things, be an unfortunate system?—Yes; but wh I may ask, do you think of a midshipman in navy?

3460. My object is not at all to point at a undue exercise of patronage in any way, but lead to this question, whether, as the block ari from the number of juniors in the line of pron tion, if a system were adopted which wo lessen materially the number of juniors in t line of promotion by providing at every one the missions an officer not in the line of pron tion, who would take off a large amount of t ordinary routine work of the legation, that mig not assist very materially in removing the blo in the service?—Of course, if there were few young men appointed as attachés, the block the way of promotion would be lessened. B the means which you propose, I think, would extremely doubtful; because, in that case, y must appoint a man who would be considere merely devoted to the drudgery of the legatio a sort of pariah, to whom certain work could confided, and who would not be in reality part the legation, because the very work that you gi him establishes his inferiority. I think that th would be a very objectionable mode of carryi on the business. You would always have to considering what might be confided to that m

what might not. He would be a man placed e by the hypothesis without expecting pro- on; he would merely be established there as onary to do the drudgery of the office; you t not expect earnest application to work from and yet you must pay him quite as much more than you would pay a man who had er aspirations.

461. I think you will admit that that must aken with some modification, because if you a man in that position who would not have necessary reason for personal expenditure the under secretaries of legation have at the ent time, a salary would be amply sufficient an officer of that kind, which would not be cient for a secretary of legation?—No, be- e he could not live upon less than the junior bers of legation do. I think people have little idea of what the expense of living ad is. A man who is employed at a legation, who has a certain amount of confidential k, you must suppose to be in the category of lemen, otherwise he would not be confidential. e is not in the category of gentlemen, I think could not employ him, and you could not ex- the others to associate with him. I think that a system would produce heartburning in the sions, and really would not be attended with economy, because you could not give a man hat sort less than the others live upon.

462. I think I may assume, that in the eign Office cases occur in which employés in office, not gentlemen, have an opportunity of aining knowledge of matters requiring con- nce, and yet that the Foreign Office never ad that that confidence has been broken; e, for instance, the binders of the documents, letters and archives in the Foreign Office; become acquainted, or may become ac- inted, with matters of that importance, and I eve it is a fact, that the information so ob- ed has never been divulged?—The mere chers of documents, and the binders of them, taken from the class of respectable artizans, are not at all of the category of persons that are alluding to required for the different sions; and there is no such man in the eign Office, as you are supposing, taken on what I may call pariah work, that is to say, an devoted to the drudgery without any hope improvement of his condition, or encourage- nt from promotion. Such a man must feel t he belongs to an inferior class of men; and en a man himself accepts an inferior position, vill always be assigned to him by others.

463. Your Lordship is aware that that is the e in every department of life; in all com- rcial business, in every direction you find that fidential men are appointed of a lower grade n those, who either as partners, or sons of tners, have a higher position in connection h the undertaking; that is to say, that you get m what is no doubt a lower class, doing a lower rk, that work done in a confidential and careful nner, in return for the salaries that you pay? You get that work done now, under the pre- t system, at the Foreign Office, by men of ose antecedents you have knowledge, about om you can make every inquiry, and whom n have absolutely under your thumb, if I may the expression, by hopes of future employ- nt at 100*l.* a year. You cannot get a man to ve you for less than that, and it is five or six rs before he gets a rise; I say that you cannot get the inferior work done at a lower rate. When a young gentleman comes into the Foreign Office and copies despatches from consuls, and all that sort of work, it is not the most interesting work for him, but that is how he rises, and becomes competent to fill a higher post.

3466. Practically, these private reports from the heads of missions are not encouraged in the Foreign Office?—I cannot say that they are encouraged or otherwise. A gentleman occupying the position of head of a mission has a certain number of young men under his command, and I think that he undertakes himself to look after their discipline and their good conduct. It is only when flagrant misconduct arises, or when a man shows himself unworthy, that it becomes the duty of the chief to report him; otherwise I should say that keeping order in his own establishment, if I may so speak, devolves upon the head himself. But a practice of reporting whether Mr. A was more attentive than Mr. B, I think, would not prove beneficial.

3467. You are aware that the heads of missions have complained to the Foreign Office that they have not sufficient control over their departments; Lord Cowley and Lord Lyons, for instance, have made that complaint; in a despatch to Lord John Russell, dated the 28th December 1860, Lord Lyons, writing from Washington, says, "Circumstances have, I think, of late years led to a diminution of the intercourse between chiefs of missions and their subordinates. The tendency seems to be towards the chief, and the secretaries standing aloof from each other altogether, and towards the attachés being little more to the chief than mere copying clerks. This is, I think, on all accounts to be regretted; it diminishes the dignity and efficiency of the mission. It has a still more disadvantageous effect upon the diplomatic education of the junior members;" then, later on, he says, "A chief in the British diplomatic service has very small means of enforcing discipline. A sense of duty and propriety, and, I may add, gentleman-like habits and manners, appear generally to suffice to make the subordinates respectful to their chief, and to induce them to give a fair share of their time and attention to their official duties. In a gross case of insubordination, misconduct, or negligence, the chief would, I suppose, have the resource of reporting the offender to the Secretary of State; but unless such a report drew down upon the culprit some very severe mark of displeasure, its effect would be to increase rather than to diminish insubordination. His being merely removed to another post might be a reward rather than a punishment. If such were supposed to be the only probable result, a complaint to the Foreign Office would be a most ineffectual weapon in the hands of the chief so unlucky as to be stationed at a post not regarded as a pleasant residence. Probably the most effectual means of giving a more thorough control over the attachés would be to make their promotion in a greater degree dependent upon the approval or disapproval of their chiefs. Custom has, I think, rendered the control of the chiefs over the secretaries much less than would be necessary if the secretaries were more regularly employed in the daily work of the legation"? — With regard to the statements which you refer to as made by Lord Lyons and Lord Cowley, I never heard them before, and I do not know whether they are answers to a Committee, or whether they are enclosed in despatches; but they are hypothetical cases, and without the least disrespect to Lord Lyons or Lord Cowley (for most assuredly better heads of missions never were), I should say that any insubordination, any want of discipline, any incompetency of service, was entirely to be attributed to the head of the mission. I was six years a minister; I had a great variety of persons at the legation while I was there, and I never found the least difficulty. They were all well conducted gentlemen; some of them might have been a little more diligent and others a little more idle, but I never had the least difficulty. It was as present to every one of them that in case of misconduct I should report him, as it would be to the ensign of a regiment, that the colonel would report him; but I never heard of anything of a serious kind. I should say that if there was any regular insubordination at a mission, if the discipline was not properly maintained, I should address myself more to the head of that mission than I should to the peccant attaché.

3468. Without going to any gross case, such as is alluded to in the despatches, I presume that your Lordship would admit that the efficiency of missions would be interfered with by any such want of harmony between the chief and the subordinates as would amount perhaps to their not being on speaking terms?—Certainly it would interfere with the efficiency of any service. If I were not on speaking terms with Mr. Otway, for instance, I should say that the ciency of the service would be greatly dama But I think that it would be exceedingly diffic and would tax all the ingenuity of this C mittee as well as of Parliament, to devise s means of making two gentlemen like each o who had determined not to like each other.

3469. But would you expect that any subalt would venture to be on those terms out of hours of duty with his superior officer?—N should certainly not expect it, and if I heard any attaché being insubordinate to his chief, his chief reported him, that attaché would be moved, and certainly not to another and a be place.

3470. We are discussing this question wit view to see how far the present system secu harmony, and I ask whether, in your experien it is not the fact that occasionally there is a g deal of unpleasant feeling and quarrelling missions, and differences between the heads missions and the secretaries of legation?— really cannot say that that has come under knowledge. There are differences in hum nature; there are some natures that are as oil other natures that are as water, and they do mix well together; but, as a general rule, I ha known very little unpleasantness indeed. I ha known the head of a mission say that he thou his secretary of embassy or legation was not pleasant fellow, and I daresay that individu of that sort may suffer in their social intercour but I have never heard of the public serv being prejudiced by that; and that is what it our business to look after.

3471. Still I understand that in your juc ment the public service must suffer unless the is an harmonious working of a mission betwe the chief and the subordinates of the mission? If the chief of a mission understands his po tion, and understands the amount of authori vested in him, and knows the power at his bac he can perfectly well maintain discipline.

3472. With regard to the appointments missions, is it the rule of the Foreign Secret to appoint the senior secretary of embassy to vacant mission?—No; I do not think that the is any positive rule about that. I think that t Secretary of State, as I have said cæteris paribu would always be disposed to take the person wh is senior, because amongst the different missio there is not that very great difference in th requirements and aptitudes, if I may use suc an expression, of the persons to fill them, t would make it necessary to give the go-by that principle of seniority which, diplomacy no being a profession, ought to be observed; but should never hesitate to set aside that practice seniority, if I thought it for the public good t do so. If I knew by experience, by reports, o in short, by what I felt to be sufficient knowledg that B was eminently qualified for a particula post, I should be sorry to pass over A, but should not hesitate to do it; because one's firs rule is the good of the public service; to do al the justice that one can to the employés of th public, in order to prevent, as much as one can well-founded heart-burnings, but still always i possible to appoint the right man in the righ place.

3473. It has been stated in the House of Com mons, and complaint has been made in th House of Commons, that there are certain gentle men at present on pension who have filled the offic of minister abroad, and whose appointment y mission would save their pensions to the ; may I ask your Lordship whether there sufficient reason for not appointing diplo-pensioners, who from their age and health t for employment?—That is a matter upon

I think the Secretary of State is personesponsible. There is no great injustice done e individuals, because they would not gain more if they were employed than they gain maining on the pension list. I do not wish y anything that is personal or disagreeable ybody, but I reserve to myself the right, a perfect sense of responsibility, to be upon to account for its exercise when ne-ry, of judging what is best for the public ce, and if I think that the public service d gain more by continuing to give a pen-to a gentleman than by re-employing him, I hat upon my individual responsibility. I given proofs enough, and shall give more,
I hope, of my desire that economy shall be practised, and it is from nothing but a sense of public duty if I do not re-employ persons in diplomatic positions who by accident, or one cause or another, find themselves on the pension list.

The Earl of Clarendon.

26 May 1870.

3474. There was a recent vacancy which was filled up by a gentleman, a late Member of this House, Mr. Layard, who had not been in the diplomatic service for a number of years, and who was not in the line of promotion to that post; is not that rather going out of the general rule?—I cannot say that it was going out of the general rule, because the general rule of the Foreign Office is, that a man who has been under secretary may claim to go out as minister. There are numerous instances of that; they are not quite fresh to my recollection now; it has always been considered a rule of the service that when an under secretary has served well and for some time, and he is appointed to a mission, he goes out ad eundem.

The Right Hon. EDWARD PLEYDELL BOUVERIE, in the Chair.

The Honourable Thomas John Hovell Thurlow, called in; and Examined.

13 June 1870.

3476. How long have you served in it?—I have been serving since June 1858.

3477. You began as an unpaid attaché?—Yes.

3478. And what rank have you reached now?—That of a second secretary.

3479. How long have you been a second secretary?—Since 1864.

3480. Where have you served?—I began by going to Paris.

3481. You were first in the Foreign Office, I suppose?—I was one week in the Foreign Office. According to the regulations I ought to have been three months there; but they wanted hands at Paris, and I was sent out. After being a little time there I went to Stockholm, then back to Paris, and then out to China with Lord Elgin's special mission; then I went back to Paris, and then I got leave from the Foreign Office to accompany Lord Elgin to India as his private secretary; then I returned to Europe and was appointed to Vienna; then I went to Washington, and from Washington I went to the Hague, where I am now.

3482. Then, in fact, you have served all round the world?—Very nearly.

3483. How many colleagues of the rank of second secretary have you?—I am not very sure, but the Foreign Office list shows, I think, 32 or 33, or something of that sort.

3484. When should you expect to arrive at the next step in your profession?—I could not say, but at the rate at which promotion is going on not much under 10 years.

3485. In 10 years you might expect to be a first secretary of legation?—Yes.

3486. How old would you be then?—I should be over 40.

3487. Have you considered whether you would continue in the profession with reference to this point of the length of service in the subordinate grades?—I have quite made up my mind to leave the service at the expiration of my present leave, for I see no prospect of rising in it.

3488. You have come to that determination on account of the very distant prospect of promotion in the profession?—Entirely on that account.

3489. No other reasons have led you to it?—No other reasons; I see no inducement to remain in the service.

3490. Have you ever attempted to calculate if you became a first secretary in what time you might become a minister?—Yes; it is possible to go through the list of first secretaries in 10 years, but it is very unusual I should say.

3491. That would be extremely good luck, would it?—I should consider it extremely good luck.

3492. You must in your experience have become familiar with a good many members of the same standing as yourself; does the feeling prevail amongst them that you give expression to on your own account?—I should say that the feeling is universal, and I do not believe that many of them would remain in the service if they could see their way to a living out of it.

3493. They think that they have made a mistake in ever entering it?—Yes.

3494. Has that reference more to promotion and the opportunities of distinction, or to want of pay?—Certainly, it is more with regard to promotion and opportunities of distinguishing themselves, and making a name, and rendering service; the pay is not tempting.

3495. I need not ask you whether your experience confirms what has been told us by other gentlemen, that the pay in the lower grades is utterly insufficient to maintain a secretary?—Utterly.

3496. Therefore a gentleman in the lower grades has to live mainly upon his own means?—Yes.

3497. The temptation to enter the service is therefore the prospect of rising to the highest stations, and the distinction consequent on that?—Yes.

3498. To what do you attribute the stoppage in the promotion?—I attribute it very much to the reduction of some of the small missions (five or six have been reduced in the course of the last few years), and to the number of subordinates not having been reduced in accordance with the number of missions; there are the same number t a greater number, of second and third secre-s and attachés now than there used to be of and unpaid attachés, when there were more ons.

99. The lower ranks are filled up, but the er ranks have been diminished?—Yes.

00. I presume that the number of first secre-s, as well as the number of ministers has diminished?—Yes.

01. Are you of opinion that the number of nd and third secretaries and attachés could be nished fully in proportion to the diminution of issions?—I think that some plan ought to it upon for reducing them, so that you might the same number of second and third secre-s as you have of first secretaries; then the notion would be regular throughout the pro-on.

02. You would propose to have an equal ber of each rank?—I would have an equal ber of first, second, and third secretaries.

03. With regard to the number that you ld have in the lowest grade; you have suged in the memorandum furnished to me, 16
chés?—Yes; calculating on four vacancies y year, they would be worked off in four s.

04. Is four about the average of the vacan-
?—Four is about what it would be if there e no outsiders put in.

05. Then you would contemplate making it
e a close profession, and having no outsiders?
n that case it would be so.

06. Then how would you provide for retire-t at the top of the service; would you wait death, vacancies, or incapacity, or would you erannuate them?—I think that the French e a system of superannuation after a certain ; and I think that that would be a very good n for us to adopt.

07. You mean compulsory retirement at a ain age?—Yes.

08. Is that the case in the French service?
believe so.

09. Do you know at what age?—No, I am sure, but I think that it is earlier than I uld advocate; I think it is very near 50.

10. That is retirement from the lower grades, resume?—I believe it is from the highest.

11. Many of the first men in the diplomatic vice of this country, in the present generation in past ones, have been far above that age, e they not?—Yes.

12. Is there any reason why a minister or bassador at 70, should not be quite as efficient at 50?—Not the least.

13. Then it would rather be by way of keep-up the current of promotion, that you would ommend such a system?—Yes.

14. I gather, that you believe in the adntage of having younger men in the service her than older ones?—It is not an invariable
e, by any means, that it proves an advantage, t I think that there ought to be a way of tting rid of old gentlemen when you like. It ght be optional with the Secretary of State haps to use that power.

15. You would give him that weapon, at any
e?—Yes.

16. Supposing that this scale of yours was opted, or anything like it, what would you do the meantime to clear the present block; how uld you get rid of the extra second secretaries o are now encumbering that rank?—I think that some of them might be drafted advantageously into the consular service, for instance, as vacancies occurred; or they might be induced, perhaps, to take all sorts of other patronage, at the disposal of the Government, in its different branches, to which they might be considered to have some claim. That is the practice that has been followed in India, on the abolition of two or three different services there. When the Indian navy, for instance, was abolished, the officers were held to have a claim on the patronage of other departments; and the same was the case with the Indian police, the other day, since Lord Mayo has been there. They were not all drafted at once, but they were given small pensions, and were officially informed that they would have a prior claim upon the patronage of the Government of India to other candidates equally eligible; and I believe that they have almost all since been drafted into different branches of the public service.

3517. Was that done to the satisfaction of the gentlemen who had to retire or in invitos?—It was done with great satisfaction to the gentlemen who had to retire.

3518. Do you think that it could be done with the same satisfaction to some gentlemen in the diplomatic service?—I think with very great satisfaction. There are a great many posts at home that the Government have to dispose of, which a great many first and second secretaries would be glad to take, and which they would be quite competent to fill; all sorts of inspectorships, and other things of that kind.

3519. I understand that your scheme would be to reduce the standard number to an equal number of first, second, and third secretaries, and to provide in the meantime for the supernumeraries by other public employment?—Yes; unless, perhaps, some of them might be bought up as the Indian colonels were; they might get bonuses.

3520. But assuming that there is not a larger subordinate staff now than is requisite for the public service, what would you do in regard to the work which these gentlemen have hitherto been doing?—In the first place, I would establish a chancelier, such as they have in most of the continental diplomatic services, a system which works well.

3521. You mean that you would have a permanent one?—I would have a permanent man attached to the principal embassies and missions to take care of the archives and keep the registers, and do a great deal of miscellaneous work, which is now handed over to the attachés.

3522. There is an officer of that kind at Paris, I think?—Yes.

3523. Is he a gentleman of the same class and stamp as the attachés, or of an inferior class of society?—He is of the same class.

3524. Is he an Englishman?—Yes; I know him very well; I served with him at Paris over three years; I allude to Mr. Atlee.

3525. Has he been permanently established at the mission?—Yes; when Lord Cowley was appointed ambassador, I think in 1851, he chose Mr. Atlee for his private secretary, and he has been there ever since, with great advantage to the work of the embassy.

3526. I presume that he is familiar with all the past correspondence and archives of the mission?—Yes; and he is now consul, for which he gets a small additional pay.

3527. What are his emoluments?—I should think about 600 l. or 700 l. a year altogether.

 3528. And

Hon. T. J. H. Thurlow.

13 June 1870.

3528. And is that the ultimate estate to which he can arrive?—I believe so; I think that he gets an annual increase of 10 l. a year.

3529. And you think from your knowledge of Paris, that that has worked satisfactorily?—Certainly, it has worked quite satisfactorily at Paris.

3530. Is there anything of the kind at any of the other missions, to your knowledge?—Yes, I believe at Constantinople Count Pisani occupies a very similar position; and there is a Mr. Michell who at St. Petersburg occupies a very similar position, and with great advantage, I should say, to the public service.

3531. Is Mr. Michell attached in the same way permanently at St. Petersburg?—I believe so.

3532. Did Mr. Atlee begin as quite a novice at Paris when he started in this office?—Yes, he was quite a young man then, and he had been in no other branch of the public service. I think he came fresh from college.

3533. Was there anybody at that time to initiate him into the business of the chancellerie, or had he to learn it all from his own industry?—He had to learn it all in the same way as any attaché joining.

3534. There was nobody to hand on the traditions of the archives to him?—I believe not. I believe they were very indifferently kept before he came there; so I have been told.

3535. Viscount Barrington.] He came originally as private secretary to Lord Cowley?—Yes.

3536. Consequently he would not have the keeping of the archives at once, would he?—I believe that his appointments have gone on by degrees.

3537. Mr. W. Cartwright.] He is now consul also?—He is consul as well, and he has all the other duties that I have mentioned.

3538. Chairman.] Was there a chancelier before him?—I believe not.

3539. Then it is an innovation in the work of the office there, as far as you know?—I suppose so.

3540. And a successful innovation you think?—Most successful, I should consider.

3541. And judging from your experience, you would recommend its extension to other important missions?—I would.

3542. To what missions?—To begin with, I would have it wherever we have an embassy, consequently at Berlin and Vienna. I should consider it indispensable at Washington and Florence, and we might perhaps have it at Madrid. At Pekin and Yeddo they have practically a man of that sort already.

3543. One of the interpreters, you mean?—Yes; the senior interpreter for the time being.

3544. With respect to copying despatches, a great deal of the business of the junior members of the missions consists in that copying work, does it not?—Yes; and it frequently happens that more than one copy is required of the same document, two or three copies, and in such cases I think we might follow the example of the United States and use copying presses with great advantage; it would be a great saving of labour and of time; in the United States in what they call the State Department, which is their foreign office, copying presses are in constant use; all the despatches received from the Government at Washington by our Minister there have been copied; they all come from the copying press.

3545. They have all had a copy taken off then—Yes, they have all been impressed.

3546. Do you know whether that is practis by any other diplomatic body?—I have kno Russian diplomatists use copying presses, but am not aware whether they are officially reco nised by any other services.

3547. It is not known in our service, at a rate?—No.

3548. Is it your considered opinion that wi the establishment of a chancelier at the emb sies, and at Washington, and at Florence, a the use of copying presses, you could amp supply the want of power which might be creat by taking off 11 second secretaries from t present staff?—Certainly; I consider that tho who remained would be much more willing a quite equal to take any additional share of wo which might accrue to them in consequence such reduction; but I do not believe that t additional share of work would be anything ver excessive.

3549. And do you allow for leave of absenc —I allow for leave of absence. And of the attachés that I should recommend having, t or three might be sent as occasion required any post where there was at that moment a great amount of correspondence.

3550. You would have a flying staff attachés?—As a rule, I would keep the attach at the embassies where the work is more vari and constant, and where they learn their busine much quicker than at other places.

3551. It is important that they should see variety of business?—Yes; but one or two them might always be available to be sent to a spot where there was a great and sudden deman 3552. Have you any suggestions to make to the rate of pay?—To begin with, I would ce tainly pay the unpaid attachés; I would gi them a small remuneration, 100 l. or 150 l. year, not so much because I consider that the want the money as to entitle the State to the best work. I think that the present system very demoralising, under which a young ma enters at 23 or 24, and serves for an uncerta number of years unpaid; he considers that th State has no right to his labour, very often.

3553. And not being paid, he thinks that h may do as he likes?—He thinks that he may d as little as he can, and that he should get as muc leave as possible.

3554. Is it a system which is practised in th other services, the French or Russian, fo example, that of having unpaid service at all?—Yes, I believe so.

3555. Do you know how their pay in the lowe grades compares with the pay in ours?—Th French lower grades are paid better than our A second secretary in the French service gets, think, a minimum of 400 l. a year, and a secon secretary in our service gets a minimum of 250 l

3556. In the French service do they attac any qualifications to their service by way o position or money?—Yes, they have a mone qualification, which I think might be introduce into our service with great advantage. I think it is entirely a profession for rich men, and think that we get into very great discredit abroa very often from having people in the service wh cannot afford to live in a proper way.

3557. Who have not enough means of thei own to make up the deficiency of their pay?—Just so; when a man becomes a third secretary our service he gets 150 l. a year, and it is impssible that he can live as he ought to live der 600 l. or 700 l., unmarried.

3558. And if he happens to try and live on s, then you think it degrades the profession?—ink that the mission loses caste. Certainly in ntinental services, particularly in the French l Russian services, the juniors spend more ney than our juniors.

3559. Are they men of greater means, do you nk, generally?—I think so.

3560. I understand you to say that those in lowest ranks, the attachés, you would attach the larger missions, and merely detach occaally for special service to the smaller ones?—here were 16 attachés, as there are now five emssies, if there were two at each embassy, that uld leave three or four (there being always one more on leave, and one or two working in the reign Office), who might be sent as sudden ocion required to any other post. For instance, Athens lately, there has been a very great mand for writing, and they have sent out an aché or two there suddenly.

3561. You are aware that Mr. Erskine, in the e of the greatest difficulty was absolutely with any assistance, and had to do everything himf?—Yes, I presume that he found somebody copy his enclosures; it is impossible that he uld have done it all himself, with his own hand, l attended to his other duties besides.

3562. Can you state what the staff would be of diplomatic service, according to your scheme? I would have embassies at Paris, St. Petersrg, Constantinople, Berlin, Vienna, Florence, l Washington, all great centres of correspondhce. The ambassador, I think, should have ,000 l. a year and a house.

3563. Do you attach much importance to the oviding of a house?—I attach the greatest imrtance to having an embassy house.

3564. You mean that it would be desirable the public service?—Yes.

3566. It adds to his influence, and weight, and thority, you think?—It adds to his dignity om the very commencement.

3567. There is no house at Washington, I ink?—No, there is not; Sir Frederick Bruce, hen he was there, was very anxious to induce e Government to buy a house.

3568. Mr. W. Cartwright.] Nor is there one Florence?—At Florence there is none; am not sure whether the Government have not ken a lease at Florence for some 20 years.

3569. Chairman.] Was there any particular casion on which Sir Frederick Bruce attempted get an embassy house at Washington?—Yes, ere was a particular occasion when a most adirable residence could have been got, entirely ne up, for about 10,000*l.*; the same site could t be procured now for three or four times the oney; and that opportunity was neglected at e time.

3570. The proposal was refused?—It was resed; it was eventually sanctioned, but by the me it was sanctioned (I believe I am correct in ying that it was ultimately sanctioned by the reasury), it was too late, and the property had en sold for other purposes.

3571. Will you proceed to state your scheme?—The first secretaries of embassy should have, I think, 1,000*l.* a year. There should be at each embassy two second secretaries at 500*l.* a year each, and one third secretary at 250 l. There should be two attachés at each embassy with 100 l. a year a-piece, and one chancelier, say, with a maximum of, say 500*l.* The first class missions, I think, should be at Madrid, Brussels, the Hague, Copenhagen, Rio, Pekin, Teheran. I would have a first secretary on 700 l., a second secretary on 400 l., and a third secretary on 250 l., at each of those missions. Then, at the second class missions, which would be Stockholm, Munich, Stuttgardt, Mexico, Berne, Lisbon, Buenos Ayres, Athens, and Yeddo, I would have a first secretary on 600 l., and a third secretary on 250 l. There would further be chargés-d'affaires, as there are at present, at Tangiers, the Hans Towns, Lima, Santiago, Monte Video, Caracas, Port au Prince, Bogota, Central America, Quito, Coburg, Dresden, Rome, Darmstadt, Alexandria, Bucharest, and Tunis; and those chargés-d'affaires should be appointed from the first secretaries of embassy or legation.

3573. Then, according to this distribution, I make out that you would have, as you propose, equal numbers of first secretaries, second secretaries, and third secretaries; with 16 attachés and seven chanceliers, at the principal missions?—Yes; the number of chanceliers might be increased if it were found desirable in places of sufficient importance.

3574. With respect to the interchange of service between the Foreign Office and the Foreign Diplomatic Service, have you any opinion on that point?—I think that it would be highly desirable to increase the number of instances of such transfers. I think that they are productive of very great good, and promote very much, among the members of the service residing abroad, the knowledge of how affairs are conducted at home, which is very beneficial, and I cannot understand the opposition which has been systematically made by the Foreign Office, to prevent that free transfer.

3575. It never has been done hitherto?—It has been done in some instances. At this moment there are two or three of the Foreign Office clerks serving abroad; one at Florence, I believe, and one at Berlin.

3576. It never has been done as a system in our service, has it?—It has been officially recognised in the rules.

3577. Is it practised generally in the Foreign Diplomatic Services?—It is practiced very generally in the French service.

3578. And so you think with advantage?—With great advantage. In my own case, for instance, I was only one week in the Foreign Office, before I was sent abroad, and that was all the experience that I had of how affairs were conducted in the Foreign Office itself.

3579. As a rule attachés have to go through a period of six months' service, have they not?—I think it is three months.

3580. Have you ever considered, with regard to foreign messengers, the question of their rank and position?—I consider it of great importance, that they should be men of high social position, perfect bred gentlemen, and that their pay should render them quite independent of seeking to increase their emoluments in other ways, as they might be tempted to do, if they were reduced from their present allowances.

3581. Does a man obtain any facilities in the discharge of those duties from being a man of a certain position and importance?—I think that it is impossible to say what particular occasions may arise in the course of travelling from London to St. Petersburg or Constantinople, but very often the presence of a man, his gentlemanly appearance, may enable him to catch a train, or may lead the officials to relax their regulations as to registration of baggage, which may enable him to get into a train, and so save 24 hours. I have known that often happen; for instance, at Paris in the case of the Queen's messengers, they do not insist on registration of their baggage; they go through the official entrance, the guard's entrance, at once, without having the trouble of taking their ticket; they have these immunities accorded to them abroad simply on account of their appearance and gentlemanly behaviour, and being good linguists; it is indispensable that they should be good linguists, and that is a very expensive qualification.

3582. You would not approve then of the proposal to reduce the position of the Queen's messengers?—I would rather reduce the number of the Queen's messengers than their position, if you want to save money.

3583. I collect from what you have said, that the result of introducing a system such as you have sketched out, would be to make the diplomatic profession a close one altogether?—Yes.

3584. You would contemplate no outsiders being brought in?—No outsiders.

3585. And with respect to special missions, would you contemplate their being done away with too?—I object to special missions on two grounds, on the ground that they have generally, or at least that they have very often, failed in their purpose in the same way as our ordinary diplomatic agents, that is to say, where our ordinary diplomatic agents have failed, I do not see that special missions have succeeded very often; and they are very costly. I can hardly recall at this moment any recent special mission that has attained very great results in the Foreign Office.

3586. May it not be desirable sometimes on critical questions, arising with foreign courts, for a minister to send somebody who is not in personal daily communication with them, to conduct the negociations?—Of course occasions may arise in which special missions may be very valuable, but as a rule I should discourage them.

3587. Do you think that the practice is viewed with dislike by the profession?—It is viewed with very great dislike by the profession, and it puts the accredited agent at the court in a very anomalous position. I could mention one instance, if it is proper to do so. When Lord Cowley went to Vienna in 1859, it placed Lord Augustus Loftus in a very difficult position, before the outbreak of the Italian war; I think that I am not saying too much in saying that.

3588. It is possible to conceive that great public advantage might sometimes arise from that sort of mission?—It might, and I should certainly leave it open to a foreign minister to send a special mission.

3589. As it is they are but rare?—Yes.

3590. Mr. Otway.] You would always consider the public advantage before the private inconvenience of the minister or ambassador?—

course.

3591. Mr. Lowther.] Were you at Vienna the time that that occurred?—No, I was at P then.

3592. Chairman.] Is there anything that would like to add to what you have said?—I think not.

3593. Mr. Rylands.] Your attention has b directed chiefly, I think, to the inconvenience objection to the service, arising out of the bl which exists at present in the service?—I c sider it very desirable to have trained diploma agents, and I think that the present system calculated to drive the best men out of the s vice, and to delay promotion unduly in the c of those who remain in it.

3594. And you see no causes at present operation which would relieve the system fr the objections which you entertain to its pres constitution?—No, I do not see any.

3595. Then you would not agree with t statement made before this Committee, that t circumstances of the service in that respect much improved, as compared with former yea —No.

3596. There is a statement in which it is s that the relative position of the second and th secretaries is better now than it was a few ye ago; that does not accord with your view?— should say that no doubt the position of the seco and third secretaries is improved by the gra ing of commissions to them, which was done t other day.

3597. But not in reference to the ultima chance of promotion?—No, not in reference the ultimate chance of promotion. The givi of a commission to second and third secretari may be a slight boon, but it certainly does n advance their promotion, or tend to improve th ultimate chances of rising.

3598. I take it that the Committee must u derstand that you think the present system do not offer that inducement to an intelligent ac vity on the part of the subordinates in the servi which it ought to do?—Well, I think that the is a great deal of intelligent activity brought light under the existing regulations; but I thi that the service deserves better treatment th it receives, and that what it wants is regul routine promotion a little more rapid than it now, or rather a great deal more rapid than it now.

3599. Do not you think it desirable that pr motion should be other than routine; that should have some reference to the capacity the members of the service?—When a man h attained the rank of first secretary, I think th then the promotion ought to go by merit; but think routine promotion up to the rank of fir secretary should be the rule.

3600. You think, then, that there is no obje tion to the juniors in the service feeling that b no activity or intelligence that they may posse can they advance their promotion in any way?— No; I think, on the contrary, it is just as we that the subordinates should feel that nothin that they can do can advance their promotion u to the rank of first secretary. I think that t much zeal would be a very dangerous thin among attachés, paid or unpaid.

3601. But if the post of secretary of legatio and embassy were made the principal point which the junior members of the service coul arrive ve; your remark would then apply to the nd secretary just as it now applies to the tary of legation; you would say that the r members should go by seniority up to position of second secretary, providing the tion of first secretary was the culminating t of the service?—I would have the promo- routine up to the rank of first secretary of ion.

02. That is assuming that the service must ntirely a close one, and no outsiders ap- ted to be heads of missions?—Yes.

03. But supposing it were so altered or so rstood, that outsiders should come in as heads issions, then your views would be met, if the ice were one of routine promotion up to the of second secretary, would they not?—It s to me that the two points are quite dis- t, the question of the admission of outsiders e rank of envoy, and the question of routine otion up to the rank of first secretary; I do see what bearing they have upon each r.

04. I will ask you about the appointment of ders as heads of missions presently; but the tion which I put to you now is this, if it so decided that outsiders should be ap- ted to be heads of missions and that the close ice, properly speaking, should end with the taries of embassy and legation, as the cul- ting point of the service, then your views ld be met if up to the rank of second secre- the system of routine were adopted, and the principle of merit; that the highest ion in the routine service, that of secretary argé d'affaires should be granted to the man had distinguished himself most as second tary?—I think that as a rule it would be to hold out to the juniors in the service, r whom I include the attachés and the third second secretaries, the chance of advancing selves over the heads of their colleagues in service by any efforts of their own. I think in the junior grades there ought certainly to outine promotion until you arrive at the rank st secretary, and then I consider that the secretary, if it were desirable, might be made nister in a very few years, or a secretary of assy, without reference to his seniority on the f first secretaries.

05. You, of course, would object to the ap- tment of Mr. Layard as an outsider, I mean ng your principle and not making it a per- l matter?—I consider that appointment very upon the service. I consider that there are y men in the service who have better claims perhaps, equally good qualifications for the ose of the minister at Madrid as Mr. Layard; that is the light in which it is regarded by service. I am not aware that Mr. Layard any special claims making him an absolutely ssary man to have at Madrid at this moment; of course that is a point that I am not ca- e of discussing.

06. We are talking, of course, of the gene- principle, and not of the personal matter. r idea is, I think, that, under no circum- ces, ought there to be placed at the head of a ion any man who had not gone through the rdinate grades of the service?—As a general , most certainly that is so.

07. And you would proceed upon the prin- e that only a certain number of young men ld be introduced as attachés, and that they 51.

should, by steps more rapid than at present, necessarily arrive at the ultimate goal of ambition, unless there were some very serious objections?—That they should ultimately arrive, in a shorter space of time than now, at the rank of first secretary; but that their further promotion should depend on merit.

3608. But, according to your plan, you would have so few first secretaries to select from, that when there was a vacancy at a mission or embassy, it would almost necessarily be the case that the first secretaries should, in turn, take the higher appointments?—I would have the same number of first secretaries that you have now, one to each mission; you cannot have more or less.

3609. And in the course of a certain number of years, particularly if these old gentlemen that you speak of were retired, there would be a certain number of vacancies into which the secretaries of legation and embassy would step?—If it were purely routine promotion; but there would be no reason to prevent a first secretary of legation remaining a first secretary of legation for 40 or 50 years, as is the case now; gentlemen in that position have been systematically passed over. A man at the top of the list of first secretaries has been constantly passed over for years and years, and I would have it so still, if the Secretary of State did not think that he was fit to be promoted.

3610. But you say that you would not place a second secretary in the position of first secretary by merit, but only by routine; and then you have a certain number of vacancies for heads of missions to be supplied out of a very narrow number of first secretaries of legation and embassy?—I wish it to be understood that my reason for not promoting a second secretary by merit is, that as I consider it would create a very bad feeling in chanceries in the conduct of the business to have these young men attachés and third and second secretaries, who are at work in the same room all trying to cut out each other in their daily work, each trying to distinguish himself unduly, and so on, to the detriment of his colleagues.

3611. You are aware that in the Foreign Office there is a certain amount of promotion in the grade of clerks apart from seniority and with reference to diligence and merit?—I think not in the grades corresponding to the second and third secretaries in the diplomatic service.

3612. To revert back to the point that I was pressing you upon just now, I think, as I understand your plan, it would lead almost necessarily to the appointment of every secretary of legation or embassy to a mission; I do not ask you whether it must absolutely lead to that, but in nine cases out of ten must it not do so?—In nine cases out of ten, it would, no doubt; and that I should say is one of the arguments in favour of keeping up small missions, where you can send people who attain that position, who are not, perhaps, qualified to go to a very big one. I think that that is one of the great uses of small missions for purposes of elimination. They cannot be all equally good men; you can send your good men to the big places, and your indifferent men to the small places.

3613. Do not you consider that for the conduct of our affairs in great embassies we ought to have men of very remarkable ability?—You ought to have men of very excellent ability, and of very good business habits, and I should say of considerable experience of living abroad, and of the ways of foreigners, and their habits of thought, and every thing of that kind.

3614. And of great judgment and prudence in the conduct of affairs?—Of sound judgment; good sound business-like men, who have learned their business.

3615. But do not you see that your plan would restrict the Foreign Secretary for the time being within very narrow limits in the selection of these men of great ability, of remarkable prudence, and of sound judgment?—He would have, according to my plan, the same list of first secretaries to draft his promotions out of, as he has now. You are aware that it is not a frequent practice now to make an outsider an envoy; as it is, promotion is usually routine in the service, and it is still exceptional for an outsider to be appointed.

3616. But your proposal would alter the present plan so far as this, that you would absolutely restrict the Foreign Secretary to the selection of one out of the secretaries of embassy and legation for any appointments to a foreign mission?—I would, unless he could come forward and say that there was no person in the service qualified for it.

3617. That would place him in a most invidious position, would it not?—Yes; but I consider that the Foreign Secretary, out of the list that he had to choose from, would find practically some person in the list adapted to any situation that might be vacant.

3620. And that many of the distinguished men who now occupy positions as ministers abroad came into that position under different circumstances, and were promoted under different circumstances, from those which now exist?—Yes.

3621. And you propose by your plan, still further to render this system a close and cramped system?—I do not consider that the closeness of the system has worked ill; quite the contrary. I think that there are as good men in the diplomatic service in the higher ranks as you will find in the higher ranks of any other service, and they have the benefit of long experience with foreigners and of speaking foreign languages, and they are au fait at their work. That is not generally the case with outsiders. In Mr. Layard's case, it is different; he had been in the Foreign Office many years before, and had served at Constantinople; and you may say that he is well qualified; but his is an exceptional case.

3622. I suppose you are quite aware that in the services of France and the United States the appointment of outsiders is a very frequent and I suppose an ordinary, occurrence?—As regards the United States they have no fixed diplomatic service. It is remodelled whenever any new president comes into office; he takes a sheet of paper and writes out the names of his people.

3623. And their ministers abroad are appointed entirely outside the service from among public men?—They have no fixed diplomatic service, you may say, in the United States; if they want to send a minister to Paris, the President appoints a private friend or a person whom he knows to be qualified to fill that post.

3624. But you are quite aware that there are secretaries of legation, in the different missions of the United States who remain there, although there may be a change in the Government at home?—They are not often promoted to be ministers; in the same way that the President when he comes into office appoints different men ministers; he appoints one man a secretary of legation, and another an attaché, and if he likes he withdraws all the others who are abroad.

3625. But is it not the fact that they have over the world a number of secretaries of legation, who are maintained although the Government of America may change, and a new President be appointed?—The staff of the American legation on the Continent is very small indeed. In very many of them they have nobody except the envoy, and very often you find a son-in-law doing the work of the legation.

3626. Mr. Lowther.] Or one who is likely to become a son-in-law?—Yes; they have no regular staff as we have abroad, and as France and Russia and Italy have.

3627. Mr. Rylands.] To the extent that they have it they do not select for their ministers abroad, as a rule, any of the men who have served in any of the legations?—When Mr. Motley was appointed here the other day he brought as his secretary the person just appointed as consul general in London, a General Badeau, who was military secretary to General Grant. There is no close profession in the United States service, and there can therefore be no outsider.

3628. In France there is a close profession?—Yes.

3629. And in France the custom has been very frequently to send to their foreign missions and embassies distinguished public men who have been outside the profession?—They have done that in France lately very often, but it is regarded as a great hardship by the service; and moreover, France can afford to do that with less hardship to their diplomatic service than we can because they have so many more embassies and missions. They have an embassy with a very large staff at Rome; they have an embassy with a very large staff at Berne; they have a minister at Hesse Cassel, and all sorts of places that we hardly know the names of; in short, they have 21 second secretaries and 30 embassies and legations; whereas we have 34 second secretaries and only 24 embassies and legations.

3630. But the fact remains that they do avail themselves of men of great public mark and great experience in public affairs as their ministers abroad?—They do occasionally as we do but I do not think more frequently. When I was at the Hague the other day, at the time that

M

13 June 1870.

Mr. Layard was appointed to Madrid, and the present French ambassador was appointed to St. Petersburg, the French legation at the Hague, and the whole of the diplomatic service, looked upon the appointment of an outsider to the French embassy at St. Petersburg as being as great a hardship as we in the British legation considered the appointment of Mr. Layard to Madrid to be.

3631. There are, of course, two ways of looking at appointments of this kind; one is the point of view of the public interest, and the other the point of view of the service. Of course you will admit that it is to the public interest that the Foreign Secretary should have the greatest possible discretion in the appointment of men who are the most suited to these very important missions abroad?—Of course.

3632. And I think you cannot deny that your plan would limit that discretion within very narrow bounds?—I am not aware that I suggested that the power of the foreign minister of appointing whom he likes, should be withdrawn; but I think that he should have very good reasons for doing it, when he appoints an outsider.

3633. You are quite aware that the Foreign Secretary may have to act in matters of this delicacy, on grounds that he could not properly be asked to state to the public?—Certainly.

3634. In the selection of agents abroad, it must be a very extreme case indeed, in which the public would have a right to call upon the Foreign Secretary to explain the reasons why he passed over particular men?—I consider that it would be a very extreme case in which the foreign minister could not find a first secretary of embassy or legation in the service, perfectly competent to perform the duties of ambassador, or minister, where there was a vacancy for one.

3635. You spoke about the compulsory retirement of ministers, with a view to relieve the block?—I simply pointed out that I believe that that system prevails in France, and that is another pull which the French system has over us; that was the incidental way in which I referred to it.

3636. But do you suppose that in regard to the appointment of ambassador to this court, under the French system, any statesman would be precluded, in consequence of his age, from being appointed to this court?—Probably not for an appointment of that magnitude. That is a thing easily ascertained; but I believe that they have a seniority qualification for compulsory retirement at a certain age.

3637. Possibly what you say in regard to compulsory retirement may apply to those gentlemen who form part of the diplomatic service in France, and it may not apply to outsiders; there may be some explanation of that kind?—Yes.

3638. I think that you did not tell the Committee at what period you would get rid of the old gentlemen who now block up the service?—I should be very sorry indeed to have to fix the period.

3639. Has not that been done lately in regard to admirals?—Yes, and if you fix the period for one branch of the public service, I do not see why you should not fix it for another.

3640. Is there not a difference in services; you can quite understand, for instance, that an admiral or a commander exposed to great physical hardships might be unfit for his duty at 70, while a minister, not exposed to hardship, but whose experience was invaluable, might be at his prime at 70; cannot you see that distinction?—It might be so certainly, but I can equally conceive that it might be the other way.

3641. But there you would come again to the discretion of the Secretary of State?—Yes.

3642. You are quite aware that some of the greatest statesmen that we have had of late years have been men who have held most important offices in this country at a very great age; Lord Palmerston, for instance, who was Prime Minister when he was extremely old; and I dare say that no one thought he ought to be got rid of, simply on the ground of his age; you are not prepared, as I understand you, to mention an age?—I only threw it out for the consideration of the Committee to inquire into the practice in that respect. In France, I think that they have a rule of some such sort as that.

3643. Mr. Otway.] The present French ambassador is past 70, I think?—It may be.

3644. Mr. Cartwright.] Are there many French ministers above 50 years of age?—I have seen very few French ministers above 50 years of age; as a rule they are much younger men; that rule may have reference only to the ministers, but the French diplomatic agents abroad are, as a class, nearly 10 years younger than ours.

3645. Mr. Rylands.] In consideration of the present difficulty in the foreign service, do you think that any relief would be furnished by a more complete amalgamation of the Foreign Office with the diplomatic service?—I think very great convenience might be afforded to both branches by more frequent exchanges, but I would not amalgamate them.

3646. You do not think it desirable that you should have certain ranks in the Foreign Office corresponding with ranks in the diplomatic service, so that the promotion in the two departments could be equivalent and exchangeable?—They have that in the French service already, but I have no reason to recommend it. I would keep them as distinct as now, but for the sake of permitting exchanges, I would establish a kind of scale of equal ranks in the two departments.

3647. Mr. Otway.] Would you propose to make the exchange compulsory?—Certainly not, but I would have it permitted in cases where it suited both parties, and where there were no public objections to it.

3648. Then would you give it a great extension, for instance, to the case of young men in the Foreign Office, whose means would not allow them to spend 500 l. or 600 l. a year?—I am speaking now from my own experience; I have tried more than once to exchange into the Foreign Office, and although I have found young men in the Foreign Office desirous to come abroad, I have not been able to get the Foreign Office sanction to my being exchanged into the Foreign Office, and I cannot conceive that there was any public reason why the exchange should not have been made, but simply the unwillingness of the Foreign Office to sanction it on a large scale.

3649. It seems to me that there is a difficulty in the way of the difference in pecuniary circumstances between many of the clerks employed in the Foreign Office, and many of the attachés abroad; if I understand you rightly, you wish to extend this system (and I do not say that I should not like to see it extended myself); but how do you propose to get over that difficulty?—I would

I would make no change from the present system, which admits of people retaining the pay of their old appointments. You have one of your clerks for instance at Berlin, who has exchanged with a second secretary; I think that in the cases you are referring to, the scale of pay is different, but here they keep their old scale of pay.

3650. But a clerk in the Foreign Office has the privilege of living with his parents, and he may live on 200 l. a year, whereas he could not live at Berlin, or Florence, or Paris, on 200 l. a year?—I would not make the exchanges compulsory, but where you find clerks who are willing to go abroad for a year, and people in the diplomatic service who are very anxious to come and live in London for a year, and I maintain that those cases are by no means unfrequent, and where there are no public objections, I think you might sanction them more readily than you do now. Those cases do occur of a Foreign Office clerk who wants to live abroad for a year or two, and a secretary who wants to come home for a year or two.

3651. Do you mean that whenever an attaché in the diplomatic service wished to be exchanged with a clerk in the Foreign Office, that exchange should be allowed without regard to the number of men absent from the Foreign Office at that time?—I would say that you must not allow the public service to suffer, but wherever there are no public reasons to the contrary, you might sanction such exchanges more readily, I think, than now. The Foreign Office, as a rule, makes great difficulties in the way of those exchanges.

3652. Are you aware that Lord Palmerston promised in the House of Commons, I think to myself, that those exchanges should be encouraged?—I consider that it would be very much for the benefit of the public service that they should be encouraged; it would tend very much to both branches knowing what goes on at the other end of the string.

3653. Mr. Rylands.] But do not you think that your plan would be very much more practicable and more readily carried out if the ranks of these two departments of one great public service were made to correspond in a way that they do not now?—That is a large question that I candidly say I have never considered much.

3654. With reference to the introduction of the attachés, have you ever considered whether the present system is a desirable system which leaves it entirely in the hands of the Foreign Secretary to nominate them?—I certainly consider that the Foreign Secretary ought to be responsible for nominations.

3655. You think you would object to any means under which a larger opportunity of selection could be afforded, and under which the competitive principle would come in?—You might apply to the diplomatic service the competitive principle, which I believe now applies to the Foreign Office, where, on a vacancy occurring, there are three nominations, and the best of the three gets the appointment. Now, in the diplomatic service we have only a pass examination, a certain test, and I think that it would be a good thing perhaps to make it competitive in the same way as for the Foreign Office, but not more than that. Let the Secretary of State select the three best men that he can find for a vacancy, and let the examiners choose one from them; I think that that might be an improvement on the present system.

3656. The idea that, as I gather, you have is that in addition to such an examination as that to which you have alluded there should be a money qualification; that is to say, that no young man should go into the diplomatic service unless he was possessed of private means?—Certainly I should think that that would be most beneficial.

3657. You would still think that to be the case in the event of there being a small payment given to the officers of the service from their first introduction into the service?—It would depend of course on how much the country chose to give them, but it would be quite impossible for a man to live as an attaché, as he ought to live at Paris or Vienna, on 100 l., or even on 200 l. a year.

3658. Practically, if the service were thrown open to competition in the first instance, young men would not be likely to go into it unless they had some means?—No.

3659. So that you would not be inclined to lay down a rule that no young man should go into the diplomatic service who had not a certain fortune?—I should be inclined to do that. In the French service they have to certify, I believe, that they have 400 l. a year.

3660. You are aware that there was a property qualification for Members of this House, formerly, of 300*l.* a year, and that notwithstanding a number of men got in who did not possess that qualification?—Still I think it would be an additional security against having beggars abroad.

3661. You say that the profession is entirely one for rich men; but may not that, to some extent, arise from the mode in which the profession is carried on in other countries?—Well, I think that it would be a great mistake to try to isolate our English diplomatists from their colleagues on the Continent. At Paris and Vienna and Berlin and these other places, no doubt, the more society that an English ambassador can see, and the more he can see of his colleagues, and the more lavish he can be, up to a certain point, the better.

3662. You think by that means he produces a certain amount of influence?—I think he produces a certain amount of influence, and he obtains a great deal of information which he otherwise would not obtain.

3663. You think that, in consequence of that sort of social intercourse, he obtains information of a valuable character to this country which he would not obtain in any other way?—I think so.

3664. Would not that sort of information have reference chiefly to the private views or intentions of members of the Government, or of persons of influence in the Court?—Very likely; and I think that those bits of private information, as a rule, are much more important than all the public despatches that they have access to.

3665. And you think that it is a safer guide for a minister abroad to be influenced by knowledge which he picks up of the private intentions of individuals, or of any personal intrigue connected with the Court to which he is accredited than it is for him to obtain his views from the expression of public opinion in the legislature or the country?—I consider that it is very valuable for a minister or ambassador abroad to have those private sources of information by which he can discount the despatches and public information which he receives, for the purpose of comparison.

3666. Do not you think that in a constitutional government vernment the mere private wishes or opinions members of the Government are very much s important to be known than the general inion of the country?—I think that an em- ssador or minister abroad cannot know too uch of all the under-currents which cause the sults which are afterwards apparent to all the rld, but which a minister or ambassador ought know a little before the rest of the world.

3667. You, of course, are alluding to various nsactions having reference to the diplomatic lationship between various European countries? And to commercial relationships too. They ould find out, for instance, any two countries ntemplating any change of tariff or anything that sort, and perhaps meet it by a judicious ange in our own tariff.

3668. Are you aware that a few years ago, hen arrangements were being made between rance and Belgium, and Italy, in connection ith commercial matters, it was a subject of reat complaint that our missions there knew othing about the transactions that were going n?—I was not aware of that.

3669. You are not aware that there was a Blue ook on the foreign trade of this country, being ie Report of the Committee of 1864, in which good deal of that sort of thing comes out?—I as not aware of that.

3670. But you think that by means of this ort of social intercourse this information can be icked up, which otherwise would not be ob- ained?—Most certainly; I consider that the mbassador at Paris would pick up a great deal nore in the saloons and places where he meets is colleagues (in fact, in private life), than in fficial ways.

3671. Are you aware that the ambassador in Paris frequently associates, to a great extent, with one or two political sections?—I will not ay that that has been the case; but, of course, hat is more or less of a misfortune where you ind it arise.

3672. Is not that the natural tendency of things?—I do not think so; my experience shows that at the English table of the embassy you meet with all shades of opinion as a rule, and that you meet people there that you would not perhaps meet anywhere else at the same table.

3673. Mr. Otway.] Have you any reason to suppose that the exact reverse is not the case, namely, that the ambassador would admit to his table specially men of different parties?—For my part I have always noticed a very great unwillingness on the part of our representatives abroad to identify themselves with any particular clique, because it stands to reason how detrimental it must be to them, and I have never known any case of that sort; I will not say never, because I did know a case of it, but it was not the case of an ambassador or envoy.

3674. Mr. Rylands.] Can you say that you have not known cases in which particular cliques have been excluded from the saloons of the ambassador?—That has sometimes been a political necessity. In America, for instance, our minister at Washington does not fill his saloon with what they call Copperheads and people of that sort. You may say that they are excluded, but that is a necessity.

3675. Is it not the fact that there is an important political clique that has been excluded from the Parisian embassy?—Of course an ambassador must use his own discretion as to the persons to whom he sends his invitations, and it is not desirable to send them to everybody.

3676. You have now been speaking about the great expenditure of the ministers abroad, but does the same remark apply to the juniors; does their expenditure lead to the obtaining of this valuable information to which you have referred?—I should say not as a rule, but I consider it of very great importance that they should mix in the best society of the place, and, as you know, on the Continent society good, bad, and indifferent is very much more judged by the money it spends than it is in England.

3677. As regards the position of the junior members of our service abroad, you mentioned just now, that the junior members of the Russian service spend more than ours in foreign capitals?—That is my experience.

3678. Can you tell me from what class of society the junior members of the Russian service are generally drawn?—They are generally drawn from the richest; generally the nobility, and not unfrequently bankers and people in a very large way of business; but they are universally rich.

3679. Then money is the passport into their service rather than birth?—I should say so; and I should certainly like to see a money qualification established for our diplomatic service.

3681. Would it not be the case that the junior members of our service in Paris, for instance, seeing the Russian juniors spending a great deal of money, would be likely to desire to spend a large sum of money themselves?—I think not.

3682. You do not think that there is a disposition on their part to vie with each other?—No, certainly not.

3683. But I clearly understood you to say, that so far as the young men at the missions are concerned, this large expenditure to which you have referred on their part, is not necessary for the purpose of obtaining public information?—I should say not.

3684. Did you, in the experience which you have had in connexion with the missions, ever find any complaint made by the heads of missions as to the fact that the juniors did not go much into society?—Yes.

3685. They thought that they ought to go more?—They thought it would be very good for them to go more into society.

3686. Can you give any reason why they did not go into society?—In the case of Paris, I should say that the great thing that keeps the juniors out of society is the hard work which they have all day at the embassy; after copying seven or eight hours at the embassy, and getting off the bag just in time for a late dinner, they do not feel inclined to take the trouble to dress and go into society; they prefer to spend the evening otherwise.

3687. You think that they are tired with over work?—Certainly, as regards Paris, it is the work of the embassy in the afternoon and evenings that keeps them out of ball-rooms.

3688. You do not then agree with the reason which has been given, that the young gentlemen attached to our missions do not know very good sets of people in foreign capitals, and therefore do not find it pleasant to mix in society there; that their acquaintance, in fact, is very limited?—A man's acquaintance being limited is his own fault. If a man seeks to make acquaintances and go into society, of course he is in a position to do it as an attaché; but I certainly think, as regards Paris, that it is the evening work of the embassy which has kept people out of society.

3689. There would be one good effect of that, that it would lessen their expenditure, I presume?—Yes, it might.

3690. With regard to the expenditure of junior diplomatists, do you think that the Russian Government gain anything by the fact that their junior members spend more than ours?—I think that the Russian diplomacy is, perhaps, the best in the world, and that they derive a great deal of their influence from their very lavish expenditure as a general rule.

3691. Is it not the fact that the great success of the Russian diplomacy arises from the fact that the Russian interests have chiefly relation to despotic courts?—I should say not. But take the case of the United States: that is not a despotic court exactly.

3692. Take the case of Constantinople, and the East generally, where Russian diplomacy has been shown to a very great extent, does not my remark apply there?—I have never been at Constantinople.

3693. Then with regard to the United States, do you think that Russian diplomacy there has been very successful?—I should say that it had.

3695. You have said that the Russian diplomacy has been very successful; but is it not the fact, within your knowledge, that the diplomacy of the United States has been very successful, in connection with the interests which they have had in view?—It depends to whom you choose to attribute the intimate and good relationship between the two countries. No doubt, whichever power has had that most at heart, has been very successful.

3696. Do not you think that the diplomacy of the United States with France, for instance, has been very successful?—I should say not; but those are points that I am not qualified to discuss.

3697. And you think that the success of Russian diplomacy with the United States of America has been in consequence of the great display caused by the profuse expenditure of the Russian diplomatic officials?—I say that it has been very much furthered by that. I think that you can hardly over-estimate the value of a liberal diplomatic expenditure.

3698. Then would you be prepared to go to this extent, that the success of diplomacy to a very great extent would depend upon the extent of the expenditure connected with those officials?—Of course, it will depend on how the money is spent; if spent with discretion, I should say, yes.

3699. You are aware that the United States are at the other end of the scale, and that they do not spend money profusely?—I believe, in fact I know, that it has been under consideration more than once of late years in America to establish a close diplomatic service on the exact footing of our own; and the Committee of Foreign Relations at Washington has been occupied for the last two years in trying to draft a plan of service of the same kind as our own. That shows that they are not quite satisfied with what they have got.

3700. Still the expenditure on their service is very small as compared with the expenditure of any other country equally important, is it not?—I do not consider that it is an important or a very wise saving.

3701. But the country of the United States itself is very important, and has very important interests?—Yes.

3702. Those interests are represented by a much less expenditure than the interests of other countries?—Yes, no doubt; but that is owing to their system of being able to take whom they like. They take a rich New York merchant, for instance, and send him as minister to Europe and he likes the status that it gives him, and the position.

3703. Mr. West, writing from Paris, states distinctly this, as his opinion: "The general style of living among the society in which members of the diplomatic body are in the habit of mixing is undoubtedly very much more expensive now than it was in 1850; and in the case of families where a certain amount of representation is called for, adds very much to their necessary expenditure; but this does not extend in the same degree to the majority of the junior members of the profession; and the idea that a constant mixing in a society which can only lead to great and uncalled for expenses is a necessary qualification for a young diplomatist, is, I conceive, a very mistaken one." I understand you to agree with that opinion generally?—Yes.

3704. But then he goes on, "These remarks would, of course, have applied to diplomatic life in 1850, as well as to diplomatic life in 1869, and it is not intended to argue therefrom that an increased expenditure has not become necessary since the former year; on the contrary, my estimate of the cost of living, which is, I believe, a fair one, clearly shows that neither a diplomatist nor any other member of society can live at present upon the same income as he did then;" with that I daresay you agree?—Yes.

3705. Then comes this remark, "But I wish to explain that the pomp and show of diplomatic life does not carry with it the same weight now or is as necessary as it was supposed to be in former years;" would you concur in that view?—I certainly do not concur in that sentiment.

3706. I judge, on the contrary, that your idea is the exact reverse?—That there is more necessity than ever for diplomatic "pomp and show."

3707. You have said, in reference to an embassy house, that it was desirable that there should be a residence for the ambassador, because it gave him more prestige?—Yes.

3708. Which is consistent with the opinion which you are now expressing, that diplomatic pomp and prestige are more important now than they were in former years?—I think that they are fully as important; they certainly are not less important.

3709. Would you not agree with this statement, that when the control of the affairs of a nation was in the hands of the monarch and some small all number of the principal persons in the untry, then anything that could affect the nds of that monarch and the people surround- him would have very much greater effect an would be the case under the circumstances a popular government?—Certainly.

3710. You would not, for instance, suppose at the pomp of diplomatic display in London ould affect Members of the House of Commons ry much in relation to the public questions nnected with the country?—I consider that ublic opinion might be affected to some extent rough the journals and everything else by the anner in which, say, a French ambassador lived London.

3711. Mr. Cartwright.] From your knowledge f the United States would you think that a good eal depends on the pomp and display of our gation at Washington?—I consider it of very reat importance that we should have a handsome stablishment at Washington; and I think that e ought to have the same establishment there s we have at all our other embassies.

3712. Mr. Rylands.] Do you really consider hat the public opinion of this country, and the action of our public men would be influenced by the fact that the Paris ambassador spent 20,000*l.* instead of 10,000*l.* a year, and that the United States minister only spent 3,000*l.* or 4,000*l.* a year?—Certainly not one iota by the fact in itself; but in conjunction with other things, I consider that diplomatic expenditure has great influence if properly spent; of course, if not properly spent, it is worse than useless.

3713. You are aware that to the extent that constitutional Government obtains in a country, the power vests in a large number of people who never come into any immediate contact with the diplomatic representatives in that country at all?—Yes.

3714. Then the influence of this diplomatic expenditure must be restricted to those who do come into contact with the diplomatic representatives?—Speaking generally from my experience, I should say that America is the country where a display of that kind would be most important.

3715. And you think that we should affect the opinions of the Legislature, and the official and ex-official statesmen in the United States of America, by giving our ambassador at Washington a palace similar to that which has been partially destroyed at Constantinople, and surrounding him with a degree of state which would place the President himself and the ministers around him in a very inferior position?—Certainly not that; there should be moderation in everything; but I think that his influence and position would be much improved by giving him a handsome salary, and that he should have a proper residence instead of having to go to Willard's Hotel, where he has perhaps to make the acquaintance of a great many people who are a nuisance to him ever after during his stay in the country.

3716. Mr. Otway.] I presume that society at Washington is affected by the same influences as society in every other capital?—Undoubtedly.

3717. Mr. Rylands.] Leaving these general views, we will come down to the practical details of an embassy; with regard to what you have stated to the Committee in reference to clerks, I presume that we may take it as your decided opinion that in every mission where there is general routine work, it is desirable that there should be a permanent clerk employed?—Yes.

3718. And that that permanent clerk should be a man of education, but not necessarily a man of the character of those looking to the higher appointments in the service?—Yes.

3719. The effect of that would be, you think, to enable us to reduce materially the number of under secretaries of legation?—Yes.

3720. In Paris, to which you alluded, in the case of Mr. Atlee, who fills that office apparently so efficiently, he gets a small portion of his income as consul, does he not?—A very small portion of it.

3721. And he does a certain amount of work as consul; he returns a considerable amount of fees to the Treasury, does he not?—I believe that the fees are very trifling.

3722. But from your practical experience do you see any objection to the permanent official, the clerk at a mission or embassy, transacting consular work in the way that Mr. Atlee does?—At first sight I do not see any objection to it in the least. I never considered the question, but I cannot imagine any objection to it.

3723. The effect of Mr. Atlee being consul is to enable him to have a larger income than he could have if he were simply librarian?—Mr. Pickford, who was the last consul there before Mr. Atlee was appointed, had a large salary; and it was well known that his duties were not very onerous, so that the appointment was very properly abolished, and Mr. Atlee took the work and added consul to his other appellations, and gets, I think, 100*l.* a year for that. There are certain deeds to attend to, but, of course, not being a port, Paris has not a great deal of consular work.

3724. Still where there is a mission and a permanent official in it, you would not see any objection to his being called consul?—I think it would be a great advantage.

3726. Do you know the position of the foreign service messengers employed by the other great powers?—Yes.

3727. Are they equal to our own in social position?—No; I should say that we are at the top of the tree.

3728. Did it ever come to your knowledge that any disadvantage arose to those other countries from their foreign service messengers not occupying the social position which our own do?—I cannot call to mind any particular instance, but I am convinced that the foreign service messengers of other countries are not equal to our own in various ways. They are not the same stamp of men; they are not required, as a general rule, to perform the same duties; and they are not equally trusted. And there are not so many of them, to begin with, because we have a very large quantity of official reports and Blue Books, and things of that sort, going round to our missions, and that system is not so prevalent on the Continent, and they have not the necessity for sending about so frequently very bulky despatch bags.

3729. Do you conceive that there would be any serious danger in sending those Blue Books packed up in a good wrapper as parcels by the ordinary means of conveyance?—It would cost more money often. We have a weekly bag, for instance, at the Hague, and it comes much cheaper in that way than if it came by common post.

3730. Having regard to the fact of the salaries of the foreign service messengers, and all the other expenses which they incur, you think that you can carry packages of that kind between the Hague and London at a less expense than by the ordinary means of conveyance? — Much cheaper than the conveyance that would be otherwise used, namely, the post-office.

3731. But the ordinary means of conveyance by packet?—Of course there are bulky things that have to be sent; but it is not to carry large packages that these messengers are principally used; they might go by the ordinary conveyance, no doubt.

3732. Their great object is to carry confidential dispatches?—They are confidential travelling agents.

3733. And in these parcels there often may be included documents which, in your opinion, could not safely be trusted to the ordinary means of conveyance; I presume that that would be your argument in favour of retaining these high class Foreign Office messengers?—I consider that one of their great uses is, that our foreign service messengers certainly are exempted from a great many little restrictions at railway stations and custom houses; and, not at all as an exception, but I should say as a practice, are enabled to travel quicker than they would be if they were not clothed with equal importance.

3734. Did you ever travel with a foreign service messenger between this country and abroad? —I have done so.

3735. And I dare say you have noticed his luggage, in which these packages connected with the Foreign Office, these sacred and important despatches, and confidential communications are packed up?—Yes.

3736. Have you seen that that luggage when you went to the station was given into the hands of some man connected with the railway, and that the foreign service messenger never saw it again till he got to his destination?—It depends entirely on what the luggage is. A Foreign Office messenger has two bags; he has his bag to put into the luggage van, and he has his bag to take with him into the carriage; and that bag is made up separately at the Foreign Office, and the despatches of importance he does not separate from himself.

3737. You think it is the fact that packages containing matters of importance are not sent in the way that I described, by passenger luggage van?—Certainly not.

3738. Are you aware of the instructions that are given to the foreign service messengers in relation to this matter?—I have never read them.

3739. I understood you to say that an advantage attaches to these gentlemen, because of their position?—Not so much because of their position; I should say that it is of very great importance that they should have ready money at their command. Very often a few francs will help them to catch a train, which, if they were very parsimonious, they might miss.

3740. The foreign service messengers have some badge, I think?—They have none now, that is to say, they do not wear any distinctive badge.

3741. But if they require any attention they can show it?—If they require any attention they can show their red passport.

3742. Do not you think that they get that attention from railway companies, and so on, to which you have referred, from the fact of their official position, rather than from the fact of their happening to be what we call gentlemen of rank? —I think that it is the combination that enables them to perform their duties as they perform them now; the fact of their being outwardly of very good appearance, and having a certain amount of money in their pockets, which they can distribute to the porters at railway stations, and that sort of thing, and also the fact of their being very good linguists; I think that the combination of the three enables them to perform their duties, as they perform them now, in the most highly satisfactory manner; and I think that you must be very careful how you reduce their position.

3743. Then I gather that you think that all the different departments of the foreign service should be well paid, in order that in our operation with the rest of mankind, we should spend money so freely as to produce an influence favourable to us, either by bribery or by other means?—I think that it is impossible to shut our eyes to the fact that the wise spending of money does produce very good effects, and that the ill spending of money does produce very bad effects; you must carefully choose your agents who are to spend the money.

3744. Mr. W. Lowther.] I think that there is an arrangement that attachés, or the junior members of the diplomatic service, should be moved continually; what is your experience with regard to the expense to these juniors, of moving?—If they are married the expense is very great; if not married, the expense is not very considerable.

3745. Is that the subject of great complaint amongst them?—I should say not as a rule.

3746. Chairman.] You have been moved a great deal yourself?—Yes.

3747. It was not really a serious grievance to you, as I understand you?—No.

3748. Mr. W. Lowther.] You said in one part of your evidence that frequently copies have to be made of the same paper; under what circumstances would those copies have to be made?—It constantly happens that you require a copy of a document for the archives, and a copy for communication to the government to which you are accredited, and a copy of the same paper for the Foreign Office, and perhaps a copy of the same paper for a consul.

3749. You said something about ambassadors dining at a table d'hôte; have you known any instance in your own experience of an ambassador doing that?—I cannot say that I spoke then from having any particular instance in my mind.

3750. Have you ever heard of an ambassador doing so?—I cannot say that I can call to mind ever actually having seen an English ambassador dining at a table d'hôte, but I have not the least doubt that the thing has occurred frequently.

3751. You stated that an ambassador arriving at his new post was put to inconvenience if there were no embassy house, by having to live in an hotel and dining at a table d'hôte; I wish to know whether you know an instance of an ambassador dining at a table d'hôte at the capital of the court to which he is accredited?—I have never known an English minister do it, but I have known foreign ministers do it very often, and I do not think that they gain by it.

3752. With regard to the members of the diplomatic service exchanging with the clerks in the e Foreign Office, have you ever remarked a ndency on the part of the clerks in the Foreign ffice to avoid the smaller missions or the dis-reeable posts?—Certainly, to avoid the dis-reeable posts, but not the smaller missions.

3753. But you would find that there would be ss difficulty for a man at Paris or Vienna, or orence, to change with a clerk in the Foreign ffice than for one of the others to do so?—Cer-inly; it stands to reason that that would be the se.

3754. What posts were you at on the two oc-sions when you offered to change with a clerk the Foreign Office?—The last time that I did I was at the Hague, I believe. In the other se I was on leave; I was not attached to any ission at the time.

3755. I think your plan is, that there should promotion by seniority amongst the subordi-ates in the diplomatic service; are we to under-and by that, that if there was a vacancy at thens, you would think it worth while to send man from St. Petersburgh to Athens, to fill up at post?—If you mean one of the second or ird secretaries, I should not appoint the man ho happened to be at Athens, simply from the ct of his being there, for the accident might nd him over the heads of 20 or 30 men equally eserving, or perhaps more deserving than himself.

3756. But if a second secretary at Athens as to give up, and the man next to him in the oreign Office list was at St. Petersburgh, would ou send him from St. Petersburgh to Athens, fill up that post?—Not necessarily.

3757. With regard to the nomination of Mr. ayard to Madrid, which has been more than nce alluded to, can you conceive that Mr. rskine, who has been at Athens since 1864, ould have felt rather pained at Mr. Layard's ing named to a first class post like Madrid?— daresay that Mr. Erskine, like all the others ho were interested, felt himself rather aggrieved y that appointment.

3758. You think that that feeling would be ared by others?—I should say that that feeling ould not be confined to Mr. Erskine, but that it ould be very general.

3759. Do you think that on the whole the epresentatives of the United States enjoy the ame position at foreign capitals as the represen-atives of other countries?—I should say that wing to the system that is followed in the con-uct of the United States diplomacy, they most ertainly do not occupy so good a position as our iplomatists abroad; not that the men in them-elves are inferior at all, but that they occupy ntirely different positions, and there is not so uch expected of them. The United States onsuls perform a great deal of work that is per-ormed, as you know, by our diplomatic agents; nd it is very customary for the United States inister at a small court to have a country place nd reside there entirely, and, perhaps, come in nly once a month, or once in three months, into he Residence.

3760. You have known an American minister t a foreign court do that?—Yes, I could quote he instance of the American minister, nominally t the Hague, but who lives at Haarlem, where e has a very nice little country seat, but does ot perform any duties; he always comes into the Hague on New Year's day for instance; and ou would not be satisfied with your minister oing that.

3761. Do the United States ministers know generally what is going on in the country?—I should say that they are not by any means as well informed as our ministers are; but as I said before, their consuls do a great deal more work in the political line than our consuls do.

3762. Is there a French ambassador at Madrid?—Yes.

3763. And at Berne?—Yes, and a very large staff indeed.

3764. With regard to constitutional governments abroad, what countries should you consider to have constitutional governments?—I should think that most of them have more or less now.

3765. Do you think that there is that same publicity abroad that there is in England, with regard to what is going on?—I think very nearly the same; not quite the same, but that has been reduced to a level very much.

3766. With regard to the gentlemen at the embassy of Paris, have they to work after dinner sometimes?—Very frequently all night. I know that when I was there an uninterrupted night's rest was a very great rarity; we used always to have to leave our addresses, and we used to be sent for at three or four in the morning, or at any hour to decipher telegrams.

3767. I suppose that going into society would increase, to some extent, their expenses?—I should think it would, but not very materially, unless married.

3768. Do you think that that would operate as a motive for keeping them out of society?—No, I do not consider, in the case of Paris, that it is the expense of entering society that keeps them out of it.

3769. Have you observed that amongst the subordinates in the diplomatic service, any man who has acquired a special knowledge of any language has been rather promoted over the heads of others?—No, I have not observed that.

3770. Are you aware that Mr. Parkes was sent to Japan?—Yes.

3771. And Mr. Doria to Lisbon, and Mr. Watson to Greece?—Yes.

3772. I believe Mr. Parkes was a very good Chinese scholar?—Yes.

3773. Did he know much of Japanese?—Well, Japanese is so easy as compared with Chinese, that he would pick it up in a fortnight. I should say that he resided at Canton many years, and had had a good deal of knowledge of the Japanese language before he went to Japan, and he had also accompanied Lord Elgin to Japan, on his first mission; so that he was not a stranger to the country, nor unacquainted with the language.

3774. Then Mr. Doria was for some time, I think, at Constantinople, where he would not learn Portuguese?—Yes; but I do not know much about Mr. Doria's career.

3775. Mr. Watson, I think, had acquired a good knowledge of Turkish or Persian?—I cannot speak as to that, but I believe that he did acquire a good knowledge of Persian.

3776. Are you ignorant of the instructions to the Foreign Office messengers, with regard to certain despatches that are given to them?—I cannot say that I ever read the instructions to foreign service messengers.

3777. Have you never seen them put up in the

13 June 1870.

the chancery at the legations where you have been?—Yes, I have seen them put up; but not being a Foreign Office messenger myself, I did not read them, or, if I did read them, I have forgotten them; but they have been so frequently altered, that I cannot say whether I have read the last.

3778. Mr. Otway.] I learn by the paper which you have handed to the Chairman, that you are about to leave the service?—At the expiration of my present leave.

3779. Will you allow me to say that I learn it now, with regret, for the first time. I see that you have propounded a scheme for having seven ambassadors, at 10,000 l. a year each; and so many ministers, I think, at 6,000 l. a year. Now I see that the whole diplomatic service, taking ambassadors and attachés, and all together, amounts to 125 persons, speaking roughly?—Yes.

3780. Are you aware of any profession or any service in the world which would admit of so many prizes among 125 men as seven prizes of 10,000 l. a year, and so many as 6,000 l. a year to be confined exclusively to these 125 members; or has such a profession ever been contemplated?—I should say that the Indian Civil Service is much better as regards pay than our diplomatic service.

3781. But with regard to the number of prizes, are there anything like seven posts in India of 10,000 l. a year?—Much more than that number.

3782. You must exclude, of course, the governors of presidencies?—Yes; but taking the members of council and the lieutenant-governors, you have a great many more than that number.

3783. And also you must look to the proportion of men in the Indian Civil Service?—The Indian Civil Service proper is not at all a large service.

3784. Is it not eight or ten times as numerous as our diplomatic service, including the military officers in civil employ?—I should say not eight or ten times as numerous.

3785. I presume that you would make a difference between a man who spends his life in Benares, or a climate of that sort, and a man who spends it agreeably in Paris?—But there are not many in the diplomatic profession who have the chance of being in Paris.

3786. You object to any gentleman, not one of these 125 ever being appointed to an embassy or mission?—I consider that the interests of the public service would be best promoted by the appointment of a person from the 125. Of course, if the Secretary of State can say that he has no man of the right sort available in that number, there must be one taken from outside.

3787. But the honorable Member for Warrington put to you that that would be putting an invidious task upon the Secretary of State, and you agreed that it would?—Yes.

3788. You have spoken of the French diplomatic service, which no doubt deserves your praise; are you aware that many of their most eminent diplomatists now, or lately living, such men as Guizot, Thiers, Flahault, Pellissier, Fleury, and Sebastiani, were not in the diplomatic service at all?—Yes.

3789. And that for instance, La Valette, Walewski and Benedetti, and others, did not begin in it or go through the regular diplomatic grades?—That is so, I believe.

3790. Those are men of great celebrity, and yet they either were never in the diplomatic service, or they did not go through the regular diplomatic grades; you properly eulogise the French diplomatic service; why would you place restrictions on the service of this country by confining these large prizes to the close profession of 125 men, when such restrictions are not placed on the French service?—They have practically become (it is difficult to say why) confined to these 125 men, and I do not see that the system works badly.

3791. Yet you are aware that every now and then it has to be departed from?—Every now and then the system is departed from, but I am not aware that it has to be departed from; there may be a political necessity, no doubt, occasionally.

3792. You must suppose the Secretary of State to exercise his choice on his individual responsibility?—Yes.

3793. And where we can ascertain that there can be no private inducement of any sort or kind operating upon him, and that he selects those whom he considers the right men for the benefit of the public service, surely that would be reason for saying, when you see a man of eminence from outside placed in a post, that the Secretary of State placed him there because he considered him better qualified than any man in the service available for the post?—Yes, that is the presumption.

3794. Therefore, if there were a comparison between Mr. Layard and Mr. Erskine, naturally the Secretary of State would defend himself, if it were necessary for him to do so, by saying that he considered that public reasons rendered Mr. Layard more fitted for the post of minister at Madrid at this present moment than Mr. Erskine?—Yes; I did not myself mention Mr. Erskine's name in that connection, but it is notorious that the whole service felt aggrieved by the appointment of Mr. Layard to Madrid; of course that was an appointment made by the Secretary of State on his own responsibility.

3795. Probably you are aware that Mr. Layard filled the office of Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs for five years?—Yes, I know that Mr. Layard is a man of varied experience.

3796. And that position which he occupied for five years is one of the most important of diplomatic posts?—Certainly.

3798. I only want to exonerate the Secretary of State from some amount of censure implied for appointing a gentleman of eminent distinction, who had been five years Under Secretary of State at the Foreign Office, to the prejudice, as it is presumed, of other men in the diplomatic profession; but you admit that he may have appointed him for the public interest believing him to be the fittest man for the place?—Of course that is the presumption, and it is in that presumption that the hardship lies, because it is tantamount to telling the world that of these 125 men men there is not one that could be selected that post.

3799. You must not take the whole number of 5, because you do not suppose that he could re selected one of the attachés, for instance, the post?—Reduce the number if you like to five secretaries of embassy; it is tantamount telling the world that there is not one of those e secretaries of embassy who is a fitting man be sent to Madrid.

3800. Is it not tantamount to saying this, rather: These five secretaries may be qualified for is post, but I have found a man who for certain asons, and for the public service, is more qualid for it then they are?—Yes, and I consider at the hardship lies in that.

3801. I observe that you have in your evince, to which I have listened very carefully, oken of the convenience of individuals, but ove the convenience of individuals you must ways put the public service, must you not?—es, certainly; but I maintain that the public rvice is not furthered by having a discontented rvice, and I think that our diplomatic service becoming a discontented service, and that the ublic service will suffer from that, as it is now e attachés on first joining receive no pay, and as little work as they can; and in the same ay now you have a larger staff than I think ould be necessary if they all worked with a ill, which they would do if they saw a chance getting on. Now they work with a will if ey like, but if they do not, they get on just as st, and I contend that it cannot be for the ublic interest to have a discontented service, nd as I say, the service is becoming more and ore discontented.

3802. I think that in all services there is what ou call a tendency to discontent; still the fact emains that there are very few retirements ineed from the diplomatic service; since I have een connected with it, which is a year and a alf, or more, I think I can only recall three reirements from the service; therefore that discontent does not show itself in any such way as ill admit of getting rid of this block which we ear of?—No, but when you alluded to the ulk of my evidence, having reference to the convenience of the private members of the service, and placing them in an attractive position, nd so on, I wish it to be understood that I made my suggestions always with a view to the public service being served in the long run.

3803. I mean that you have referred, in several cases, to the question how a man's feelings would be affected, and that a certain rule would be a hardship to him, whereas I should be disposed to contend that the first consideration for a public man must be the public service, and that, though it would be very much to be avoided that any man in the service should be placed in a humiliating position, the public service must be the first consideration. In order to clear up some mistakes, let me ask you this question: you are not generally acquainted with the regulations or with the conduct of the foreign service messengers; you only know what has come within your own experience?—I can only know what has come within my own experience.

3804. You cannot know generally whether the service of foreign messengers is conducted to the satisfaction of those in the Foreign Office or not? No.

3805. [Viscount Barrington.] You stated just now, with regard to attachés, that they did not do more work than they could help?—I have come across attachés of that description.

Hon. T. J. H. Thurlow.

13 June 1870.

3806. It would not be their business to originate work, I presume, but to do the work set them to do?—Yes; but there are two ways of doing work.

3807. Have you found that there has been a great indisposition on the part of the junior members of the service to do the work set them to do?—Certainly not, judging the service as a whole; but I am certain that there would be a much greater willingness to put themselves to inconvenience to do their work if they were paid for it.

3808. You spoke of your experience in America with regard to the use of copying machines; are you aware that that question has been already before the Committee, and that we have had evidence from Mr. Hammond on the subject, to the effect that the use of copying machines is not likely to be advantageous, because these despatches have to be filed and kept among the archives, and that, from the fact of the paper being damp, or from the kind of ink used, there is no means of preserving them?—I was not aware that the question had been raised before this Committee.

3809. You have not heard any complaint of that kind in America, where the copying machines are used?—No.

3810. Chairman.] As I understand you, when you were at Washington, the mission had letters from the American government constantly, which you could see had been copied by the press?—Yes.

3811. Were these regularly bound and filed with the other papers?—Yes, they were bound with the other archives.

3812. Have you had any evidence of their perishing?—Not the least, while I was there; and, moreover, I believe that these copying presses are in general use in mercantile houses, and that the letters do not deteriorate there.

3813. Viscount Barrington.] Did I rightly understand you to say that you are satisfied with the present system of examination on entering the service?—Yes, on the whole, I am quite satisfied with it. I think that it would be better to have one examination, and I think that you might, with advantage, introduce the Foreign Office system of having a competitive examination among three nominations; but I have no particular remarks to make about the examination.

3814. You are against gentlemen entering the service for a certain length of time, without making it a profession, and having a stricter second examination for those who mean to continue in the profession?—No, I cannot say that I am against that at all. It answers very well in the French service where an ambassador is allowed to have one or more attachés, who are considered as hardly forming part of his official establishment, but simply as a kind of aides-de-camp; persons who do work all the same.

3815. Do you think that our ambassadors should have private secretaries paid by the public?—I consider that it is almost impossible for the ambassador at Paris, for instance, to get on without a private secretary. Whether that private secretary should be paid by the public or not is another question.

3816. Does your experience go to show that sufficient sufficient knowledge of French and German is attained by the junior members of the diplomatic service to enable them to carry on conversation fluently in those languages?—Certainly; as regards French, that is the case.

13 June 1870.

3817. Are you aware that the examination in regard to conversation in French has been discontinued within the last few years?—I was not aware of that.

3818. You are not in favour of that course, I suppose?—No; I would maintain an examination in French conversation.

3819. What is your experience with regard to telegraphic communication; do you think that it diminishes work or that it increases it?—I think that it increases work very much.

3820. I suppose that you are very often unable to decipher the exact meaning of the telegram that arrives?—No; one gets very quickly into the habit of deciphering it, and it is a very rare occurrence that you cannot make it out, even although there are one or two errors perhaps.

3821. And do you think that these telegraphic communications actually diminish the responsibility of the minister very much, or that they act only in the way of hints to him?—As a rule, they no doubt diminish his responsibility, but circumstances may arise in which they may increase it, by their following one another very rapidly, and through their contradicting each other, or a minister reading them as such, they may increase his embarrassment.

3822. I understood you to say that you are very much in favour of the transfer of attachés and junior secretaries backwards and forwards between the Foreign Office and the different missions?—I am very much in favour of that.

3823. Do you think that a gentleman who had been acting as secretary at a mission would be perfectly competent to carry on the business in the Foreign Office when he was transferred to that office?—I cannot conceive why he should not.

3824. Mr. Cameron.] Do you think that your plan of having chanceliers would be sufficient to supply the number of second secretaries whom you would reduce?—I consider that it would be sufficient. At present I do not think that you have 16 attachés, but I think that 16 attachés, and such a staff as I have indicated, would be amply sufficient to perform the work in those embassies and legations which I am personally acquainted with.

3825. You would only suggest having the chanceliers at the embassies, as I understand you?—Yes.

3826. Therefore, you would not be able to reduce any second secretaries at the smaller missions, would you?—If the plan answered, I should not see any objection to extending it to some of the important missions; and in the first place, I would certainly have it at Washington and at Florence.

3827. There is already a chancelier at Paris, as you have told us; does his presence and employment there tend to reduce the number of second and third secretaries employed there?—No doubt if Mr. Atlee were to be removed, and no successor appointed, it would add materially to the work of the chancery; for the attachés would have to take into their own hands the registration and the charge of the archives, and a variety of work now performed by Mr. Atlee.

3828. Mr. Otway.] When you speak of registration, do you mean the registration of despatches?—The docketing and registering of despatches.

3829. Is that done by Mr. Atlee?—It was when I was there, and I presume is so still.

3830. Mr. Cameron.] But there are at present as many subordinate members of the service at Paris, even apart from Mr. Atlee, as at other embassies, are there not, indeed more?—Yes, but Paris is an exceptional embassy; as Mr. Hammond said in his evidence, it is practically a branch of the Foreign Office.

3831. Some suggestion has been made to the Committee of the employment of clerks of an inferior social position to the ordinary attachés and secretaries; do you think that that would be productive of benefit to the service?—I do not see any objection against it. I think that it might be done with great convenience, particularly in a place like Paris where there is so much copying to do.

3832. Do you think that there would be no difficulty in discriminating between the work for the ordinary attachés and secretaries, and that to be given to these clerks?—I do not conceive that there would be any difficulty in that respect.

3833. No confusion would arise, you think, from some despatches being given to one class and some to another?—No, I should conceive not; it is what they have in some public offices; they have a secret department where they have a different style of officers.

3834. In fact, from your experience in the service, you think that this plan might be tried?—It might be tried, I think.

3835. And as to the promotion amongst the chanceliers, would you have the promotion entirely confined to the chanceliers, or would you have a chancelier appointed from the rank of attaché, and the promotion mixed up?—No; I would not have it mixed up, but quite distinct like the French system.

3836. Have you any observations to make about any rules that you would suggest with regard to marriage among the junior members of our diplomatic service?—I think, as regards marriage, that we might take another leaf out of the book of the French service, with great advantage. If I am rightly informed, in the French service, it is necessary for a junior before he can marry, to get the consent of his chief, and of the French Foreign Office; and I think it would be productive of very good results if we had a regulation of the same kind in our service, particularly now as it is a marrying age that we live in. All the attachés are getting wives; and then they make a great objection to moving, from the extra expense that it entails on them.

3837. Have you ever thought as a means by which the block in the service might be removed of reverting to the old practice of allowing ambassadors to appoint attachés themselves, it being understood that such attachés are not part of the regular service, but that they form merely a class of extra attachés, and that when the minister retires or resigns, the attaché shall not be considered to have any claim on the service?—Yes; I consider that that would be a very good plan, and that it would facilitate the reduction of the 10 or 11 second secretaries which I advocate very much.

3838. Of course the obvious objection to such a plan would be, that having attachés not paid but as members of the family of the ambassador lor, they would be inclined to shirk their rk; would that be a valid objection to the n, do you think?—No; I think that you uld manage to get work out of them.

3839. With regard to the distinction which u drew between first and second class mis- ns, I noticed that you mentioned Copenhagan a first class mission, and Stockholm as a ond class one. Might I ask your reason for awing that distinction?—I confess that my ason was the family alliance between the two rts.

3840. But the importance of Stockholm to , I suppose, is fully as great as that of Co- nhagan?—I suppose it may be so.

3841. Do you think that we should have a gher class of minister at Copenhagan, on ac- unt of the family alliance?—I consider that should.

3842. With regard to the success of the merican diplomacy, I wish to ask you whe- er the success of that diplomacy may not ther be ascribed to the vigorous and deter- ned action of the home Government, than to e excellence of their diplomatic system?— rtainly; I entirely agree with that view.

3843. Mr. Kinnaird.] Owing to the evident ck in the service, and the partial discontent ich exists, you are not sorry, perhaps, that examination of this nature has taken place?—Quite the contrary. It may do a great deal good; I do not think that it can do any rm; I think that the more that is known out our service the better; it is very im- rfectly understood, and I do not think that gets credit for a great deal of the work per- rmed.

3844. You said that you were in favour of the tention of small missions for the purpose of lacing in them the less competent men in the plomatic service; you do not mean missions at are evidently useless, I presume, but the naller missions?—I would not re-establish any the missions that have been discontinued, but think that there would be an argument for the reservation of such as remained, in the fact that is very valuable to have these places for men hom you cannot turn adrift, and who may not e equal to the first places.

3845. As I understand, nothing that you have aid implies that you have any reflection to make pon the American diplomacy, as a rule?—Not t all, but upon the American system. I con- ider that their system is a very bad one, and I lo not believe that it will last.

3846. You think that they must adopt the lan of paying their ministers in great courts better than they do?—Certainly, and I am certain that they will.

3847. And the success of American diplomacy is, you think, from the natural vigour of the State, which really carries great weight with it for the moment?—Yes.

3848. Mr. R. Shaw.] Have you considered what would be the extra cost of your new scheme to the country?—If it were carried out by commencing with a reduction of the number to the extent of, I think, nine or ten second secretaries, I do not think that the cost to the country would be very great.

3849. You complain of the inadequate pay of the service; were you not aware of the terms of the service when you entered it?—Yes.

3850. Are you not aware that at the present time there is no difficulty in obtaining the services of any number of attachés?—Certainly I am aware of that.

3851. When you entered the service in 1858 were the chances of promotion greater than they are at the present moment?—Yes, much greater; there were six missions more then than there are now.

3852. But are there not fewer second and third secretaries now than there were in 1861?—I believe, on the contrary, that there are more now than there were then; and there are six missions less in Europe alone, besides some others, I believe, reduced in South America.

3853. In reference to these facts, then, you entirely differ in opinion from Mr. Hammond?—With regard to these facts I maintain that we are not in the same position now as when I entered the service.

3854. After what length of service, according to your idea, should persons attain the rank of first secretary?—I should say after 15 years.

3855. And after what length of service do you think that they ought to attain the position of a minister?—Not under 20 years.

3856. You have complained of the stagnation in the promotion of the diplomatic service; have you compared it with the promotion in other professions, such as the army, the navy, and the bar?—I cannot say that I have compared them.

3857. Then you are not prepared to say that promotion is slower in the diplomatic service than it is in the other professions which I have alluded to?—I have not made that a study, and I am not prepared to speak on it.

3858. Have you compared the pay of the diplomatic service with that of the army or navy?—No.

3859. Then you are not prepared to say that the pay in the diplomatic service is inferior to the pay in the army or the navy?—No, I am not.

The Right Honourable EDWARD PLEYDELL BOUVERIE, in the Chair.

The Right Honourable George William Frederick Earl of Clarendon, K.G., G.C.B. (attending by permission of the House of Lords); further Examined.

The Earl of Clarendon.
16 June 1870.

3860. Mr. Rylands.] In respect of the appointment of Mr. Layard, to which allusion was made in the last examination, I presume that your Lordship is aware that it created great dissatisfaction in the service, as stopping promotion?—It certainly did create a great amount of dissatisfaction.

3861. The dissatisfaction arose, no doubt, from the fact that the secretaries of legation look forward to the appointment of minister, but the clerks in the Foreign Office simply look forward to the appointment of chief clerk or assistant under secretary, and do not look forward to the highest office in the department; supposing that a similar understanding existed in the diplomatic service, and that the promotion of the secretaries of legation ended, so to speak, with the rank of secretary of embassy, there would be no dissatisfaction in the event of outsiders being appointed by the Foreign Secretary as heads of missions?—But I think you limit the ambition the aims of secretaries of legation unduly. I think that there is no man who enters the profession that does not hope to get to the top of it, just as any man who is called to the Bar thinks that he may be Lord Chancellor, but does not always get to that. Certainly their ambition is not limited to being secretaries of embassy.

3863. My object in drawing your attention to this is to refer to an opinion which was expressed by Lord Wodehouse in the evidence before the Diplomatic Committee of 1861, before which he expressed a very strong opinion that it was desirable that the heads of the principal missions abroad should occasionally, and not unfrequently, be appointed outside the mere line of diplomatic promotion; is that your Lordship's view?—I do not see that that is necessary; an occasion may arise when you may think that a certain man is particularly fitted for a mission, and you would then take him, though he was an outsider; bu cæteris paribus, I should prefer to take some on in the service. And, with respect to the disco tent that Mr. Layard's appointment created, I d not think that it was borne in mind that it is practice of the Foreign Office (I do not mean say that it is very frequently resorted to) that a under Secretary who has served well, and f some time, goes out as a minister. There hav been several instances of that. I have not g them present to my mind at this moment, but could tell you four or five cases in which th under Secretaries of State have gone out, eundem, so to speak, to a mission. Therefo there was nothing contrary to the well-know rule of the Foreign Office in appointing M Layard.

3864. That I quite understand; still the di satisfaction does exist, and I presume the know ledge that the Foreign Secretary has of such di satisfaction would have a tendency to lim appointments of that character?—Certainly; an man at the head of a department would be ver glad to limit dissatisfaction; and if there is n particular reason for going out of the line would not be done; but I say, although seniorit is the rule, there must be some exceptions to i Now, with regard to the Foreign Office clerk I do not know what exactly may have been th rule many years ago with respect to rising in th department. For instance, take the post of pe manent Under Secretary; I think that that is most excellent place, the most interesting plac probably in the Government. Well, it has no been usual to give that by seniority. In the Indi Office, generally the Secretary of State has give it to one of his friends, and certainly it is a mo valuable and agreeable appointment. I thougl that Mr. Hammond, who was in the office, was fitter person for that post than any friend of min outside that I could appoint, and I appointe Mr. Hammond; but he was not the most senio he was a senior clerk, but not the most senio there were others before him; I put him the because I thought it would be good for the publ service, and he has justified that expectation. S that the rule of seniority is, although adhered t whe ere possible, as far as I am concerned, is never absolute bar to what I believe would be preible for the public benefit.

3865. Of course, I have been asking these estions not on the ground of any personal obtion to Mr. Layard's appointment in any way? quite understand that.

3866. With regard to the small missions in rope, has your Lordship considered whether re might not be an economy by the suppresn of some of the appointments which now st?—By the small missions in Europe, I aphend that as usual Stuttgardt is particularly aded to; that generally paves the road as reds the small missions. I am not favourable the abolition of that mission. I have conered it very much and I do not think that it uld be expedient; it is not an expensive misn. I think that the present movement would inopportune for suppressing it. Germany is w divided into two parts, each having a very ferent political significance and importance, mely, the North German Federation and South rmany. I think that both will play a conerable part in the future history of Europe, d as we have no longer got a minister at ankfort I should consider that the present ment would be inopportune, as I said, for ing away with those two missions in South rmany; there might not be perhaps much nsideration here for the English public there; t I think that it would be taken as an affront the sovereign of the country; I think that it uld be taken generally in Europe as a proof at we cared less for the interests of Germany an we do, and I think also that it would put a rge portion of the British public who reside in urtemberg, at Carlsruhe and other places to nsiderable inconvenience. I think that the ving of 3,000 l. or 4,000 l. a year, particularly this moment, really would not be a compensaon for that. I think that it would injure our estige in Europe as showing an indifference to rman politics which I do not think we do feel, d which certainly we ought not to feel, and I ould be opposed to the abolition of that misn.

3867. Stuttgardt and Munich, being both in outh Germany, do you think that in both cases is desirable that we should maintain the misn?—I do not think, considering what the preent state and the future prospects of Germany re, that those two minor missions in Germany re more than we ought to have for our influence Germany, and for the convenience of the British public there.

3868. Does not your Lordship think that it ight be sufficient to have chargés d'affaires at hose two points, the one at Munich being under he minister at Vienna?—No, I do not think that hat would be worth while. You might, I dare ay, get British interests cared for if you had a onsul in either of those places who would be nder the embassy at Vienna. But I do not hink that that is expedient. We must look a ittle to our character and position in the world; nd if we let ourselves down, people are genelly put a little lower than they place themselves.

3869. But is it not the fact, that whatever ight be the impression produced by this line f policy there, it is well understood that the olicy of England is not to interfere to so great n extent as was formerly the case in European olitics?—Certainly, we are pursuing now a policy of non-intervention. We do not threaten; we do not bark when we do not intend to bite. But if you think that that has diminished our moral influence I think that you are greatly mistaken. I think that people are apt to say that if we held a high hand, and used menacing language, and said we would not bear this or that, things would be done as we pleased. But other nations have just as much independence as ourselves, and just as much resent undue interference with their affairs; but, with regard to the moral influence gained by a community of interest and desire to promote the good of all, and particularly to promote peace, that moral influence would be gained by the residence of an efficient man in the country, and it is far more valuable and useful to this country, and makes it more respected than all the threatening in the world. As to the minister at Hamburg, I may say here that Hamburg now makes part of the German Confederation; it has ceased to be of any independent influence, and any influence that we have in the German Confederation should be exercised at Berlin, and that mission was abolished.

3870. I am quite sure that I should subscribe to every word that your Lordship has stated, with reference to the moral influence of this country in connection with the missions abroad. In some of the capitals of Europe there are consulates as well as missions, and I wish to ask your Lordship whether you see any objection to an arrangement being made under which one of the secretaries of legation should undertake consular duties in those capitals, so as to avoid the necessity of two separate appointments?—There are some capitals (take St. Petersburgh, for instance) in which the consular duties are so constant and of such various kinds that I do not think that you could get one attaché to do the work. Supposing that the attaché is necessary in the mission or embassy, he has tolerably full work; and I am quite certain that if he had to do the consul's work, the notarial work, and all that sort of thing, would be constantly behind hand.

3871. Do you think that that would be the case in a capital, such as Lisbon, or Stockholm, or Vienna?—In Vienna, I believe there is a consul, but I think that he is more like a lawyer than a consul; I do not remember really what the pay of the consul there is. But certainly at Lisbon you could not expect the thing to be well done if you were to have an attaché for the consular work. I assume by the hypothesis that the missions are not over manned; you cannot well spare any one man to devote his time to any other duties than those of the mission, and I think that if he were required to do consular duties, either one or the other, either the consular duties or the chancery duties would suffer.

3872. Do you think that it would be a practicable plan to have a permanent officer in the mission of the nature of a clerk or chancelier, who should attend to a certain class of the duties of the mission, and should also attend to the consular duties of the place in which the mission was?—I went rather fully into that on the last occasion you know, and I do not think that it would be expedient. It is done where it can be done. There are certain consular duties and notarial duties that are done now in that way at Madrid; there happens to be an extremely intelligent young man there, and he does that work; but then you know in Madrid you cannot call it really consular work; it is a town in the centre of

of the country; there are no shipping interests, and nothing in the way of distressed British seamen, and the infinite variety of consular duties of course have not to be performed at a place like Madrid. But at other places, particularly at such an one as I instanced just now, St. Petersburg, I think, that one or other of the services would suffer if such a plan were adopted.

3873. I think that your Lordship had very much to do with the arrangement under which secretaries of legation were required to present reports upon trade and commercial matters, and other points of interest. The object of the reports, in the first instance, I understand (we gathered that from Mr. Hammond, I think), had reference more particularly to the practical education of the secretaries of legation than to the obtaining of information for the uses of the public?—I think that there was a double object; to render the secretary of legation or embassy as useful as you could, to improve his education and his fitness for his profession; and at the same time you secured a great deal of useful information for the public; and I think that it has answered remarkably well; I think that the chambers of commerce, and the people who have received the reports here, have greatly profited by them; they could not have got them for themselves. There are three or four reports that I could mention as specially valuable. I think that it would be invidious to mention one gentleman more than another; but there have been reports, for instance, on manufactures, on the production of silk worms in Japan, on the industrial classes of the United States, and on a variety of other subjects, which really have given information, which is entirely new, and very useful for people here.

3874. There can be no doubt about that; but does your Lordship think that there would be an advantage in these reports going through the heads of missions, and in fact the heads of missions being to some extent, and to a great extent, made responsible for the reports, they giving to the subordinates the duty of obtaining information and making up the reports upon the subjects to which their attention is directed?—I think that if a man collects the information, and writes the report, he is the chief person in that work. I cannot say that I have ever asked heads of missions whether they take interest in these reports, but I have not the smallest doubt that they do: that the secretary of legation or embassy employed in such a work as that must consult his chief; the chief knows very well what facilities he has procured for him; I should think they go hand in hand, although the secretary, who is the man that collects the information, and is responsible for its correctness, and writes the report, is of course the person chiefly interested. But those reports are always sent home by the minister; I have no doubt that no minister ever sent home a report without reading it first with the secretary of legation or embassy, because anything which he thought was incomplete or incorrect he would notice.

3875. We may, at all events, take it that it is your Lordship's opinion that that is the course that should be taken by the heads of missions, so as to prevent any introduction of matters that ought not to be published?—I cannot have the least doubt that it is done; it seems to me to be such a very ordinary piece of duty that one would not think of asking if it were done. The minister or the ambassador sends home this report himself; the subject has been taken up, and this report forms an enclosure in his despatch. I do not consider that there would be such a supervision as would dispense with the reading over the report at the Foreign Office before it is printed and circulated. Every now and then we have words in a report that might give offence in the country which the report relates to; but I must say, that the reports (of course they go back to the countries to which they relate) have generally given much satisfaction to the people of the country; they have been glad that their affairs have been so investigated; and even when things have been said that are not quite flattering or satisfactory to them they have perhaps entered into explanations, but they do not in the least annoy or offend the countries to which they relate.

3876. Would your Lordship consider that it was right, in the preparation of those reports, that the second secretaries of legation should when so directed by the heads of missions, render assistance in obtaining information as to the matter of those reports?—I should say that anything is right for a second or third secretary of legation to do which is required by the service, and is directed by the head of the mission, just as in any other department. We have a staff entirely at the disposal of the minister, and if he found that the first secretary, from want of time or health, was not able to travel about (for these gentlemen who make the reports are obliged often to travel about, and go to manufactories and get information at the spot, and if they remained in the capital it would not answer the purpose), and to do the whole of the work necessary for completing the report by a specific time, certainly a third or second secretary would comply with any request from the head of the mission to assist; at least I have never heard of any case to the contrary.

3877. I am glad to hear that that is your Lordship's experience, because we have had evidence of a different character?—I cannot tell what is done in every case and every mission, but I know my opinion of what is right and what, if I were the minister, I should insist upon and have insisted upon. When I say "insisted," it is too strong a word, for that was not necessary.

3878. I am quite aware that your Lordship has always taken the greatest interest in the connection of the Foreign Office with commercial matters abroad; but you are aware that before 1864 there was a good deal of dissatisfaction in the country with the action of the Foreign Office and the Board of Trade, in reference to foreign countries; the chambers of commerce complained that, owing to the double action of the departments, it was frequently the case that the commercial interests of this country were neglected?—Yes; but there are two sides to that; the chambers of commerce complained, I think without reason, or without full knowledge; because when I was examined before that Committee, and alluded to those reports which were very useful, I found that they were unknown to many chambers of commerce, to whom they had been regularly sent, which I thought was not quite fair.

3879. In 1864 the Committee sat to which you have just alluded, and before which you gave evidence; but since that Committee, I think I am right in believing that the complaints that previously iously existed have not been so frequent the chambers of commerce, in relation to e matters?—I have never had complaints the chambers of commerce; I do not know ther it is in consequence of the arrangements ch were the result of the recommendations of Committee; but I think that nothing can k more harmoniously than the action of the departments now; formerly, before that mittee sat, the commercial matters were dis-uted to the different political departments, ac-ing to the countries to which they related; the departments were separated, and a commercial rtment was created which was more in imme-e and direct communication with the Board Trade; that certainly may have accelerated communications between the two departments. not pretend to say what the cause of the rovement is, but I do say that it is impossible two departments to work more harmoniously ther than they do now; if it were one depart-t, all the Board of Trade or all the Foreign ce, and they occupied adjoining rooms to each r, I do not see how they could work more moniously; of course, there are many com-cial questions on which great difficulties e; we always consult the Board of Trade on e questions, and as there are as eminent men e as in any department in the world, we get able opinions from them, given most cheer-y; I do not see how two departments could k more harmoniously together than they do

880. The fact, however, is that before this mmittee of 1864, there were many complaints, that since 1864 the chambers of commerce the commercial bodies have been satisfied h the action of the two departments?—To tell honest truth, I was not aware of these great plaints; I think the part is that the chambers commerce have been a little more vigilant, that y know a little more about their own business a they did.

881. I am quite prepared to believe that there reat harmony of action between the two de-tments, but I wish your Lordship to give us r opinion as to whether you think it might not desirable that inasmuch as the Board of Trade now very much an executive department, ing reference to railways, shipping, light-ses and harbours, and inasmuch as the foreign merce is so intimately connected with the itical and other arrangements which we have h other countries, the department of foreign merce should be entirely in the hands of the reign Office, rather than be divided between Foreign Office and the Board of Trade?—t I do not think that it is divided between the reign Office and the Board of Trade; every ng comes to the Foreign Office; there are ny things upon which the Foreign Office de-es at once as matters of course; but in any es of difficulty we immediately consult the ard of Trade, just exactly as I, if a case came ore me, and I did not feel myself quite able to ide it, should ask the Under Secretary's nion. There is nothing of the foreign trade t is immediately under the Board of Trade; all comes to the Foreign Office.

882. And the officers who have to deal with are all servants of the Foreign Office and not the Board of Trade?—Yes, that is to say con-s and diplomatic agents.

883. My reason for asking the question is that in the Select Committee of 1864, to which I have been alluding, there was a motion proposed by Sir Stafford Northcote which was supported by Mr. Cobden, but not carried, to the effect that the Committee should report "that the arrangement which upon the whole they would prefer is the establishment of a commercial department in the Foreign Office, which should be strong enough to enable the Secretary of State to conduct commercial negotiations and to investigate the complaints of merchants without the necessity of referring to the Board of Trade, except for such occasional information on matters specially committed to that department, as the Secretary of State may from time to time require to assist him in making up his mind on the questions with which he has to deal"?—That very well expresses the actual state of things.

3884. You think that that is, practically, what exists now?—Certainly, we do not refer everything to the Board of Trade, but there may come some intricate commercial international questions upon which it is extremely desirous for the public interests that we should have the opinion of some persons at the Board of Trade.

3885. Then you consider that in all those matters the Foreign Office does really take the control and is, practically, the department which is responsible, in the government of the country, for them?—Certainly the Foreign Office is responsible to the country for the conduct of commercial affairs, everything that is depending upon ministers and consuls. I have not the least doubt that if the Board of Trade gave us any particular advice, and we took it, the Board of Trade would cheerfully share with us in the responsibility of it, but it is really as if there were two more able men in the same department of the Foreign Office, they work so harmoniously together.

3886. In relation to the inquiry conducted under the authority of the Government into the expenditure of the consular establishment in China, which took place a short time ago, I must ask your lordship whether there was any correspondence between the Treasury and the Foreign Office setting forth the views of the Treasury as to the reductions to be made in the expenditure on account of the several consulates?—There has been a great deal of correspondence between the Foreign Office and the Treasury with respect to China. I do not say actually with respect to the reductions, although, of course, they have entered largely into that. You know the whole thing is new; it is exceedingly complicated, and very expensive indeed, from a great variety of causes; not only from the expense of living there, but from the difficulty of getting houses, and the necessity of constant leaves of absence for men whose health is injured by the climate. Comparatively, the consular system in China is new; the process to a certain extent has been tentative for a time; things that we thought might be done for a certain expense, we find cannot be done; but the thing now has got into more regular shape, and I think that we are better able to control it. There have been considerable reductions, and I have no doubt that there will be more. But the consulates you know at the great Treaty Ports are absolutely necessary for the protection of British interests; they must have a certain staff there, and that staff must speak the language. It is a very expensive service indeed, but then the trade is very great and increasing, and it is worth while to incur the expense for the sake of the advantages secured.

3887. I notice in the China papers that there is an important and valuable letter from the Foreign Office to the Treasury, stating the reductions which the Foreign Office proposed to make; my question is whether there have not been some communinations from the Treasury to the Foreign Office, stating the reductions that in the judgment of the Treasury might be made?—So many letters have passed that I cannot speak with certainty; but I do not think that they would have pointed out the actual reductions which might be made when we became in a condition to revise the service. I am always looking out for cases where we can make a saving without loss of efficiency.

3888. Of course it would be of very great advantage to this Committee if we could have a report of an independent Government department, namely, a communication from the Treasury, setting forth the views that they have as to the line of reduction; and if there is such a report, perhaps your Lordship would not object to furnish it?—There is nothing which the Foreign Office contains that is not at the disposal of this Committee.

3889. With reference to the possible reductions that might be made in the diplomatic staff at the different missions, would your Lordship see any objection to there being a departmental inquiry, conducted by the Treasury in conjunction with the Foreign Office, which might go into the actual details of the expenditure connected with the service?—I really think it is very unnecessary. I do not see what you could expect to get from it. The Treasury has sometimes a right to call upon the Foreign Office for any details of expenditure of money. It is known to the Treasury and to the public what are the rates of pay to the service. I do not see what such an inquiry could do. I do not see where the practical utility of it would be.

3890. I have been informed that the Treasury actually proposed such an inquiry to the Foreign Office last autumn, but that the inquiry was refused by the Foreign Office; is your Lordship aware of that?—I do not remember that.

3891. At all events, we may take it that in your Lordship's judgment it is not necessary that there should be such an inquiry?—I think it is not necessary; I do not see why the head of the Foreign Office should be regarded as less competent than any other head of a department on such a subject; I should say that it would be simply offensive, without public utility.

3892. Sir Arthur Magenis, Minister in Portugal, wrote a despatch which appears at the end of the Report of the Select Committee of 1861, in which this passage occurs: "I believe that the system occasionally adopted of conferring pecuniary rewards on attachés for meritorious service, might with great advantage and at a very trifling expense, be more frequently adopted;" I wish to ask your Lordship what rewards does Sir Arthur Magenis refer to, and from what fund would they be paid?—I do not know what rewards he means, but he states himself "pecuniary rewards;" if a man had performed any very particular service not quite in the line of his duty, if he had first qualified himself for it, and then had succeeded in it, the Treasury might make him a bonus, just exactly as you might make a present to anybody who had done well, and beyond his duty. The course would be, that the bonus would be conferred, on application to the Treasury, for the services done.

3893. And it would appear on the Estimates then; these rewards are not of such a character that they would be taken out of some fund other than the Estimates?—No; I will give an instance, I will not state the gentleman's name but if there is one man more deserving than another this man is wonderfully deserving. I must not say what it was he did lest I should give a clue, but he did things that were very remarkable which necessitated great exertions on his part, and cost him a good deal of money I thought that he had done them so well, and that it would be such an encouragement to others that I did propose a small bonus to that gentleman, and the Treasury refused it. I knew the services rendered by him; I do not know whether the Treasury attended to that point, but they refused the bonus. I merely give that as an instance, to show that if anything of that sort is done it goes to the Treasury. It was only a small sum which I proposed in that case, my object being to mark my sense of the service which he had rendered.

3894. Any bonus of that kind would not come out of secret service money, I suppose?—I am not going to talk of secret service money, but I have given you an illustration of how I deal with anything of that kind.

re are confided to his honour, his judgment, l his discretion (perhaps I ought to add his nesty), the most momentous international and ite affairs, and by any laches of his, by any lure of his in any of these qualities, he might volve the country in the greatest trouble. ell, in that man who happens to be the Minis- for Foreign Affairs, Parliament and the public e in the habit of confiding until they find that is unworthy of trust; but there is a sort of tion that he cannot quite be trusted with ney which is not brought into the public counts; I hardly know why he should be usted on the largest affairs, and mistrusted on e very small ones. I do not think that the blic suppose that he puts this money into his n pocket, but I think that there are vague tions abroad of mysterious acts of corruption, of ying people more than they ought to have, and at sort of thing; I really am quite glad of this portunity of saying to the Committee, just as the Committee were a Baron of the Exchequer fore whom I make a formal and solemn state- ent that I have applied the money as it ought be applied, that I can most solemnly declare at all those notions are entirely without founda- on.

3896. I am quite sure that your Lordship will elieve me when I say that in putting the ques- on, I had not the slightest doubt as to the ropriety with which your Lordship superintends ie department, and that my question was en- rely as to the application of the funds in a way hich we may consider to be undesirable, not on ccount of the action of the head of the depart- ent, but because they came through somebody elow the head of the department?—But they o not come through somebody below the head f the department; I act in the matter myself.

3897. Your Lordship acts through subordi- ates in the department necessarily, I presume? —Not about that secret service. Might I ask ou in fairness, who do you think are the sub- rdinates through whom I act?

3899. In the case of the payments made with the oncurrence of the permanent under secretary, we were informed by Mr. Hammond that the political under secretary is not allowed to have any voice n the decision of that expenditure, at all events hat the political under secretary was not con- sulted?—Certainly not, nor anybody else; I do t on my own responsibilty, and I do not commu- nicate what I do; the best way of keeping it secret is not to talk about it, and I do not consult anybody for that with regard to which I am alone responsible; of course Mr. Hammond draws the cheques that I give authority for, and that is quite sufficient; and I hope that the public at all events have sufficient confidence in my honour to think that I do not misappropriate one shilling of that; but I do not consult anybody about it.

3900. In reference to the recent abolition of the Foreign Office agents, that, I think, was a voluntary act on your Lordship's part, as the head of the Foreign Office Department?—I do not think it is quite fair to say that it was a voluntary act of mine. There was that sort of manifestation of opinion by certrin portions of the press, and by the House of Commons, that made it quite clear to me that that system could not be maintained. There was a great feeling against it. I consider that it was a system which worked extremely well, and one which all those concerned in it, that is to say, all the ministers and consuls, will regret the loss of; and I think that it was doomed, sacrificed, to a prejudice; but a prejudice is often as strong in determining action as a well-founded opinion. There had got abroad an opinion that the agents had some influence in the making of appointments, and in the distribution of patronage. I can say that there never was a more completely unfounded opinion than that. I have been seven years now in the Foreign Office, and I am as unconscious of the existence of an agent in that office, with reference to any appointments, as I am of what the opinion of this Committee might have been on the matter of any of those appointments; and I say that there never were men who were more unjustly treated than those men, by the supposition that for their own interests they got certain appointments made. I should say that even if the agents might have done such a thing, any one at the head of the office who accepted the recommendations of a clerk in the office who happened to be an agent to A. B. or C. D. would grossly fail in his duty; but I have no more knowledge of anything of the kind than I have of anything that never existed; and I am obliged to the honourable Member for having put that question, because I think it is an injustice to those gentlemen to think that they would have misused the position in which they accidentally were in the Foreign Office really to the public detriment, and that it would involve a grave condemnation on any Secretary for Foreign Affairs who accepted such recommendations.

3901. Viscount Barrington.] It has come before the notice of this Committee, through the evidence of Mr. Walrond, that the examinations in French for attachéships are not very satisfactorily conducted; that, in the first place, there is no vivâ voce examination in conversation, that having been discontinued within the last few years; aud, further, that there is no examination in writing French from dictation, and the translating of English into French; but that although that used to form part of the examination, it has been discontinued. Now French being generally recognised as the language of diplomacy, I wish to ask your Lordship whether you do not consider that it would be advisable to make some alteration in that respect?—I did not know that there was such a state of things; I hear it for the first time. All that I could do some years ago was to furnish, as all other heads of departments did for their own departments, qualifications for persons employed in the diplomatic service; and certainly a perfect knowledge of French was one of the principal elements of qualification, in my opinion. Then it was left to the Civil Service Commissioners to carry that out. I know nothing, and they decline in general to tell what passes at the examinations. I do not complain of that, but as a matter of fact we know nothing about it. Mr. A. is appointed to be consul or attaché; he will go up for examination on the day which the Civil Service Commissioners appoint. I know nothing more about it until the Civil Service Commissioners write word that he is fit or that he is unfit.

3901. But the Secretary of the Civil Service Commissioners states that though the practice of requiring such an examination prevailed before, it was discontinued some years ago while Lord Russell was Secretary for Foreign Affairs?—I did not know that there was any change in respect of that examination; I entirely concur in the opinion which I see is expressed by Mr. Walrond on that point.

3902. Mr. F. Stanley.] Before the Select Committee on the Diplomatic Service, which sat in 1861, Lord Wodehouse, then the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, in answer to a question, stated that there was at that time no official representative of this country at the Court of Rome; I imagine that I am right in thinking that that position of things is still unaltered?—Yes.

3903. May I ask whether, considering the number of questions which now arise in this country, and which are affected very materially by the action of the Court of Rome, it would be, in your Lordships opinion, to the advantage of the public service that we should have, resident at Rome, an accredited representative of this country?—I think so, and have always thought so, that is to say, of latter years; I thought that what is usually called the Eglinton clause, which was introduced in the House of Lords, and was carried in the House of Commons, was a very imprudent one. Although we removed the prohibition that there was in olden times to send a representative to Rome, and permission was given to send a representative there, yet it was at the same time enacted by that Eglinton clause, that the Pope should not send here, as his representative, an ecclesiastic. The Pope was, not unnaturally, rather offended at this limitation being put on his power of choice, and he said that as he had no relations with foreign countries except those which were ecclesiastical, that is to say, which related to religious matters, it was useless for him to send anybody that was not an ecclesiastic; and the consequence was that, as he declined (and I may say not unfairly) to send a lay minister to this country, no minister was sent from England to Rome, but the prohibition being removed, permission was given by Parliament to Government to have an agent there, not one who was regularly accredited as other ministers were; and that is how the matter has remained ever since. Before that Eglinton clause, so necessary did we feel it to have some sort of relations with Rome, and some sort of information of what was going on there, considering not only the number of Catholic subjects of the English Sovereign, but the many intercolonial matters concerned, that we considered ourselves always obliged to have somebody there, but he was an attaché from the Florence Legation. He was merely sent from there to reside at Rome, and he corresponded with the minister at Florence. Since the time that we have had a more regular representative there (the first one was, I think, Mr. Lyons, now Lord Lyons), he has corresponded directly with the Foreign Office, and received instructions from the Foreign Office; but I have not the least hesitation in saying that his position is very inferior to that of the regularly accredited diplomatic corps, and that inconvenience results from that; and I think that considering we have so many interests now affecting Roman Catholics, it would be very advisable that we should have a regularly accredited representative at that court. I will just give an instance of what Mr. Odo Russell's position is there now. He was told by Cardinal Antonelli that he might attend the opening of the Œcumenical Council, but the doyen of the diplomatic corps said no, he should not; he was, in fact, treated as if he were not even fit to attend such a meeting as that. I say that that is not a position in which the representative of England ought to be placed.

3904. Is your Lordship aware what are the relations between the Court of Berlin and the Court of Rome; I think the Court of Berlin have a representative in Rome, whereas there is none from Rome in return at Berlin?—That is so, and that would have been the case in England if we had not enacted that he should be a layman; the consequence of that was that they had a representative here, an ecclesiastic, and a very powerful one, Cardinal Wiseman, who was wholly responsible; whereas even if we had had a cardinal here as the representative of the Court of Rome he would have come under diplomatic rules, and would have been responsible for his conduct, and he might have been complained of and removed if he had not performed his diplomatic duties properly, 3905. Viscount Barrington.] The Pope has no opportunity, has he, of appointing anybody but an ecclesiastic?—There are laymen in the Government of the Pope, but none in high and important places.

3906. Viscount Sandon.] With regard to the salaries at the present moment of the diplomatic service, may I ask whether, virtually, the salaries of the whole service have not been reduced rather than increased, owing to the great increase in the cost of living on the Continent?—I am very much obliged to you for putting that question, as it gives me an opportunity of saying that I think that they are very much underpaid. You must remember that the greater part of these salaries were fixed 30, 40, or 50 years ago. There is nobody at home or abroad who is not aware of what the increase of the cost of living is. Some of the reports that I hear from honourable men, who are perfectly incapable of saying what is untrue about the cost of their living, are really very distressing. I gave myself as an instance, the other day, when I stated that I spent a thousand a year more than my salary all the time that I was in Spain, even when I was a bachelor. But it is not everybody who can do that. The greater part of our diplomatic servants are very poor men; there are scarcely any of them who have any private fortunes, and there is a constant conflict going on, I know, with those men as to how far they can venture to impair their own property, in order to do what is their public duty. Now I do not think that the public is bound in the least to so pay a man that he may lay by a great deal, but I think that the public has no right to expect to be served by a man at his own expense. I should not ask for any person in the Diplomatic or Consular Service one farthing more than what would cover not only what is indispensable, but his proper liabilities. I would not ask for anything, in order that he should be allowed to lay by, although perhaps a man after being 40 or 50 years in the service, has some right to look to having earned something for his children; but I do think it is hard that a man should be asked to spend s own private fortune, and that of his chil- en, to enable him to perform his public duties operly.

3907. I am right therefore in saying that vir- ally there has been a decrease in the emoluments the Diplomatic Service?—There is not the least ubt of it; the same money goes less far than it d.

3909. It would be for the benefit of the public rvice to revise the salaries?—Yes, I think so.

3910. I rather understand your Lordship to ay that under the present system you get exactly he class of men into the Diplomatic Service that ou want for the public service?—I think so; I o not know how you could improve it.

3911. You get exactly the very men that would erve the public best in this particular line?—I annot suggest any method of getting better; I dare ay that you may say, in regard to all professions, hat there are men superior to them out of the pro- essions; but I do not know how you can get any etter for the diplomatic service, and I must say hat I think the present plan works very well; I lo not believe that the public have any reason- ble ground for complaint, or to doubt that they et their money's worth.

3912. Your Lordship appears to think that any hange in the present system might prejudice the ublic service?—I think so.

3913. With regard to the functions and the umber of the subordinate members of the mis- ions abroad, might there not be some danger, if ou increased their office work, of diminishing heir efficiency as diplomatists, and so far in- uring the public service; I mean if by in- reasing their desk work you considerably imit their opportunities of travelling about he country, mixing in society, and so on?—I think that the staff of each mission is calculated upon the average amount of desk work that there has been, so that there should not be any over- taxing; I think that it is a fair amount of labour which you require from each, and I do not think that you could put much more on them with ad- vantage.

3914. One of the most important objects to which a young diplomatist can give his attention is mixing with all classes of society, and travel- ling over the country, and making himself ac- quainted with the peculiarities of the country, with a view to the public service, is it not?—Certainly, to attain that knowledge of the country which he is in that will be useful to his own country.

3915. And you think that it is absolutely ne- cessary that he should mix with the higher classes of the country which he is in?—Yes; of course that does not in the least preclude him from mix- ing with the lower too.

3916. But it is absolutely necessary that as a diplomatist he should be able to be admitted into the very best society?—Yes, certainly.

3918. Therefore you require ministers who are able to take quite as much responsibility upon themselves now under the present system as formerly?—I think so; I do not mean to say that if a question arose at Paris as to this or that, you would not save 24 hours by a telegram; but then the minister or ambassador must give his reasons why he recommends one course or another, or he must state the facts which would be sufficient to enable the Foreign Secretary to come to a deci- sion upon the matter.

3919. With regard to the value of our diplo- matic service generally, is it not the case that what may be called the greatest feats of diplomacy are those that are unknown to the world; for instance, where great wars have been quietly prevented, or the commencement of evil in the relations between countries averted; that, in fact, the country frequently, from the very fact of its successes, has not known the greatest successes of its diplomacy?—I think that that is per- fectly accurate; things have been done that exactly fulfil the conditions that you have men- tioned; evil may be averted, and good may be done, but the causes, the mainsprings of that remain concealed, and very desirable it is that they should be so. Supposing that a particular country exercises moral influence, and makes another Government feel that it is wrong, that it interposes quietly and mediates between two other countries, and brings the question between the contending parties to a peaceful solution, it is extremely desirable that that should not be known. It would only be to the advantage or glorification of the person concerned in it; but it might lead to mortification and irritation to the powers that had been brought to that result to have it known that it had been done by means of foreign or external influence that had been exerted. Therefore, I should always con- sider that unless there is a public necessity, those things should remain concealed. Of course I think that everything ought to be public that can be, and my notion of proper diplomacy is that everything ought to be known by the public that is useful to your own country to know; but that you ought not to make public in your own country that which would be prejudicial or irritating to others.

3920. Therefore, when a country is considering the cost of its diplomatic service, and whether it is well to keep it up, it ought to take into account that the most valuable diplomatic action it can never be aware of, but it must take on trust very much the beneficial nature of diplomacy, because from the very nature of things its most valuable operations are unseen?—That is perfectly true; I do not mean to say that these sorts of occurrences happen often in which diplomatists, whether an ambassador or the Foreign Secretary, intervene; but to my own knowledge, some of them have done so very successfully indeed, and those cases will never be known.

3921. Mr. A. Russell.] Do you think that considering the increasing importance of our relations with the United States, there would be any advantage in giving the rank of ambassador to our minister at Washington?—That is a matter that I have not considered; I do not think that that is entirely within my province, because I do not think that we could well take the initiative with any prospect of success; I think that, considering the great power and the increasing power in every way of the United States, one of the greatest countries in the world, the representative of the United States is entitled to the highest rank of diplomacy which commands the greatest consideration in the country to which he is accredited; and certainly I should say that there is nothing derogatory, as perhaps it might be called, to the country itself in conferring such rank, for the republics of Venice and Genoa, for example, have been represented by ambassadors. But I can offer no opinion whatever as to whether it would be applicable to the Government and people of the United States, nor, indeed, could I say, not having thought upon this question before, or mentioned it to my colleagues, and being only able to express my individual opinion, whether the Government would propose, or the House of Commons would sanction, the increase of expense that it might entail; but considering that we have ambassadors, that the United States have none, that they are a Republic and have given a good deal of proof that they wish to retain not only Republican institutions but Republican forms of procedure, I can have no doubt that the initiative should come from them; but if any wish was manifested by the United States Government to confer the highest diplomatic rank upon their representative, I should say that the question would certainly be considered by Government, and be submitted to Parliament; and expressing my own opinion, I may say that if it were agreeable to the United States, I think that it would be very agreeable to us.

3922. Mr. W. H. Gladstone.] When your Lordship said that, in your opinion, the members of the Diplomatic Service were underpaid, were you speaking of the heads of missions as well as of the subordinate grades?—I was speaking of them generally. There may be one mission where a secretary on 500 l. a year may be tolerably well off, and another mission of the same rank where he would be spending 200 l. or 300 l. a year of his own money. I should say that if there were any general revision of the diplomatic salaries, the cost of living and the different circumstances connected with each mission ought to be taken into consideration. You cannot say that a man is underpaid who serves four years gratis.

3923. I think that it was Sir Henry Elliott who said that, in his opinion, heads of missions were not underpaid. He drew a distinction, I think, between the heads of missions and the subordinates?—I am very glad to hear of any exceptions to the general rule of complaint.

3924. It is the fact, is it not, that, in some instances, the salaries of heads of missions have been increased since 1861?—That is when they have been made ambassadors. I do not know of any others that have been increased, not by me at least, but when there were three missions, Vienna, St. Petersburgh, and Berlin, made into embassies, then there was an increase in those salaries.

3927. Do you consider that the salary of our minister there is large enough?—I am quite certain that it is not, I mean not large enough to do what is required of a British minister there in the way of hospitality. He buys so much for his house, and for everything, that he really cannot do on his salary what he ought to do.

3928. The chief of a mission has a right to take away drafts or copies of his own despatches. Those despatches contain information which he has obtained from his official position. Those papers become his private property, and that of his executors if he dies. Has your Lordship ever known any inconvenience arise from the publication of official papers of that sort which have come into private hands?—I do not remember any cases of that just at the present moment, but I have not the least doubt that there have been such.

3929. With regard to commercial business being carried on at the Foreign Office, I suppose that there are often times when commercial questions are very much mixed up with political questions?—Yes, certainly.

3930. And therefore if the commercial correspondence were handed over to the Board of Trade, they would have to be continually applying to the Foreign Office in order to consult them?—Yes; there could not be a better receipt for confusion.

3931. With regard to the so-called small missions, irrespective of the business which may be carried on at them, are they not very useful as nurseries, so to speak, for rising diplomatists?—Well small missions are not more useful as nurseries than large ones, I think; but the more you extend the sphere of the nursery the better you will have your young diplomatists, particularly as there is a rule (a good one I think, although it puts the country to a little expense), that a young man should not be allowed to stay so long at the same place as to vegetate there, and become rusty; from two to three years is quite enough for him to learn, if he has his wits about him, what there is to be learnt at the particular court, and I think that a change is very advantageous to him; and many any of our men who are not yet old, not more an 30 or 35, have seen so much of the world that y are very useful public servants I think.

3932. I believe that it has been stated on a rmer occasion "that the diplomatic service was aristocratic monopoly and a field of favouritism, d the result of the system was, that honest, le, hard-working men give themselves up to spair, or get into a morbid state, and become able to serve the public as they were wont to , and that this system literally destroyed them;" es your Lordship agree with that statement of inion?—I differ from that entirely; I do not nsider that able and hard-working men are nothered and choked, that the tares grow up out them, and the seed is smothered. I do not ny that the advancement in the profession is ow; I wish it were otherwise; but when I look round me in all other professions, I cannot say at there is much difference. Look at the army the navy; a very able man may be a long me in one of those services, fulfilling those nditions, before he gets enough to live on.

3933. Mr. Kinnaird.] Is there any compensaon given to a minister when he is appointed uddenly to one place, and from the necessity of e service is removed to another, for the outlay at he has had in the first place; take the case ow of a very eminent and very rising diplomatist, Mr. Lumley, who was in Switzerland he other day, when he had just furnished his ouse, and set up an establishment, from the ecessity of the service he was removed to Brussels, and was suddenly called upon to enter n that post, and to entertain very largely, incurring an expense which exceeded anything which his salary could supply?—He was called pon by necessity to do a thing extremely agreeble to himself; and if a minister receives an outfit, say, for a third-class mission, and is promoted to a second or first-class mission, I believe that I am right in saying that he would have the difference between the outfit of the one and the ther, but no more. If it had been too costly, or nconvenient to Mr. Lumley, of course it would ave been very easy for him to decline, and say hat he would prefer to remain in Switzerland.

3934. Your Lordship knows that to decline a duty would not raise him in the estimation of his chief?—If he has not good reason to do it.

3936. I only meant to ask whether that was not an additional element to be considered in the salaries?—In almost all these moves you see it is to an increase of salary; Mr. Lumley, for instance, gets a higher salary at Brussels than he did in Switzerland.

3937. Do you agree with the policy indicated by Lord Derby of reducing the smaller missions, who has given evidence here with regard to Stuttgardt, Darmstadt, and Coburg, that they might be reduced with great advantage to the public service?—In my answer to Mr. Rylands I gave my opinion upon that point.

3938. You did not mention Coburg, I think?—No; but I think that it must be manifest to everybody that there are family reasons for having a man there; and really the pay is very low.

3939. Would it not also be acceptable to the country, that whilst providing for those important missions on a full pay, in the revision you should consider whether a reduction of some almost useless missions might not be effected. Might not that tend to facilitate the due payment of the really effective missions?—I think that the saving would be very small. You could only carry it out at Coburg and Darmstadt; those are both, to use the foreign terms, family missions. They are both of them, particularly Darmstadt, now in a very good position indeed for information of the movement of political opinion, which may have very important political results. There is no staff there.

3940. Information, you mean, with reference to the state of Southern Germany?—Yes; and if the Duke of Edinburgh succeeds to the Duchy of Coburg, there are family reasons which suggest themselves why the House of Commons should scarcely, for a few hundreds a year, take away a mission of that sort.

3941. You would rather keep them?—I should not, probably, have appointed them; but I do not think that it is worth while to take them away.

3942. Mr. Eastwick.] You have given a very strong opinion as to the under-payment of the service, and as to the deficiency of means on the part of the members of the service, and we have had considerable evidence on the same, and, indeed, the last gentleman before the Committee gave very strong evidence on that subject. Now I would like to ask your Lordship, with regard to that, whether it would not be well to have some property qualification in the foreign service, as is the case in the foreign service of several other countries?—If you would undertake to defend such an aristocratic provision, I shall be very glad to consider it; but I should not venture to propose to the House of Commons, and I do not think that you would support me in proposing that a man who is appointed to be an attaché should have 400 l. a year of his own.

3943. But supposing that the property qualification was not so large as that, because I fancy that the property qualification in the French service does not go to anything like that, but supposing that it was a property qualification of, we will say, 200 l. a year, or 100 l. a year, and supposing that the attachés were paid as many gentlemen have stated that they ought to be paid, would not that go some way towards removing the present very objectionable state of things?—Of course, as far as the 100 l. a year or the 200 l. a year goes it would; but I do not think that either you would get a better class of men or that it would materially alter the service. A man who wishes his son to go into the Diplomatic Service must be sure of his having about 400 l. a year. That he must get as he can, out of his own pocket or out of the service, or get into debt in the place where he is, in which case he will be removed.

3944. Your Lordship thinks, I presume, that it would be very objectionable for a diplomatic officer, or any consul, to leave a station where he was in debt?—Yes.

3945. I think, however, there have been instances of that, or, perhaps, I should say an instance at all events of an officer having left in debt. I will take the case of Persia, where a consular officer has lately been defaulter. Do you think that it would be desirable that in that particular instance the country should pay?—Certainly not. I cannot conceive a better mode of encouraging people to get into debt. I know very well the case to which you have been alluding. I know that there have been claims with regard to debts in no way contracted for the public service; there is not a pretence of that. If it had been anything that had been really for the public service, and the man got into debt, and they could prove that it was for the public service, then it would be a matter to take into consideration; but if a man gets himself indebted in private ways for the Government to recognise and pay his debts would be offering a premium to getting into debt.

3946. But the consul receiving the dues, and the people of that country not being acquainted with consuls or consular usage, might not an exception be made in that particular instance?—They trusted the man; it is very unfortunate for them that they did so; but many people do trust others, and do get deceived.

3947. I would like to ask your Lordship, considering the great disadvantages of the service in some countries, for instance in Japan, or we will say in some parts of South America, the bad climate, the great expense of living, and the danger to life (for some of our officers have actually been wounded on service), whether some compensation might not be given in the shape of reducing the amount of service for a pension, or in other ways, say, increasing the salaries?—If you mean with regard to the danger or the disagreeableness of the post, and the climate in which they are, I think that that is very just. I think that that ought to be taken into consideration. If a man is sent to an unhealthy place in South America, or, as of late, in Japan, to a place where he has a chance of being wounded, I think that that man is entitled to some consideration. I do not think that our service is what you may call liberal; I do not think that they take the circumstances of a man and his position into sufficient consideration. You make a mission first or second class, with a certain salary attached, and a man takes it, good or bad; but there are some climates that ought to be taken into consideration in the salary, I think.

3948. I was looking particularly to the case of Japan, and the case of Caraccas, where three of our chargés d'affaires have died in succession within the last six years, one of them of yellow fever; and, where the expense of living is considerable, and where the town has been three times taken, twice with very great slaughter, which of course was a considerable risk to property and to life?—Yes, to say nothing of earthquakes.

3949. Then I would ask your Lordship, with respect to South America, whether it might not be better to make those officers who are diplomatic officers with the rank of consuls general and chargé d'affaires, ministers resident, and thereby give them a claim to a rather increased pension?—I quite agree with that, and if I had been able to do it, I think that it would have been a very proper thing to give them an increase of salary. But now, in Chili and Peru, our agent and chargé d'affaires is in a lower position than his European colleagues, both in rank and in pay. It is mortifying to him individually, and he is distressed at it, and I think that it takes away from his consideration. I should have been very glad indeed to have done what you suggest, and have only been deterred by the increased expense that it would be. I quite agree with you on the point.

3950. Then I would like to ask whether it is not the fact that the number of British subjects in the different States of South America is very considerable, and whether it would not be desirable that some return should be made of the number of British subjects, in order that we might be made aware of the importance of the public interests in that direction?—I should agree with you in that, but it is so exceedingly difficult to do it. You see in those countries there is no regular census taken with reference to the distinctions of nationality. With just the same object that you are thinking of, I gave instructions that they should be registered as far as they could be in Guatemala. The reason of that was, that in these countries where there are such perpetual revolutions, and the social condition of the country is so various, one wishes, of course, to give all the protection one can to those who have a right to claim it; but in order to know who has a right to claim it you must have some sort of register, an account taken of who are British subjects. But then you see that they live at such great distances from the capitals, and from places where there are consular agents, that I do not think that you can get a correct account. The instance that I have given shows that I have the same feeling that you have about that, and that I do think, in reference to all those British subjects, it is our interest that they should be registered as far as possible.

3951. Would there be an objection to give a proximate return of their number as far as it can be furnished by the Foreign Office before this Committee finishes it labours?—To take a census of the British subjects scattered about South America is not a short job; but I will see how far it can be done; I will consult those who would have to do it.

3952. I should like to ask your Lordship one other question with regard to South America; our consuls general there are placed in very isolated positions, and in case of their death, or of their absence on whatever ground, it is generally necessary to send up a consul sometimes from a considerable distance to occupy the post: may I ask whether there would be any objection to appoint a junior diplomatic officer as private secretary, or in any other capacity with these ministers; the expense would not be considerable, there being already a clerk who would probably cost as much as the junior diplomatic officer?—If you mean that this junior diplomatic officer would have to live at the mission as the private secretary of the minister, I expressed my opinion at some length the other day, on the question whether a minister was entitled to have a private secretary. But I think that if you have a man as private secretary to a minister in order that at any moment, in the event of the death or absence for six months or a year of a consul, he may be sent over to some distant place, you put the minister in a very precarious position if he is depending upon that work from the private secretary which would justify his having one.

3953. Some questions have been asked with reference to the recovery of interest on foreign bonds, and reference has been made here to a dictum of Lord Palmerston's; would there be any objection to put in the circular on that subject from the Foreign Office, dated January 1848?—I should think not. I do not like to promise mise papers without looking at them, but pro-ly that has been laid before Parliament al-dy.

954. I should also like to ask your Lordship ew questions with reference to Persia; I uld ask your Lordship whether you would not k it desirable for us, as much as lay in our er, rather to keep Persia within the Indian le than to bring it into the European circle politics?—No, I think it would not be for our est.

955. Your Lordship is of opinion that it ld be better to bring it into the European le?—Certainly, I have no doubt about that;
ish I had, for I should be very happy to ree the Foreign Office of the Persian Mission.

956. Your Lordship is clear that it should be der the Foreign Office?—Quite so; I have the least doubt about it, and what is more I nk that the tendency of things will make it re important every day that it should be so.
e progress of Russia in Central Asia, and the ations between Persia and bordering tribes ich will be influenced by foreign agitators, l bring Persia every day more and more thin the pale of European influences. I think o that we are greatly interested in being on od terms with the Shah, and I think that he uld be very much hurt and offended at being cluded from European diplomacy and put into e Indian circle. I think it would be offensive his dignity, and I believe that it would be pre-licial to our interests.

3957. But if it should be more agreeable to e Shah, would your Lordship's opinion then be anged?—Not a bit; but that "if" is simply a ry high improbability. I am quite sure it uld not be more agreeable to him. I do not ink that his relations with the Indian Govern-nt have been of such a kind that he would be disposed to renew them.

3958. Your Lordship is, of course, much better ware than myself that Persia has been for pretty arly an equal number of years under the Indian overnment, and under the Foreign Office; is ur Lordship aware of any very great difference uring those two different periods as to the sults?—Well, it must be remembered that at e time of the Board of Control (that is now a od many years ago) Persia had never been in lations with any other form of British Govern-ent than the East India Company: they had ways had representatives there, and that worked ell; but afterwards, in consequence of Persia coming of greater European importance, it was ought under the Foreign Office. I do not know xactly what were the precise motives which led that result; I have not looked at the corre-ondence lately, and it was a long time ago that it as first transferred; then for some reason or other was transferred back again to the India Office.
hen the East India Company was done away ith, and there was a Secretary of State for India.
nd the India Office became a component part of e Queen's Government at home, that arrange-ent with regard to Persia was not found to work ell, and it came back again to the Foreign ffice. As I said before, I should be very glad deed to think that it might be re-transferred the India Office, but I am clearly of opinion at it would not be useful; you must bear in ind that the India Office, the Indian Govern-ent, has very little to do with Persia. I have nderstood from Lord Halifax that he said something, when he was examined the other day, as to the correspondence that takes place between the India Office and the Foreign Office with respect to Persia; I have had a Memorandum prepared with reference to that matter, and I find that between 1st January 1860 and 1st January 1870, 278 letters were received at the Foreign Office from the India Office relating to Persia; then the statement which I have gives the number of letters in each of these 10 years; the largest number in any one year is 50, and the whole works out to an averge of 27 and a fraction (say 28) in each year; of these 278 letters, 91 related to telegraph questions, and by far the greater number of the remainder (that is 187) were replies to letters from the Foreign Office; some few contained copies of papers for the information of the Foreign Office, on which no opinion was asked; others suggestions; others related to questions of finance, &c., and in a few instances, proposed instructions from the India Office to the Bombay Government were submitted for the approval of the Foreign Office, relative to questions on which correspondence had already passed between the two offices. A short abstract of the letters has been made, from which it will be seen that out of 278, probably not more than 8 papers in the ten years can be said to have contained references to the Foreign Office from the India Office on political matters in which the interests of India were concerned, that is to say, the interests of India with reference to Persia.

3959. But I believe it is the fact that during those ten years the mission at the chief post in Persia, namely, Tehran, has been filled by a gentleman who belongs specially to the Foreign Office, and who is not acquainted with the Indian service; I would like to ask whether the same average would be found in the correspondence for the ten years preceding, when an Indian officer was at Tehran; should I not be right in saying that a considerable difference would appear in that respect during that period?—The statement in the Memorandum from which I have just read is merely with regard to the last term in which Persia has been under the Foreign Office, as I merely asked for that; but of course any returns for previous years which the Committee would like to have could be given.

3961. But with regard to the Persian Gulf, is not the principal agent in matters connected with the Persian Gulf, I mean the resident at Bushire, an Indian officer under the Indian Government?—He is.

3962. Mr. R. Shaw.] We have been informed by certain witnesses who have been examined before us, that there is a great block in the service, and, on the other hand, we are assured by Mr. Hammond, in answer to a question put to him, that there is really now no greater block in the service than there was in former years; will your Lordship be kind enough to give us the benefit of your opinion on that point?—I do not quite agree with Mr. Hammond with respect to that, because the abolition of four or five missions of course has taken away some facilities for moving persons upwards, which previously existed; but, cæteris paribus, I do not consider that there is a greater block now than there was formerly; indeed, I should say that although the block is very great, and the profession is certainly stagnant, you can hardly say that it is as much so as where the Secretaries of State used to appoint any number of attachés they pleased, some of whom remained in the service, and thought that they had claims by remaining a long time, and others of whom quitted the service. I should be very glad if the service was a little more open, and the promotion was quicker.

3963. The same witnesses who gave evidence that there was a block, suggested at the time as a mode of obtaining relief, that the junior members in the Diplomatic Service should be drafted into the consular service; could your Lordship give us an opinion on that point?—I do not think that there would be any advantage in that.

3964. You think it desirable that the two services should be kept separate?—Yes; if your son, for instance, gets into the Diplomatic Service, and hopes to rise in that service, as everyone does hope to rise, and then found himself drafted into a service that does not offer the same advantages, whether social, political, or pecuniary, he would think it very hard.

3965. With reference to the complaint of the inadequate pay of the junior members of the service, am I correct in saying that they have all entered the service with full knowledge of the amount of pay which they were to receive?—Certainly; so far as I myself am concerned, I can answer for it that they have, because I have always advised people not to enter it with the hope of pecuniary advantage.

3966. We are informed that these gentlemen cannot live on their pay; I believe that that does not apply to this service alone, but that it applies equally to the Army or Navy?—I do not think that a naval cadet could live well on his pay.

3967. I was going to ask a question which you have just anticipated; comparing the pay of this service with that of the Army or the Navy, do you think that the junior members of the Diplomatic Service are worse paid than the junior members of those other services?—I think that in this respect they are worse paid, that they cannot escape a much larger expenditure than their pay. A young man in the Army or Navy who wishes to keep out of debt may manage to get on; but if you send a young man to a foreign capital, where he has to mix with the best society (and it is desirable that he should be in the best society), you impose on him, by the nature of the service, a great amount of extra expense.

3968. I think I understood you to say that, notwithstanding the complaints of the great e pense of the Diplomatic Service, you still h any number of applications for young gentlem to enter the service?—There are a good many.

3969. So that inadequacy of pay does not sto applications for entering the service?—But a these applications, it must be borne in mind come from people who can afford it. You ma be able to give your son 400*l.* a year for fou years, before he gets 100*l.* a year, and I may n be able to give him even 100*l.* a year. Y apply, and I abstain from applying.

3970. You have no difficulty in filling up an number of vacancies, as I understand you?—I believe my expression was "a good number."

3971. With reference to the stagnation in th promotion in the Diplomatic Service, do you thin that is slower than the promotion in the Army Navy?—I really do not know that it is; I am n very familiar with their pay, or chances of pr motion in the Army or Navy; but certainly, pa ticularly as regards the Navy, I may say, havin many friends in it, that I never knew any one them who had not some grievance of that sort complain of.

3972. Can you give me an idea of the leng of service before an attaché becomes a first secr tary; is it on an average 15 or 20 years?—I would not be so long as that; but if I were give you an answer, it would be merely gues work. Lord Lyons is ambassador at Paris, an I suppose that he is about 50. Sir August Paget, our minister at Florence, I suppose, about 44.

3973. Looking at these facts, and bearing mind that the service is a close one, and o which for its social advantages is much soug after, do you recommend the Committee to i crease the pay of the junior members of the se vice?—Really if there was to be a gener revision of the Diplomatic Service, I should li the salaries of the junior members to be includ in that inquiry. Of course, they do not co plain, because they take the appointment with drawbacks and its advantages. A man kno when he enters the service that he is not to ha 100*l.* a year till he has been three years it, and that it is no use complaining of that, b still he would prefer to have 100*l.* a ye when he entered, if he could.

3974. I understand that you have no schem which you wish to lay before the Committee f increasing the pay of the junior officers of t service?—No, I have no scheme; if the Co mittee would like it in the course of next ye if this Committee should sit all that time, should be very happy to present a scheme. Eith the Committee might inquire into it, or I shou be very happy to undertake the inquiry mysel

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE EDWARD PLEYDELL BOUVERIE, IN THE CHAIR.

Mr. ALGERNON BERTRAM MITFORD, called in; and Examined.

Mr. Mitford.
20 June 1870.

975. Chairman.] ARE you a Member of the lomatic Service?—Yes.
976. What rank do you hold in it?—That of nd Secretary.
977. How long have you been in the service? first entered the service in February 1858; s in the Foreign Office then.
978. You began by being a clerk in the cign Office at the commencement?—I was in Foreign Office for several years, to commence , and then made a temporary exchange to Petersburg with Mr. Locock.
979. You went out there as attaché, I sup- e?—I went out there as third secretary, for time being; after that I came back to my at the Foreign Office; and, in March 1865, as sent off to Pekin. I remained at Pekin a r and a-half, and was transferred to Japan, re I remained three years and a-half.
980. So that you interchanged service be- en the Foreign Office and the diplomatic vice abroad twice?—In two capacities; once porarily and once permanently.
981. So that you never went through the eal of an unpaid attaché?—I was unpaid during year which I spent at the Foreign Office, but ever was an unpaid attaché.
982. Who was the Secretary of State who t you to St. Petersburg?—Lord Russell.
983. Was it at your own desire that you e sent there?—It was at the desire of Mr. cock and myself; it was a mutual affair.
984. When were you promoted to be second retary?—In March 1868.
985. To what mission are you now attached? Yeddo, the Japanese mission.
986. How long have you been in Japan?— ree and a half-years.
987. We have been told that there is a con- erable amount of dissatisfaction in the junior nches of the service at the very poor prospects advancement; do you confirm that opinion?— rtainly.
988. Have you ever made any calculation as when you have a reasonable prospect of be- ning a first secretary?—I should imagine in out from 10 to 12 years from this time.
989. How old would you be then?—In 12 ars I should be 46 years of age.
990. Have you any estimate of how long it would take you to rise from a first secretaryship to a ministry?—I should think about 14 or 16 years; but Mr. Lowther would probably be a better judge of that.
991. You could not, as I understand you, expect to rise to the highest grade under about 60 years of age?—Exactly so.
992. That is a practical example of what is commonly called the block in the profession?—Yes, it is a very practical example of it.
993. You are aware that there is a general feeling amongst your colleagues of dissatisfaction on that account?—Certainly.
994. Have you ever applied your mind to suggesting a remedy?—I have very often thought that promotion entirely by seniority is the cause of the unfairness of the block; not the cause of the block itself, but the cause of what may be termed its unfairness.
995. Every man, good or bad, goes up according to seniority, you mean?—There is no encouragement whatever to a man to do his work well, simply because he sees his neighbour who is shirking his work, and shuffling, go up, as he himself might do, knowing at the same time that he is working hard in the interests of his country.
996. There is no hope that by extraordinary exertion, or highly-skilled service, you can get a start in the profession?—I do not think that there is any hope of that.
997. May I ask, when you went to Japan had you any acquaintance with Oriental languages at all?—When I went to Japan I had already studied Chinese a considerable time.
998. Are you now acquainted with both languages?—Yes.
999. And able to converse in them?—In both.
1000. Is any inducement held out to gentlemen to make themselves masters of those languages?—On the contrary, there is every inducement to them not to make themselves masters of those languages.
1001. How so?—Simply for this reason, that if a man studies those languages, it is a matter of great personal cost to himself. I learned those languages, and in Pekin I never was employed in an interpretorial capacity, but Mr. Wade, who I suppose

I suppose is the finest Chinese scholar living, certified that I was capable of interpreting in Chinese, and in Japan; I was not only constantly employed to go and do business on my own account without the aid of an interpreter, but also on many occasions I was called upon to interpret, notably in the case when the Duke of Edinburgh was received by the Mikado. To render myself capable to do this it cost me a sum of about 80*l.* a year, in employing what they call writers there (not tutors, but people more in the capacity of a servants) to teach me the language, and to open all Japanese letters that might be addressed to me, and to write down the answers that I dictated to them; for the acquisition of Japanese handwriting is a matter of such immense laboriousness, and takes so long a time, that I am only acquainted with one European who has ever been able to manage it.

4002. I was going to ask you whether your knowledge of Chinese or Japanese extended to a knowledge of the written character?—Up to a certain point; but not to being my own amanuensis; because if I were to copy out a despatch in Chinese or Japanese, the text of which had been written by a native, I should produce the sort of thing that a schoolboy would produce, and look ridiculous; and it is the habit of the natives to have all official things done by clerks; these men were my clerks.

4003. Is there a great difference between the written and the printed character?—There are so many characters that it is a long story to go into. When I said that there was an inducement to men not to learn these languages, I meant to refer to this fact in my experience. When Sir Harry Parkes recommended that the money which I had paid to these writers should be refunded to me from the public funds, the Foreign Office wrote, I believe, a very strong letter recommending that course; and it was thrown out by the Treasury, who said, that if I had done any extraordinary service, it was to promotion in my own profession that I must look, and not to any remuneration or gratuity from them. That is why I say that there is an inducement not to work in that direction.

4004. Mr. Otway.] What are we to understand by your being employed to carry on your own business in Japan?—During the five months of the year 1868, the minister, Sir Harry Parkes, was obliged to go to Yokohama, in order to look after the interests of the foreign colony there during a very critical moment; it was the time of the revolution, and the centre of the government was at Osaka. I was left at Osaka to carry on the negotiations with the foreign minister there.

4005. In your public duty, you mean?—Yes, my own business in a public capacity. I very often had negotiations to carry on with the Japanese government, and did so without an interpreter.

4006. Were you the only gentleman connected with the mission who had a knowledge of spoken Japanese?—The only one not belonging to the interpretorial class.

4007. Chairman.] Was any direction given to you when you first went into that part of the world, to the effect that you were to make yourself acquainted with the Chinese and Japanese languages?—Not the slightest.

4008. It was your own desire to make yourself familiar with them that made you learn them?—I cannot conceive a man living in a country of that sort without wishing to know the language in order to make himself as useful as possible.

4009. Of course if you were transferred to a distant mission in another part of the world, the knowledge of that language would be useless to you?—Quite useless, except in so far that ultimately I might again be transferred back to Japan.

4010. There is a class of interpreters, I suppose, attached to the mission at Japan?—Yes, they belong to the consular service.

4012. They are not employed in the higher branches of diplomatic business?—Naturally the chief interpreters are always with the minister, and therefore they are employed in that way; but they are not so much employed on their own account individually; they are employed more as interpreters between the minister and others; but, for instance, the Japanese secretary would form an exception to that rule, although he is an interpreter.

4013. Is there any special payment for the instruction of these gentlemen, the interpreters?—These gentlemen come out to China and Japan in the capacity of what are called student interpreters. Their passage out is paid for them, and they receive 200*l.* a year as long as they are student interpreters, until they are promoted to what is called third assistant in the consular service; and from that they rise through the grade of second assistant and first assistant to that of full interpreter, and from that to vice-consul and consul.

4014. And no doubt they are permanently attached to the mission?—They are attached to the mission until they are promoted and transferred to consulates. The Japanese secretary, however, who ranks as a consul, is permanently attached to the legation staff.

4015. Is the arrangement the same at Pekin as at Yeddo?—It is the same at both places, with the exception that at Pekin the Chinese secretary is also secretary of legation.

4016. Did you find your knowledge of Chinese any advantage to you in learning Japanese?—So far as the written character was concerned, and then when I became more familiar with Japanese, it was advantageous to me in conversing with people of rank, because they use a good deal of Chinese mixed up with the vernacular, which is believed to be a corruption of the ancient Fo-Kien dialect. Two Japanese speaking together, if they were men of education, would use that mixture. The Chinese classical works form the basis of the education of a Japanese.

4017. Is there much communication between the two nations, commercial or otherwise?—Very little; the communication between the two nations has increased enormously since the advent of foreigners, because foreigners have brought Chinese men to act as, what they call, their compradores, that is head clerks in their business, but otherwise the communication between the two nations has been religious and educational.

4018. Does the speaking of pidgin English prevail in Japan?—Pidgin English prevails in the Chinese ports; at the Japanese ports pidgin Japanese prevails; it is a mixture of Malay, Portuguese, English, and a very small proportion of Japanese.

4019. Viscount Barrington.] Why is it called "pidgin"?—"Pidgin" is a corruption of the word "business"; when we went to China these young words of ours puzzled them, and they caught our word "business," and it became "pidgin"; it is a corruption of the word business, and pidgin English means business English; it is really a sort of corruption of English, pronounced in the most horrible manner, with a Chinese construction.

4020. Chairman.] I understand you to say that your diplomatic chief recommended your case for consideration to the Foreign Office for some remuneration, in consequence of what you had spent in learning the language?—I do not know whether I am doing quite right to mention this; but he recommended me for the sum of 200 l. to be paid to me, and the Treasury refused it.

4021. Was that lately?—Just before I left Japan.

4022. Do you anticipate having to go back there?—I do not know at all; I am still attached to that mission.

4023. Viscount Barrington.] Is the amount of salary that you receive there at all commensurate with the expenses attending your situation?—No; I receive 400 l., and I spend 800 l.

4024. Is the style of living extremely expensive out there?—The style of living is expensive, on account of the extravagance of the merchants, who have raised the prices of everything; and it is also necessary, I think, if you wish to keep up your position at all towards the natives, that you should live in a suitable manner.

4025. That you should entertain to a certain extent?—Certainly; I was called upon to entertain rather largely.

4026. Junior members of the mission, do you mean?—The secretary of legation, and myself, used to mess together, and we constantly had people of the rank of the foreign minister and other Japanese noblemen, and persons of rank dining with us, and breakfasting with us; then, of course, also any travelling Englishmen who might come out and bring letters of introduction, would expect to lodge at our house for a week or a fortnight, or three weeks together.

4027. At your expense?—At our expense, if he brought letters of introduction, or was in any way known to us at all.

4028. Are there no hotels there?—During the last few months of my residence at Yeddo, there was an hotel, but it was a very rowdy place, and you would not like to send a gentleman there; during the first months of my residence there, there was absolutely nothing; Yeddo was a show place, and we were obliged to show it for nothing; travellers came either to the minister or to us; it was a very heavy expense to Sir Harry Parkes as minister, and to us, of course, proportionately great.

4029. I suppose that these student interpreters who are attached to the mission are like dragomans?—They are a higher class than that, they rise to be consuls; these are young gentlemen who come out principally from the Irish universities; generally you will find that the majority of them come from the Irish universities.

4030. And having learned the preliminary portion of their education as far as Japanese or Chinese is concerned?—Knowing nothing of those languages. You cannot learn Chinese or Japanese in England; of course, they find it excessively hard to live upon their salary of 200 l. a year; those in Japan are really in a seriously inconvenient position; those at Pekin are able to live on their salary, and unfortunately the salaries for Yeddo are based upon those for Pekin, Pekin being a cheap place, and Yeddo an expensive one; the extravagance of the British merchants has not affected Pekin, because no British merchant resides there, and because it is 80 miles away from the nearest open port, whereas Yeddo is close to an open port, and is itself an open city.

4031. Can you give us any account of the way in which the work is distributed in the chancery in the missions in China and Japan?—That must depend a great deal upon the individuals composing the chancery. For instance, supposing that the second secretary, who is at the head of the chancery, did as I did, made himself acquainted with the language, and was enabled to conduct negotiations by himself, he would be a good deal employed in that way, and that would take him away in a measure from the copying, and the copying of the bulky despatches, with the exception of the minister's own despatches, would be done by the student interpreters.

4032. The student interpreters would be confidentially employed?—Yes, the bulk of the inclosures are copied as a rule by the student interpreters, who are learning their business as public officials at the same time as they are learning the language, because we send them off to the consulates as trained men.

4033. Unless he is acquainted with the language out there, an Englishman can personally be of very little use, I suppose?—I should think very little; a copying clerk would do as well.

4034. Mr. A. Russell.] You said that there were no means of learning Chinese or Japanese in England, did you not?—There is a gentleman who calls himself professor of Chinese, at I think, the London University, or King's College, but we do not think very much of the books which he has produced.

4035. Paris is the only town in Europe where those languages can be studied?—Certainly, there they have a first-rate man, M. Stanislas Julien.

4036. Mr. Otway.] Is there no professors of these languages in Germany?—I am not acquainted with any what you call serious professors of Chinese and Japanese, with the exception of those at Paris. At St. Petersburg and Berlin they have professors, and, I believe, that there is a gentleman at Vienna who knows something about these languages.

4037. Viscount Barrington.] Have you much telegraphic business in Japan?—Scarcely ever; now and then we telegraph viâ Ceylon. Of course this new arrangement of the cable will give us some telegraphic work.

4038. Mr. W. Cartwright.] As to interpreters, does the same system prevail in the other foreign missions in Japan with regard to interpreters?—No; we are the only legation there that have any recognised system of interpreters. The Prussians have got two student interpreters now, but in no other legation is it upon the same scale at all as it is with ours; and that is what gives us so very great influence there.

4039. But what is the Prussian system there?—The Prussians have two student interpreters now, whom they are educating up to be interpreters; but the thing is not on the same scale as ours is. We have a dominant interest there entirely on that account.

4040. In Japan I apprehend that Japanese is not the only tongue of importance, but Dutch also is important, is it not?—Not of the slightest importance at present. The reason that it was so formerly was, that the Dutch were the only Europeans with whom the Japanese for a considerable number of centuries had any communication whatever. The consequence is that at Desima Dutch was taught to a certain number of Japanese interpreters, but the reason of that was that they objected to the Dutch, or indeed to any foreigners acquiring Japanese; they did not wish the records of their country to be thrown open to foreigners.

4041. I see in the Foreign Office List that we have Japanese interpreters and Dutch interpreters?—The Dutch interpreters were appointed when the mission was first opened; when Sir Rutherford Alcock went out, a number, of Dutch interpreters were appointed; Mr. Eusden, Mr. Dohmen, Mr. Schmidt, and a number of others went out as Dutch interpreters; and the mode of interpreting was extremely cumbrous. The British minister stated any remark that he had to make to his Dutch interpreter in English, this man translated it into Dutch to the Japanese linguist, and the Japanese linguist re-translated it into Japanese to the Japanese minister, and then the process had to be reversed to get back the answer.

4042. I understand you to say that Dutch now is almost of no importance there?—None whatever.

4043. But are these Dutch interpreters who are out there now employed as consuls?—They are employed as assistants in the consular service, that is to say, those who have not been promoted to be consuls as some of them have.

4044. I think you were saying that life is very expensive at Yeddo, in contradistinction from Pekin?—Yes.

4045. Are not the juniors lodged in the case of Pekin?—Yes, and in Japan.

4046. I think you suggest that there should be no promotion strictly by seniority?—I consider that promotion entirely by seniority is not a good thing, cæteris paribus of course the senior man should go up, but when a man has special talents or requirements I do not see why he should not be promoted.

4047. Up to the rank of first secretary?—I do not see why he should not be promoted in the case I have supposed.

4048. Mr. Cameron.] Do not you think that if promotion by seniority were done away with, it might give rise to a suspicion of favouritism on the part of the Principal Secretary of State?—I think, as a rule, in a small service like ours, the working men are so well known to the rest of the service, that the Secretary of State could hardly be suspected of favouritism in promoting them.

4049. I meant, that whereas the Secretary of State might appoint men who would be perfectly well known in the profession as being able and deserving men, the public outside might think (most likely very unjust) that he was appointing some friends of his own?—I do not think that it would signify very much what the public outside said if the service itself was satisfied.

4050. But discontent in the public outside has sometimes the effect of producing alterations in the service, which the service might approve of?—That is so.

4051. Was your outward journey to Japan paid?—Yes.

4052. And your homeward journey?—I came home on sick leave. Half of the passage money to Southampton was paid to me, that is to say, 75 l. It cost me 200 l. more to get home with a servant. Coming home on sick leave, I only had the ordinary allowance that would have been made to a consular officer, 75 l., half the passage money to Southampton.

4053. Did I rightly understand you to say that the service in China and Japan might be so far separated from the other portions of the Diplomatic Service, and the work be done entirely by interpreters?—No; I think that would be the very worst thing. I am entirely against the employment of specialists in these higher branches of the Diplomatic Service in China and Japan. I believe that a good man in Europe is a good man in China and Japan; and the best proof we had of that was Sir Frederick Bruce. Never had a minister more personal influence than he had.

4054. Then you think that the system of interchange should still be kept up between the missions in Europe and the missions in Japan and China?—I am quite certain that it is for the advantage of the missions in China and Japan that it should be so. Whether the gentlemen who went into the service, bargaining that they should be employed in posts in Europe and America, would care to go out to China and Japan I do not know, but I am quite sure that it is an advantage to our nation, that in dealing with Asiatics we should have the highest class of gentlemen we can to represent us.

4055. If you required the consent of these gentlemen to go to China and Japan, that would at once make a distinction?—Of the inadvisability of such a distinction I do not think there could be a doubt.

4056. How many regular diplomatic servants do you think would be required at Pekin and Yeddo?—Looking at the quantity of work that there is to be done, I should think that the regular diplomatic men should not be reduced to a number lower than they are at present; in fact, I would rather see a junior added to Japan. In Japan you have a minister, a secretary of legation, and a second secretary; and I think you ought to have a third secretary.

4057. Viscount Barrington.] In China there are two secretaries, are there not?—In China there are two second secretaries.

4058. Mr. W. Cartwright.] How many foreign missions are there in Japan?—The French, the American, the Italian, the Dutch, the Prussian, and the Austrian. The Russians never had anything more than a consul at Hakodaté, in the northern island of Yezo.

4059. How many of these missions employ native interpreters?—The French employ one French interpreter and one or more native interpreters; the Americans employ native interpreters only; the Italians employ a native interpreter; the Prussians have their own interpreters. The Austrians have no interpreter; if they want one, they borrow one from the other missions, or employ a native; but the work done through native interpreters is necessarily very indifferent. In the first place, you are never quite certain that the native interpreter will not be afraid of rendering what you say in the same outspoken manner in which you wish it said, or at he gives you back exactly the reply. Partly rom fear and partly from want of training in hat line, he is not a good interpreter.

4060. Mr. Cameron.] From your experience n the Foreign Office when you were working here as a clerk, do you consider that the present ystem of permissive exchange between members f the Foreign Office and of the foreign diplo- atic service might be extended, or do you think hat it is already sufficient to meet the require- nts of the public service?—I think it is quite fficient on paper, and not sufficient in practice.

4061. How do you account for its not being fficient in practice?—Because I think the oreign Office are, perhaps, unwilling to allow a reat number of their own men to go away and o be replaced by members of the diplomatic ser- ice; I think there might always be at least one an in each department absent if it suited every- ody's wish.

4062. I think it has been represented to us hat one objection to extending that system of nterchange would be that members of the Foreign Office would feel the extra expense which they ould have to incur if they went abroad?—But hen, if it is purely voluntary on their part, that bjection does not arise; and nobody compels hem under the present arrangement.

4063. That was given us as a reason why the ystem does not prevail more, that members of he Foreign Office would feel the extra expense, nd not so much that the Foreign Office was un- illing to let them go?—I think I have heard of ases where men were willing to go out and were ot allowed to do so.

4064. I suppose that if the Foreign Office ad- mitted, in place of their own clerks, attachés or unior secretaries, these gentlemen could not be xpected to do the same amount of work as he clerks who have been there for a great many ears, and knew all the daily routine of the ffice?—I do not see why they should not be ble to attend to the daily routine of the office, n the junior branches. Of course, exchanges re not allowed in the higher branches at all; nd in the junior branches it does not take a long ime for a man to become a useful member of the epartment.

4065. Mr. Otway.] A junior may come into he charge of a department, may he not?—It oes not happen to a man who has just joined he Foreign Office to be left in charge of a de- artment.

4066. Mr. Cameron.] Your own opinion is, that it is a system which might be carried out to a greater extent than it is at present; that it is not distasteful to the clerks in the Foreign Office, or to the members of the foreign diplo- matic service, but would be rather agreeable to them?—Certainly, that is my impression.

4067. Viscount Barrington.] Up to what grade would you have the exchange made between the Foreign Office and the Diplomatic Service?—The second secretary in the Diplomatic Service, and the third in the department of the Foreign Office, or junior clerk of the first class; that is the rule I think at present, and I do not think it could be carried further at present; junior clerks of the first class exchange with second secreta- ries.

4068. Do you think that a second secretary could be able to take charge of the business in the Foreign Office?—Certainly not at once; after he had been working some time in the office, he ought to be able to take charge of a depart- ment.

4069. On the other hand, I suppose, a man going out from the Foreign Office would be able to take charge at once of the work of the em- bassy or mission to which he went?—He would have to learn his work there in the same way.

4070. Do you think that one is not easier than the other to learn?—It entirely depends upon the amount of work there is in the embassy. Take Paris; Paris has as difficult a chancery to manage as any department in the Foreign Office; no department in the Foreign Office requires more care, more method, or closer attention to business than the direction of the chancery at Paris; St. Petersburg also now requires a good deal of attention and care.

4071. Mr. Cameron.] Have you any sugges- tions to make with regard to the leave of absence to the junior members of the service, or do you think that that is in a fair and satisfactory state?—I do not see anything unfair in it; as far as I am concerned, I am perfectly satisfied with it.

4072. Mr. F. Walpole.] Do you think it is positively necessary that a person should dedicate himself especially to the study of Japanese, in order to fit himself competently to fulfil the du- ties of his office as you have done?—He could not do the same work as I have done as trans- lator and interpreter, unless he did know the lan- guage.

4073. But could not an ordinary diplomatic employé do it in connection with his other du- ties?—I did it in connection with my other duties.

4074. Could not a man going from one place to another fulfil the duty as well, or must he de- dicate himself to it?—No man could not make himself thoroughly useful in a country like China or Japan unless he knew the language.

4075. But would special dedication to learn the language be necessary?—If you wish to learn the language you must dedicate yourself to it thoroughly; you cannot learn the language of Japan as you would French or German. Before you learn how people speak in Japan you have to learn how they think; you cannot, what is commonly called, pick up the language; there is no such thing; it is not to be done; it is a matter of close application for many hours every day.

4076. And therefore a long period?—Yes, for a long period.

4077. A superficial knowledge is of no use, I presume?—A superficial knowledge is a thing a man would be better without; superficial know- ledge is not useful; a man must learn not only the spoken but the written language to be of any use.

4078. Mr. Holms.] From your experience, would you recommend that a native or natives of China should be appointed here to give instruc- tion in the language?—No; I think it is far better that men should learn the language there.

4079. You have spoken of the block in the service, and we have heard a great deal about the block in the service. Does not that block in reality arise almost entirely from the pressure that is put upon the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs to get appointments; is not that the main reason of the block?—I do not think so. I should think the main reason was the abolition of so many posts; that revolutions and other external causes have acted upon the service.

4080. You think there is no pressure now upon the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs to obtain appointments?—I am not aware. I have not access to his private secretary's book, which contains the list of applications. I daresay he is very much pressed; perhaps he is not; I mean it is a question which cannot possibly be known to anybody but the Secretary of State himself and his private secretary.

4081. The block, you believe, arises altogether from the abolition of posts, and not from the numerous applications to the Secretary of State?—I should think that was the cause of it, and then that other posts have been filled up from the consular service, and by men not belonging to the service at all.

4082. Mr. Eastwick.] You think that it would be inexpedient to make any attempt to have Chinese and Japanese taught in this country, even if we could get natives of the country over to assist?—If you could get a certain number of natives of the country, say two of each language, and if you found one Englishman or two Englishmen, one for each language, or one for the two languages, a man of the calibre of Mr. Wade as a Chinese scholar, and a man of the calibre of Mr. Satow as a Japanese scholar, to superintend the studies, then it would be an admirable plan, because then you would be able to select men who showed capacity, and to reject others after a term of probation; but that would be a very difficult thing to carry out.

4083. Mr. F. Walpole.] There is hardly demand enough, I suppose?—There is a very small number of the student interpreters appointed each year, and the question is whether it would be worth while to adopt such a plan.

4084. Is there not a professor of Japanese at Leyden, in Holland?—Yes, Mr. Hoffmann.

4085. Is that a good school?—I am not acquainted with Mr. Hoffmann's school; but I am acquainted with his book, which is a very bad one.

4086. Mr. Eastwick.] It is the fact, is it not, that the professor of Chinese in Paris is a fine scholar; I mean M. Stanislas Julien?—He learnt entirely from books; and M. Stanislas Julien having learnt entirely from books, and not having been himself in the country, is utterly unintelligible in conversation; but he is a magnificent scholar of the written language and of books; I believe there is no man his equal in that respect.

4087. And of course a man having a knowledge of books and the character would more rapidly pick up the language?—The spoken language is a matter of ear.

4088. Would it not be the case that such a man would more rapidly pick it up?—Certainly it would be the case that a man having a great deal of knowledge in one particular direction, would have an advantage over another man who had not that knowledge.

4089. It is a matter of experience, is it not, that those who go out to India, for instance, who have studied the language here, acquire the spoken language very much more rapidly than others?—I believe that the spoken languages of India are not extremely difficult, and I have always understood that men who study in this country with a view to acquiring them are grounded in Sanscrit, which would gives them great advantage over men who have never had any study in that direction.

4090. I would like to ask you, with regard to the expense of learning the language of Japan does it cost about 80 l. a year?—Yes.

4091. What do you think would be a fair donation for Government to give to a gentleman who studies the language; do you think that in a year a man could sufficiently master the language to go on by himself?—No; a man must always keep his writer or writers; if he does any extensive business at all he must have two.

4092. Then, at least two years' expenses should be allowed, you think?—I think that a man who renders himself useful in that direction should be reimbursed the charge which he has been at and that he should be allowed to keep on his writers at the public expense. They are partly teachers, and then afterwards, when they have done teaching, they become your amanuenses.

4093. They correspond to a moonshee in India?—Yes.

4094. You think that 80 l. a-year would be a fair sum to allow in respect of the language?—Yes.

4095. May I ask you how long you were studying Chinese before you found yourself able to converse in it?—In about 18 months I was able to do any ordinary business.

4096. And how long were you studying Japanese before you could do so?—In Japanese I took about the same time.

4097. It has been stated here by a gentleman, that Japanese could be acquired in a fortnight; that is not your view?—He would be an extraordinary gentleman who acquired it in that time. It took me about a year and a half working steadily, often as much as eight or ten hours a day, before I was intelligible in Japanese, or intelligent in it.

4098. Mr. W. Cartwright.] You consider Japanese more difficult than Chinese?—Simply for this reason, that a knowledge of the higher branches of Japanese involves a knowledge of Chinese.

4099. Mr. Eastwick.] Did you study Russian when you were at St. Petersburgh?—Yes.

4100. You would say, I suppose, that you would require 18 months for that?—A man ought to do it in a year. Any European language is much easier to learn, because you have not to learn a new order of thought. If you wish to learn to speak you must learn how the people think, and if you learn the language of a Christian nation you have an enormous advantage in understanding how they think.

4101. Supposing that this Government gave a sum in consideration of the expense of learning Japanese, do you think that there should be an examination before anything was given?—No, for this reason, that the minister out there would never recommend a man to receive compensation for having been at the expense of learning a language, unless he had already shown practical proof of being able to wield his arms; he must have produced translations, he must have interpreted on serious occasions, and conducted business on his own account; then the minister might come forward; but if a minister were to recommend a man who had never sent home a translation the Foreign Office would be perfectly justified in saying, "Why give this man anything?

4102. You have taken a degree in honours at Oxford ford, have you not?—I went through the first ool of moderations.

4103. Do you see any reason why a degree in ours at a university might not be made a con- ion for admission into the diplomatic service?— rtainly, a good working knowledge of French uld be much more advisable.

4104. Of course that would be an accompani- nt?—I do not see that having taken honours Oxford is necessarily a sign of a good man; it a sign that he has worked at one time of his ; I think that many of the best men we have never took honours, although many of the st men we have got did.

4105. Their having taking honours would ely not be to their disadvantage?—That is other side of the question; of course, cæteris ribus, it would be in a man's favour.

4106. May I ask if your health suffered while t there, or did you observe that the gentlemen ployed out there suffered much in health?— ry much indeed, especially in the case of men o have served in Formosa..

4107. Would it not often be a fair thing that e term of service for pensions should be rather duced in the case of men serving in unhealthy imates?—Only fair; nothing more than fair. nd I think another thing should be noticed in ew of the climate: a man is supposed to be lowed to come home at the end of five years, d at the end of those five years he has half his ssage to Southampton paid to him, and half his ssage out again. Now the Russians behave uch more liberally to their employés out in those untries. At the end of five years' service they ive a man treble the entire cost of the journey come home; that is to say, they give him his urney home, as much again, and his journey ut again; and it appears to me that that is a ery fair reward. If a man stays five years in ose countries he is sure to have suffered more r less, and it is a great banishment.

4108. Mr. W. Cartwright.] Do the Russians o that in all cases?—I am talking now of the xtreme East.

4109. But they have no diplomatic servants in apan?—They have a consul at Hakodaté.

4110. Mr. Kinnaird.] Do you think that for ractical working in an embassy that a college ducation is not nearly as essential as a thorough nowledge of languages?—I do not think that a nowledge of languages without anything else is f much use; but I should think that a good nowledge of modern languages is of more use han that of ancient languages.

4111. Do you think that there is any advan- age afforded to a man by a college life when he nters the diplomatic service?—He probably tarts in life in debt, and has lost three years' aluable time.

4112. Mr. Rylands.] I think I understood that he student interpreters were gradually advanced through the appointments of third, second, and first assistants until they reached the position of vice consul?—The position of interpreter.

4113. Then what rank does the interpreter hold in the legation; what position does he occupy?—The interpreter, I believe, ranks with, but after, the vice consul.

4114. Is the appointment of vice consul occasionally given to the interpreter as a further advancement?—Certainly, according to the present system.

4115. Then, in fact, the line of promotion is, as I imagined, from the position of a student interpreter to that of vice consul, and possibly consul?—Yes, that is their career.

4116. And in the legation at Yeddo the business is very much of the nature of a consulate; that is to say, the head of the legation is also consul general, and superintends the whole of the consular work at Yeddo?—So it is at Pekin; the minister at Pekin does that in his capacity of superintendent of trade (that was the title given to him many years ago), and the minister at Japan, as consul general in Japan, also superintends all the consulates.

4117. Then, in point of fact, in China and Japan the two services are amalgamated in their operations?—Yes, up to a certain point they are amalgamated; that is to say, that the minister who has the ministerial duties to perform of negotiating between the two countries, also has the control and supervision of the consulates; that is added to his ministerial work.

4118. Viscount Barrington.] Our ambassador at Constantinople has the control of all consulates in the East, has he not?—Yes, that is so.

4119. Mr. Rylands.] With respect to the secretary of legation, and the second secretary; would they do any consular business, or interfere in any way with the consular department?—Not in any way, except so far as conducting the business of the legations is concerned, and doing anything that their chiefs tell them; but the consulates are supervised by the chief of the mission, and naturally we subordinates do not interfere with the action of our chiefs.

4120. I understand that the point of contact is at the top, and not in the lower ranks?—Of course it influences the work of the lower ranks, more or less.

4121. Could you tell me, for instance, in Yeddo, where there is a vice consul who acts under the envoy extraordinary and consul general, whether the vice consul has a separate office?—It is a separate office altogether; he lives at a separate place, and he corresponds, not directly with the chief, but with the branch of the consulate at Yokohama; he is subordinate to the Yokohama consulate; the legation is a legation between the two countries, and it is also a consulate general; the vice consul at Yeddo is the vice of the consul at Yokohama.

4122. And above both comes the minister plenipotentiary?—Naturally, in his capacity of consul general.

4123. In what respect do the action of the legation and the action of the consulate touch each other below the action of the head of the mission?—In respect of copying.

4124. Would you explain that further?—The consulates throughout Japan report to the minister; they report what is going on at the different open ports. These despatches come into the legation at Yeddo, and are forwarded home or not at the discretion of the minister; the minister of course approves or disapproves of the action of the consuls in any matter in which their action is brought before him; and he also suggests and sends home a recommendation for the promotion of the consular officers. In fact, he is the head of the service.

4125. In the event of any breakdown in a consulate, arising from illness or any other cause, there would be no action taken by the subordinates in the mission in order to supply the deficiency of an officer in the consulate proper?—

Mr. Mitford. 20 June 1870.

Not except at the orders of their chief, the minister; the minister might at any moment send one of the consular officers attached to the legation, to go and relieve a certain consulate which might be short-handed; but no man could of his own accord, because he heard that a consulate was in distress rush to its assistance.

4126. I should judge from your evidence, what I presume is notoriously a fact, that the conduct of the missions in the East varies considerably from that of the missions in Europe?—Certainly it does; there are very different surroundings.

4127. Have you formed any opinion as to how far it would be desirable that the eastern embassies and missions should be considered a class apart?—I am decidedly of opinion that they should not be considered a class apart.

4128. You would then be of opinion that there is no advantage in the officials of those missions looking to that especial service as their future career?—I think that there might be cases in which that would be desirable where a man showed a special disposition and a special ability for a post. Then that goes into the larger question of promoting by ability and not by mere routine.

4129. We will come to that in a moment: I was rather anxious to get to know from your practical experience, as you have seen something of European missions, and have had considerable experience in the East also, whether you thought the system in the East was so different as to justify the placing of those embassies and missions in the East as a separate class?—It appears to me not desirable to do so in a general way; on the contrary, I would rather see the higher branches in the East recruited from men in the regular diplomatic service.

4130. Although the men in the diplomatic service might, on being appointed to the East, be entirely ignorant of the languages and customs of the nations that they were brought in contact with?—Yes; because if a man is worth anything, if he is worth his salt, he will, when he goes out there, take up the line that has been approved by his country and his nation, and work for a time till he has learnt it. Take Sir Frederick Bruce. No minister ever acquired the same influence in China as Sir Frederick Bruce. He was colonial secretary, I think, at Hong Kong, but that has nothing to do with Pekin; it is as different from Pekin as Russia is from England. He went out not knowing anything of the people and the language, and no man ever acquired so much influence with the Chinese as Sir Frederick Bruce did.

4131. Perhaps it might be possible to give some reason for that; but without going into that point, and leaving out of view the case of a man of marked ability, is it seriously your opinion that there would be no disadvantage or inconvenience in recruiting the higher ranks of the service in the East, I mean not only the heads of the missions, but also the secretaries of legation, by drawing from the European missions men totally ignorant of the customs of the East, and of the Chinese and Japanese language?—Certainly I am of that opinion. I should be cutting my own throat, if I were not. I knew nothing of China and Japan when I went out there; I made it my business to learn the languages.

4132. But you went out as a junior?—And why should not a senior do the same thing?

4133. But as men get old they get less able, do they not, to take up the very difficult task that you have accomplished?—It may be more difficult for a man as he gets on in life to acquire a language; but a minister has got his interpreters there to do the speaking for him, and all he has got to do is to learn the people, and that a man may learn at any age.

4134. You have got a very remarkable knowledge of these languages, and a very considerable amount of experience, and I should like to ask you whether you think that your knowledge of these languages and the experience that you have obtained are not likely to facilitate your future career and usefulness if you remain in China and Japan?—Of course, the more you know the more useful you are; but I do not see why any other man should not make himself as useful, provided he takes the same amount of trouble.

4135. But supposing that he does not take the same amount of trouble, and supposing the system were such that in consequence of your having taken that trouble, and displayed that ability you could be appointed to a higher and more advantageous position?—I should be very much obliged to the system.

4136. You would think the system not a despicable one?—I should much prefer it, of course.

4137. I understand you to say that now notwithstanding the knowledge that you have acquired, you are in no better position?—I beg your pardon. I think I have not alluded to myself. I have only answered questions as far as they were put to me; I have not attempted to put myself forward in any way.

4138. Of course your evidence has been admirably given, but I quite understood you to say that, so far from the present system encouraging the sort of labour which you have given for the learning of these Oriental languages you have found that the system discouraged it?—I said that the system as it at present exists was a discouragement to men who attempted to learn the language, simply because it is an occasion for them to disburse so much more out of their pockets.

4139. Did I not rightly understand you to say that the routine system of promotion caused the unfairness of the block, because when a man has given himself the kind of trouble that you have given yourself, he did not get any advantage in promotion in consequence of that?—I do not think I said that of myself.

4140. I ask whether you did not say that the effect of the system was that?—I did not allude to myself. I said that the effect was that a man might work as hard as he pleased, and might see his next-door neighbour shirking and shuffling and advanced just as rapidly as he himself, who was conscious of having done good work.

4141. And you thought that that was the unfairness of the present system?—Yes. I did not allude to myself.

4142. I do not want to fasten it on yourself; I am merely asking your opinion; that is your opinion, as I gather?—I said that that was the cause, not of the block, but of the unfairness of the block.

4143. Then I ask you whether you think that if, in the missions in the East, encouragement was given to the sort of knowledge of languages and care and ability which a young man might display by such a promotion in connection with the mission s of the East as would repay him for his uble and expense, under those circumstances would not be a more efficient service in the st?—I think, certainly, if you find a man cially capable of doing the special thing, and a want that special thing done, that is the man om you naturally would be inclined to employ, l whom you ought to employ. But what I say this, that where there are not those men (beuse there are not a great many specialists in stern matters) but all are equally able, the e is different. If you have got an able man, l appoint him to go out to the East, naturally he ll learn all that it is requisite for him to learn.

4144. No doubt that must be the case as a neral rule; but the fact is, that men do differ, l that you find some men who are anxious to ke themselves useful and master a language, ile you find other men careless about it?—at you will find as well in Europe as in the st.

4145. And your policy, as I understand, would that those men who seek to make themselves eful, and do become useful, should get on? I do not separate the East from Europe. My a is, that no people in the world have such a en eye for a gentleman, a man of high breeding the Asiatics; and certainly in dealing with em I would employ men of as high breeding and rth as I could get to represent this country.

4147. So that if you have two gentlemen of qual ability, and of equal distinction in other capaties, one of whom knows the Chinese language nd the customs of the people thoroughly, it would e advisable to send that man to China rather an the other?—Yes; but I would any day ather send a man who was a thorough gentlean, and a man of distinction (and ability, of ourse), to China, without any knowledge of hinese, than I would send a man of the class to hom allusion has frequently been made in this ommittee, as to whether they would not be proer men to appoint to the diplomatic service, howver good his knowledge of Chinese might be.

4148. At all events, I may take it that your pinion is, that there should be promotion in the ervice dependent upon the capacity and upon ne knowledge of the members of the service?—ertainly.

4150. In the evidence that we had given to us y a gentleman who has held the position of econd secretary of legation, he expresses a fear and I should be glad to hear whether you concur with him), in reply to a question that I put to him on this very subject, that promotion by merit would create bad feeling: he said, "I wish it to be understood that my reason for not promoting a second secretary by merit is, that, as I consider, it would create a very bad feeling in the chanceries in the conduct of the business to have these young men attachés, and third and second secretaries, who are at work in the same room, all trying to cut each other in their daily work, each trying to distinguish himself unduly, and so on, to the detriment of his colleagues;" I gather that you would not be inclined to concur in that opinion?—I do not think that there is any reason to feel any alarm on that score.

4151. And, with regard to any question of favouritism, the promotion depending, as it would do, very much, upon the recommendation of the head of the mission, you do not consider that if it were felt, as it would be, in the service, that the promotion was on justifiable grounds, there would be any reason to fear any public expression of dissatisfaction?—No.

4152. I notice that you have mentioned that a considerable portion of the work in the missions in China and Japan arose out of the copying of bulky enclosures?—Yes.

4153. I should like to know whether you think that any saving of labour might be advantageously obtained in the missions by the use of copying presses?—No, I do not think that copying papers would answer in missions at all; because it would not be desirable very often to have an unlimited number of copies of confidential despatches lying about; of course, great care would be taken; still, there never would be the same guarantee that information of a delicate nature did not get abroad that there is now.

4154. You are aware that if the copying press was used, the number of copies would not be greater than if they were copied by hand, that is to say, there would only be the number of copies taken that might be required for the purpose of the office?—It would not be very difficult to take another copy; I am only supposing the worst.

4155. You think that there might be an unlimited number of copies taken by the copying machine?—Supposing that the copying machine happened to be in the hands of some dishonest person.

4156. Of course you are aware that the copying would be done by some one employed in the mission?—Naturally.

4157. And I presume that the copying of letters is done by somebody employed in the office?—The copying of letters is done by ourselves; I think that very often in some missions there would be a danger lest the chancery servant or somebody should get hold of a copy if a copying press were used.

4158. Your objection to these copying presses is that you think it might possibly lead to some breaking of confidence on the part of some persons employed in the mission if copying presses were used?—I object to the plan because I have known such cases happen in places where lithographing was done; in the service of a foreign country, for instance, I have known that.

4159. But in lithographing you have a large number of copies, and you take the impressions from a stone?—That stone was supposed to be in very confidential hands.

4160. Viscount Barrington.] I understand you to allude to the mission of a foreign country, not to any breach of confidence likely to arise in our own?—It is an invidious question to deal with.

20 June 1870.

4161. Mr. W. Cartwright.] Do you think that it might facilitate clandestine copies?—I have never heard of such a thing, I must confess, in our service.

4162. Mr. Rylands.] You are aware that one great reason for the block in the service which is complained of is the number of juniors in proportion to the senior appointments; that is, of course, the main origin of the block?—I suppose so.

4163. Then anything which would reduce the number of junior in proportion to the senior appointments would have a tendency to relieve the block, would it not?—I suppose so.

4164. Then do not you think that one mode of relieving what is occasioning considerable dissatisfaction in the service would be to adopt a system under which a considerable proportion of the routine work of the office might be done by clerks of a character lower rather than the attachés?—Those were the very people that I was thinking of (because I have heard this question being put before) with regard to the copying presses.

4165. You do not think that that is an advisable way of curing the block in the service, reducing the number of juniors by employing clerks who would not look to the line of promotion?—It might be a good thing; it might answer.

4166. You do not object to it?—I have no objection to it.

4168. Mr. Holms.] As regards the public interest, do you see any harm in the plan suggested?—I see that harm.

4169. Mr. Rylands.] That is to say, you think that this class of clerks would not be satisfied to be in the position under which they had taken their appointments?—I think that you would find them either gradually trying to creep upwards or getting discontented.

4170. Mr. F. Walpole.] Would the work be done as well then as it is now?—It could not be better done.

4171. Mr. Rylands.] I daresay you are aware that, in connection with the War Office, there has been a complaint amongst the clerks in the War Office of slowness of promotion, very similar to that which now obtains in the Diplomatic Service?—I have heard of it in connection with a great many public offices.

4172. And I daresay that you have heard of Lord Northbrook's Committee on the subject of the organisation of the War Department?—Yes.

4173. And that in the report of that Committee there is a recommendation of the appointment of writers of a class inferior to the clerks in the line of promotion, with a view to remedy the block in the War Office?—Yes, I have heard so.

4174. With regard to the exchanges between the Foreign Office and the Diplomatic Service, have you considered at all whether those exchanges would be facilitated by the ranks of clerks in the Foreign Office being made to correspond with the different classes of secretaries of legation?—They do now correspond up to the rank of second secretary. Supposing, for instance, that a junior clerk of the first class in the Foreign Office wishes to exchange into the Diplomatic Service, he exchanges with a second secretary, and below that rank he exchanges with a third secretary.

4175. Do you not think that there is any existing difficulty which would be removed by a more complete amalgamation of the line of promotion between the two services?—I do not think so.

4176. With regard to the exchanges, you think that it would be to the advantage of the Diplomatic Service if there were more frequent opportunities for the under secretaries of legation to exchange with clerks in the Foreign Office?—I think it is a very good thing that men in the Diplomatic Service should have an opportunity of returning to their own country now and then for something more than the two months which is their leave of absence.

4177. Do you approve of the system of under secretaries of legation being transferred very frequently from one mission to another?—Not very frequently; I do not think it is fair upon them on account of the expense that it entails, especially upon the married men.

4178. Do not you think that it will have this injurious effect, that an under secretary who has obtained pretty considerable information in connection with one mission when he goes to a new mission goes there entirely ignorant of the circumstances of the mission to which he is appointed?—But in quite the junior branches of the service, for instance, attachés and third secretaries, it is necessary that they should see a good many countries, in order to make themselves practically acquainted with the whole working of the Diplomatic Service, and foreign affairs in general.

4179. Without going to the extent of saying that they should not be transferred at all, the effect of the present frequent transfer is that by continually removing under secretaries from one place to another, you have at all times almost one of the secretaries who is not conversant with the business of the legation; is not that so?—I should hardly think that it operated injuriously.

4180. Then, in point of fact, there is no great difficulty in the work of a third secretary that needs experience?—He is gathering experience for his after life.

4181. But with regard to the peculiar experience belonging to his particular mission, the experience of a third secretary in Vienna, for instance, would not be very different from the routine work that he had to perform in Paris?—It would be the same sort of work.

4182. With regard to the chancellerie work in Paris, you said it was as difficult as the Foreign Office; you have been at Paris, I think?—I have never been attached at Paris, but I have been in the chancery there very often.

4183. Can you speak of the work of the chancery there?—From having watched it.

4184. There is a great amount of work in Paris, is there not, very much like the work in the Foreign Office, arising from the fact that the Paris embassy is looked upon almost as another foreign office, taking the supervision of the affairs of the other embassies and missions?—Not that it takes the supervision of the affairs of the other embassies and missions; but it certainly is one of the great channels of communication, and the telegraphic work there alone is enormous.

4185. Are those telegrams passing through that is to say going to Paris, and transmitted from e elsewhere, or are they principally to Paris f?—Principally telegrams addressed to Paris, ould think.

486. Then with regard to despatches, is there h copying in Paris of despatches sent under g seal?—Yes; it is frequently the case with atches sent under flying seal that the ambas- r orders copies of them.

487. And all that work, you think, is better e by the juniors in the embassy than it would y any permanent clerk?—It is very confiden- work you know.

488. And you think that that would be an ction to the appointment of a number of clerks a great part of the work in the Paris embassy? great deal might be done by anybody. Such gs as the registration of births, deaths, and riages, the transfer of lunatics between the countries, and small petty claims between ermen on our side and fishermen on the French , might be done naturally by anybody.

489. Mr. Otway.] Generally speaking, you of opinion that much of the work that comes an embassy or legation is of a confidential racter, requiring a man in whose discretion honour you can have confidence to deal with —Yes.

490. And, as a rule, copies of a despatch in a ign legation are not numerous, and therefore achine would not be applicable, the machine ng principally advantageous where the copies e to be repeated?—Yes.

491. Before asking you with reference to an, I want to refer to one or two other matters which you have been questioned. With re- d to promotion by seniority, you are aware t promotion is not absolutely by seniority?— eoretically I believe it is not, but practically nd that it is very much by seniority.

4192. Have you ever contemplated a system which a portion should be by seniority and a tion by selection, by way of obviating the idea ggested by an honourable Member, that the cretary of State might be supposed to be given favouritism in those promotions?—No.

4193. Do you think such a system would work vantageously?—It would be very difficult to rk, I think.

4194. That every alternate vacancy, for in- nce, might be filled by the selection of the cretary of State, and every other vacancy go seniority?—I do not think that it would rk.

4195. Do you think that members, looking to ur general knowledge of circumstances, might induced to retire from your rank in the pro- sion, and the block thereby be relieved by atuities being given to them?—I should say would depend entirely upon the amount of the atuity.

4197. I do not know whether you are aware at a system of retirement has been proposed sed on their principle for the non-purchase stem in the army?—Yes.

4198. Would you think that such a system as at would tend to relieve the block in the ser- ce?—It might; you might get men to go. I do not know at all whether you would, for it is very difficult to say, because we never see enough of one another to enable us to know; and it is not possible to call a council upon it and get the opinion of the majority upon the subject.

4199. Now, coming to Japan, there have been great changes in that country lately, have there not?—Immense changes.

4200. Of which you have furnished a very full and, I may say, a very interesting account. Do you think that our diplomacy has in any way affected those changes in the government of the Mikados?—Most certainly I do; I think that the moral support that the English gave to the Mikados' party constantly, almost from its very birth, was one main cause of its success.

4201. And I think there can be no doubt in your mind that those changes will be beneficial to this country, and to Europe generally?—Certainly, because in former days you had in Japan a government which was no government, a government only ruling over small patches of territory here and there, and not recognised by the nation at large, whereas now you have an intelligible government recognised by the nation at large, and this government is giving signs of its intelligence by promoting such things as railroads and telegraphs.

4202. I think it would be interesting to the Committee if, as shortly as you can, you would describe the constitutional changes that have taken place in Japan, and which you say diplomacy has assisted in bringing about?—It is rather difficult for me to do so off-hand, because it is like saying one's lesson without having prepared it. But when Lord Elgin first went to Japan, in 1858, the Dutch were the only people that had any connexion or communication whatever with the Japanese nation. They lived in a small island called Desima, where they were kept in a sort of thraldom, and where they had to do all sorts of humiliating service and obeisance to the Tycoon government for the privilege of residing there; then the Americans came to Japan, and they availed themselves of the news of the success of the British forces and French forces in China to persuade the Japanese to partially open their country to them, and held themselves out as a sort of protectorate. Lord Elgin arrived there, and found the Tycoon's government at Yeddo, and he wished to conclude his treaty; the Tycoon's ministers replied that they could not conclude the treaty without reference to Kioto, which was the capital of the Mikado; it was believed that this was a mere subterfuge, a piece of Asiatic diplomacy, and the excuse was not listened to, and we made a treaty with the Tycoon as Emperor of Japan; but the Tycoon was no more Emperor of Japan than any member of this Committee was; he was the Maire du Palais of the Roi Fainéant; the office was created at the end of the 12th century, and from that time forth the Mikado had been entirely a sleeping monarch; he had remained in his old capital, occupied exclusively with ecclesiastical affairs and certain functions of State; and the Tycoon had carried on every thing; but there was a very large class of daimios, powerful nobles, some of whom were of higher personal rank than the tycoons themselves, who viewed the power of the tycoons with great jealousy, and had done so for a great number of years; people have not taken into consideration in this country how long the discontent had been brewing; these nobles saw in our advent an opportunity of upsetting the Tycoon's Government, and of reinstating the Mikado in the power of his ancestors; and when the Tycoon made treaties with us, and confined foreigners to certain ports under his own jurisdiction, this was made a great grievance by the nobles, who said that he wished to monopolise the advantages of foreign trade. That was a nucleus of the confederation against the Tycoon. A few years after we were established in the open ports there began great troubles at Yeddo, the British Legation was attacked, the prime minister of the Tycoon was murdered on his way home from the castle, the secretary of the American legation was murdered, an Englishman was murdered on the road between Yokohama and Yeddo and two others severely wounded. There were constant threats against foreigners; several foreigners were murdered; the site which had been set aside for the foreign legations at Yeddo, and which had been partially built, was devastated by fire; and the whole of this was an attempt to embroil the Tycoon and get him into trouble with foreigners, in order that the daimios might put him down. To cut a long story short, in the month of January 1868 things had reached their climax. We went down to open the ports of Osaka and Hiogo, and it was there that the civil war burst out. The Tycoon was driven out of Kioto; his great supporter, who had the guardianship of the Palace of the Mikado, was turned out with him, and there were three days of hard fighting between the two cities of Osaka and Kioto, which resulted in the complete victory of the confederate daimios against the Tycoon. The Tycoon retired to Yeddo, and was invited to disembowel himself, which he refused to do. He had already been deprived of his offices by an edict, but his territories were confiscated, and a younger member of the family was nominated to take the chief position in the family, and the Mikado announced his willingness to observe all the treaties which had been made with foreigners. An intelligible government was formed; certain of the principal daimios were named to the principal offices, and they were joined in this by the old nobles of the Mikado's court, some of whom have turned out to be men of remarkable ability and culture; men of whom we knew nothing at all before, but men of great rank and influence, although very poor. These were men of the most ancient lineage and family, whose ancestors had been shut up in Kioto with their master, the Mikado, for centuries.

4203. Mr. W. Cartwright.] Do you mean that they were nobles of the 12th century?—Some of them are of Imperial descent, and most of the families date from several centuries before our era.

4204. They were the class of nobles who were in power at that time?—Yes; they have always had a sort of undercurrent of power; when the Tycoon said that he had no power to make treaties with foreigners without reference to Kioto he was telling the truth, though we thought that he was using a subterfuge. Then the Mikado took possession of Yeddo, which had hitherto been the capital of the Tycoons, and which certainly is the most desirable capital for the whole of the Island of Japan, settled himself there, and called a council of the daimios around him; the daimios answered to his call, and of their own free will and accord, four of them inaugurati the movement, gave up the whole of their ter tories, revenues, and men to the Mikado, so to produce an united Japan, throughout wh there should be one law, that of the Mik reigning supreme; I suppose it was one of most remarkable movements in modern histo These daimios were quasi independent prin with the power of life and death; kings, and m than kings in their own provinces; they h surrendered this all up to the Mikado and m him supreme; then a parliament was formed sort of House of Commons, composed of the tainers of these men, one man from every (that would be about 276 men), and they ha been engaged in debating various questions, s relating to foreign commerce, others relating internal questions; one was as to mixed partn ships between foreigners and Japanese; howev this parliament is not supposed to have a weight in the state, it is merely a means of asc taining the opinions of men; the government not profess to be bound by it. So that in fact the present moment the change is from a feu system, of which the Tycoon was the type, t constitutional monarchy, which is in the cou of formation.

4205. Mr. Otway.] All these changes, y have no hesitation in saying, are beneficial n only to Japan but to those other nations th have intercourse with Japan?—Yes.

4206. And European diplomacy has been i strumental in bringing about this result?—It h been intrumental in an entirely subordin manner, in a negative manner.

4207. But diplomacy has supported the Mika in the changes which have been so beneficial? Yes.

4209. In one of these debates that I have re it is debated whether the government shou tolerate, or discourage, or promote the introd tion of foreigners; that must be a question wh the government would have to take action upo would it not, if influential men declared, by large majority, against tolerating foreigners?- Certainly; in fact there were a certain numb of questions proposed to the house for them answer.

4210. The parliament is not without influen on the government then, is it?—It has a s of indirect influence on the government, n turally; still, it is merely supposed to be a mea of ascertaining the minds of men.

4211. You have mentioned the expense of e tertaining that fell upon yourself and yo colleagues; was that in consequence of gentl men coming to Japan with letters of introducti to you personally, or was it entertaining gentl men who were living there?—It was cause occasionally, by persons coming with letters introduction to us personally; when such perso came, we, in our position, could not avoid ente taining them; and also, as I told the Committ before, we had to receive Japanese men of ran such as the foreign minister and others, who, fr ne to time, would rather look to come and dine h us, and talk over matters in that way.

4212. Why should that devolve on you?—Be- use they used to come, and we could not send em away.

4213. But Japan would not differ from other es in that respect, would it?—Yes, because re you have a house mounted, and you have ur cook in the house, and it is the custom in e East when a man comes to your house that he ould break bread there.

4214. How do the other foreign legations act regard to entertaining?—The other foreign gations reside principally at Yokohama, never e the Japanese at all, but live entirely amongst emselves, and play a very secondary part in the untry.

4215. Do the French ever entertain in that ay?—They hardly ever come to Yeddo.

4216. Do the United States representatives? Very little.

4217. Chairman.] Is there a large commercial body established now at Yokohama?—A very large body, and also at Yeddo, Hiogo, Osaka, Nagasaki, Niigata, and Hakodaté.

4218. And are there English merchants in those places?—Yes, a large number.

4219. Do any large proportion of them possess a knowledge of Japanese?—Only the pidgin Japanese; just enough to enable them to converse with their servants, and give an order.

4220. Would it be a great advantage to them in their business if they had a familiarity with the language?—They most of them regret now that when they first went there they did not acquire it.

4221. I was going to ask whether your own knowledge of Japanese could be turned to account in that part of the world, if you directed your abilities in that line of life?—I have had two or three offers made me.

Sir Henry Drummond Wolff, K.C.M.G., called in; and Examined.

Sir H. D. Wolff. K.C.M.G.

4222. Mr. Rylands.] I think that you were rmerly in the Foreign Office?—I was 12 years the Foreign Office, and twice during that time was sent abroad. I was then assistant private cretary to Lord Malmesbury, and afterwards Lord Lytton, in the Colonial Office I was ter appointed secretary in the Ionian Islands, here a portion of my duty was corresponding ith Her Majesty's diplomatic and consular re- esentatives in the Levant. On one occasion I as sent home to confer with the Foreign Office to consular jurisdiction in the Levant.

4223. Your attention has generally been di- ected to the arrangements in the Foreign Office nd the diplomatic service, with a view to increased fficiency and economy?—Yes.

4224. Have you formed any opinion as to how ar diplomacy should be considered an exclusive rofession?—I think that it must be considered exclusive profession up to a certain point. I o not see how you can get men of sufficient alibre and education to go abroad, unless you old out some hopes of promotion to them.

4226. From your experience of missions abroad, re you of opinion that any steps should be taken y means of which there would be a diminution f the number of juniors in proportion to the ccupants of the higher offices in the profession? —In my opinion, the whole system might be im- roved by a general revision. I am not speaking t all of the personnel of the Diplomatic or onsular Service; because I think that in- ividually our diplomatists are the best men; ney are superior to the diplomatic servants f any other country. At the same time I think that you might improve their position generally, and render the service more efficient by a general amalgation of all branches of the service, the Foreign Office, the Consular Service, and the Diplomatic Service, by establishing equivalent ranks, as I believe that they are called in the Army, in each one of these branches of the service; and then you might appoint second secretaries to first-rate consulates, and make it a sine quâ non that a second secretary should go through a first-rate consulate before he was made a first secretary. By that means you would, in the first place, improve the position of the second secretary. You have men now almost eating their hearts out at 300 l. or 400 l. a-year, at the age of 27 or 28; whereas if they got these consulates they might get 700 l., or 800 l., or 1000 l. a year, which would be an adequate provision for them while they would also be learning a great deal of the routine of commerce, which is now the principal element in the business of a diplomatic establishment.

4227. Then, in fact, you think that the amalgamation of the services would be twofold in its advantages; one being that it would give a better range of promotion, and the other that it would increase the information and efficiency of the officers employed in the service?—Yes.

4228. In your judgment, from the experience you have had of the Foreign Office, do you believe that the fact that there is not such an amalgamation as you suggest does interfere with the exchanges between the Foreign Office and the Diplomatic Service, which many persons recommend?—I think that in every way such amalgamation would be advantageous. The present system gives rise to a great many anomalies. There are one or two posts which really require a diplomatist and politician, but which are reserved for the consular service, simply because they are called consular posts. For instance, the consul general at Bucharest, the consul general at Tunis, and the consul general in Egypt, are practically ministers. They are not consuls in the generally accepted sense of the word "consuls." They are diplomatists; but because these happen to be consular appointments, they are given to men who are consuls, and these men come to these posts as the height of their career, and are unable to aspire to anything higher, because they are consuls. A great many posts besides those I have mentioned are now held by consuls which might be held by diplomatists. Nearly all the consulates in the Levant are really political posts, and other countries, such as France and Russia, appoint men to those posts whose calibre is that of a diplomatist. For instance, M. Tissot, now the first secretary here, was appointed consul general at Janina when I was at Corfu. That is a political post, so that it is rather an anomaly to send a consul out there to act as a politician with no hope of promotion, except perhaps to a commercial consulate.

4229. A fear has been expressed lest if there were any such amalgamation, consuls in small places abroad might think it necessary to interfere in political matters; have you any such apprehension?—I do not see how that could be. In the East they must interfere in political matters, because everything is more or less a political question; but I do not see how a man who was consul at Marseilles could find out anything political that he could do there to the prejudice of the service. I do not see any mercantile port where he could find much room for politics.

4230. In a mercantile port, if a consul were to see any movement of armed vessels, that he would think of political importance, it would be his duty to communicate that, I presume?—Yes.

4231. So that, in fact, there is a certain amount of political business to which they attend now?—Yes; and the consul is bound to report to the ambassador or minister now, anything in the shape of a political movement; still reporting is one thing and action is another.

4232. You think it quite absurd to imagine that a consul engaged in attending to commercial questions could assume any political influence?—It appears to me impossible that he should do any harm in that way, at all events very unlikely.

4233. Taking the head of the services, I think you will agree with me, that the fact is that now there is much greater attention paid to commercial matters in connection with our Foreign Office and diplomatic system than was formerly the case?—Enormously. In fact, in some capitals the great duty of the missions, so far as I have seen, has been in connection with commercial matters and railroads. Concessions of different kinds are always being obtained in different capitals, and the diplomatic establishment then has to occupy itself with these to assist British subjects, and protect their interests in every kind of way. Therefore a knowledge of the routine of commercial matters, such as would be attained by a man who had passed some time at a commercial port, would be of unspeakable advantage to him in his career.

4234. In the negotiations between this country and countries abroad, is it not impossible almost to draw a distinct line of demarcation between the political questions and mercantile and commercial questions?—I think commercial questions very often attain a political character. I do not say that political questions are always commercial ones.

4235. They often run one into the other?—They often do run into each other.

4236. And in fact now, in the negotiation of questions abroad, commercial questions continually come up before our diplomatic representatives?—Continually.

4237. When you were in the Foreign Office, and acting as private secretary to the Foreign Secretary, did it ever come under your notice that at that time there were complaints made by commercial bodies in this country that sufficient attention was not paid to commercial matters by the Foreign Office?—No, I do not recollect it at all.

4238. Are you not aware that there were complaints of that kind a few years ago?—After I left the Foreign Office there was a movement by which a commercial department was established in the Foreign Office, but that was since my time; and I believe that that has worked very satisfactorily, from everything that I hear.

4239. In your judgment, I take it, you would expect that a commercial department being established in the Foreign Office would tend very much to the work of the department being satisfactorily done in relation to commercial questions?—Certainly.

4240. And that your way of more completely amalgamating the services would still further promote the satisfactory working of the department in relation to foreign questions of trade?—I think so.

4242. With a view of giving advantages to all alike?—To all alike hereafter. I think at the present moment you might have a great difficulty in putting existing consuls into the diplomatic service, because their whole groove of life has been different; but hereafter I should let every man who goes into the diplomatic service, or serves the Secretary of State, know that he was to go through every branch of the service, the consular the home administration, and the diplomatic service.

4243. And although you think, in the first instance, that it might tend to the advantage of members of the diplomatic profession, in which there is now a block, yet your expectation would be that, in the long run, it would so amalgamate the different branches as to be equally advantageous to all?—Yes.

4244. And in the filling of the position of vice consul or consul in the service, any man of remarkable ability you would consider in consequence of his conduct, would place himself in a position in which he would be likely to obtain promotion?—I should make it indiscriminate; I should not say that this man was to enter as a consul, and he might hope for promotion in the diplomatic service. I should say that a man going into the service was a member of the service, and, whether a consul or attaché, was to be entitled to the same species of promotion.

4245. You would make it one army, but have three divisions of it, the Foreign Office, the diplomatic department, and the consular service?—Yes.

4246. Mr. W. Cartwright.] There are in the diplomatic service, consuls that have been drafted into it, are there not?—Yes; but it is a jump on every occasion. I should make it the rule where it is now the exception.

4247. Mr. R. Shaw.] If I rightly understand you, according to your scheme, you might insi nyone of these gentlemen, being an attaché, e to be sent to Paris or Vienna, or elsewhere? rtainly.

48. Mr. Rylands.] That is to say, when were introduced into the service, it would nd entirely on the directions of the head of department in what particular department of same grade they served?—Yes.

49. It might be the grade in the Foreign e, or the grade in the consular service, or grade in the diplomatic service?—Yes, and might be promoted or exchanged from one the other.

50. In reference to the present system, has attention ever been directed to the fact, that unior members of the service are frequently sferred from one post to another, and from part of the world to another?—Yes.

51. Have you ever seen any reason to ider that that frequent transference was ctionable?—No; I think it is good. I think a very bad thing for any diplomatist of any to remain too long at one post.

52. In saying "too long," would you con- r that to remain there only two years was too t a time?—I think it does not make much rence for a junior. I should say the more n he was transferred the better for him. It s him general knowledge of the relations of country abroad, and better than he could rwise obtain. I think that it would be a good thing in the upper classes for them to ain longer, but not too long. For instance, idea is, that the ambassador at Paris should ays change with the Government, and that er ambassadors should get their appointments not more than six years at a time, like govern- of colonies. They might be sent to another t, but they should not remain in one place too g a time; I think that if they do they get too h acclimatised and naturalised. As from ir position, they do not hope for promotion. e tendency of keeping ambassadors in one ce too long, is to make them consider them- es members of the society of the place where y are rather than the representatives of their n country. I am not referring to any par- ular person, but there is one peculiar instance that, which does not belong to this country, l which I may mention. When Baron Bunsen, cing the Crimean War, was taken away from ndon, the only reason assigned by the Prus- n Government for removing him was, that he l been so long away from his own country that was too much imbued with English views tead of the views of his own Government.

4253. You were proposing, I think, that the bassadors should change with the different vernments, but that the ministers should not? I should make a good deal of difference between ambassador at Paris and the ambassadors at e other four courts, because I look at the am- ssador at Paris as being as different from other bassadors as the Lord Chancellor is different m other judges, or as the Lord Lieutenant of eland is different from the governors of colo- es. I think that he ought to change with ery Government; I think that then he would ve a great deal of influence in France, and uld be, as the French say, solidaire with the overnment of the day. You might find some fficulty in doing that with the courts of Vienna d St. Petersburg, and Berlin; but then I ould limit the duration of the ambassadorial tenure to six years. I think that you might make some alteration of my rule at Constantinople, because Constantinople is a very exceptional place, and there, I think, an ambassador gains by being kept a long time. The great influence which Lord Stratford exercised there was owing to the fact that, besides his great ability, he did not change for a long time, and that the Turks felt that the Turkish ministries might change, but he never left.

4254. Does not that difference arise from the fact that Eastern diplomacy is a very different thing from diplomacy in Europe?—I think that it is very different with regard to its effect upon the people, but if you wish an opinion to the effect that Western diplomatists should not be made use of in the East, I should not go all the way with you there.

4255. I was not leading to that, but I want to know whether the action of an ambassador at the Porte, for instance, is not a very different thing from the action of an ambassador in an European court; his personal influence with the sovereign in Turkey becomes a matter of immense importance, and that personal influence will naturally be increased by the permanent residence of a man of great ability; that is what you are pointing to?—Yes, and also we must remember the enormous national jealousies that there are at Constantinople; there is a French, a Russian party, and an English party; and if the English party is presided over by an ambassador kept there a long time, and known to have the confidence of the successive administrations in England, I think that is for the advantage of the public service.

4256. Do not you think that, as a general rule, if ambassadors were men of great public mark, men who had gone through a great career at home, they would be likely to carry with them a much greater prestige than a man who might simply have risen, through the different ranks of diplomacy, from an attaché to an ambassador?—I think that the Secretary of State ought always to have the absolute power of appointing any person of that kind to an embassy without its being a grievance to the service. For instance, I think that the appointment of Mr. Layard the other day to Madrid was a very proper appointment, from the point of view of the present Government. I do not know whether it would be right for Mr. Layard to remain there, supposing this Government to leave office; but I think that appointments of that kind are advantageous if they are not made too frequently, and if they are done for the public service.

4257. I understand your scheme for the highest post in the service to be this: you recommend, that in regard to the ambassadors they should all be appointed at the will of the minister of the day, from outsiders, if he should so think fit?—I think so.

4258. That with regard to ministers plenipotentiary, that should be the recognised reward of men of the diplomatic profession?—Yes.

4259. And further that the ambassador at Paris should change with every change of Government at home, so as to be in perfect political accord with the Government here?—Yes.

4260. And that with regard to the ambassadors and ministers in other courts, except Constantinople, their tenure of service should be limited to some definite time?—I should say that that limit should only apply to ambassadors, because so long as a man was minister, and eligible to be an ambassador, I think that he would be more active than an ambassador who had reached the culminating point of his career, and hoped to remain at his place a long time. I should not fix the limit for ministers, but only for ambassadors.

Sir H. D. Wolff, K.C.M.G.

20 June 1870.

4261. You would not consider that the fact that a man had arrived at the point of minister from the lowest rank of the diplomatic service, was any reason why he should not be appointed to an embassy by the Secretary of State if he seemed a suitable man to be so appointed?—No.

4262. That you would say that the Secreta of State should have the power of appointm as to the embassies, and should appoint men mark?—I think that a professional diplomat ought to have the preference so long as th really was no man of great mark to take embassy.

4263. You would not be able to tell exac the views that might influence the Foreign S cretary; he might have reasons for appointi an outsider to an embassy if he were a man great public ability and under your rule, would not be called upon to give his reasons doing so I presume?—No.

Mr. Robert Burnet David Morier, c.b., called in; and Examined.

Mr. Morier, C.B.

23 June 1870.

4264. Chairman.] You are a Secretary of gation in the Diplomatic Service?—Yes.

4265. And your post is at Darmstadt?—s.

4266. Will you be good enough to inform the mmittee how the other European countries represented at Darmstadt?—There are ench, Austrian, Prussian, Russian, and Bavan missions. All the heads of these missions, are voys extraordinary and ministers plenipotenry, with the exception of the Frenchman, who minister plenipotentiary, and the present Rusn, who is minister resident; till lately, the ussian was also envoy extraordinary.

4267. These missions have the ordinary staff a minister plenipotentiary, I presume?—Yes, ey have got secretaries. There is a French cretary, and a French chancelier, and a French ıaché. The others have only secretaries.

4268. Your diplomatic position and rank is erefore not equal to that of those others to nom you have just alluded?—Certainly not. am secretary of legation in the British diplotic service, but my recognised position there that of a chargé d'affaires. I am admitted and nsidered in the light of a chargé d'affaires.

4269. And, to use the phrase of a diplomatist milarly situated with yourself, you are, I think, our own staff?—I am my own staff.

4270. I presume, from these foreign legations eing on that footing, that it is considered by ıe countries whom they represent, that it is adisable to maintain at Darmstadt a diplomatic epresentation of that character?—Well, the naller the state the more it holds, naturally, to s international status, as evidenced by the preence of a diplomatic service.

4271. My question was directed more to the pinion of the states of France, Austria, Russia, nd Prussia; they consider it desirable to maiin a representation of that character there?—hey consider it desirable. You must remember, as regards Russia, that the Empress of Russia is sister to the Grand Duke. The French, n the other hand, consider all these small nissions in Germany of very great importance; nd necessarily Austria and Prussia would have he same feeling with regard to a state which is alf in and half out of the North German Confederation.

4272. The peculiar position of Darmstadt, to which you just alluded, renders it desirable in your opinion, does it not, that this country should also, as wishing to be informed of political events in Germany, have a representative there?—That depends upon the view which is taken of the diplomatic service. If it is considered important that Her Majesty's Government should have correct information and full data upon which to come to a judgment upon the events that are taking place in Europe, and in the case of Germany to be enabled to estimate accurately the political development there going on, a state so exceptionally situated as Darmstadt, which is half in the North German Confederation and half out of it, is peculiarly fitted for noting the facts leading to the future reconstruction of Germany, which is admitted by all to be at present in a provisional state. If the functions of diplomacy are purely those of treating matters which immediately concern Great Britain, I cannot say that the post of Darmstadt is one of importance. It certainly is one of importance as regards watching the events which are going on in connection with the reconstruction of Germany, and as such I believe it is a post from which good information can be obtained.

4273. What is your salary at Darmstadt?—£. 700 a year.

4276. There is a notion on the part of some gentlemen that Darmstadt is a place where a diplomatist would find it very difficult to employ his time; will you give us an idea, from your own experience, by stating the work that may have devolved on you to do; how you have employed your time while you have been there?—I have no doubt the Committee is aware that of late years information of a very varied kind has been asked for, I believe principally by Members of the House of Commons. During the three years that I have been employed at Darmstadt, I have had to draw up a report upon the co-operative institutions of Germany, and a second report upon land tenure; and I have at this moment received instructions to write a report upon the industrial status of the working classes in what is a great manufacturing centre of Germany. This work is quite independent of the work of reporting upon political subjects, and the work connected with British subjects, which is exceedingly variable; sometimes there is a great deal of it, and sometimes there is very little. Every one of these reports has imposed upon me hard labour for a considerable number of months. The report which I have to make now, and which I am desired to have ready by the 1st of December, will probably take up some five or six hours of my time daily, from the time that I return to Darmstadt till that date, if I am to do the work as it ought to be done, for it is but natural that a fuller and a more business-like report should be required from a post in which there is comparatively little to do, than from a post where the secretary of legation has a great deal to do; I know that with regard to my report upon land tenure, it gave me three or four months of the very hardest work that I ever had in my life.

4277. Your report referred only to the land tenure in the Grand Duchy, I suppose?—It referred to the land tenure in the Grand Duchy of Hesse, but as the Grand Duchy of Hesse is made up of a number of different portions of Germany, each with a different political and social history of its own, it was necessary, in order to understand the A.B.C. of the subject, to go through the whole question of mediæval tenures, and the laws affecting land throughout Germany; it was quite impossible to get to the slightest idea of it without doing that.

4278. You have, I think, made the affairs of Germany for a long time your study?—My whole career has been spent in Germany; I have been 17 years in Germany.

4279. There has been much inquiry here as to the cause of what is termed the block in the diplomatic service; will you give us the advantage of your opinions on the cause of that block, and any suggestions that may occur to you by which promotion may be augmented, or the impediment to promotion removed?—My own impression of the block is, that it is the result of the alterations made in the diplomatic service consequent upon the recommendations of the Committee which sat in 1861. Certainly up to that time the diplomatic service was not considered absolutely as a profession. Men entered it as unpaid attachés with a very vague sort of prospect, and they did not become covenanted servants of the State, they did not acquire a distinct claim upon the State, until they obtained their commissions as secretaries. Undoubtedly, at that time, though the advancement by seniority had been gradually creeping into the service, it was not by any means recognised as the law or the rule of the service. Men were promoted then very much more according to merit than they are at present, consequently, though many individuals under the old system might have had reason to groan at their want of promotion, that feeling was not general in the whole service as it is at present; because though there might be some individuals who remained a long time without getting promotion, there were others who comparatively soon got to the higher posts. Now, undoubtedly the block is partly caused by the number of missions that have been superseded and done away with; but this universal feeling, this feeling of absolute, total, and complete hopelessness, which every junior member of the service has, did not in those days exist, and therefore I think that, in considering the causes of the block, we must look to this radical change more or less imposed by the recommendations of the Committee of 1861 as the principal cause.

4280. Are you able to suggest any mode by which, setting aside for the moment the consideration of those recommendations of the Committee, that block can be diminished or removed?—There are two ways of looking at the thing. There is the complete reconstruction of the diplomatic service upon a different basis; and there are the momentary palliatives which might be used. There are many different ways by which you can remove the momentary block. You can bribe a certain number of men out of the service; you can give them openings elsewhere; but the desideratum is to retain the good men, and to get rid of the bad men; and that is a very difficult thing to do.

4281. Do you think that a system of gratuity based on the calculation of the salary received by the junior members of the diplomatic service would induce many members to leave it?—The objection to that seems to me, that it might induce the good men to go and keep the bad men in. A man who obtains a gratuity and has got a status in the service is a man very likely to get employment elsewhere.

4282. But that objection would cease if the Secretary of State exercised his discretion in offering such a gratuity to individuals, would it not?—Yes, perfectly. Then you come back to what I believe to be the only possible system in so small a service as the diplomatic that is promotion wholly, solely, and entirely by the fitness of the man for the place.

4283. You would not attach any importance to the impression that might prevail of the action of political pressure on and favouritism on the part of the Secretary of State?—Absolutely none; I look upon that as being as completely dead and gone as rotten boroughs.

4284. Mr. F. Walpole.] But they are not all gone?—As dead and gone as those that are gone. I have had a good many opportunities of watching the action of the Foreign Office during the last 17 years, and I do not believe that any Foreign Secretary of State would at the present day act upon any other motive than that of the good of the public service; that is my full, complete, and entire conviction.

4285. Chairman.] Supposing that you had a Secretary of State so lost to the sense of the responsibility of his position as to promote men from mere favouritism, would there not be a very tremendous check upon that in the knowledge that is possessed by men in the Foreign Office, and by those in the diplomatic profession of the merits of each man?—If the House of Commons should stand having a minister so completely lost to all sense of public duty, they are responsible for it. I cannot see any way in which a service like the diplomatic can be worked, except by heaping up responsibility upon the shoulders of your Foreign Secretary. The moment that you make him completely responsible, as a mere matter of self preservation, he must look out for the best men. He cannot bear all the weigh ight upon his back unless he has good men ler him to help him. It is the condition of all d service to make a man responsible for his rk, to break his neck if he does not do it well;

l if he does do it well, to let him have all honour.
1286. Does it appear to you that, to a certain tent, the Secretary of State becomes absolved m his responsibility if he has to follow a utine of seniority?—Completely and entirely;
l that is why I believe that all these well-ant reforms are in the wrong direction. I do t pretend to know anything about any other vice than my own; but where you have got establishment consisting of, as far as I know, y 122 individuals, it does not seem to me to be ing too much to require that the man who has t to work this complicated machine should know e merits of those 122 servants whom he has der him.

4287. Is it conceivable that, with the oppornities enjoyed by those in the Foreign Office knowing the work and capacity of almost ery individual in the diplomatic service who rresponds with the Foreign Office, they should t be able to form a very generally correct timate of the capacity of most of its members?
I am perfectly convinced that the Foreign ffice knows the value of every one of us.

4288. I presume that at Darmstadt, if the odest English representation which already ists there, which I understand costs the country 0*l.* a year, were withdrawn, irrespective al-gether of the gentleman who might be chargé affaires or might fill the position that you fill ere, it would be felt by the Grand Ducal ourt as a slur upon their position?—Certainly; would be considered a very marked act of disurtesy, and under the peculiar circumstances the family relations between the two courts it ould be difficult to make them exactly under-and why it was done.

4289. There are, I think, also several English sidents, and a great many travellers passing rough?—I think that there are about 80 or 90
nglish residents at Darmstadt, at least the conregation consists of about 80 heads; there may e many more, but, if I remember right, 80 is out the official list of the congregation.

4290. They recur to the advice of the English epresentative every now and then, do they not, nd seek his assistance?—I cannot say that the tual residents in Darmstadt do; I have had a w cases there of people coming who were aving troops quartered upon them, and things
f that sort; but I am constantly having persons assing through and persons belonging to the wer orders, workmen, and persons of that sort, oming for advice; because, since the change at rankfort, Darmstadt is the only diplomatic entre in that part of the world.

4291. Where is the nearest diplomatic repre-ntative to you?—Stuttgardt would be the earest point.

4292. Mr. W. Cartwright.] Is there any reresentative at Frankfort?—There is a consul at rankfort.

4293. Chairman.] He is unpaid?—Yes, un-aid; it costs him, I believe, some 200*l.* or 300*l.*
year.

4294. Mr. W. Cartwright.] It is an honorary osition, I suppose?—He has very hard work.

4295. Mr. Rylands.] What becomes of the es; he receives them, I suppose?—Yes, he eceives the fees, but they do not cover anything like his expenditure; I believe that they cover his stationery. I have entered into an arrangement with him so far, that whenever he is away I take all his notarial work; and people then come from Frankfort to Darmstadt, and there is a good deal in the way of affidavits, and so on, to attend to; and when I am away he takes my work.

Mr. Morier, C.B.

4296. Chairman.] The cost of living at Darmstadt has very much increased of late years, has it not?—Very much; I find that there are one or two items that are cheaper, but the items of everyday life, food, provisions, servants' wages, fuel and the like, I find are quite the same at Berlin, Vienna, and Darmstadt; carriage hire and house rent are cheaper; those are the only two items that are cheaper.

4297. Viscount Barrington.] The cost of provisions is the same as at the other places you have mentioned?—The cost of provisions is, I find, curiously equal in almost every part of Europe. I mean that taking the cost of provisions per head for a certain number of weeks, I found that it came within a few pounds to the same in Vienna, Berlin, and Darmstadt. This complete equality is curious as an economical fact.

4298. You allude to places that are centres in Europe, of course?—Yes.

4299. Chairman.] You were sent, I think, to assist in negotiating the commercial treaty with Austria?—I was named on the International Enquête Commission in the spring of 1865. When that commission came to an untimely end, I was sent, in conjunction with Mr. Mallet, now Sir Louis Mallet, to assist Lord Bloomfield in the negotiation of the treaty which was signed in December 1865; and I was then named commissioner under the treaty for the construction of an Austrian tariff, and I attended that commission in 1866, in 1867, and in 1868.

4300. Part of the time you filled the post that you now occupy?—Part of the time I was second secretary at Berlin, and part of the time I was what I am now at Darmstadt.

4301. How long were you absent from Darmstadt?—In 1866, I think, I must have been absent about three months, and in 1867, I was absent most of the summer. Without referring I could not tell you exactly how long I was absent.

4302. Still it was a little more than the usual period that is granted to a member of the diplomatic body for his leave of absence?—Very much.

4303. During each year?—Certainly, both in 1865, and in 1866, and in 1867.

4304. But I thought I understood you to say that you were three months absent in 1865?—In 1865 I was absent more than that; but in 1865 I was still second secretary at Berlin, and part of the time I was secretary of legation at Athens.

4305. The treaty, ratifications of which were exchanged a few months ago when Parliament met, is based on that convention, is it not?—That was the treaty that was concluded in 1868, but which was not put in force by the Austrian Government, because other difficulties arose. The treaty of 1865 instituted an international commission, which was to draw up a tariff, and on the elaboration of this tariff we were occupied during 1866, 1867, and 1868, and then difficulties came in with regard to the execution of the treaty,

4306. Viscount Barrington.] Did I rightly understand that the principal suggestion that you had for relieving the block in the service, was giving a gratuity to certain members to induce them to leave it?—I did not wish to suggest any specific means because I do not pretend to see my way to this object. I suppose you must do something if you want to get people out of a service who have entered it upon a distinct pledge; because that was, I think, the harm which was done in 1861, that a number of men by the prospect of a certain, though small salary at the end of a definite time, were induced to enter into a profession in which they believed they would rise by seniority. All these men have a distinct belief that they stand vis-à-vis, of the State in the position of having a contract, that a contract has been entered into with them. That, I think, is the mischief that that has had done. Of course, a man that has got a good contract sticks to his contract, and how you are to get them out I do not pretend to have the least idea. What I fear is, that any system of the sort proposed will get the good men out, and leave the bad men in.

4307. Have you ever considered the possibility of amalgamating the diplomatic and consular services in any kind of way?—You mean so as to increase the general amount of salaried places. My feeling about the amalgamation of those two services is this: I believe that there are a certain number of appointments which have the name of consular, but which are really political appointments; and there are a great many other appointments which are purely and entirely mercantile. I have a strong feeling that the appointments which are in their nature political, should be amalgamated wholly with the diplomatic service, that is to say, that no man should have an appointment of that sort who had not had the training which can only be obtained in diplomacy. As far as that goes, I should be entirely for amalgamating the political consulships with the diplomatic service. I feel very strongly upon that subject, because I think that it is a mistake to reward a man for, however good service in one line, by giving him a post in another line which he is totally unacquainted with. I would not reward a lieutenant of artillery by making him post captain in the navy; they are two distinct things.

4308. Would you mention the consular posts which you allude to?—There is Bucharest; that of course is a political post. Egypt again, Warsaw, and Tunis. I mean simply that every post which is in its nature a political post, should be filled by a political agent, and by a political agent should be a man who has had his training in the diplomatic service.

4309. And do you think that would cause any very great jealousy on the part of the present occupants of consular posts?—I do not know; I daresay it would. But I think that the public service is the thing to be looked at; I think that we ought all of us to go into the service with the view that we shall be used where we are most wanted, and that we shall not be used where we are not wanted. It seems to me that the public service ought to be the criterion for all questions of that kind.

4310. What is your opinion with regard to the changes that ought to take place in diplomatic posts. Beginning with the juniors, it was recommended by the Committee of 1861 that juniors should not remain more than two years at a post; would that meet your views?—I am afraid that I should not agree with that; I mean that I should disagree with anything like any very absolute rule. I think that the international knowledge required for diplomatic purposes is so different in kind and degree that it is impossible to apply a rule. I think it important that we should have a certain number of men in the service who have a thorough, complete, and entire knowledge of the different countries in Europe. Now, two years will give that knowledge about some countries, or even less than that will do it; with regard to others, two years is just enough to give a man the A.B.C. Take Russia; do you suppose that a man in two years can have a real knowledge of Russia? I do not know the actual working of the system; I know nothing of what has been done by the Foreign Office, but I should very much doubt whether they had kept to a very strict rule. What I have found occasionally has been, that when a man was just getting to know his work, and to be exceedingly useful, he was removed. I have been in charge of two first-class chanceries, and it certainly has happened to me, on more than one occasion, that a man was just getting fit for his work when he was sent off to the other end of the world.

4311. With regard to the chiefs of missions, do you think that the same rule ought to apply to them?—I think that the fewer rules you make the better. I go back to my notion of the absolute responsibility of a Foreign Minister, leaving him perfectly free to use his tools how he pleases and to use what tools he pleases, and making him responsible; if the thing does not go right, make him suffer for it, and if it goes right, then heap every kind of honour that you can upon his head.

4312. Mr. A. Russell.] It was suggested by Sir Henry Wolff on Monday that the ambassador at Paris ought to change with the Government, that the ambassador at Constantinople ought to hold his office permanently till he is superannuated, and that the ambassadors at other posts ought to hold their appointments only for six years; do you think that rules of that kind can be enforced with any advantage?—I should wholly dissent from them.

4313. Viscount Barrington.] If any rule of that sort were made absolute, so as to involve having changes at the principal missions with every change of Government, it would entail a very large expense upon the country in the way of outfit, would it not?—Certainly.

4314. What do you think about exchanges taking place between the Foreign Office and the juniors in missions?—I have a very strong feeling upon that subject; I do not believe that it is shared by persons in the Foreign Office, and therefore I wish to speak with very great diffidence on the subject. I wish to say, first, that I have never served in the Foreign Office, and that therefore I cannot judge of that question in the least from the point of view of a person cognisant with the work of the Foreign Office; but I have myself a very strong feeling that as regards the efficiency of the diplomatic agents, I mean with regard to the sort of sense of responsibility under which they do their work, it would be of incalculable service to have men ien in the Foreign Office who had personal experience of the diplomatic service. Instead of aving the exchange voluntary, I should wish o see it obligatory. I should wish, for instance, his kind of thing, that the head of the French Department in the Foreign Office should at ome period of his career have served in France, nd if possible as first secretary of embassy at aris; similarly I should wish the head of the erman Department to have served at least a year s secretary of embassy and chargé d'affaires at erlin and Vienna, and so on. I say this, beause it makes the whole difference in the sort of terest that one has in one's work, and in the ower of really doing good work, whether you e writing to persons who are personally acainted with the subject upon which you write them. I will take such an instance as Japan. daresay you have read Mr. Mitford's papers the "Fortnightly." It would make the whole ifference to you if you happened to be minister Japan, if you had such a man as that at the ead of the Oriental Department, and if you rote to him under the sense that he could enter nto everything that you were saying. That ould give you the power of imparting informaon which it is wholly out of your power to do hen you are writing to people who, however ntelligent, are without that sort of knowledge of ne concrete facts which would enable them to nderstand the attempts that you may make to ive a more real knowledge of the facts which ou are describing.

4315. Chairman.] All correspondence in the oreign Office proceeds from the Secretary of tate, does it not?—I do not know anything of he working of the Foreign Office.

4316. Supposing it does proceed from the ecretary of State, in what position would you ut these gentlemen, as counsellors to the Secreary of State?—I am not making any suggesions for the reform of the Foreign Office, beause I am unacquainted with the Foreign ffice; but I can best illustrate what I wish say by saying that I should like to have s part of the system of the Foreign Office what as been the case practically ever since Lord larendon has been Foreign Minister. Lord larendon has been himself employed abroad, nd has an exceptional knowledge of everything onnected with foreign persons, and not only oreign politics, but all those numerous questions hat are now interesting the English public. I hink that every person who has served in diplonacy during the last 15 years will say the same hing that I do, which is that no attaché, however bscure, could write a memorandum on any subect connected with either political or social uestions, or any question of general interest which would not be submitted to the most ccurate criticism by the Foreign Secretary imself. I can say of myself that the first thing which gave me a keen interest in the diplomatic rofession was the criticism made by Lord Clarendon upon a report of mine when I was an npaid attaché at Vienna. At the present time very diplomatic agent knows that he will have a perfect master in the art of criticism, judging he work that he sends home. That is the case ith Lord Clarendon; but there is of course lways a possibility of a person filling the post of Foreign Secretary who does not possess this exceptional and extraordinary knowledge; and what I should like to see in the Foreign Office would be that there should be a certain body of men who had that interest and that knowledge, and who could sit as critics of the work that we do. It is a great check upon a man who is not a conscientious reporter, and who likes to indulge in fine writing to know that the man who reads is thoroughly and completely conversant with the facts about which he writes; and on the other hand it is a great advantage to a man who is conscientious, and who is really trying to do good work, to know that his work will be understood and appreciated.

4317. But how would you find the vacancies for these gentlemen in the Foreign Office?—That is a question which I am not in any kind of way prepared to answer, because I know absolutely nothing of the Foreign Office; but it seems to me that if there were a desire to do the thing, the thing could be easily done. The moment you make these changes compulsory, you get over the difficulty. If you force a man after, say, five years of his career abroad, to spend one year in the Foreign Office, he grows up knowing the work of the Foreign Office; and there is no sort of reason why the secretary of embassy at Paris should not exchange for a year with the head of the French Department in the Foreign Office.

4318. But supposing that the circumstances of the head of the French Department did not allow him to go and live in Paris?—Then you must pay him. If the thing is desirable and good for the foreign service, I cannot see that the question of a few hundred pounds a year would come in at all.

4319. Still is it not the fact that gentlemen enter the Foreign Office very often with very different views from those who enter the diplomatic service; I mean in different pecuniary circumstances altogether; and would it not be rather hard for you to compel a man who had entered an office in London prepared there to spend his life to go nolens volens and exchange with diplomatists, and enter on quite a different career?—That is a question of administrative detail, which I am not competent to answer. I was asked whether the thing was in itself desirable; I say the thing is to my mind not only desirable, but seems to me a most important change to make; I think that it is most important that we should be to a certain extent nationalised, and that the Foreign Office should be to a certain extent internationalised.

4320. Mr. Rylands.] I think I understood you to say in regard to the plan you have been suggesting, that it had reference more particularly to the desirableness in your opinion of the senior clerks attached to the different departments of European and foreign diplomacy being, if possible, men who had a practical experience in that part of the world to which they are attached in the Foreign Office arrangements?—That is the way I put it.

4321. And it is your impression, I presume, that the business of the different departments goes through those senior clerks, and goes up to the Foreign Secretary; and your views would be met if the senior clerks had that practical knowledge, although it might not be the case that the Foreign Secretary could have a general knowledge of the department?—I have never worked in the Foreign Office, and therefore I have not the slightest idea of the way in which the work is carried on there. I do not know know how far the work is done by the senior clerk, how far by the under secretary, or how far by the Secretary of State. I believe, from a perfectly general knowledge, that the Foreign Secretary in England does infinitely more work than any foreign secretary in any other country in the world. I mean, there is more actually depending upon him in this service than depends on the foreign secretary in any other service; but I want to have that sort of interest, and that sort of knowledge, in some portion of the Foreign Office. There are exceedingly able men in the Foreign Office; everybody who has had to deal with them knows that there are exceedingly able men there. But everybody must feel that it is a perfectly different thing to have a sort of abstract knowledge of foreign matters, from what it is to have a practical knowledge of them; just as the sort of idea which a painter would have from a lay figure is different from that which he has after studying from the living figure. I refer to that sort of knowledge of the political men and the political institutions of other countries, with regard to which I should have thought that it would be conferring a very great boon upon those men in the Foreign Office who really take a great interest in their work, to give them the chance of becoming practically acquainted with the things they have to deal with all their lives.

4322. Chairman.] Have you considered the practical working of this scheme at all that you have been suggesting?—I have not considered it in its technical details, because I have not the data to study it in that light. I only think that in itself it is an exceedingly desirable thing, and that with the enormous amount of every kind of work that is being given to us to do now, there should be a corresponding personal knowledge in the Foreign Office to control that work.

4323. It would be a great innovation, would it not, to require the head of a department of the Foreign Office, looking to the position and circumstances, generally speaking, of the head of a department, that he is a married man established in London with a house and family, suddenly to change with the secretary of legation, say, at Brazil, or elsewhere?—A most undoubted change; I was not thinking of his personal comfort.

4324. Mr. W. Lowther.] Would you have these gentlemen go to these foreign posts when they were heads of departments, or before they became heads of departments?—I have not elaborated the thing; I have thought of an amalgamation between the two, but I could not pretend to have a scheme prepared. All that I meant to say was that I thought it was desirable that that interchange should take place, and that it should take place in such a way that a man should not be made head of a department unless he had a considerable personal knowledge of the countries constituting his department.

4325. Viscount Barrington.] I suppose you might fairly consider Lord Clarendon's position, having previously served in a diplomatic career a great many years, as a fair corroboration of your view?—I think very much so indeed; I am speaking not only from my own personal experience, but from that of the greater number of the members of the diplomatic service. The whole of that unmistakeable zeal which anybody may see who takes the trouble of reading these Blue Book Reports, comes from the sort of personal interest taken by Lord Clarendon in this more or less external work of diplomacy; I mean from that kind of careful criticism which he gives to everybody's work. As I have said, the most obscure unpaid attaché is perfectly certain that any piece of work of that sort would be appreciated not by a blind criticism, but by a criticism which is perfectly aware of what it is about; and that I think is the desirable relation to exist between the Foreign Office and its diplomatic agents.

4326. Mr. W. Cartwright.] I suppose you think that such a change would put the Foreign Office into more intelligent sympathy with what is going on abroad?—Certainly so, and would make it thoroughly acquainted with the diplomatic servants.

4327. Is there any such amalgamation in foreign services between those who serve in the department and those who serve abroad?—In the only two cases I know anything about, which are those of France and Prussia, there are certainly more men in the Foreign Office who have served abroad than with us.

4328. Viscount Barrington.] To turn to another subject, I suppose that entertaining as you do the highest possible view of the responsibility of the Foreign Secretary in this country, you would, notwithstanding the fact of the diplomatic service now being looked upon entirely as a profession, not object to the appointment occasionally of what are called outsiders to the higher posts?—That of course involves the whole system of appointment in the diplomatic service, and of promotion when there, which is a very large subject. What seems to me to be the difficulty is this: The diplomatic service is not numerically sufficiently large to be treated as a profession. There are 122 persons in the diplomatic service, at least that is about the number; and if I remember right there are, out of that number of 122, something like 64 persons who are either heads of missions or first secretaries of legation, that is to say, persons who at any moment may have the full international responsibility of such a state as Great Britain put upon their shoulders. In a profession like that of the army, where you have got to deal with a great many thousand persons, and out of these thousands of persons only a comparatively small per-centage are persons who perform the higher functions and fill the more responsible posts, you can establish a rule and system; but with 122 persons, 64 of whom are, so to speak, field marshals, you cannot do it, and therefore you have got this difficulty, that you cannot, in my opinion, treat diplomacy as a profession in the same way as you can treat other branches of the public service. On the other hand, there is no branch of the public service which requires a more thorough professional knowledge than diplomacy; there is no branch of the service which requires such careful preparation and such long training; and what you have to do is to find some means or other (I do not pretend to solve the problem) by which these two difficulties can be reconciled. My own idea (it is a very crude notion) would be that, if I were starting perfectly clear, if I had to do the thing myself, I would have an upper class not necessarily professional, a middle class absolutely professional, and a third class wholly unprofessional. The sort of thing that I think could be established would be this: you have got your ur envoys, who have to do the actual negocian between Great Britain and other countries;

u have your secretaries, whose principal funcn is that of collecting and imparting informan to the Government; and then you require v material out of which you can select your cretaries. I should propose going back to the l system of unpaid attachés. I should give absolutely unlimited power to the Foreign cretary to appoint as many unpaid attachés as wished; and I should require no sort or kind examination for the purpose of being named paid attaché. The advantage which a man ob-ned by being unpaid attaché would be that he uld be allowed to present himself for examinan, not for a competitive examination, but for a t examination. But instead of having what we ve had hitherto, which seems to me the great stake of the system, a minimum test examinan, I would have a maximum test examination; at is to say, I would have an examination of e very highest possible kind, so that a man o had passed that examination should be, as ted by that examination, up to the very ghest class of work that could be given to him;
d this class of persons should receive sufficient y to make such a post in itself desirable; at is to say, the remuneration should be fficiently high to make it worth a man's ile to go in for this, irrespectively of anything e; and that could be very easily done, be-use the moment you fix such a standard as that, u are certain to have only a limited number men capable of passing such an examination;
d, in the second place, they are perfectly rth the money. These men should know that distinguishing themselves and acting up to e standard we had proved by their examination ey had attained, they would, more or less, as a atter of course, become envoys. The higher issions should be open to this class of men, rfectly irrespective of the time that they had rved; that is to say, it should be wholly a rvice by merit. If you once had that system ere would be then no sort of difficulty in apinting outsiders into the higher service. The justice of appointing outsiders at present is, at you have made the profession a seniority rvice, and therefore, having made it a seniority rvice, we get to this disagreeable position
r all of us, that when we have worked up within one or two of this goal which we ve before us, namely, a mission, then an out-der is suddenly taken and put in in front of us, the plea that he is the best man. Supposing at the fifth or sixth man on the list is the very st man in the world, he cannot be put there, cause it would be going against the seniority of e service, but somebody else, an outsider, is t there. The injustice consists wholly and en-rely in combining outsiders with the seniority stem. I am strongly of opinion (it comes from y original principle that the Foreign Secretary ould be made responsible, and that he should ot be limited in his choice), that the moment u get rid of the seniority system, there is no rt of reason why a man, if he is specially fitted r a post, should not be appointed to it, even if e is an outsider.

4329. I understand that you would do away ith the first examination entirely, and that you ould make the second a test examination, but ring it up to a maximum instead of having it a inimum?—Yes.

4330. That is rather the view of Sir Henry Elliot?—I was not aware that he took that view.

4331. Do you think that the present system of examination is a satisfactory one?—I think it is unsatisfactory, because I think it is a very small and poor kind of examination, and yet it is big enough to make a man who has passed it think that he has an absolute claim on the public service for ever.

4332. How do you feel in regard to the junior members of the service being up in conversation in French and German?—There is a very considerable difference in that respect; there is not the least doubt that a great number of them have a very fair knowledge indeed of the languages which are required of them; certainly I should say the majority of them have a very fair knowledge. I do not think they have much knowledge of writing French, and I think that writing French is a thing that ought to be very differently developed from what it is at present.

4333. You have not found any considerable difference within the last few years with regard to, say, the writing of French and conversation in French?—The system of examinations began very shortly after I went into the service, and therefore I can hardly tell what difference it has made.

4334. You are not aware that there has been any change made in regard to that part of the examination?—I am unable to answer that question.

4335. Now I should like to ask your opinion about the appointment of clerks in the different missions; do you think that they would carry out the duties that are now fulfilled by attachés and secretaries in an equally good way?—Do you mean chanceliers?

4336. Yes, chanceliers, or men in a different class of life from the present set of gentlemen in Her Majesty's diplomatic service?—If you mean, as a substitute for the service of attachés and secretaries, to have copying clerks for the general work of the service, I should certainly be excessively averse to that.

4337. What would be your reasons for objecting to them?—I think that one cannot sufficiently bear in mind that the vital principle of international intercourse is confidence. What credit is to commerce confidence is to international intercourse; and there is nothing in the world so delicate as either credit or confidence of that sort; and if you come to examine either the one or the other, I think you will find that it resolves itself into the kind of opinion which one person forms of another person. If I have to accept a bill at six months, I look at the name of the firm; it is very difficult to analyse the process further than that. The sort of feeling and belief that I have in regard to that firm, is made up of all sorts of traditions and impressions which it would be impossible to analyse; it is the sort of belief that I have in a particular name. If you examine this process as regards inter-national intercourse, when a man like Prince Gortchakoff or Ali Pachi confides a secret, an important State secret, to Her Majesty's ambassador at St. Petersburg, or at Constantinople, what he has in his mind is an unconscious judgment which he has come to with regard to, not Lord Clarendon, or Lord Granville, or Lord Aberdeen, personally, but with regard to the firm, so to speak, which is represented by the British

Mr. Morier, C.B.

Foreign Office. He knows when he confides that secret, that within a few hours a certain number of attachés and secretaries will know all about it, and that within a few days a certain number of persons in the Foreign Office will know all about it. His confidence is based upon the idea that the foreign minister under whom all these persons are serving is personally responsible for the sacredness with which that secret will be treated; and I do not think that you can afford to diminish this confidence, because, as I say, it is the soul of international intercourse.

4338. Without wishing in the least to cast any slur upon the characters of gentlemen who might be in the position of copying clerks, I suppose you would consider that it is almost the duty of an attaché in the diplomatic service to go a great deal into foreign society, and that being the case, a good deal of information is picked up in that way. It is not likely, I suppose, that a gentleman in the position of a copying clerk would be admitted into foreign society in the same way as a present attaché or secretary in Her Majesty's service? — If the substitutes for attachés and secretaries are to be an entirely different class of persons, you cannot use a copying clerk in the same way that you use an attaché or a secretary.

4339. In fact, you do not think that it would be to the advantage of the service that any change like that should take place?—I think it would be the very worst thing in the world that could possibly happen.

4340. Mr. W. Cartwright.] There is a good deal of routine work to be done in the missions, is there not, that might be perhaps taken away from the secretaries and attachés and given to such clerks?—I did not quite understand that that was meant. If you supplement your trained diplomatists by persons like chanceliers, then I think that a good deal of strain of that kind would be taken off, but in the system I advocate I would have a large number of unpaid attachés to do that kind of work. I think you cannot possibly bring too much unpaid labour into your service; I have a very strong feeling about that, quite irrespectively of whether the men continue afterwards in the service or not. I think that the more of the class of people described by Mr. Gladstone, as people who have money and nothing else, that you can adscript to the public service the better. I think it is an enormous advantage to those persons themselves. I think that it is just that class which requires to be de-parochialised and to be imperialised, and you cannot do that better than by making them serve as unpaid servants of the Crown. If the object is to save labour, then chanceliers can do all the kind of work which is not confidential. That is the case in the French service; every French legation has a chancelier, who takes all the current work, and does the copying of commercial enclosures and despatches of that sort.

4341. Viscount Barrington.] He is not entrusted with any confidential work?—As a rule, not; it depends upon the individual, but, as a rule, not.

4342. He has access to the archives, I suppose?—No.

4343. Viscount Sandon.] With regard to these reports that are sent in from the chiefs of missions, Lord Clarendon informed us that the Land Tenure Report only cost the country, I think, about 180*l.*; might I ask whether any cost is entailed upon the gentlemen who draw up these reports?—That takes us into a delicate subject, that of the cost entailed upon Her Majesty's diplomatic servants, by inquiries and search for information, which cannot be paid for in ready money. I do not know what the cost of those reports may have been; I have not sent in a charge, but I think that as regards the actual cost which I could have charged the Foreign Office for my researches, it would certainly not have been above 4*l.* or 5*l.*; but it is perfectly plain that in a thing of that sort, where you have to put people to great inconvenience, and get them to do a maximum of work, you must in some way or other acknowledge that. It is not a peculiarity of the diplomatic service; I believe in all social intercourse, if you are asking a man to give up four or five hours a day to explain things to you, you will try, in some sort of manner, to give an acknowledgment for that. Of course, in these matters, it takes the form of expenditure undergone by Her Majesty's diplomatic agents, and comes out of their pockets. For instance, if a man spends his whole day in showing you over his farm, and draws up a long account of income and expenditure, and things of that sort, which will give him an immense deal of trouble, the natural thing to do is to ask him to dine with you, and if you ask him to dine with you, you ask a number of people to meet him whom it may be interesting to him to meet. I am merely just giving that as an instance. But it would be excessively hard to describe that sort of thing as bribery or corruption; it is the sort of coin in which I believe a great deal of the world's business is paid for. I think that if you were to add up expenses of that kind, you would find that those reports upon land tenure have cost a great deal more than the 180*l.*, though they may only have cost the country 180*l.* You must remember, too, that foreign governments have a great advantage over us; they have orders to give away. First of all, there is very much less of inquiry by foreign governments than by us, but whenever there is this kind of inquiry, it is invariably paid for by an order; that is the received coin. We have got no orders to give away, and there is not the least doubt that there is a great deal that we have to do by social courtesy which other people do very much cheaper by means of orders. I may give an instance: during the Crimean war there was a physician at Vienna who, I knew, had exceptional information with regard to the Principalities, that was of great importance; he had been there for several months, drawing up a report for the Austrian Government. I knew of this, and I at once informed Her Majesty's Government that there was this man with this special information, and they instantly sent out two army surgeons of great eminence, who spent three days sucking this man's brain, and then went off to Bucharest. There was not the slightest kind of official notice taken of this man's giving up three very valuable days; three days of his practice. He was a little hurt at not getting any kind of official acknowledgment sent to him, but this was smoothed over by little attentions of the kind which I have mentioned.

4344. We have none of us any doubt whatever as to the amount of labour entailed on the various gentlemen connected with the missions by these reports; I wanted to elicit whether, in addition to this extra labour, there was not a very considerable nsiderable incidental expense entailed upon the ntlemen who draw up the Papers, and that I ther is the case?—Yes.

4345. Expense that cannot be detailed to the reign Office, but still that does add to the pense of daily life?—As regards any incidental penditure the Foreign Office are exceedingly nerous; they treat us as gentlemen. I have ver found the slightest hitch in that kind of ay; if I say my expenses have been so-and-so, ere is an end of it. But there is incidental ex- nse of this sort very often of a very costly nd, which cannot be charged to the public.

4346. You thoroughly approve of this modern stem of reports?—Yes, I think it is of enor- ous advantage as an education for the diplo- atic service on the one hand, and I think it is of e greatest possible importance that we should, a nation, get to know something of what is ne outside Great Britain.

4347. Might I ask you, from your large ex- rience had, over and above attending to such ports, you think a young diplomatist would e of most service to the country; by what cupation of his time would a young diplomatist st serve his own country abroad?—I under- and the question to be, what would be the st use of a young diplomatist's time abroad. Well, the actual amount of knowledge which a plomatist has to master before he can fit himself r the work is so great, because the peculiar ature of the day is the way in which political uestions, and social questions, and religious uestions, and scientific questions, are all dove- iled the one into the other, that the time of a an who really wishes to fit himself for his ork is more than filled. According to the heme that I laid down just now, I should pre- uppose a special diplomatic education of a very ifferent kind from any that has been thought f as yet, and that would take up a man's whole me for several years of his life. To tell you ne honest truth, I think that there is uncommonly ttle spare time at present.

4348. That is just what I want to get at; me gentlemen are of opinion that the public rvice would be best advanced by having fixed ours for office attendance, and by reducing the umber of younger members of the mission to uch an extent that they would be largely ccupied by copying despatches; I wish to now whether you think that the best training f a young diplomatist, or whether he would ot be serving his country better by mixing rgely in all classes of society, by studying the olloquial language of the country, and by ravelling over the country in which he is laced?—I think that the more you can di- inish his mere mechanical work, and the more ou can give him of the higher class of work he better; there is no doubt about that.

4349. And that knowledge is essential to his raining?—Absolutely essential.

4350. With regard to open competition for di- lomatic appointments, it has been suggested hat it would be better to throw open all these ffices to open competition; what is your opinion f that, with a view to the public service?— That question is partly answered by what I said n the earlier part of my examination, viz., that I conceive that it is absolutely necessary that the Foreign Secretary should be wholly responsible or the persons that are admitted into the ervice; on anything in the shape of a body external to the Foreign Office on whom should be shifted the responsibility of selecting persons for the service, I look as one of the most dangerous things that could happen. I have stated why I think so, because I think that it would destroy that sense of confidence which now prevails. As regards the scheme that I mentioned, of course there would be the option between having a competitive examination amongst the whole body of these unpaid servants, and the scheme of a very high examination, a maximum test examination. I have got some knowledge of examinations; I was for two years in the educational department of the Council Office, and I have been at Oxford, and I have occupied myself with the question of examinations; and I have no hesitation whatever in saying that I look upon competition as the very worst form of training possible for the purpose that you require. I can describe it best by saying that every fault that is found with two-year-old races may be applied to competitive examinations. You bring out certain qualities prematurely; you develop in an excessive way certain peculiarities, and you totally miss the whole object of the kind of education that you require for a service like the diplomatic, which is the power of assimilation. Therefore I am totally and entirely against competitive examinations.

4351. Viscount Barrington.] You mean as far as the diplomatic service is concerned?—I am speaking wholly from the point of view of the diplomatic service. But I also dislike them from the pedagogue's point of view in themselves.

4352. Mr. A. Russell.] You have taken honours at Oxford yourself?—I took a second class in classics in 1849.

4353. You know what examinations are?—Yes, I do.

4354. Viscount Sandon.] You have seen possibly the Order in Council with regard to the other public services?—Yes.

4355. Supposing that the diplomatic service was added to that, you would consider it a real misfortune to the nation?—Very great. My reason is this; I should conceive that however good might be the men turned out by such a system, it would be a fatal blow to that international confidence, which I look upon as the sine quâ non of international intercourse. I wish particularly to make an observation which I have not seen made anywhere, which is that we have got something very much higher to consider than our national responsibility in this matter. The diplomatic service of the Foreign Office has confided to it the secrets of other nations; we are responsible not for our secrets only, but for the secrets of other people; and therefore it is of the greatest importance that whatever experiments we may make with regard to services wholly within our own control, they should not rashly be extended to relations which involve our good faith with other nations; because you must remember that a great many secrets are confided to us which do not immediately concern us, but which are confided to us in virtue of this complete confidence which exists at present, and which to a very great extent is based upon the prestige which the idea of an English gentleman carries with it, and we cannot jeopardise that confidence by letting other nations know that nobody is responsible for the persons to whom these secrets are confided. For this will really be the result of appointments made by competitive examinations. The Secretary of State is not responsible, because the successful candidates are forced upon him by the Civil Service examiners; the Civil Service examiners are not responsible for the individual as a whole, but only for a certain amount of brain work. Thus nobody is responsible.

Mr. Morier, C.B. — 23 June 1870.

4356. Mr. A. Russell.] The diplomatic service has been described as too exclusively composed of members of titled families; do you think that that is the case?—I think that if anybody took the trouble of looking at the Red Book, and of inquiring about who the persons are, he would find that the diplomatic service was exceedingly fairly made up You might call it a geological section of English society; you would find in it certain names of great families; you would find the names of families who have, within recent years, become connected with the House of Lords for public services; you would find names of great mercantile houses; you would find old official names, I mean those of persons connected with the public service for a good many generations; you would find the names of eminent physcians; you would find the sons of solicitors and attorneys; you would find as complete a microcosm of English society as in any other profession whatever. I have not gone carefully through the list, but that is my own impression, certainly, and I think anyone could substantiate it by going through the list.

4357. Do you see your way to the possibility of any reduction in the expenditure of the diplomatic service, without detriment to the public service?—Well, to tell the honest truth, I have not looked at the thing in detail; I only know what the sum total is, which I believe is about 180,000*l.* Now, if we have got a bad diplomatic service, 180,000*l.* a year is just 180,000 l. a year too much. If we have a good diplomatic service, which I believe we have (it is one that is good, and can be made better) I believe that 180,000*l.* a year is an exceedingly small sum to pay for that. Of course, 180,000*l.* is a good deal of money, but you must look upon it in relation to the work that is done. We must remember that England has an international position which no other country in the world has. We are the only country in the world that can be really said to have a cosmopolitan position. We are not only a great European power but a first-rate American power; a first-rate Asiatic power; a first-rate African power; and a wholly Australasian power. If, therefore, we do not spend upon our international machinery more than a first rate European power does, it seems to me a very small sum. As regards the possibilities of cutting the thing down here and there, I have never considered that matter.

4358. It has been said that a chargé d'affaires with a small salary, speaking in the name of England, ought to carry the same weight and authority as an ambassador with a large salary speaking in the name of England; do you assent to that?—That is a difficult question to answer. It seems to me to hang together with the whole question as to whether we are to set up an entirely different usage from that of any other nation; and whether we are called upon to practise a kind of international asceticism. I do not quite see why we should do that. It is, however, a difficult question to answer. In a particular case if a man had got the British fleet at his back I dare say that a chargé d'affaire's words would carry the same weight as an ambassador's; but the social position of a chargé d'affaires is certainly not equivalent to that of an ambassador or minister, and you can hardly expect England to use second-rate people when other nations are using first-rate people.

4359. You think that England ought to be represented by agents of the same rank as other powers?—Yes.

4360. And that it would not be wise to lower the position of our representatives if other countries do not do the same?—Most decidedly it would not. There is no use denying that people are very much influenced by these external forms; and, as I said, social status and position are more necessary to an English agent than to any other, because they afford him the only means of acknowledging a great number of international courtesies which he is perpetually receiving, and of requiting the trouble of a great many persons, both official and non-official, to whose services the present system of reports forces him to have recourse.

4361. We have been told that a diplomatic agent abroad could live with greater economy by abstaining altogether from mixing in the society of the town in which he resides; do you think that his efficiency would be diminished thereby?—His efficiency would be absolutely diminished. Do you mean, may I ask, that it would be cheaper for him to shut himself up than to go about in society?

4362. Yes; Mr. West, in his report from Paris, says that there is great exaggeration in the idea that it is necessary for a diplomatic agent to mix in society, and that it leads to increase in expenditure?—There is no doubt that it leads to increase in expenditure, but I cannot conceive how a man can be getting up the knowledge which her Majesty's Government expects him to have unless he does mix in society.

4363. You think that it would be difficult for him to receive the hospitalities of others if he never returned them?—Yes, absolutely impossible. Those hospitalities are made to him in virtue of his being the agent of the British Crown, and if he does not return them it is the British Crown that stands in the invidious position of not returning the civilities offered to it.

4364. Mr. W. Cartwright.] I think you entered the service before those recent examinations?—Yes.

4365. Therefore you have had experience of the service in its old state and also under the present system?—Yes, but only for a short time in its old state, because I had to pass through the second examination for a paid attachéship.

4366. Would you say that there is any difference in the attainments of the present generation in the diplomatic service as compared with those of the men who entered the service before there was any examination, I mean any improvement in their efficiency?—As far as I can make out there is a decided improvement in the actual diplomatic agents. The men in the junior grades especially, are, I should think, a superior body on the whole to what I have been told they were formerly; but then I think that that is principally owing to the kind of education which they are receiving by the present system of reporting which is entirely new. I cannot conceive that an examination such as that which at present exists can tell either one way or the other.

4367. You attach more importance, then, to such n an education as they get in consequence of greater labour put upon them now when they in the service, than to the test of the examion?—I do certainly.

368. Could you illustrate the points in which think that the examination is deficient and inquate?—It is some time now since I passed examination. Most certainly the amount of wledge required as regards foreign languages a limited one, and persons passed the examion who were very far from being able to te French, as I consider that every diplomatic nt should be able to write French, and of which is certainly the most important por. of a diplomatist's education, international , the whole knowledge that was required was nowledge of the elements of Wheatstone, knowledge that could be got up in a fortht or three weeks. That we have got a y of men who are in the least acquainted n international law, I am sorry to say, I do believe.

369. You look upon diplomacy, I presume, means for promoting international purposes? es.

370. And you think that the kind of work ich has in recent years been put on diplomatic rants has had a tendency to extend their wledge in reference to international matters? es.

371. In the course of this Committee it has n repeatedly urged that the introduction and great extension of the telegraphic communiion has altogether modified the position of the lomatic servants abroad and has tended to re- e them from a great deal of responsibility and gether to modify their relations, is that your w?—My own impression is the exact reverse. elieve that the introduction of telegraphy has essitated a very far superior kind of intellectual ining to what existed before the introduction the telegraph. We must remember that we e not got the choice of telegraphing or telegraphing, because upon occasions like se of European conferences, which are cerly increasing very much, and probably will rease very much more, all the other diplotic agents are telegraphing as well as ourves, and therefore the work has to a very eat extent to be done by telegraphy. Only e side of the question seems to have been sidered with regard to this, namely the wer which the Foreign Secretary has of teleaphing his orders to the diplomatic agent. hat seems to have been entirely forgotten is at before the Foreign Secretary can convey orders to the diplomatic agent he must have telegraphic report of the diplomatic agent on which to base his orders. Now anybody o has thought upon the subject knows that all the responsible and of all the difficult ings to do to convey a completely new political uation, such as can be the result of a day's nference, in a telegram of some 70 or 80 words, d to convey it in such a form that not only Foreign Minister, but perhaps a Cabinet uncil may be able to decide upon it, is an inlectual tour de force which requires an exceedgly superior kind of agent. If you take the l conferences at Verona or Aix-la-Chapelle, any of those places, you had there a numr of ambassadors who settled themselves ry comfortably for a sojourn of weeks or nths. Whenever a conference had taken place, couriers were sent back to the different capitals, and they would wait till the answers came, so that no step was taken by those conferences for which the ministers had not the most detailed instructions. Instead of that we have now a system of telegraphing; and therefore though in one sense it relieves the responsibility of the ambassador or minister, in another it enormously adds to it. I have watched this question of the telegraph, and know something about it.

4372. Is not the mechanical labour of diplomatists increased by the use of ciphers necessarily consequent on the habitual use of telegraphing?—Yes.

4373. So that both the intellectual strain and the mere mechanical labour are increased?—Yes.

4374. In regard to examinations I forgot to ask whether you could give us information about what kind of examinations, if any, are customary in foreign services?—I could once have given information about Prussia, but my memory does not serve me now. If I remember right there are three examinations passed in Prussia, three Staats-prüfungen, and then there is an additional number of subjects in which a candidate for the diplomatic service is examined; but I cannot give you information worth having on that point without reference.

4375. I suppose that you do not agree with those who think that in consequence of the great improvement of the press, a great deal of the work that used to be done by confidential agents of the Foreign Office, now need not be done any more by confidential agents, and that the press itself in a great degree is a substitute for the work of the Foreign Office?—No, I cannot agree with that view the least in the world.

4376. Still the view does prevail that the press is, to a great extent a substitute for the work of the Foreign Office?—My view is very much the reverse, viz., that if we did not require the diplomatic service for anything else, we should require it for the purpose of controlling the information given by the press.

4377. You mean that you think very often the press is incorrectly informed?—It is not merely that the press is incorrectly informed, but, speaking not in the least of the English press, but of the foreign press from which the English press must to a great extent take its knowledge, it is a well-known thing that every foreign government has relations more or less subterranean with certain organs of the press, and that there is a perpetual manufacture of information which is certainly not necessarily correct, but which is intended for a certain momentary purpose. Now, one of the most important functions which a diplomatic agent has to perform, is to give to his Government exact knowledge of what is good information, and what is bad information.

4378. Could you illustrate that by mentioning any great crisis, where the great organs of the press were badly informed?—There are one or two wonderful instances of that. I fancy before the Italian War there was such a case, about a Russian treaty. I know that within my recollection there have been what are called very successful "canards," i.e., false pieces of information sent flying about Europe with a specific political purpose.

4379. Viscount Barrington.] There was a little

Mr. Morier, C.B.

23 June 1870.

little mistake also, about the Zollverein, was there not?—Yes; "The Times" announced, in a leading article, that Prussia at last, after having been obstinate for a great many years, had consented to enter the Zollverein, and to form part of this great union. The fact was, that Austria had made a proposal to enter the Zollverein, under certain conditions. I cannot recollect what the article was now, but I know quite positively that the information was, that Prussia had made up her mind to enter the Zollverein, and the article showed the importance it was that Prussia should enter the Zollverein. Then the next day it corrected this information, and said that there was a little mistake; that it was not Prussia that had consented to enter the Zollverein, but Austria.

4380. Mr. Rylands.] I think I gathered from you that one of the instances of incorrect intelligence on the part of the press, had reference to an understanding which it was said had been come to between the Emperor Napoleon and the King of Sardinia, in reference to the cession of Nice and Savoy?—Mr. Cartwright asked me the question, and I had got a dim recollection that there was one very great canard in the year 1859, but I cannot recollect sufficiently what it was.

4381. I may at all events put it in this way; it was reported in the public press for some months that there was an understanding between France and Italy for the cession of Savoy and Nice; the question that I wished to ask you was this, whether you can recollect that it was the fact that our representatives abroad corrected that intelligence by informing the Government at home that there was no foundation for any such statements?—I am not able to give you any answer on that subject; my recollection does not serve me, but the treaty to which I refer was not connected with Savoy or Nice, but with Russia.

4382. You are aware that in the end it did take place?—I am quite aware of that fact.

4383. Mr. W. Cartwright.] But I think from your general view you do not think that the condition of the press at all justifies our suppressing or altering in any material degree our diplomatic representation abroad?—In no way whatever; and my reason is this, that first of all there is a great amount of information which never does get into the press, and which must be conveyed from one government to another; and, secondly, that the press abroad (I am not speaking of the English press, which, I believe, has a perfectly exceptional position) is in many instances a political instrument used by foreign governments for the manufacture of news intended to produce momentary effects, and because of this it is of the greatest importance that Her Majesty's Foreign Office should be informed by a competent authority how much of this sort of so-called officious information (you know in French the difference between officious and official) is to be trusted, and how much is not to be trusted.

4385. Now, looking round, from your knowledge, could you suggest any economics that might be made at the present moment in the f reign service abroad, or any redistribution missions in Germany or anywhere else?—No, cannot say that I can.

4386. You cannot make any practical sugge tions with a view to economy?—No; I think could make the service better by having mo money, but I really do not see that I could mak it better by spending less money.

4387. Do you think that the cost of living h very much increased abroad?—The cost of livi has very much increased abroad.

4388. Is it your opinion that the diplomat officers are underpaid?—I can only speak for t posts that I know; I consider myself very muc underpaid; but of course, that is a personal vie of the subject. I think it is perfectly impossibl for a man to live as a diplomatic agent without certain amount of money of his own. I thin he ought to see his way to having at some time other of his career, sufficient at all events enable him to save a part of his private incom That is the case with some missions, and it certainly not the case with others. I think I ca state as a general rule that a man for the seve or eight years before he gets a mission is spendin not only his income but his capital; if he is married man, certainly he is, unless he has got large private fortune, which is a thing whic unfortunately, few of us have; and I think th he ought to be able to pay himself back what h has spent of his capital when he gets a mission 4389. In point of fact, you are of opinio that the service is anything but exorbitantl remunerative?—The service is most certainl underpaid, there is not the slightest doubt in th world about that.

4390. You threw out a suggestion that the should be, I think you said, an unlimited numb of unpaid attachés?—An unlimited number unpaid attachés.

4391. That these unpaid attachés should r main in that position till there was a vacanc amongst the secretaries, and that they should l admitted to be secretaries after a very high te examination; now do not you think that th would be a discouragement to persons who migl go on for an unlimited time as unpaid attach waiting for some opening, as an examinati can only take place when there is an opening?- My sketch was a very rough one, and only la down a few general principles to get over th difficulty of obtaining persons of high profe sional training, and at the same time to leave th foreign minister perfectly free, as regards high appointments, to appoint the men whom h wishes. I only gave that as a sort of general ou line of a plan that might be worked out in deta Of course there are all manner of difficulties th will suggest themselves in carrying it out, b as regards your particular question, my id would be that there should be, every two yea an examination to which these unpaid attach might submit themselves, and that all the perso who satisfied the examiners that they had reach this high test, should then be the men who had right to fill these openings when they becan vacant. I think you might supplement the pl by giving a certain sum to the foreign ministe say 2,000*l.*, or 3,000*l.*, or 4,000*l.* a year, to p the services of the men who had passed the e amination, but for whom there were as yet vaoancies, so as to have them ready for his us se men would know the chances of the ser-

The

, and the examination would be passed at ry early period in their service. What you
: now is a large number of persons who are gering and thirsting for these posts just as h as the people of whom I speak would be, that in the one case you would be perfectly ain of having the right men to fill them, and ne present case you only have persons rising eniority, which necessitates the employment ery second and third-rate employés.

392. You would then have envoys and secre-s paid, and a certain number of attachés who ive premiums?—An unlimited number of chés, who may pass this examination that I k of, and whose services the Foreign Secrecan pay for as soon as they have, by their nination, shown that they have the know-e which the Foreign Office expect them to 393. I think you said that you were not erse to seeing junior members of the diploic service drafted into certain consular apıtments?—I should wish to see all the ular appointments, which have a distinct tical character, amalgamated with the diploic service.

394. It has been observed several times that e danger might exist of making such juniors became consuls, invested with a certain tical character, prone to what is called needintermedling; do you think that there is much ger of that?—No, I think it is just the re-
e. The danger of meddling arises when you a man utterly unused to political work into st where he has a certain amount of political k to do. Such a man suddenly finding him-in a place like Bucharest or Belgrade, where e is a good deal of important political work, n danger of exaggerating the nature of his tical functions, whereas a man who has been etary of embassy, and who knows the comative importance of work at Bucharest, and at Paris or Vienna, is not likely to make t mistake.

395. Do you think, generally, that there is a osition on the part of persons in our diploic and consular services to meddle?—Absoly none; the tendency is very much the erse; the tendency is for them to abstain as ch as possible from anything in which they ld burn their fingers. As regards that ques-ı of what is called intervention, I must con-
, having for about 20 years been watching international relations, that I am of opinion
t the cry about the damage and harm
t has been done by needless intervention, s very much more upon public opinion and ular writers in England (certainly it does not upon the diplomatic profession, which is a re instrument) than it does upon Cabinet isters or upon the Foreign Office. If we k at the questions relating to Poland, and ly, and Denmark, what really happened was t a sort of strong and violent public symhy, expressing itself in public meetings, l articles in the press, and so forth, reed upon the imagination of foreigners
d the people concerned, so as to make them lieve that what a public meeting with a ular chairman, in England, decided, would be ified by Parliament. I think that anybody o has considered a little the history of such estions as the Polish question and the Italian question, will see that the right horse has yet to be saddled. We forget altogether, or we do not sufficiently consider that what a great free people like the people of England expresses vociferously at a public meeting, people abroad take for good coin. And when we talk of intervention we must remember that it is we, as a nation, who are to a very great extent responsible for that. We are excessively fond of meddling as a nation; just take the instance of all those mayors who went the other day in a procession, by special train, to pay their respects to King Leopold, and those volunteer deputations that go there every six weeks. Well of course we know the value of that, but we must not suppose that the Belgians know the value of it. We must not suppose that the Belgians look upon it as meaning anything else than that if they were to kick over the traces, and to make themselves disagreeable to France, all these mayors would instantly call public meetings and urge war to the knife with France. If you told them that on the contrary these mayors would be the first to call public meetings to protest against war, no Belgian would believe you. Coming from a free people the sort of thing that I have been describing is after all more intervention than anything that a cabinet can do, and I am certainly inclined to say that the diplomatic service served by the Foreign Office, and with a man like Lord Clarendon for Her Majesty's Foreign Minister, is a very useful corrective to popular vociferousness of that kind.

4396. Mr. Eastwick.] Would you think it expedient, that being the case, for the Foreign Office and the diplomatic service to instruct the press at certain times, or up to a certain point?—I consider the less diplomatic agents have to do with the press the better.

4397. You would not furnish information to it?—I would not furnish political information.

4398. But in such a case, for instance, as this which you have just been mentioning, of the mayors who went to Belgium, would it not be advantageous to put in an article which would say that there was no deep meaning, no political meaning, in such a circumstance?—Well, I think that that is the business of the press of a country like England, but the proper channel of communication is the accredited minister, and it is his business to represent the true state of the case to the Government. I know nothing, of course, of what has taken place at Brussels, but it is the business of an English representative to keep the government to which he is accredited thoroughly acquainted with the attitude of England to that government.

4399. So that that government might, if it pleased, having the correct information, take any steps to instruct the press accordingly?—Yes.

4400. Take, for instance, India, where there is no authentic information with respect to matters in Persia, owing to our relations with Persia being under the Foreign Office. Do not you think that it is a dangerous thing if the press continually goes on writing against Persia, and representing erroneous facts as to the movement of Persian troops so as to excite the public feeling both of Europeans and of the West Indian population against the Persians?—Well, I should consider that an English diplomatic agent should use the official knowledge that he has, to correct positively false data.

4401. Or the Indian government?—I think that you cannot possibly do too much in the way of correcting actually false information. It is a perfectly legitimate function of a diplomatic agent to correct false information.

Mr. Morier, C.B.

23 June 1870.

4402. With regard to the examinations, do not you think it is most desirable to have the very best talent of the country in the diplomatic service?—Certainly.

4403. Do not you think that we might get better talent than we have by attending more to examinations?—Certainly; that is my notion of a maximum test examination.

4404. And do you not think it desirable to have a stringent examination at an early part of a man's career, rather than to admit him on very slight grounds into the service, and then continue examinations afterwards?—Certainly. As I said before, I would have no examination for the unpaid attachés, and I would have the very highest possible test examination to be passed once for all, it being at the option of th individual whether he would submit himself t that examination or not.

4405. I would like to ask what you would d with these unpaid attachés; supposing that t gentleman had been serving for a number o years as an unpaid attaché, and could not succee in getting through the examination, what woul you do with him?—That is entirely his own loo out. I would have no contract with him; th the man had passed his examination, the Stat should know nothing of him.

4406. If you could amalgamate the politic consular service and the diplomatic service the way which you propose, you would keep, suppose, the mere shipping consuls in a total distinct service, and not connect them with th diplomatic service at all?—I would keep the perfectly distinct.

Sir HENRY DRUMMOND WOLFF, K.C.M.G., called in; and further Examined.

Sir H. D. Wolff, K.C.M.G.

30 June 1870.

407. Mr. Rylands.] I THINK that although have not been long in the diplomatic service, have had many opportunities of visiting the itions in various parts of the world?—Yes, I attached twice to legations during the time I was in the Foreign Office, and I have also velled a good deal and seen a good deal of our itions in foreign countries.

408. Which legations were you attached to? was at Florence, and for a very short time I attached to a special mission at Brussels.

409. And in addition to being at those places have had the opportunity of observing the king of other foreign legations in Europe?—s.

410. Have you formed any opinion, from your portunity of judging of foreign missions, whe- r any reduction could be practically made in staff employed in the foreign legations?—I rely think that any reduction could be made the existing staff of legations. One or two sions, perhaps, might be reduced. For in- nce, the mission at Stuttgardt appears to me be one that might be reduced for two reasons. the first place, I do not think that the mission re is of any very great use, and in the second ce, Wurtemburg has no mission in England, l reciprocity is the essence of diplomacy.

411. That reply has reference to the absolute uction of small missions; but in the larger sions, where you would not absolutely abolish m, have you formed any judgment as to ether the staff of secretaries and attachés nected with the legations is more numerous n necessary?—I do not think that the staff is all too numerous.

412. You are not prepared to recommend any uction of the staff?—No, not at all.

413. Have you formed any opinion as to ether such a reduction could be made by the ployment of efficient persons attached to the ations in a permanent character as clerks?—I ve been here on two occasions previously, and ard that question asked, and I have considered since I was here; but I do not think that, by employment of clerks, you would achieve at I imagine you have in view, namely, eco- my: because, if you are to have an efficient rk, he must speak the language of the country, and in addition to that he must speak French. I do not think that you would get a clerk with those capabilities for a less salary than you pay to a second secretary. Therefore I do not see that you would gain anything by employing a clerk of that kind. Perhaps at some of the large embassies, like Paris, or some of the other embassies, you might employ a clerk for current business, the police business and things of that kind; but I think generally the addition of clerks to diplomatic establishments could not be introduced as a general system.

4414. You have spoken in reference to economy; do you not think that the salary of a second secretary would be higher than would be necessary to secure the services of a subordinate clerk of the character suggested?—A second secretary generally receives between 250 l. and 400 l. a year; and I scarcely think that you would get a clerk talking languages, and having the accomplishments necessary for the position of a clerk at a legation, for less than that, considering too that he would have to leave England.

4415. The other idea is, that it is not improbable a clerk of that character, kept at regular routine chancery work, would get through more work than is now got through by any single under secretary; what is your view on that?—My own experience of secretaries is, that though they do not always have a great deal to do regularly every day, yet whenever there is a great emergency of business they are always very active and very anxious to do their work properly, and I think that they would do it with more intelligence than a clerk; and as to the salary, I am convinced that it would be about the same. I do not think that you would get a clerk talking languages to do more than a secretary, or to do it for less salary.

4416. Of course, taking the view which you gave us the other day of the amalgamation of the services, you would scarcely think it advisable, in reference to the block that has been complained of, to appoint such officers?—Certainly not. And there is another danger in it, which I have myself seen. I cannot refer to individual cases, because it would look personal; but I think that there have been occasionally cases where a man has got into a kind of subordinate position, and has made that a species of fulcrum to work himself up. It is rather a dangerous precedent, except, as I say, in large embassies like Paris, where there is a good deal of current business which does not require a man of any social standing to attend to it. I do not think that you would achieve economy by that plan, or efficiency.

4417. In reference to your experience at the Foreign Office, I should wish to ask you some questions in relation to the distribution of the business at present. The different countries of the world are divided into classes, and are confided to separate officials in the Foreign Office, are they not?—Yes.

4419. I suppose that, in the first place, it goes through the clerks allotted to the department to which the country belongs, and from the clerks, I presume, that ordinary business would go, in the first instance, through the senior clerk?—I suppose that the work is conducted in the same way as when I was in the Foreign Office. If a bag comes in, for instance, from a foreign mission, if it is out of office hours it is taken to the resident clerk, if it is in office hours it is taken to the geographical department to which the mission belongs. The papers are then taken out; if it is during office hours, they are at once registered by anybody in the department, and then they are sent to the Under Secretary of the department in boxes, who sends them at once to the Secretary of State.

4420. Can you tell me what the senior clerk does in connection with that bag; supposing a bag came in from Italy, it would go, as you have just told us, to one of the junior clerks; and then would it go directly from the junior clerk, after being registered, to the Under Secretary of State?—There is some alteration in the office in the distribution of the rooms since I was there; because, when I was in the Foreign Office, it was in the old building, and nearly everybody in the department sat in the same room. Naturally the senior clerk was in the room and looked through the despatches, and they would not be sent on from the department except with the cognizance of the senior clerk. The senior clerk would look through the despatches that came, and anything of a routine character he would keep back for the moment, and he would send on the more pressing ones. If he saw that in any particular case any reference was necessary, and there was time for it and no great hurry about the thing, he would desire somebody to annex the former papers to the particular despatches which required a reference. He then sent them in a box with his name (labels being for that purpose prepared) to the Under Secretary of his division.

4421. That is to say, to either the permanent or the Political Under Secretary, whichever was the one to whom the particular division containing that country of the world belonged?—Yes.

4422. Are you aware that, in the division which is made in the Foreign Office, the despatches from the most important embassies and legations abroad go to the Permanent Under Secretary and not to the Political Under Secretary?—By the present arrangement he divides the duties absolutely with the Political Under Secretary.

4423. And perhaps you are aware that [illegible] most important countries, those countries [illegible] which the most important negotiations are likely to arise, are allotted to the Permanent Under Secretary, and not to the Political Under Secretary?—I believe they are, but there has been little redistribution since I left the Foreign Office.

4424. It is the fact that the Permanent Under Secretary has the lion's share in the distribution of business?—You have got the distribution of the Foreign Office list, and therefore you can see what it is now; but in my time it was pretty equal. The Political Under Secretary had Austria and the whole of Germany, as well as Spain and South America, and everything that was Spanish or Portuguese; but I find that since I left the office they have added a commercial department and given the Political Under Secretary the commercial department, and taken away one of the political departments.

4425. With regard to the commercial department, it is given to the two Under Secretaries conjointly; Mr. Hammond and Mr. Otway are put down as the Superintending Under Secretaries of that department; and that is the case, I think also with reference to the internal arrangements and other business of the office. But in the distribution of the diplomatic business abroad, the countries given to the Permanent Secretary are as follows: France, Italy, Madagascar, Switzerland, and miscellaneous, Barbary States, Egypt, Greece, Persia, Russia, and Turkey, China, Japan, Siam and United States, Argentine Confederation, Bolivia, Brazil, Central America, Chili, Columbia, Equator, Haiti, Mexico, Peru, Portugal, Spain, Uraguay, and Venezuela. Having read that list, I think you will agree that it does embrace a very large amount of the current business of the office?—Evidently.

4426. The effect of that would be, that the despatches from abroad in connection with those departments would go to the Permanent Under Secretary, would receive his minutes, and would be sent from him direct to the Foreign Secretary?—Yes.

4427. Without in the first place passing through the hands of the Political Under Secretary?—Just so.

4428. The decision come to upon those despatches would be formed by the Foreign Secretary in conjunction with the Permanent Under Secretary?—Yes.

4429. And then communicated to the Political Under Secretary, but not before; that, you are aware, is the course of business, as the ordinary rule?—Yes; it goes to the Under Secretary of the division, who sends it to the Secretary of State, who then sends it back to the department through the other Under Secretary, but after his decision is taken.

4430. After his decision is taken by consultation with the Permanent Under Secretary?—Yes, if he chooses to consult him.

4431. But the effect of that is, that the decision is taken before the Political Under Secretary has any voice in the matter?—Yes, certainly.

4432. With reference to financial questions in relation to increase of expenditure, or any proposal whatever in connection with the expenditure under the Foreign Office, are you aware that that is determined chiefly by the Foreign retary, in conjunction with the Permanent ler Secretary, and not with the advice of the tical Under Secretary?—Yes, certainly; all office arrangements, including finance, are lucted by the Permanent Under Secretary.

433. From your knowledge of the working he Foreign Office, do not the arrangements which I have alluded tend necessarily to a very much greater amount of control to Permanent Under Secretary than to the tical Under Secretary?—Yes, certainly.

434. Are you aware of the arrangements in r departments of the State, in connection, with the Colonial Office?—Yes; in the nial Office the arrangement is different; the x is divided there between the Permanent er Secretary and the Assistant Under Secreand goes through the Political Under etary.

435. Then, in fact, in the Colonial Office the ness comes ultimately through the Political er Secretary to the Secretary of State?—
I must observe that there is one thing must be borne in mind as a point of differ-between the two offices, which is this. In Colonial Office there is is no rapidity of .; it is not necessary. Everything is a quesof precedent and former correspondence, nothing presses from one day to another.
ything may be adjourned; in fact, it rees more deliberation than the business in the eign Office, where a despatch comes from a gn diplomatist to the Foreign Office, which ires merely the judgment of the Secretary tate, and no reference to any former pro-ing or analogies of any kind. For instance, the case of the Greek assassination the other
In that case there were no former papers ired, or any consultation at all. The papers e in, and, I suppose, went to the Secretary of e, and he formed his own judgment from papers before him. Therefore you do not ire the same deliberation in the Foreign e, and the same consultation, as you do in Colonial Office; and the passage of the rs through one Under Secretary to the etary of State takes place much faster, by n of their merely going through one Under etary of State, than would be the case in Colonial Office, where everything is carefully ted first by a clerk, and then goes through different Under Secretaries to the Secretary
State, a week after it arrives, perhaps;
reas, in the Foreign Office, the despatches go e Secretary of State within 10 minutes after arrival. That makes a difference, but I x, on the whole, it would be advantageous he Foreign Office if there were some re-ngement as to the position of the Political er Secretary.

436. I must not take you into details on this
t, but can you say whether, in your judg-
, it would be desirable that the whole of diplomatic correspondence should be divided een two Permanent Assistant Secretaries, that matters of importance should go through Political Under Secretary to the Secretary of
?—I could not well answer that question, ss I could intrude upon the Committee for a ute or two, to explain my general views on matter. I should not care about the papers g straight to the Secretary of State, through Permanent Under Secretary of State, so long as the Political Under Secretary had some voice before the final decision was taken. The final decision is not taken on the paper at once The Secretary of State minutes this paper, and it goes back again to the department, and then the drafts and so on are sent up to the Secretary of State. I think that it would be advantageous that the Political Under Secretary should have some voice in the drafts before they go to the Secretary of State, because, otherwise, any remark he had to make would entail his asking the Secretary of State, who is his chief, to reconsider his decision. It would be advisable that he should have some voice before the decision was taken, so as not to be put in the invidious position of asking the Secretary of State to reconsider his decision. And with regard to the general question, it appears to me that the present arrangement of having the Secretary of State in the House of Lords, and the Under Secretary of State in the House of Commons, is the best arrangement that there could be, because the work of a Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs would, at times, be a very great deal too heavy for him, if he were at the same time in the House of Commons. On the other hand, I have also seen that the Foreign Office has come into trouble when it has not been represented in the House of Commons. The only two occasions which I recollect of an adverse division in the House of Commons on a Foreign Office question, were occasions when there was no representative of the Foreign Office in the House of Commons; that is to say, on the China question, and on the Conspiracy Bill. At that time both the Secretary of State and the Political Under Secretary were in the House of Lords. I think it is very advantageous for the Foreign Office that it should be represented in the House of Commons by a special officer, and also that the House of Commons should be reflected back to the Foreign Office by the same channel.

4437. Then, in fact, according to your plan, you think that the diplomatic arrangements throughout the world would be more under the control of Parliament, and would be more likely to be efficiently represented by an Under Secretary of State in the House of Commons, if he were placed in the position which you think the Under Secretary should be placed in in relation to the work of the office?—Yes. I do not say that I should put him over the head of the Permanent Under Secretary, but I think that he ought to have a voice in everything of importance before the Secretary of State gives his final decision.

4438. Mr. W. Lowther.] In giving your evidence upon the Foreign Office you speak from your experience of what it was when you were there, which is some time ago?—Yes.

4439. Did the Political Under Secretary write many despatches when you were there?—That varied very much; sometimes he did and sometimes he did not.

4440. He always had access to all the correspondence that came into the office?—He had access to it, but it was subsequent access, in a case where the matter was not in his own department.

4441. But it would retard business rather if every subject was to be referred to the Political Under Secretary, would it not; for example, now the Under Secretary is attending a Committee here at two o'clock, and may be in the House till till 12 o'clock to night?—There might be, of course, a little delay, and where there was delay it must be overlooked; but I think, generally speaking, it would be advantageous if he saw every draft of importance before it went to the Secretary of State for approval.

Sir H. D. Wolff, K.C.M.G.

30 June 1870.

4442. And you suppose that he does not?—I am certain that he does not, unless they have changed the practice very much.

4443. Mr. Rylands.] That is to say, he does not know the decision till after it is come to?—Yes; there is no mechanism by which he is absolutely cognizant of every decision before it is taken.

4444. Mr. W. Lowther.] With regard to the reduction of missions, I think you stated that you were in favour of Stuttgardt being reduced?—Yes.

4445. Altogether done away with?—No. I think that there ought to be somebody there; but I do not see any advantage in having a minister there.

4446. You have never been employed in Germany, have you?—No; I have travelled there.

4447. But you have not been employed there?—No; but I have been employed in the German department of the Foreign Office.

4448. Viscount Barrington.] I think you stated that it was your opinion that ambassadors should change with every change of Government?—Only the ambassador at Paris.

4449. Not other ambassadors?—I think it would be advantageous; but I do not think that it is so necessary with regard to the other ambassadors as it is with regard to the ambassador at Paris.

4450. Would not that lead to extra expense to the country?—I do not see that it would involve any expense at all, except the outfit, which is very small. The ambassador has a house at Paris, and his outfit, I think, is about a third of his salary, which would make it about 3,000*l.* It always was the case, until the year 1852, that the ambassador there did change. If you look back, in the Foreign Office List, at the list of ambassadors, you will find that there was a regular change of ambassadors at Paris with every administration. Formerly Lord Stuart de Rothsay, Lord Granville, and Lord Cowley used regularly to ring the changes of English administrations at Paris; then in 1847, when Sir Robert Peel's Government was turned out, Lord Normanby was appointed; and when Lord Normanby retired, in 1852, Lord Cowley was appointed, and he was the first ambassador who remained there under successive administrations.

4451. I suppose you are alluding to their different home political feelings?—Yes.

4452. But I presume that no ambassador would remain there if he objected to carry out the orders of the Government; it would be impossible, in fact, for him to do so?—But I think that there is this danger very often; I do not say that it ever has occurred, but I think that there is the danger of his serving one Government more willingly than he would another.

4453. Take the instance of a Peer and an ambassador who has no very particular political opinions one way or the other, who sits on the cross benches in the House of Lords?—I of course cannot go into a personal question, but I am very strongly of opinion that the public service would be promoted by a change of ambadors at Paris with every administration.

4454. At the same time you only give tha your opinion without actually stating why think so?—If I stated why, I should hav give personal motives, which you would not me to give. I should not mind explainin you alone, but I could not say it in public.

4455. Mr. Cameron.] With reference to change of ambassadors at Paris, do not you th that if your principle were carried out it w destroy the feeling that however much the h policy of this country might be changed, regard to foreign affairs, the policy of this c try always remains the same?—I think th would be more strongly expressed if you h change of ambassadors at Paris. There is n a change of policy on the part of the Gov ment, not a real and fundamental change, there are changes in their views of manipula certain questions.

4456. But surely if this country were change its representative at Paris each time the Home Government was changed it w imply a certain intention to change its for policy?—No, I do not think so. For insta to give you one case, the Government of L Palmerston was turned out in 1858, on the C spiracy Bill, and Lord Cowley was then am sador at Paris. Naturally he was to a cer extent connected with Lord Clarendon in policy which was rejected by the House of C mons. I think that it would have been ad tageous if Lord Cowley had retired in 1858 Lord Clarendon, because there was a chang the manipulation of a question, though t was no change in the feeling of alliance tow France; the policy of that Conspiracy Bill changed, but it did not change on general ings of alliance towards France. Another vernment came in, and I think that it w have been advantageous if another ambass at Paris had announced to the French Gov ment what the English Government intende do; to keep up the alliance, but still u another process.

4457. In fact, I may take it to be opinion that a change of our ambassador at P with each successive Government here w imply, not a change of policy, but exactly reverse?—It need not imply anything at You send a new ambassador, and I think it im a strong feeling of friendship towards Fran you send a man who has the intimate confid and is the associate of the new Governm rather than keep an ambassador who, how high in position, is the mere agent of succe Governments.

4458. With reference to an answer which gave to Mr. Lowther, do I rightly under you to say that the Political Under Secreta never consulted by the Principal Secreta State for Foreign Affairs on matters conn with those countries which come under the manent Under Secretary?—Not necessarily 4459. As a fact?—As a fact he may s particular cases where he does consult him; as a matter of fact, the Political Under Secr has no voice that affects the other departm unless either the other Under Secretary o Secretary of State chooses to consult him has no right to volunteer his opinion.

4460. But surely in every matter, exce matters of the most trivial nature, the Secr of State consults the Political Under Secretary?—It was not so in my time. Of course, if they are on friendly terms, they talk to each other, and the Secretary of State communicates things to the Political Under Secretary, but there is no mechanism by which the Political Under Secretary can, so to say, force his opinion on the office before a decision is taken.

4461. Is it your opinion that the arrangement of the interior of a public department, the distribution of bags and of the work between the clerks, is a desirable subject for Parliamentary interference, and that it might not be left to the head of the department itself?—I think that the distribution of work is merely a matter of detail; but for the reasons that I assigned just now I consider that the Political Under Secretary, who is reflecting the element of the House of Commons in the Foreign Office, should have the means of expressing an opinion on every paper before the ultimate decision is taken.

4462. And in your belief at present he has not that power?—In my belief at present he has not that power.

4463. Mr. Eastwick.] Would it not also be an item of expense in changing the ambassador at Paris, that you have to give a pension to every ambassador who retires?—You would not necessarily do that. Lord Normanby had no pension when he left Paris.

4464. After three years' service as an ambassador a man would have a right to a pension, would he not?—He must have had the Queen's commission 15 years before he is entitled to a pension, and then the three years' service as an ambassador gives him the right to the highest scale of pension.

4465. But there would be many cases; in fact, it would generally be the case that they would have served their time?—Except that if you were to send a politician from England to Paris as ambassador, he would take the post as an English minister does, and would not look for a pension any more than an English minister.

Mr. Robert Burnet David Morier, C.B., called in; and further Examined.

4466. Mr. Rylands.] When we had the pleasure of seeing you before, I understood you to object to competitive examinations as applied to the foreign service, and I think I understood that you thought there was an objection applicable to them in relation to the foreign service which did not obtain in relation to other services?—Certainly.

4467. And that the tendency would be that competitive examinations might bring in persons of a character which would have the effect of destroying that international confidence that you think so necessary in the conduct of legations?—What I said with regard to competitive examinations was only the logical consequence of what I said with regard to the appointments to the service generally; I think that they ought to be absolutely in the hands of the Foreign Secretary. To have persons forced upon the service by a body such as the Civil Service Examiners, who are outside the Foreign Office, would be to diminish that confidence, because it would so far take the thing out of the hands of the Foreign Secretary.

4468. Have you seen the recent Order in Council in relation to competitive examinations, as applied to the public departments?—I have not read it carefully.

4469. Perhaps you may have observed it so far as to know that it is intended, under the Order in Council, that when a man passes a competitive examination for a particular department, he shall be drafted to that department and serve a probation there, and shall have no right to employment unless he receives a certificate of approval from the head of the department into which he is drafted?—I was aware of that.

4470. The effect of that would be that, supposing a number of young men went into the foreign department under open competitive examination, none of them would be appointed without the sanction of the Secretary of State; and in that event do you not think that there would be a very great approach to your idea of responsibility?—I do not think that six months would be sufficient to give anybody that knowledge of the individual which is required, and the Foreign Secretary would still not be responsible for him; he would be to a certain extent responsible, in so far that he had had opportunity for six months to watch him, but he would not have that absolute responsibility of which I spoke; he would not be responsible in the same sense as if he had himself selected him. If you will allow me I will give an instance of the sort of thing I mean. Within a fortnight of being named unpaid attaché I was called upon to accompany Lord Westmorland to the camp held at Olmütz, just before the Crimean War. It was one of the most important crises in modern European history. I was the only person with Lord Westmorland. Business of the very greatest importance was being transacted every day, and I had access to information of the greatest money value; I mean knowledge which I could not only have sold for any sum almost, but which would have enabled me to play on the funds with absolute certainty. I was going every day to Count Nesselrode, to Count Buol, or some other Minister, with messages of various kinds from Lord Westmorland, having reference to the business being transacted, and I was being treated on the most absolutely confidential terms. I think that is a sort of thing that could not possibly have been done unless the Foreign Minister who had appointed me had been wholly responsible for my nomination; and I think that what I call international confidence could not have been the same if Count Nesselrode, and these different persons with whom I was helping to transact business, had known that I had been delivered over labelled as fit for use by a body outside the Foreign Office.

4471. But if a man were introduced by competitive examination into the foreign service, and if then his subsequent promotion took place in the way that you would very much approve of, I mean in consideration of his merit and peculiar ability for the service, when he got to the position which you occupied there, do not you think that, under those circumstances, he would be very likely to be deserving of confidence, and that, inasmuch as his promotion had arisen out of merit, there would not be any objection felt to it by the members members of other legations?—I was an unpaid attaché, having been exactly a fortnight in the service, therefore I was in the position of one of those persons immediately appointed.

Mr. Morier, C.B.

4472. But that must be unusual for a very young man to be placed in a position of such confidence?—I was unfortunately not a very young man then. It was before the rule limiting the age of admission had been established; and I may incidentally remark that I consider this rule as thoroughly bad, and calculated to keep very good men out of the profession.

4473. But I am assuming that when men get into such a position they will have passed through such a career of promotion by merit, as to have removed the difficulty that you suggest?—I have a strong belief that the Foreign Secretary must be absolutely responsible; and I think if you ask a man to do difficult work he must choose his own tools, and he must not have his tools forced upon him by outsiders.

4474. I understood you to sustain the position of Darmstadt as a mission on several grounds; one of which was the obtaining of information in reference to the political and commercial affairs of Germany; I think that was one of the most important reasons of all that you gave?—I did not mean by that finding out secret information, but I meant that, in the case of Darmstadt, there was an opportunity of watching, for instance, the action and the legislation of the German Parliament as affecting a State which was only partly in it and was partly without it, and questions of that kind; opportunity of watching the process of reconstruction, in which Germany is at present engaged.

4475. As to the position of Darmstadt, I think it is not very far from Carlsrhue by railway, four or five hours?—About four hours.

4476. And it is also near Stuttgardt?—About six hours from Stuttgardt, I should think.

4477. In your judgment, from your experience do you not think that, placed as you are in Darmstadt, all the information that might be necessary to be obtained on the various points to which you have alluded, might be obtained by you without the necessity of having these appointments at Carlsrhue and Stuttgardt?—I think that is a question you can hardly ask me to answer.

4478. I will not press it if you do not like to answer it; I will put it in this way: do not you think that your position in Darmstadt enables you to get information in reference to the affairs of Germany, and the commercial interests of this country affected in Germany, extending over a much wider area than Hesse Darmstadt, where you are stationed?—Yes.

4479. I am quite aware that we are indebted to you and other members of the service for valuable information and important reports in connection with land tenure and other questions; perhaps you will allow me to ask you whether it is the fact that a greater amount of attention has been paid by the representatives of England abroad to commercial questions during the last few years than was formerly the case?—Very much greater; indeed, there is no comparison between the work that has been done within the last 10 or 15 years and the work done before. The system of reporting is quite new, and there is no foreign diplomatic body which does it at all to the extent that we do.

4480. I suppose that it is felt in the service now, that if a man makes himself competent in relation to questions affecting the material interests of the British Empire, it will be very much to his credit with the authorities at home?—Very much to his credit, but not to his advancement, owing to the seniority system.

4481. If your view were carried out, you would make it a matter that would tell on his advancement?—To the very greatest possible extent.

4482. And you think that that would be an encouragement in the very great labour that would necessarily be entailed on him, to a man who does his duty in obtaining this important information?—It would make the whole difference.

4483. Your whole career, I think you said, has been spent in Germany?—With the exception of accompanying a special mission to Naples my whole career has been spent in Germany.

4484. Do you not think that the effect of your having been so much in Germany is to give you experience of very great value in your present position in Germany?—Certainly.

4485. You would not consider, for instance, that you would be in a position so well adapted to promote the interests of England if you were removed to some country with which you had no previous acquaintance at all?—No; I could not say that I should have the same feeling of confidence. I have been 17 years in Germany, and I can honestly say that it is only quite lately that I have begun to feel that I have the power of really judging of social and political questions in Germany.

4486. You do not think then that, in reference to diplomacy, it is a desirable thing that a man should have a smattering of all the countries on the face of the earth, and no full knowledge of any particular country?—I think it is impossible to lay down an absolute rule of that kind. For many reasons it is desirable that a man should know many countries; and, at the same time, it is desirable that there should be in the profession a certain number of men who are thoroughly acquainted with the different countries. I do not think that you can lay down a rule on the subject.

4487. But you think that the knowledge which a man may obtain by having passed a career in a particular large country, such as Germany, ought to be a consideration in the appointments to the higher and more responsible offices in that part of the world?—I think so.

4488. Of course all that is consistent with your idea, that in every direction promotion should depend upon experience, ability, and zeal?—Yes.

4489. With regard to that promotion arising from the superiority of a man's character and services, you think that the fact that there was promotion by merit would do a great deal to remove the feeling of hopelessness that you speak of as prevailing in the profession?—It would entirely remove it, I think.

4490. It would have this effect, I presume, in your judgment, that if a man were an inefficient man, and saw that he had no chance of getting on, he would become hopeless, and very likely might go out of the profession?—Which would be very desirable.

4491. There is no objection to the inefficient men becoming hopeless; the objection is to men of ability becoming hopeless?—Just so.

4492. There

4492. There was something said about the contract under which men have entered into the diplomatic profession; but do you consider that that contract went to the extent that it would prevent the Secretary of State at the present time from making rules as to promotion depending upon merit?—I think with regard to the men who have entered since 1861, that they have a very fair right to look forward to the operation of the system of seniority up to the grade of first secretary of legation.

4493. Then you think that we are in this position, that as regards those now in the service, there could not be any material alteration of the system, so as to promote by merit, and not by seniority?—I was asked, on the former occasion, by Mr. Otway, whether I had considered what means there were of relieving the block. I had not considered the point at that time, but I have thought of it since, and I have put down in writing a few suggestions that I think might be adopted. As regards the momentary causes of the block, some means should be found of retaining the good men, and getting rid of the bad men.

4494. Chairman.] That is the problem to solve?—That is the problem to solve; because, in the present state of the labour market, a man who has attained a status in the diplomatic profession, who is known to have been a trusted agent of the Government, who has a thorough acquaintance with foreign languages, who has mastered all the details of finance and of the productive resources of European countries, is a man who can any day command a very large price if he chooses to go out of the service, and serve in one of those numerous international undertakings which are becoming every day more developed. Therefore a man of that sort can get his price; and I know at the present moment (of course I cannot mention names) several persons, very excellent public servants, who are only waiting to see whether there is a prospect of this block being got rid of, before they decide on leaving diplomacy, and going into private enterprises of that kind.

4495. Those are the people that you wish to retain?—Those are the people that I wish to retain; for if those people go out you retain the second-rate people, who, having no chance in any other profession, are only too glad to go on, however slowly, by seniority. I can mention the case of Mr. Herbert, who was assassinated at Athens, and I think everybody who read his letters will have formed some sort of idea of how valuable a life his was. I considered him one of the very best men in the service. The last conversation that I had with him was on this very subject, and that is why I mention him. He described the perfect hopelessness of going on with the profession, and told me that it was his intention to leave it. The following is the proposal which I thought of: a high test examination, principally in subjects chosen by the candidates and connected with the countries in which the individuals had been employed, to which all unpaid attachés and second and third secretaries might voluntary offer themselves within the next two years; those who passed that examination should be placed at the head of the list of second secretaries, and receive an additional gratuity; those who did not pass it, or did not present themselves, would then have the option of remaining where they were or leaving the service with a fair compensation; that is, of course, upon the assumption that some such general plan as that which I have proposed for the reorganisation of the service, of a high test examination instead of a low entrance examination, should be adopted.

4496. That is to say, a test examination in substitution for an entrance examination?—I propose three classes of diplomatic servants, a first, and second, and third class; I wish to have a third class, consisting of unpaid attachés, who would have the right to present themselves for this very high test examination; I think this plan might be, in a modified form, applied at present, viz., to give these men the option of passing such an examination, and thus to place them at the head of the list of second secretaries.

4497. Mr. Eastwick.] You would give, I suppose, a certain amount of pension to those who have been in the service, but availed themselves of the option of leaving it?—Yes, and the others who remained would simply find themselves behind the men who had passed the high test examination; you would push those men forward, and the others would have the chance of waiting for what might happen to them, or be allowed to leave the service with fair compensation.

4498. Mr. W. Cartwright.] That is an expedient in regard to the present block?—That is an expedient in regard to the present block.

4499. And it would not affect permanently your other scheme?—In no way whatever; it is merely in order to get rid of the agglomeration, and to give a premium to the good men by placing them at the head of the list, and with an additional salary of, say 200 l.

4500. Viscount Barrington.] Those in the service who had already gone through two examinations would have to go through a third examination, in fact?—Yes.

4501. Mr. Rylands.] I understood you to mean that all who chose to go through this examination, and who went through it with credit to themselves, would then get a step which would place them in the line of promotion much higher than the others?—Yes, first for selection for the post of first secretary.

4502. And that those who either did not pass, or did not choose to enter their names for this stiff examination, would be left in a position no doubt of disadvantage, but from which they would have, if they chose, the chance of relieving themselves by retiring from the service on some commutation?—I think with a considerable compensation, because it is the House of Commons that has produced the seniority system, and I think the House of Commons ought to pay those who have entered it on the faith of this recommendation of theirs.

4503. Mr. Eastwick.] You would estimate their pension according to their length of service?—Yes; I do not know upon what principle it would be done, but I believe that has been done in the army and navy.

4504. Mr. W. Cartwright,] Those who passed the examination would, as a reward, receive a bonus?—A bonus of some 200 l. or 300 l. a year, whatever it might be, which would give them a fair salary, which they at present are not receiving.

4505. Viscount Barrington.] I understand you to have the greatest possible faith in the amount of responsibility which, under your plan, would be placed in the Foreign Secretary?—Yes.

Mr. Morier, C.B.

30 June 1870.

4506. Why could not the Foreign Secretary now select the best men?—Because I think it would be an invidious thing for him to do. I should, however, be perfectly happy to see it done.

4507. But surely it would be rather unjust, considering that the diplomatic service is now a profession, and that gentlemen who entered it under certain conditions, namely, that there was to be a first and a second examination, if, having gone through that second examination, they found themselves all of a sudden called upon to pass a third?—The injustice already exists, because the State has entered into a contract which it cannot fulfill. I wish to restrict the injustice to the inefficient men, and to diminish this injustice as regards these men by a large compensation. Of course the examination I propose would be entirely voluntary.

4508. As I understand it, if they objected to pass this third examination, then they would be eliminated from the service?—No, they would only find themselves behind those who had passed it.

4509. But with very little chance of future promotion?—With very little chance of future promotion, certainly.

4510. Mr. Rylands.] They have not much chance now, have they?—They have very little chance now. The difficulty is that you have got this block, and if the blocks lasts I can positively predict that the good men will leave it, and that the bad men will be left in; that is a thing of which you may be perfectly certain.

4511. Mr. W. Cartwright.] Your plan would be an incentive, and a means to push the good men on at once?—Yes.

4512. And to get rid of the inferior men at a fair compensation?—Yes.

4513. Mr. Rylands.] And you would propose, after this arrangement, which you recommend merely as one of an extremely exceptional character, that it should be understood that all promotion should be by merit, and that this system of seniority should be entirely done away with?—Yes.

4514. Then comes in your plan for the general service; that you would introduce under certain conditions, persons into the service, and give them to understand that their promotion would depend on their efficiency; the effect of that, you believe, would be, that in future bad men would go out of the service and good men would remain in?—Yes. I will furnish the Committee afterwards with my scheme, in writing, that they may have it more clearly before them. The paper I have written relates to the block, as caused by permanent defects in the constitution of the service, and also to the block as arising from temporary and accidental causes. I have already read the second part of it; but I should add to this proposal of an examination, that I would grant larger pensions than they would be otherwise entitled to to some of the older servants in the various categories. I should also say, that if any missions are abolished (which I absolutely deprecate myself) I would consider it better not to abolish them altogether, but to change them into chargés d'affairesships, which would relieve the block quicker than anything else, because the chargé d'affairesship would be the reward of a secretary of embassy.

4515. Mr. Cameron.] Did you mention what sort of an examination this should be?—As regards this particular examination which I have suggested, I think the course which one would wish to adopt would be to examine the men in what they already knew; they would themselves submit what they would like to be examined in; a man like Mr. Mitford, for instance, might be examined as regards Japan.

4516. Might it not be possible, in that case, that they would all pass the examination, and you would be as badly off as ever?—I should be very glad indeed if I saw any chance of that. I am supposing a very high standard of examination; that was what I described the last time, that I wished to see an excessively high test examination.

4517. Mr. Eastwick.] Might you not attain your object by offering a pension to those who choose to take it, without this examination, because it seems rather an unjust thing after a man has been subjected to the necessity of two examinations to make him go through this third one; and if you offered a pension you would get rid of a number of men who do not see their way to get on in the service, and leave the best men in?—My fear is the reverse, that if you offered a good premium the good men would take it, because with that they would at once start in private life, and the bad men would remain in the service.

4518. Mr. Cameron.] Would not the service have any attractions for these men if they felt that the block would be done away with?—If they saw their way to the block being removed it would.

4519. Are you aware that something of that kind has been suggested by Mr. Eastwick with reference to the Indian Army?—No.

4520. Mr. Rylands.] You would not, I imagine, at all suppose that it would be a wise way of getting rid of this difficulty to pay people to go out of the service, and take no step in reference to the future introduction of people into the service; supposing the present system continued, the mere fact of getting people to retire from the service now by paying them money would in no way assist the difficulty, because we should have a similar block in the course of a few years?—Yes, I think that would be the case.

4521. You were making a distinction between the diplomatic service and other public services in consequence of the limited number of members of the diplomatic service, and saying that it was difficult to treat it with reference to promotion as an ordinary profession; I think there was some difficulty you thought arising from the narrowness of the service; do you think that it would be at all relieved if there were a greater amalgamation between the diplomatic service and the Foreign Office, so as to secure promotion from one to the other?—That would leave the thing quite where it is; I think it is desirable for its own sake, but I do not see that it would open up any new posts.

4522. Then with regard to the greater amalgamation between the Foreign Office and the diplomatic service, would you suggest that there should be different ranks in regard to position and pay corresponding in the two services; that is to say, that a second secretary abroad should rank with a clerk of a certain standing in the Foreign Office, and that a first secretary abroad should also rank with a clerk of a higher standing in the Foreign Office?—I believe that they already do so.

4523. I believe

523. I believe they do so up to a certain nt, but not all through; you are not aware of t?—I am not aware of that.

524. But I understood your opinion to be , that with such an amalgamation the Foreign retary, if he thought fit, could bring from one he legations abroad some exceedingly suitable er and place him at the head of one of the rtments at home as senior clerk?—I do not at all to propose any cut-and-dried system, use I am not acquainted with the work of the eign Office, but I only meant to say that I ght it desirable that the persons employed in Foreign Office should be personally ac- inted with the work of the diplomatic service, that persons in the diplomatic service should personally acquainted with the work of the eign Office. I think that some scheme might asily arranged, but I cannot propose such a me myself.

525. Assuming that it is the fact, as seems to the case from the Foreign Office arrange- nts, that certain countries are distributed er certain departments to which certain senior ks especially are applied, I understood your ion not to go further than this, that it would n advantage if those senior clerks attached hose departments had had personal experience he countries over which they have to exercise ain power?—I meant to give that rather as nstance of the kind of amalgamation that I ld desire; I did not mean that when a person appointed senior clerk, he should be sent ad to a mission, but if some scheme were pted by which a fifth of every diplomatic at's time was spent in the Foreign Office, and th of the time of every person employed in Foreign Office was spent abroad, then what ld naturally happen would be that the heads epartments would have personal acquaintance so much with the diplomatic service as with countries coming under their immediate cog- nce, and that I thought would give to those ons a far higher interest in the work than y can derive from the mere abstract knowledge ch they obtain by reading despatches. I laid ress upon the advisability of such a system g carried out, principally in order that we are abroad should be under more efficient trol in regard to a great deal of the informa- which we send home, and which can be more iently controlled by a person personally ac- inted with the facts of the case, than by one is not. But there is another side of it which ink, is equally strong: the larger missions really small Foreign Offices; I mean that the sion at Paris and the mission at Berlin, and mission at Vienna are departments in which ry considerable amount of official and routine k is done. That work can only be done pro- y upon a system, and I believe that no office s its work better than the Foreign Office; to have a person coming from the Foreign ce and putting the whole of one of these mis- s in working order would be a very great antage. I was myself in charge of the mis- at Berlin for eight years, and I felt con- tly the want of that sort of knowledge in ting the work done in a shipshape way.

526. Perhaps you are aware that there is a e objection on the part of the Foreign Office ring in junior secretaries from foreign lega- s into the Foreign Office?—I believe I have rd that there was an objection.

4527. But you cannot tell us whether that arises from the fact that the Foreign Office finds that the training of those young gentlemen in foreign legations is not equal to the training which the clerks in the Foreign Office obtain?—They have not the drill, and they have not the discipline, and I think it would be a good thing that the persons employed abroad should have that drill and that discipline which they would get in the Foreign Office, and which it is difficult to get except in a large office where there is a large accumulation of administrative skill.

4528. You consider that by adopting such a plan, on the one hand foreign legations would get an advantage from the greater business regularity of the employés, and on the other hand the Foreign Office would get the advantage of the knowledge and experience of men abroad?—Yes, they would have the interest arising from personal knowledge.

4529. But in your remarks I did not in any way understand you to refer to the Under Secretaries of State; you did not at all think it was necessary that they should have served abroad?—I never mentioned them.

4530. You told us that the consul at Frankfort, and yourself at Darmstadt, worked with very great mutual advantage together?—Yes; we do each other's notarial work when one is away.

4531. Is there any other consular work that you do on behalf of the consul at Frankfort?—No.

4532. It is simply notarial work?—It is merely the notarial work when he is away.

4533. Do you see any disadvantage or difficulty in the consulates being attached to missions in capitals where there are at the present moment missions as well as consulates?—You mean that the minister should do the work which a consul does?

4534. That is to say, that in the mission there should be one of the members of the mission who should attend to consular work, so as to save the expenditure of two establishments?—That is actually done. I am not aware of any paid consulships, except perhaps at Constantinople, in towns where there are ministers. At all events, with regard to Vienna and Berlin, there is a consul general at Berlin who receives no pay, and there is a consul at Vienna who receives no pay; but the notarial work, which is done by a consul, is, in towns where there are missions, always done by the missions.

4535. But in Lisbon, Stockholm, Copenhagen, and other places, there are consulates as well as missions?—I was not aware of that.

4536. I merely wanted to ask you whether you saw any objection to the consulates being attached to the missions in such cases, and I gather that you do not?—The work of a consul at a seaport is a very special sort of work, with which I am not acquainted.

4537. With regard to notarial duties, do you receive the notarial fees?—No.

4538. Do not you even receive them on account of the consul?—No; all the notarial work which is done at the missions is done gratis.

4539. Do you see any reason why that should be so?—I should be very sorry to take half-a-crown from a gentleman who came to be sworn by me.

4540. The consuls do that, do they not?—

Mr. Morier, C.B.

30 June 1870.

There is a difference between the status of a representative of the Crown, and that of a person not a representative of the Crown.

5441. Would not a consul general superintend the taking of the fees in any way?—He might; but he is not a diplomatic agent.

4542. You think that, on the whole, it would not comport with the position of a diplomatic agent to take fees?—No; I think that any work of that sort which is done by a mission should be done gratis; we are paid for political work, and we can do the other work, but we ought not to take money for it.

4543. Mr. Kinnaird.] You often do that other work?—Yes; I have plenty of it, because there is no other diplomatic centre near Frankfort; and when the consul is away from Frankfort, I am obliged to remain at home so many hours to attend to his duties.

4544. When you object to taking fees, you are not talking of any personal feeling, but of the profession?—Yes; ordinary notarial work is unpaid.

4545. It probably would destroy the prestige of the diplomatic service if fees were received?—Yes.

4546. Mr. Rylands.] I quite understood that you did not raise any personal objection; but still, in reference to passports, and things of that kind, the agents of other foreign governments do take fees, do they not?—Yes; I believe they do.

4547. Do you see any objection to having half-a-crown paid for a visé, or a shilling with a passport?—We have never taken such fees, as far as I am aware.

4548. With regard to political agencies, I think that you made a complaint that political agencies purely of a diplomatic character were not given to members of the diplomatic service?—I did not wish to make a complaint; but I was asked a question in regard to the amalgamation of the consular and diplomatic services, and I said I thought it was exceedingly advisable that consulships which have a political character should be filled by men who have had a diplomatic training; and therefore I would amalgamate them with the diplomatic service, but I would keep the others apart.

4549. I think that you alluded to Egypt, and one or two other cases, and said that our representatives in those countries should form part of the diplomatic system?—I think so; they should have had the training which is had by being a secretary at an embassy or a great mission.

4550. I see that the political agent at Alexandria is Colonel Edward Stanton, R.E., C.B., who has passed through a career in the Royal Engineers, I have no doubt with very great credit, through different ranks until he became a lieutenant colonel in January 1868, and has served in the army abroad with great distinction; do you think that the sort of training that would fit a man for such a post?—I believe that Colonel Stanton is a very good diplomatic agent.

4551. But do you think that fighting at Inkermann and going through a very honourable career as colonel in the army is a good training for a diplomatic agent?—I believe the case of Colonel Stanton was this, that he was at Warsaw, and we always have had a military agent there.

4552. But Alexandria is a very different place; the fact is that a military man was appointed to Warsaw, that he was then sent from Warsaw as a political agent to Alexandria, but which I pr sume is a better appointment, and that th another military man was appointed to Warsaw —What I have laid down as my princip is that the foreign minister should have eve latitude left to him for appointing whoever thinks will do the work best.

4553. Viscount Barrington.] In regard military work, I believe that a great many our troops pass through Egypt to India?—Th would be an excellent reason for appointi Colonel Stanton to Alexandria.

4554. Mr. Rylands.] In reference to yo opinion with regard to the relative effect of chargé d'affaires and an ambassador I understo you to say that the representative of this count as an ambassador, naturally had greater weig upon foreign courts than as a mere char d'affaires?—Certainly.

4555. But that would not at all lead you think that it would be desirable to place a man very high rank at a very small court?—Ce tainly not. There are two great functions diplomacy; the one is negotiating great and i portant matters, and for that sort of work y cannot have a man of too high position; you r quire a statesman, and statesmen are rare and e ceptional men, and must be taken wherever y can find them. The other is keeping the Gover ment informed of everything that a Governme like that of England ought to know, which inclu a very vast number of subjects. Of course whe the question is merely one of keeping up dip matic relations with a small state, you send a m of less status than you do to a great post. T law administered by a county court judge the same as the law administered by the Lo Chancellor; but you would hardly change t Lord Chancellor into a county court judge.

4556. Do not you think that in the small cou it would be sufficient to have a chargé d'affai with an understanding that a minister would appointed on any important occasions; I allu to an answer that you gave as to the feeling th these smaller courts have, and their anxiety th we should pay them the compliment of accred ing a minister there: but if it were understo that we should occasionally send a minister in t event of any important circumstance arising, you not think that a chargé d'affaires would sufficient?—In some circumstances a cha d'affaires would be sufficient.

4557. Mr. A. Russell.] You would not li the English agent to be lower in position th those of other powers, I presume?—No, c tainly not; that is the general rule that we sho abide by, and I do not see why we need m ourselves smaller than we are. We know the fa of the frog who tried to become an ox, bu never heard of an ox who tried to shrink hims down to the dimensions of a frog.

4558. Mr. Rylands.] When a country has i portant interests to negotiate, then it requires important representation, but it does not foll that because France, in some small Gern court, has a very great representation, therefo we should have one, does it?—No; I think t that is a question which must be decided, every such case must be decided, upon its o merits; I do not think that you can make absolute rule.

4559. You would not say that because a reign power had a representative of a cert rank in a foreign court, therefore we sho necessa cessarily have one of the same rank?—Not as absolute rule.

4560. Mr. W. Cartwright.] As a general rule, u would not put the English representative on a lower footing than those of other coun-es?—As a general rule, I would not.

4561. You would leave particular cases to be dged on their own merits?—Yes; I would not ve a minister where other nations have an bassador; of course, that applies to the great sts

4562. Mr. Rylands.] The cost of representa-n to which you have made allusion, I suppose very much increased by the fact that our nisters abroad have to receive people from this untry?—Yes.

4563. And they give entertainments to people this country of different characters?—It is ry difficult not to do so, to a certain extent.

4564. Persons come to them from this country th letters of introduction, which almost neces-ate their entertaining them?—They bring, or ther used to bring, for I believe the custom is t now what it was, what were called soup kets, letters of introduction from the Foreign ffice, which were, in fact, bills drawn upon the cket of the individual diplomatic agent.

4565. Naturally people who are in the habit making use of these "soup tickets" would be clined to support the system under which they tain the soup tickets?—I do not think one can y that there is much influence of this kind at ork. The really important thing with regard representation is this, that there is a certain nount of official international hospitality granted a diplomatic agent in virtue of his representing e British Crown and the English nation, and at this hospitality must be returned not neces-rily with ostentation, but still on a sufficient ale to acknowledge it, and if it is not done it oks as if the British nation received courtesies hich it did not reciprocate.

4566. Then you put it more as a matter of eling than of any advantage which would arise relation to the position of Great Britain with her powers?—Well, I explained in my evidence e other day that a great deal of that social urtesy, which depends to a great extent upon e social status of the person, is required in der to acknowledge not only courtesies, but tual work done for you, by numbers of people th official and non-official. I was mentioning e case of reports, like the reports on land nure, with regard to which the only way in hich I have been able to acknowledge hard ork done by many individuals of different asses has been to ask them to my house. here is another point which is important, mely, that in questions of this kind a great al of the very best information can only be tained in that way. If you want to know the eling of a country, in regard to the tenure of nd or any question like that, you cannot go to ne individual here and another there and sub-it him to cross-examination, but having them out you, you start the topic and you hear hat they say on all sides, and you get to have a erception of the existing state of opinion upon y given subject. You cannot do any work, ther in diplomacy or anything else, without king in the social element.

4567. Still you would say that a great deal of e usefulness of that sort of intermingling of ciety, the facility to obtain information, will depend very much upon the character of our representative?—Yes.

4568. The mere fact of spending money in that way does not necessarily do good unless there is advantage taken of it by representatives abroad in obtaining information?—That is so.

4569. Mr. W. Cartwright.] That kind of intercourse is not confined to our representatives?—It is universal.

4570. There are allowances for that made to the representatives of other countries which do not appear in the published salaries, are there not?—There are, as far as I am aware, frais de représentation which differ largely, and which do not figure in the returns given. As regards France (and other nations, I believe, too), as far as I know, the frais de représentation are a distinct thing which depends often on the express will of the sovereign. In the case of countries like Prussia and Russia, it is often the sovereign who decides that on such and such an occasion so much money shall be given.

4571. Then they are indefinite gratuities?—They are indefinite gratuities, so far as I know.

4572. Whereas in our service there is nothing of the kind?—There is absolutely nothing of the kind. Every now and then, upon a great occasion, some extra sum will be given as on the occasion of the Prince of Wales's marriage; but then that figures in the returns made to the House.

4573. Viscount Barrington.] Certain sums go down to what are called extraordinaries, but that has nothing to do with the frais de représentation to which you have alluded?—No, the extraordinaries are under definite heads; the frais de représentation do not come under those heads. When grants are made (which is very rarely done) in our service, they are made on special occasions, and figure specially in the Estimates.

4574. Mr. W. Lowther.] Have you found, during your long residence in Germany, that information often crops up at small courts which you do not obtain at a big court?—Certainly.

4575. Your pay, I think, is 700*l.* a year at Darmstadt?—Yes.

4576. Do you find that enough?—No, I cannot say that I do.

4577. You are only secretary of legation?—I am secretary of legation in the British service; but I am recognised internationally at Darmstadt as chargé d'affaires, because I was accredited by a letter from the English Foreign Minister to the Hessian Foreign Minister, which is the definition given at Congress, Vienna, of a chargé d'affaires.

4578. A secretary of embassy would get 1,000*l.* a year?—I believe most of them have 1,000*l.* a year. With regard to my position, of course by whatever name you call the English representative abroad, if he is the only representative, he is considered by the country as representing the English Government, and those hospitalities are given to him that in the case of a mission would be returned by the head of the mission; and which, of course, wherever there is an independent agent must be returned by him. I think that 1,000*l.* a year ought to be the least that is given to persons who have an independent position.

4579. Mr. Otway.] What is your common style; what are you commonly called at Darmstadt?—I am always called chargé d'affaires.

4580. Are you not called in the place the English

Mr. Morier, C.B.

30 June 1870.

English minister?—Yes; I am usually called your excellency; I try very hard to avoid it.

4581. And your house the English embassy?—Yes; I wish I could make my tradesmen understand the difference.

4582. Mr. W. Lowther.] There are more claims upon you, with your 700*l.* a year at Darmstadt, than there are upon a secretary of embassy with 1,000*l.* a year?—Certainly; because however humbly or modestly one does it, there are certain representative functions which are perfectly unavoidable. And then there is another point, that is, that assistance has to be given to English subjects.

4583. Pecuniary assistance?—Yes.

4584. Relieving people in distress?—Yes. There has been a circular sent to us saying that in certain cases we can now get that refunded by the Government, which is an innovation; but the cases that I have to relieve are usually cases which one feels are cases of swindlers, which one could not send home, but which somehow one cannot get rid of, so that they become charges on one's private purse.

4585. I think you said that a thorough absolute and complete knowledge of diplomacy was necessary for a minister at a foreign court; do you consider that the public service suffers by the employment of outsiders; do you consider that they have that thorough, absolute, and complete knowledge that is necessary?—That would depend entirely upon the outsider and upon the dry nurse that was given to him. Making a great distinction between the actual work of negotiation and the work of collecting information, I should say that where you come to the work of negotiation the qualities that you require are those of a statesman. Well, if you can get the right man for that work, I think you must take him wherever you can find him, and I should be very sorry to see any system adopted that excluded the possibility of taking in outsiders. I should be sorry to see the service one altogether professional, or one altogether consisting of outsiders, with people assisting them who had been abroad; but I think you cannot exclude the question of outsiders. Take a case like that of a man who has been Governor in Canada; he might be just the very man that you wanted at Washington; or the man who had been Viceroy in India might be the very man you wanted at St. Petersburg. I do not think that you can limit the choice of the Foreign Secretary.

4586. Did I understand you right with regard to the contract; I understood you to say that since 1861 the Government here, as it were, has entered into a contract with people who enter diplomacy?—Yes.

4587. They exact from them an examination, they exact from them a qualification and second examination, and though the diplomats are obliged to fulfil the stipulations of the contract, the Government absolves itself in the course of time?—Except that the Government has very honestly worked the system of seniority ever since 1861, as far as I have been able to make out. The contract consists in this, that the moment a man has passed his first examination he knows that at the end of four years he will have a commission, and after he has got a commission he is a covenanted public servant.

4588. I believe secretaries of legation are now allowed to travel about in that country to which they are accredited in order to make reports; does your experience tell you that they avai themselves of that privilege of travelling about —Certainly, in many cases; if they have report to make they must travel about. It depend upon the reports, but I do not know how fa that has been done.

4589. They have to ask permission from th Foreign Office to go upon a tour during whic they can make the report; do you know of an instances of their doing so?—No; I have bee five years away from any great mission.

4590. Your opinion decidedly is, that tele graphing increases the public business?—Tele graphing increases the public business, an necessitates a very high form of profession training.

4591. Mr. Rylands asked you whether yo could not, in certain cases, have the consula office attached to the legation; where could yo put the consul who was to do the work at Frank fort?—You could not possibly do without consul at Frankfort. But I understood M Rylands to ask only in regard to those missio where there was a minister and a consul, wheth you could not give the work of the consul to th legation; I think that you certainly can wit regard to the work, which is merely of a notari kind. Whether you could do it in a seaport what I cannot answer, because I do not kno the work of a seaport.

4592. I observe, on looking to the repor from Her Majesty's representatives abroad, th you did not report upon the diplomatic servi yourself?—No, I did not; I was entirely take up with the land tenure, and Hesse Darmsta hardly seemed to me to be of sufficient impor ance for me to make the report you allude to.

4593. Viscount Barrington.] In regard Darmstadt, a question was put to you by th honourable Member for Warrington which y did not answer; I think you are solely in char at Darmstadt?—I am solely in charge at Darm tadt.

4594. With regard to superintending Darm tadt, Carlsruhe, and Stuttgardt, I suppose if y had a sufficient staff you would consider yours able to do that?—As regards sending informatio and keeping the Government informed of t political changes that were going on, I dares one man could do that, with a sufficient staff.

4595. Which sufficient staff would create very considerable additional expense, naturall —I think, as regards that sort of work, one m man would be sufficient; I think that it co be worked by a chargé d'affaires and a secreta if that was the only work required. But th of course, you could not do the notarial wo necessary at Stuttgardt, and there would be, u doubtedly, a sort of slight and slur upon t Stuttgardt Government if you withdrew diplomatic representation from, after all, an dependent kingdom.

4596. But at the same time I understand th they have no representative here?—They ha no representative here.

4597. Chairman.] Is Stuttgardt at all a cen of German thought or action, politically or oth wise?—It is a very great centre of politi action. It represents the Suabian eleme which is one of the most important elements Germany. The Suabian democracy, the peo who desire a sort of cantonal federation, mostly in Wurtemberg.

4598. Th

4598. Then it is important that we should ...e eyes and ears there?—Yes.

4599. Is Darmstadt upon any of the great ...es of traffic?—It is exactly the centre of the ...s between north and south, east and west; ... great lines of railway cross each other there; ...s the centre of Europe as regards railway ...mmunication.

4600. As regards British subjects, do they often ...ly to you for advice or assistance?—I have a ...ain number of people who lose their money ... Homburg and Wisbaden, and who think I ...ght to pay their journey back to England if ...y engage not to play again; and I get a great ...ny cases of English workmen and English ...hanics, who either have been employed, or ... going to be employed. Many of them are ...ployed at Mayence, and Worms, and Offen...h, and those centres, and they come for advice ...l to be got out of difficulties; and people of ...t sort derive an immense advantage from an ...glish agent, because usually they are ignorant ... the laws of the country, and there is some...ng that can be arranged in a few minutes, ...ich without that assistance would cause them ...s of time and money.

4601. There is, in fact, a general demand ...n your good offices of that kind?—Yes, a ...y fluctuating demand, but sometimes a con...erable one.

4602. Mr. Otway.] At Stuttgardt there is a ...ge English community, is there not?—There ... large English community at Stuttgardt.

4603. Mr. Eastwick.] Has the Foreign Office ...y knowledge of the number of English resi...nts in Germany?—No, I should think not.

4604. Do you think that it would be a difficult ...ng to obtain that?—It fluctuates very much. ... Darmstadt the congregation is about 80.

4605. Would there be any difficulty in send...g a yearly report on that?—It could be very ...sily done, I should think, an approximative ...port.

4606. Mr. Rylands.] With reference to the ...estion of expense, supposing that Stuttgardt, ...den, and Darmstadt, were all worked from one ...ace, it would be a matter of consideration where ...at head should be placed; supposing that were ...ne, there would be a very considerable reduc...n of expenditure as compared with the present ...penditure, if those three places were worked ... one head, with just the additional staff of one ...cretary, probably?—There would be certainly ... diminution of expenditure; but there would ... an increase of the block.

4607. But leaving out the question of the ...ock, there would be a diminution in expendi...re?—There would be diminution in the expen...ture.

4608. And in regard to two of the places, that ...to say the places where no mission was placed, ...y notarial acts of the character that might be ...quired could be done by a vice consul, I pre...me?—Any person who had a consular character ...uld do that.

4609. But as far as the great object, which ...ou state is to be borne in mind, in relation to ...ermany, as regards that district, I quite under...ood you to say that one head would be sufficient to obtain the information?—I did not wish to express myself very strongly on the subject. If I am asked whether I believe that one person could keep Her Majesty's Government informed of the political changes that are going on, I think that in some respects that could be done by one person. That the amount of diplomatic and representative work now being done can be done by one person is what I should be sorry to affirm.

4610. Mr. Eastwick.] In regard to languages; do you think it absolutely necessary that a man should know German for the purpose of being employed there, or that he could not transact his business in French?—A knowledge of German is absolutely necessary.

4611. And do you think that, generally speaking, the officers are well up in the language?—Yes.

4613. So that probably there would be some political difficulty about placing the whole of Darmstadt and the whole of the South German missions under the control of a person resident at Stuttgardt, which is exclusively out of the North German Confederation?—I am not so sure of that; because there is the case of two or three missions that have no representatives among them; for instance, Wurtemberg is represented by a chargé d'affaires who lives at Carlesruhe, and is accredited to Darmstadt, and goes there occasionally.

4614. Chairman.] Is there anything further that you wish to state?—In answer to Question 4378, which Mr. Rylands put to me with regard to a "canard" in 1859, I stated then that I could not recollect what the "canard" was to which I alluded. It was an account published in the "Times," of two treaties which had been concluded between Russia and France, engaging Russia to attack Austria. A fortnight after France had invaded Piedmont. That was in the "Times" of the 30th of April 1859, and this announcement created a panic of a very dangerous kind. I only gave that as an instance of information published in the newspapers, to correct which, an official representation was required. Then with regard to Mr. Eastwick's question, No. 4396, I did not quite understand the question; I thought he was referring merely to the diplomatic agents abroad meddling with the press. What I wished to say was, that I considered that a diplomatic agent abroad should keep as clear of the foreign press as possible, except as far as correcting actual false information went, and that in that case I thought the best plan was for him to address himself to the Government, to state what the mistake was, and to request the Government in their own organs to correct that mistake. I am not alluding to anything that takes place in the British diplomatic service; but there is a great tendency among foreign diplomatists to get themselves "en relation" with the press of the country to which they are accredited, to get themselves puffed by that press, and while believing that they can wield that press for their own purposes, imperceptibly to become its servants.

Mr. HENRY LABOUCHERE, called in; and Examined.

Mr. Labouchere.

30 June 1870.

4615. Mr. Rylands.] I THINK you were appointed as attaché at Washington in 1854?—Yes.

4616. With regard to the appointments which you have held in the diplomatic service, subsequently to your appointment in 1854, I find that you were transferred to Munich, 28th December 1855; to Stockholm in 1857; to Frankfort, 6th November 1858; to St. Petersburg, 23rd August 1860; and to Dresden, 4th November 1862; you were appointed a third secretary in Her Majesty's diplomatic service, 17th November 1862; and were transferred to Constantinople as a second secretary, 3rd February 1863, and resigned 27th July 1864?—Yes.

4617–18. Then you have had a considerable amount of experience in the working of foreign missions?—Yes, I have been at a great many posts.

4619. With reference, in the first place, to the entrance into the service, are you prepared to express any opinion as to whether it would be desirable that there should be a system of competition in connection with the appointments to the diplomatic service?—As long as you have the present system under which attachés or secretaries are required to go into society, you have certain social requirements which are necessary and which would render it very difficult to gain what you want by a competitive examination; but then it may be a question whether you do really want these social requirements in order that the work of the country may be done.

4620. You are aware that, with regard to the present juniors in the diplomatic service, in many cases there is not any going into society?—There is very little going into society.

4621. Taking a man of very good education and mental training, who has passed through a competitive examination, and in the course of a certain number of years residing abroad has gradually advanced in the diplomatic profession, do you not think that by the time he got to be secretary of legation he would be perfectly well fitted to mix in society abroad?—I think that within about six months, as a general rule, he would be able to mix in society abroad. Of course he has to pass an examination, and if it be a general one, and from passing it, it is evident that he has a certain amount of education. Therefore it appears to me that there is no real reason why there should not be a competitive examination.

4622. Of course we may assume from his passing such an examination, that he would be a man of very considerable intellectual acquirements and training, and you do not see from your experience in the diplomatic service that there would be any public disadvantage arising from that, I presume?—Providing that the examination showed that he had had a liberal education.

4623. You would expect that that would sufficiently prepare him for the position that he would occupy in the service?—Certainly.

4624. As to the experience that you have had of different missions, it seems that you have been both at large and at small missions?—Yes.

4625. And therefore you have had some opportunity of judging of the work both in large and in small missions?—Yes.

4626. I see that you were at St. Petersburg in 1860, and remained there for about two years—Not quite so long.

4627. I wish to ask you in reference to St. Petersburg whether you consider that the staff in the embassy at St. Petersburg is too large?—I do not know what the staff is now; when I was there the staff was certainly too large for the work required.

4628. I will tell you what the staff is now at St. Petersburg; the staff at St. Petersburg consists of the ambassador extraordinary, a secretary of embassy, and three secretaries of legation, and, I presume, that there would be also one or two attachés; is that staff too large, in your opinion?—It depends upon how much work it is considered that a second or a third secretary ought to do. I suppose that if the first secretary of embassy, and if two other secretaries (call them second or third secretaries, whatever you like), were to do, say, four hours' work a day there certainly would not be required any further staff; and also you might, as a general rule, do it with the first secretary of embassy, providing he works, and one under secretary, so that one of the staff might be always away on leave.

4629. I need scarcely ask you this: if there were a dozen under secretaries of legation, if they all did little enough work, they might all be held to be employed upon the staff?—Yes.

4631. Then, in fact, so far as your judgment goes, the staff might be reduced there?—Undoubtedly.

4632. With regard to the position of the members of the diplomatic service in Russia, can you give us information as to the cost of living of an attaché, or junior second or third secretary in Russia?—If they were to live as at present attachés usually do live, they would have to have a carriage, because everyone of the corps diplomatic does, and the distances are very great, and I should say they could not live on less than 800*l.* a year. But then they need not necessarily live in that way; that is going into society. If they were simply to take a room and go to the chancellerie, as a clerk here at Somerset House, or in the Foreign Office, does it would be a third dearer than it is here. I do not suppose that it would cost the Russian more than it does here; but putting it a third more for a stranger, it would not be above that.

4633. You do not see, from your experience there, that there is any reason why the second and third secretaries should not abstain from going into society?—I consider that whether they go into society or not is a matter for themselves; if they have a private fortune, and want to hey can do so, but the country does not gain t.

634. You do not think that we are justified iving them a higher salary merely for any ntage which we derive as a country from going into society?—Certainly not.

635. With regard to the working of the staff t. Petersburg, I should like to ask you a tion with respect to each of the members; will take first of all the secretary of embassy, t does he do?—The secretary of embassy, n I was there, did nothing. It is an under- d thing, and I think Mr. Hammond stated as an understood thing, that a secretary mbassy should not work in the chancellerie; occasionally do work, but usually they do He did not when I was there.

636. Mr. W. Lowther.] Who was secretary of assy then?—Mr. Lumley.

637. Mr. Rylands.] Is it the fact that the etary of embassy has this position, that he is e as a sort of relay; when the ambassador is ent he does nothing, and when the ambassa- is away he takes the position of the ambassa- as chargé d'affaires?—I think that is under- d by the Foreign Office; but very often a etary of embassy, if there is any stress of k, will work if a good many are away on e; but he will do it more as an act of good ure than anything else; he is not required to t by the Foreign Office.

638. Did you see any reason, from your ex- ience, why a secretary of embassy or legation uld not take a share in the work of the chan- y?—Not the least.

639. You do not consider that there is any- ng that should be considered degrading or im- per on the part of a secretary of legation who take his share in the work?—No, because a at many of them do it from choice. For in- nce, when I was at Constantinople, Mr. Erskine d to come and work in the chancellerie.

4640. You have heard the evidence of Mr. rier, who is his own staff, and of course he s to do all the work of his post, and so has Mr. lo Russell at Rome?—Yes.

4641. And you do not see any reason why the retaries of embassy and legation in every ier mission should not equally do work which also performed by the under secretaries?—No, lo not.

4642. And the effect of that would be to lessen e stress on the staff?—Evidently you would quire a smaller staff.

4643. That you had in view, I suppose, amongst ier things, when you said that the staff could reduced?—Yes.

4644. We have heard, in the course of our quiry, very much said about the necessity of eping up very high salaries for ambassadors, d I should like to ask you whether you con- er that the expenditure of our representatives road necessitates the salaries which we give to m, whether they necessarily spend the amount the salary?—It would depend a good deal on the place. In Paris, and in St. Peters- rg, and in Vienna, I should think they did nd their salaries (I am speaking only of am- ssadors); in Berlin the ambassador might nd his salary, but he would not be obliged to so; in Constantinople he certainly would not, d probably does not.

4645. You think that in Constantinople the ambassador does not spend the whole of his salary?—He certainly is not obliged to do it.

4646. There was there, as the embassy house, a very large palace; I suppose you have been the occupant of it?—Yes.

4647. We were told that it takes 20,000 l. a year to keep up that palace to live in; do you think that there is any foundation for that idea?—Certainly not. In Constantinople the ambassador has a good many allowances; he, perhaps, keeps one carriage, but it is hardly necessary to do that; he has boats, and goes to see the Minister for Foreign Affairs, and other Ministers, in a boat. These are all paid by a special allowance; the boatman is paid for, and the guard in the embassy is paid for; some of the guard are employed in the embassy itself to clean out the rooms. So that an ambassador at Constantinople, if he has not a wife and family, may do everything requisite on 2,000 l. or 3,000 l. a year, and put by the rest, and no one would think that he was living under the mark.

4648. Was this palace such a very large place?—Yes, it was a large place.

4649. But not so large as to render necessary anything like the large expenditure which has been supposed to be required?—It would just depend; it requires two more persons, perhaps, to clean out the rooms than if it were an ordinary sized house. Then most of the attachés and secretaries live there, and they have their own servants.

4650. Then, so far as your observation went, you cannot see that this large expenditure which we pay for the support of our representative in Constantinople, who has not only a very high salary, but a very extraordinary amount of extraordinary expenses, is necessary?—No; I should think that in Constantinople a person who fairly does his duty as representing this country, has a better chance of putting by money than anywhere else almost in the diplomatic service.

4651. In reference to the expenditure of ambassadors, perhaps on this point your experience will give us some information; we are told that they are obliged to entertain largely; what classes of people do they entertain?—Well, at Paris they entertain persons who are supposed to be in society, and persons who come from England, whom they probably would know in England, or who have letters of introduction from some friends they do know in England. But in St. Petersburg and in Vienna the society is composed almost exclusively of persons belonging to the court, and these are the persons who are entertained, the court chamberlain and court aides-de-camp, and suchlike people.

4652. Do you consider that the class of people who are entertained at embassies abroad are distinguished rather from their social than from their political positions; take, for instance, any of the great capitals in Europe; do you think that the class of people who are entertained by the ambassadors are people of political importance, or rather people of social importance?—Of course there are some people of political importance, but they are generally people of social importance.

4653. In Paris, for instance, there are certain political sets, people connected with certain political parties, and whose influence and position in connection with those parties are very important; do you think that the entertainments of an ambassador at Paris are directed to bring him into contact with the members of all those political parties?—I should think so.

4654. Do you think it is so in the other capitals of Europe?—St. Petersburg and Constantinople were the only embassies I was at. At Constantinople of course there is very little entertaining; but in St. Petersburg they are excessively exclusive, and it would have been impossible to invite any Russian in society (which means in the court) at the same time with any English merchant there, because he practically would not have met him.

4655. There are many leading English merchants in St. Petersburg, are there not?—Yes, a good many.

4656. And is it a fact that a leading English merchant, because he is an English merchant, is practically excluded from the dinner-table of the ambassador on account of the objection of the court society to meet him?—Any person engaged in trade (with the exception, I think, of the court banker) is not admitted at court; and those persons who are admitted at court do not wish to meet them socially in the houses of foreign ministers. Hence, when I was there, the ambassador was obliged to give two different kinds of parties, one party for the Russians another to English residents, but he was quite unable to bring them together.

4657. Mr. Eastwick.] Would not that fact increase his expense?—A few candles and ices for an evening party do not cost very much.

4659. Mr. Rylands.] Do you think that anything is gained by this hospitality on the part of the ambassador?—Very little, I should think. As he is living there he must entertain to a certain reasonable extent; he has colleagues who ask him to dinner, and he would naturally ask them back; there are a certain number of persons who are in the habit of entertaining him in the town, and he would ask them back; this is necessary, just as a person in London who is in the habit of going out to dinner and is supposed to be well off, is expected to return civilities.

4660. Mr. Otway.] Do you really think that the expenditure of an entertainment at Paris would be fairly represented by your description of a few candles and a few ices?—Do you mean a simple reception?

4661. An evening entertainment?—Certainly I do.

4662. You consider that a fair description of the expenditure that is put on the ambassador by an evening entertainment at Paris?—I should say that the fair description would be candles, ices, tea, and coffee.

4663. Mr. Rylands.] In the case of Washington, where you were placed, the state of society is a good deal different from that of Paris, and I should like to have your judgment on the entertainment of the British minister there, as to how far it is desirable?—There I think a good deal is gained by it. When I was there Sir John Crampton was the minister, and he was in the habit of giving a large dinner once a week; he invited almost all the senators, a great number of the Lower House, all the ministers of State, and all persons of any political eminence who came to the capital; and that I think was very useful; and, if I remember rightly, he used to give a ba once a year.

4664. With reference to the general work the mission at Washington, from your experien there, have you formed any idea as to the amou of work that they do?—When I was there y had to have a large staff, because the mails on came in once a week, and everything had to done between the time that the boat came in a the time that the boat went out, about 24 or 3 hours, consequently we very often had to wo all night.

4665. You are aware that there are mo frequent means of communication now betwee this country and Washington?—Yes, I believ so; then we had a great deal to do also, becaus a great deal of correspondence went on wit Canada and the governors of Nova Scotia an the other North British Provinces, and also wit the consuls.

4666. In reference to Washington, I gathe that you think that, considering what is done b the British representative there, the salary is n too large and the staff not too large?—The salar is not too large. I happened to be at Washing ton last October, and the cost of living is ce tainly double what it is in England.

4667. In reference to the staff, what do yo say?—There was not too large a staff when was there; I do not know what it is now.

4668. Now the staff consists, in addition t the minister, of a secretary of legation, tw second secretaries, too third secretaries, and naval attaché?—Probably they could do wit one less; when I was there there was a secretar of legation, one paid secretary, and two unpai secretaries, and, as a rule, one or other was awa on leave.

4669. Did you intend your remark in referenc to secretaries of legation to apply equally there —The secretary of legation at Washington use to work in the chancellerie, and he was the sam gentleman who was at St. Petersburg, Mr Lumley, but he worked at Washington, becaus the staff was small, and he did not work at S Petersburg, because there was nothing for hi to do, the staff was so large; he would hav been quite ready to work at St. Petersburg if there had been anything to do.

4670. With reference to the other embassie you have been connected with the staff at Cor stantinople comparatively lately; I should lik to have your opinion, from your knowledge o the work there, whether the staff could hav been reduced?—When I was at Constantinopl I never arrived at the bottom of that staff; never could find out how many there were, ther were so many; there were dragomans, and chie of the chancellerie, and private secretaries, an persons who seemed to be a species of connectin links between the consulates and the embassy but it was difficult to find out how many ther really were.

4671. Mr. Otway.] Have you any experienc at all as to Constantinople; were you there an time?—I was there about eight months.

4672. You arrived on the 20th of June, di you not?—No, I arrived before that; I coul not exactly tell you the date, but I know arrived before they went to Therapia, and stopped some time in Constantinople, and the we went on to the summer residence at Therapi where I stopped, if I remember right, prett well through the summer.

4673. Whe

73. When were you appointed?—I will it from the book, February the 3rd, 1863.

74. Had you arrived in Constantinople on 11th of June?—I presume I had, because had not gone up to Therapia by that time.

75. Are you aware that a telegram was sent r Henry Bulwer at that time to inquire why had not arrived on the 11th of June?—No, not aware of that.

76. Are you aware that a telegram was sent ir Henry Storks subsequently to that, to v whether you were at Corfu?—No, because s not at Corfu.

77. Did you never touch at Corfu on your to Constantinople? — Yes, the steamer hed, but I did not land.

78. Had you arrived on the 20th of June? cannot tell you exactly, because I cannot re- ıber. I delayed a certain length of time, use I wanted to see Greece. I arrived e before they went to Therapia, and they go e directly it becomes warm. We stopped some time in Constantinople, and then went down to Therapia.

4679. Your information and mine are inaccurate, I think, as to the point of time: as far as I am informed, you could not have been at Constantinople more than two months, and I think you answered that you had been there eight months?—Well eight months is too long; I reckon thus: that I was a certain length of time at Constantinople before they went down to Therapia, and I stopped on, if I remember right, till August at Therapia. I remember that I was at Constantinople, at the embassy there, before they went down, and then we went down to Therapia. Now as they go down directly it becomes warm, the presumption is that they went before the 20th of June.

4680. Would you like to correct your statement, that you were there eight months?—Yes, I correct that statement.

4681. Mr. Rylands.] You were there sufficiently long to enable you to see what was going on at the embassy, and the people employed, I presume?—Certainly.

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE EDWARD PLEYDELL BOUVERIE, IN THE CHAIR.

Major General Sir HENRY CRESWICK RAWLINSON, K.C.B., re-called; and further Examined.

Major Gen. Sir H. C. Rawlinson, K.C.B.

4 July 1870.

4682. Mr. Eastwick.] It has been stated in answer to Question 3956, that the progress of Russia in Central Asia tends to throw our relations with Persia, and the questions affecting Persia generally, more and more every day into the pale of European diplomacy, and therefore renders it more and more desirable to keep Persia under the Foreign Office; what is your view with regard to that?—The progress of Russia in Central Asia, and especially the operations which have been now commenced on the eastern shores of the Caspian, seems to me to bear directly upon India, and only to affect England through India. All political relations, therefore, which arise from that advance or are connected with it—the relations with Persia included—become, I conceive, Indian rather than European; I may give the Committee an illustration of what I mean by a reference to matters now in progress. For some years the Indian Government, as is well known, pursued a policy in Central Asia of rigid non-interference, a policy to which the bye-word was attached of "masterly inactivity." Recent events, however, have forced us from this policy of isolation and obliged us to open relations in many new quarters. The Umballah conference and our friendly intercourse with the Court of Cabul, was one of the first results of this change. More recently the Viceroy of India has dispatched a mission for purposes of trade and general amity to the Court of Kashgar; and he now proposes to send an officer to Herat to co-operate with a commissioner from England in arbitrating between the Persians and Affghans in Sistan; and if he should see fit, in the interests of India, to open relations with Kokhand or Bokhara, or Khiva, no one doubts his competence to do so without previous reference to England. In Persia, also, we are showing an awakened interest by undertaking to arbitrate between the Persians and Affghans in Sistan and to superintend the delimitation of a line of frontier in Mekran, and further by resuming the practice, or offering to resume the practice, of furnishing officers from India for the Persian army. All this then shows, I submit, that the tendency of Russian conquest in Central Asia is not only to necessitate an increased activity on the part of the Indian Government, but also to bring our relations with the countries intermediate between Russia and India within the reach of Indian rather than of European diplomacy; and when I make this distinction I would beg to explain to the Committee that I intend a distinction of character rather than of locality. By Indian diplomacy I do not mean the mere local functions of the Foreign Department in Calcutta, but I mean that general view of our Imperial policy which regards the safety, honour, and interests of the British Empire in the East as of fully equal value with the balance of power in Europe. This doctrine, as far as my experience goes, is not recognised, or even understood, at the Foreign Office, but it is recognised and understood and practised at the India Office which agency, therefore, I consider to be most fitting for the conduct of our future relations with Central Asia and Persia.

4683. Then it has also been stated that in case of the transfer being made from the Foreign Office to the India Office of our Persian relations, the Shah might be very much hurt and offended at the transfer: you have had opportunities of knowing, and probably know better than any European officer, the mind of the Shah; have you seen when you were there any symptom of his being hurt at being under the India Office, or do you think that the transfer now would be offensive to him?—I really do not see how a transfer from the Foreign Office to the India Office is to be felt at all in Persia. There can be no change in the relations between Persia and the British Government owing to a transfer of control from the Foreign Office to the India Office. Whilst I was in Persia, partly as Minister from the India Office, and partly as a Minister from the Foreign Office, I never felt or perceived the slightest distinction between the two positions, either at the Court or with the Shah, or with the people of the country in general. I corresponded as Minister under the India Office with Ministers under the Foreign Office at other Courts as one of the diplomatic body, and I conceive it to be quite a mistake to suppose that the diplomatic body is of necessity exclusively under the Foreign Office.

4684. We have, I believe, at Tehran a native staff that corresponds to the dragomans at Constantinople, and some of them have, I think, been connected indirectly with the Indian Government; who were the staff when you were there, may I ask?—When I went to Persia in 1859 I found the senior Persian secretary to be a refugee Affghaghan nobleman with whom I was well acinted personally; he belonged to a noble and ent family in Affghanistan which had been ed owing to its attachment to our cause. er we left the country, all the senior members ne family were plundered, and many of them dered; some of the junior members fled, and ngst them two brothers, the elder of whom ived a pension of 1,200 l. a year for life from Indian Government.

385. What is his name?—Ghiás Khan. His ager brother Sultan Khan was at that time the or secretary. He was a well educated young , of very agreeable manners, and I found him ys a most efficient and trustworthy, and, I uld say, a really valuable assistant.

386. Chairman.] What has become of him?—ve heard since I left the country that he has dismissed from office, but I am not acinted with the details of the transaction.

387. Mr. Eastwick.] That has happened since mission has been under the Foreign Office? es.

388. There was a considerable pension given im?—£. 1,200 a year was originally given he support of the family; but the allowance been increased recently to 1,300 l.

389. That was for their distinguished ser-s?—Yes.

390. We have had a return sent us of the ber of letters sent from the India Office to Foreign Office, with reference to matters in ia; it is stated that they work out to about year, of which the greater part relate to graphic questions; this return is up to the 1st of January of the present year: can you give us any information as to the number of letters since that time?—This morning I have asked the secretary at the head of the political department of the India Office to count the number of letters received between the 1st of January 1870 and the 30th of June of the same year, referring to political matters with regard to Persia and the Persian Gulf, and received at the India Office from the Foreign Office; I find that number to be 34, which would give about 70 for the average letters of the year on political matters alone.

Major Gen. Sir H. C. Rawlinson, K.C.B.

4691. And including the other questions, the telegraph and so on, of course the number would be very much greater?—Very much greater. I may mention further, in connection with this subject, that formerly there no doubt was a disposition—during the period of the prevalence of the non-interference policy—to discourage, as much as possible, all correspondence between Persia and India, and we are in reality paying the penalty of that over caution at present. For instance, in 1863, Her Majesty's Government resolved to adopt a modification—in one important particular—of our position as arbiter under the Treaty of Paris between the Persians and Affghans. This modification was duly notified at the time to the government of Persia, but was not notified to India, and the consequence is that considerable embarrassment is felt at present. Had the affairs of Persia and Affghanistan been under one head at that period, whether that head might be the Foreign Office or the India Office, this cause of embarrassment would not have arisen.

Mr. Henry Du Pre Labouchere, re-called, and further Examined.

392. Mr. Rylands.] On the last occasion I d you a question in reference to the staff at stantinople, and I have before me a list of the , to which I will direct your attention: I find , in addition to the ambassador with 8,000 l. a and 9,531 l. for dragomans, servants' wages, iers, and all other miscellaneous expenses, e is a secretary of embassy with 900 l. a year, an Oriental secretary with 600 l. a year; I to ask you whether you think that both e officers are necessary?—The Oriental secre- is entirely useless; he has nothing to do e.

393. Then there are four second secretaries, h is an usually large staff: I should like to v whether you think that it is necessary to up four second secretaries in addition to the tary of embassy?—Probably the work could one with a secretary of embassy, and three d or third secretaries.

394. I presume that there would be probably or two attachés in addition to the junior taries?—In fact, a staff consisting of the tary of embassy and four gentlemen, call attachés or second or third secretaries, as please, I should imagine could do the work well.

395. There is also a class of officers, the omans, whose salaries are included in the nt that I mentioned to you just now. Can give me any information as to the employt of the dragomans; there is a chief dragois there not?—There is a chief dragoman, remember right, and two others.

396. Can you tell me the duties of the chief dragoman?—The duties of the chief dragoman and of the other dragomans are much about the same. When one goes with the ambassador to the Sultan of course the others do not go. They were originally employed when correspondence with the Turkish Government was carried on in Turkish; at present all correspondence is carried on in French, and their Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs understands French; consequently the dragomans are not required in any intercourse between the ambassador and the secretary of state, but I believe it is etiquette for the Sultan, whether he does understand or does not understand French, to be supposed not to understand it; and so when he speaks his observations are translated by a dragoman; but that occurs very seldom. That is all the dragomans have to do with the embassy; but there is a consular court there, and they are employed in the consular court. A distinction ought to be made between their diplomatic position and their position as members of this consular court. I cannot speak as to their position in the consular court, though I can speak as to their diplomatic position.

Mr. Labouchere.

4697. Do you happen to know whether the chief dragoman goes into the consular court, and does business there?—Yes, the chief dragoman goes there.

4698. Is it not a fact that the dragomans take charge of certain cases, in connection with merchants and others in Constantinople, in those courts?—I presume that they have a very great amount of influence there, and they can bring on a case, or put back a case, when they like.

4699. Did

Mr. Labouchere.

4 July 1870.

4699. Did you ever hear of any of the dragomans there receiving presents, with a view to push on or retard business in any way?—No, I never did. The chief dragoman received a house from the Sultan, but that was allowed by the Foreign Office; but that was the only thing I knew of. Of course there are reports there such as you allude to, but I never heard of anything myself.

4700. You say that the chief dragoman received a house from the Sultan; do you know under what circumstances he received the house?—He received the house as a present from the Sultan.

4701. With the concurrence of the Foreign Office?—With the concurrence of the Foreign Office.

4702. Was it a large house?—Yes; it was a house worth, I suppose, about 20,000 l.

4703. How long is it since this present was given to the chief dragoman?—I think it was about two years or one year before I was there. If I remember right, he was living in the house when I was there.

4704. Of course it would be understood that it was a gift from the Sultan, with a view to influence him in some way?—I do not know; I do not presume it was looked upon in that light, because he was permitted to receive it by the Foreign Office, and of course that freed him from all responsibility.

4705. You do not wish to express an opinion on the subject as to what your view is, I suppose, or as to British officers receiving handsome presents of that kind from a foreign Government?—Well, I think it is a bad rule that any of them should be allowed to receive presents; it is against the rule of the Foreign Office.

4706. Now we will leave Constantinople, and I will take you, if you please, to one of the small legations. You were at Munich, Stockholm, and Dresden, I think?—And at Frankfort.

4707. As to Munich, I should like to have your opinion as to whether there is any object in keeping up the legation at Munich?—Well, certainly, in a political sense, I did not see that there was any very great object in keeping up the legation: when I was there, there was no business of any political importance. So little was there to do, that the minister for eight months in the year resided in a country house about 60 or 70 miles from the capital. He used to come in once every month, when the Queen's messenger came there, and if there was any despatch to be replied to, he replied to it.

4708. Practically there was little or nothing at Munich for the minister to do?—Little or nothing. When I was there, I remember that the minister wrote a good deal about the state of Greece, and the Foreign Office wrote about the state of Greece to the minister, and the Minister of Foreign Affairs in Munich at last said that he did not want to be bored with the thing, as it did not concern him.

4709. Were you an attaché at Munich?—Yes.

4710. What had you to do at Munich as attaché?—I was the only person there for most of the time besides the minister. I had to sit in for about an hour every morning, in order to visé passports, because all the passports of English travellers going towards Austria had to be visaéd. At present passports are not visaéd, and so I presume there is absolutely nothing to do.

4711. So when you were attaché you simply were occupied a short time in visaing the passports?—I was occupied for a short time in visaing passports, and perhaps once a week in copying despatch.

4712. But, at the same time, I presume there was a secretary of legation and a second secretary?—There was a secretary of legation, but he was away on leave. I think the second secretary who was then called a paid attaché, was away on leave. There was myself and another gentleman a Mr. Lonsdale, who was there, an invalid; he was hardly in the diplomatic service; it was a sort of brevet rank.

4713. May I gather your answer to amount to this, that at Munich the envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary had little or nothing to do, and was chiefly away some little distance from his post; that the secretary of legation was absent on leave; that the second secretary was in ill health and could not do much; and that you visaéd the passports?—I am not in any way attacking the minister; he was a sensible man to go and live in the country, there being nothing to do in the town. He came in once a month for a few hours.

4714. Viscount Barrington.] How long were you there?—I was on leave some time; I suppose I was there eight months.

4715. Mr. Rylands.] One of the secretaries of legation was away, and the other from ill health was unable to do much?—He was called attaché, but it was more as a sort of brevet rank, to give him a little work.

4716. It would seem that your visaing passports, and copying letters once a week, would amount to the principal part of the work done at that legation?—It certainly was the principal part of the work done.

4717. It seems that we pay the minister at Munich 3,600 l., and house rent 400 l., making altogether 4,000 l., in return for these valuable services; do you suppose that in the position the minister occupies there, he spends this salary which we give to him?—Well, whether he spends it or not, I do not know; I should not think he need spend it.

4718. Does he entertain people at his house—As a general rule, the minister at a place like Munich would be considered to do things very well if he were to give a dinner once a week to about 10 persons?—Well, each person you may count would cost, putting it at the highest, 1*l.* a head; therefore, you can easily reckon what that would be. He would then give twice during the winter a party which would cost perhaps 20 l. or 30 l.; if he were of an exceedingly hospitable turn, he would give a ball which perhaps would cost 200 l.

4719. Would he entertain the members of the House of Representatives?—No, I never saw any member of the House of Representatives invited to dinner; they are hardly in what is called society in a small German court. In a small German court, no person who is not what is called born well, that is to say, noble, is admitted into society; the nobility are generally very impoverished, and they pick up a living by being chamberlains and aides-de-camp about the court, and these are the persons who together with his colleagues are entertained by the British minister; as a rule, any members of the Cabinet unless they belong to the noble class, are not in society; there are some professors with 600 l. or 700 l. a year who are, but they do not profess to entertain ntertain themselves, and perhaps feel rather out the ir element when they are in society.

4720. There can be no political object in these irties at Munich?—Not the slightest.

4721. You were also at Stockholm?—Yes.

4722. I suppose there, there was very much the me sort of thing as at Munich?—Yes, it was ry much the same sort of thing.

4723. The amount of work in the legation was ly trivial, I presume?—The amount of work hen I was there was this: there was the minis- r, there was a first secretary, and myself; I as there, I suppose, about eight months. The id attaché was away. The first secretary did t, as is allowed in the diplomatic service, have ything to do with the work.

4724. Mr. W. Lowther.] Who was the first cretary then?—Mr. Gray. I used to go down out 12 o'clock; I used to go into the minister's om, and we used to sit and smoke a cigar to- ther, and he used to say, "Well, do you sup- se there is anything to do?" "Well, nothing," used to say. Every now and then, about once fortnight he said, "I suppose we must show we e existing; cannot you think of anything to rite a despatch about?" or something would cur to him. I remember once we gave evidence our existence by writing about the condition the wetnurse of one of the Royal children, r which you do not require a minister to write spatches, I think.

4725. Mr. Otway.] Mr. Gray is dead?—Yes, make no charge against him.

4726. Mr. Rylands.] I presume that in none these replies do you impute any neglect of uty?—Not at all; all I want to do is to point t that there is nothing to do; the ministers do ost conscientiously anything they are called on to do.

4727. With regard to the staff at Stockholm, I d that, in addition to the envoy now there, there a secretary of legation, a second secretary, and a ird secretary, and I do not know whether an taché or not; however, those are the paid mem- rs of the mission; and I understand you to y, that with regard to the business of the mis- on, there is little or nothing for the minister to ; that the secretary of legation, when the inister is there, does nothing, and that the mount of work for the juniors is very much as ou have described in the case of Munich, really a trivial and routine kind?—Very much; I do ot believe that there is any object in a legation ere at all; but if you have a legation, the whole aff that would be required would be two per- s, call them what you like; you must have wo, because if one is ill the other must replace im, or one may go away on leave.

4728. Then the other mission at which you ere placed was at Dresden?—Yes.

4729. I should like to ask whether anything as done in that mission by you?—No, there was o business done. There are a great many Eng- sh residents at Dresden, and there was a great eal of notarial work done in the legation; there ere persons who used to come and want some- ing signed every day, but that was all there as; no work of any diplomatic importance or ny importance was done.

4730. Viscount Barrington.] How long were ou there?—I suppose about eight months; I put own eight months round for all these places.

4731. Mr. Rylands.] You say notarial work; I suppose that is the sort of work that would be done by a consul or vice-consul?—Yes.

4732. There was no consul at Dresden while you were there?—No, but there was a consul at Leipsic appointed a short time before I was there.

4733. How far is Leipsic from Dresden?—It takes three hours by the train.

4734. Would there be any difficulty at all in the notarial work that was attended to by the mission when you were at Dresden, being attended to at Leipsic?—At Leipsic there are neither English residents nor English commerce; so I could never understand why a consul or consul general was sent to Leipsic. If they wanted a consul general for Saxony, it would have been far better to have had him at Dresden.

4735. In fact, you think there would be some employment for a consul at Dresden, but that placed at Leipsic he has nothing to do?—Yes.

4736. Your idea would be that the consular duties for that district would be best performed by the establishment of a consular agent at Dresden, instead of at Leipsic?—Yes.

4737. And there being such an agent appointed at Dresden, is it in your opinion the fact that the chargé d'affaires now stationed at Dresden would have nothing to do?—When I was at Dresden, there was the usual staff. There was a secretary of legation belonging to the legation, who lived at Coburg with the local rank of chargé d'affaires, and there was this consul general at Leipsic. The only thing that is really required for the whole of Saxony and these little Coburg Duchies is to have a consul general or a consul at Leipsic. I cannot understand the use of sending a chargé d'affaires to Dresden; in fact, I believe the English residents, since he has been sent there, have asked for a consul. When the chargé d'affaires goes away, as he does not leave any staff there, they have to get all their documents signed at a distance; but if there is a consul, he can have a vice consul who can sign them.

4738. Since you were there, there has been a reduction of staff, and there is simply a chargé d'affaires now?—They were obliged to reduce the legation; the absurdity was too great, because the Saxon Government cannot enter into treaties with foreign Governments; why they sent a chargé d'affaires, I do not know.

4739. You were at Frankfort also, I believe; was not the minister at Frankfort at that time accredited to Darmstadt?—Yes, he was accredited to Darmstadt.

4740. Did he go to Darmstadt often?—He used to go, if I remember right, to two or three courts balls, and once or twice to dinner at the court.

4741. Then, in your judgment, looking simply at the business belonging to Darmstadt proper, there is no necessity for a chargé d'affaires at Darmstadt?—When there was a legation at Frankfort which was also accredited to Darmstadt, I suppose that the whole time of the year that was occupied with the Darmstadt branch, did not amount to above one hour for business; I am not talking of socially going and dining there.

4742. With regard to the salary of the minister at Copenhagen, I find that it is 3,600 l., while the minister at Stockholm, has a salary of 3,000 l.; are you aware, from your knowledge of the circumstance of the two capitals, of any reason why the salary to the Danish minister should be higher than the salary to the Swedish minister? — I should have imagined that the reverse would have been the case, and that if there was any difference between the two, the larger salary would have been given at Stockholm. I was never at Copenhagen, except passing through; but there were several ministers from other countries accredited to both Copenhagen and Stockholm, and they used to consider that rent at Stockholm was dearer than at Copenhagen.

4743. Then it is your opinion that in regard to the Principalities and Duchies, it would be sufficient to have a consul general at some central point and vice consuls?—I should imagine that what you would want in Bavaria would be a consul general and chargé d'affaires; in point of fact, at all these places with the exception of Madrid and Florence, and one or two places where there are really great and important interests, all you want is a chargé d'affaires and consul general, the species of diplomatic agent that is employed in the South American Republics; their staff generally consists of one vice consul.

4744. You are aware that your scheme of reform that you have just suggested would throw a considerable number of gentlemen now connected with the diplomatic service out of employment?—Well, I should exceedingly regret it for them; but it has been laid down in the War Office that only the number that are required for the service of the country are to be employed; and I presume that the same system is to be carried out in all the departments of Government.

4745. Then you think that if the staff were so reduced, those whose services were not required should be paid off in some way? — I think that they cannot complain, if what has been done at the War Office is done at the Foreign Office; the same terms should be given to them.

4746. Do you see any reason why the diplomatic and consular services should not be amalgamated?—I think that it would be a great advantage to amalgamate them.

4747. You have indicated some cases, but do you think that throughout the whole of the service it would be desirable that there should be an amalgamation?—I think that it would be a great thing to do away with that species of notion on the part of the diplomatists that they are superior beings to consuls. Now, for instance, I heard Mr. Morier, the other day, give in evidence that he thought that it would below the dignity of diplomatic agents to receive fees, to transmit them to the Treasury, which are received by consuls, and transmitted by them to the Treasury. I think that that is a delusion, and I think that it would be very desirable to do away with that delusion by amalgamating the services; and I think that the whole thing would be carried on much more fairly, and that promotion would be much fairer, if you amalgamated the two services.

4748. Could you give the Committee any scheme embodying your views?—I have written down the scheme which has suggested itself to me, and I will read it. "The following plan will, if carried out, put an end to much waste of public money, and increase the efficiency of the diplomatic and consular services. The diplomatic, the consular, and the Foreign Office services, shall henceforward be amalgamated. The staff of the amalgamated services shall consist of three classes of officials. Class 1 shall consist of secretaries of embassy and of legation, of consuls holding first class consulates, and of senior and assistant Foreign Office clerks; class 2, of second secretaries in the diplomatic service, consuls holding second class consulates, and junior first and second class Foreign Office clerks; class 3, of vice consuls, third secretaries in the diplomatic service and attachés, and third class clerks in the Foreign Office. The salaries of members of class 1 shall be 700 l. per annum, of class 2, 400 l. per annum, of class 3, 200 l. per annum, with 10 l. additional per annum for every year of service in each class until removed into a higher one; but this addition will only commence in classes 3 and 2, after the test examination for the higher class shall have been passed. No person shall be admitted into class 3 until he has passed a competitive examination, and his appointment will not be confirmed until he has served for one year on probation; nor will he be promoted from one class to a higher one until he has, in each case, passed a further test examination. No person shall be qualified for class 1 until he has served at least one year in a consulate and one year in the Foreign Office. Promotion from one class to another shall be, as far as is possible, by seniority among those who have qualified themselves for it by having passed the examination for the class above that in which they are. Promotion from class 1 to the higher posts in the diplomatic and consular services shall not necessarily be by seniority. There will in future be embassies at St. Petersburg, Vienna, Constantinople, Paris, Berlin, and Washington; ambassadors and envoys will in future receive no allowance for houses, or for keeping up any house in which they may reside which belongs to the nation. The outfit allowance of an ambassador or envoy shall not exceed 1,000 l. Each embassy and legation shall be provided with plate of the value of 1,000 l. The outfit allowance of a chargé d'affaires will be 500 l. The ambassador at Paris shall receive 10,000 l. per annum, at Berlin 7,000 l., at Vienna 8,000 l., at St. Petersburg 9,000 l., at Washington 8,000 l., and at Constantinople 6,000 l. There will be legations at Madrid, Florence, Teheran, Pekin, and Yeddo. The ministers at Florence and Madrid will receive 5,000 l. per annum; at Pekin, Teheran, and Yeddo, 6,000 l. There will be chargés d'affaires and consuls general at Munich, Brussels, Rio Janeiro, Santiago, Bogota, Copenhagen, Quito, Athens, Guatemala, Hayti, Mexico, Morocco, The Hague, Lima, Lisbon, Stockholm, Berne, Tunis, Monte Video, and Caraccas; consuls general at Cairo, Havana, Tripoli, New York, Hamburg, Constantinople, Bagdad, Belgrade, and Bucharest. Chargés d'affaires and consuls general will receive 2,000 l. per annum, consuls general 1,200 l. Consulates will be divided into two classes according to their importance; all consulates such as that of Leipsic, which are useless, will be abolished; nor, except at Constantinople, will a separate diplomatic and consular establishment be kept up in the same town. The staff of an embassy shall not, except under exceptional circumstances, exceed one secretary of embassy, who will be employed in the chancery, one second class, and two third-class officials; one of the latter will be specially affected to the consular work. The staff of a legation will not exceed three persons. The staff of a chargé d'affaires will consist of one or two third class officials. As these alterations will involve a reduction in the number of those at present employed by the Foreign reign Office, all those whose services are not quired will be allowed to retire upon the terms ich, under similar circumstances, were offered clerks in the War Office. Although the con- ates will at once be classified, existing incum- nts will be allowed to retain their present aries until they die or retire." What I mean the examination, for instance, of persons in the rd class taking place, and only those who pass becoming placed on the list to be advanced to second class by seniority, is this: there will a large number of vice consuls in the third ss, or consuls of the second class in the second ss who would never pass this examination, nor, ng attached to the places where they are, uld wish to pass it; consequently the promo- n would be quicker. Of course if you do away th the different great prizes in the diplomatic vice, you have to give a fair remuneration to blic servants, and I think that is a fair remune- ion with the additional 10 l. a year.

4749. Taking that scheme which you have d before the Committee, have you formed any imate as to the economy which would be se- ed by carrying out that scheme in its full de- ls?—I should think that it would be about ,000 l. a year.

4750. With regard to the reply which you de just now respecting the Legation at Frank- t, was there not a secretary of legation resi- nt at Darmstadt at that time?—No; there was ne. The secretary of legation at Frankfort ed at Frankfort, and there was no diplomatic icer resident at Darmstadt.

4751. But the minister simply visited Darm- dt?—Yes.

4752. I suppose you are quite aware of the ser- e performed by the Queen's foreign mes- ngers?—Yes.

4753. Are you aware of the rate of pay that y receive?—I think it is 400 l. a year, and a nd a day when they are employed.

4754. £. 400 a year, and a pound a day, and o their travelling expenses?—Yes.

4755. Do you think that that is more than ecessary?—I think that you take Foreign Office ssengers from too high a social class. I do t think that it requires a gentleman of high cial standing and education to carry letters from ndon to Paris, or from London to Constanti- ple. It is not done in any other country.

4756. Have you had the opportunity of seeing y special missions, or have the circumstances der which special missions have been sent to ner countries been brought under your notice? I was never at any place to which a special mis- n was sent; but special missions, I believe, are nally sent to carry a Garter, or something of rt sort, to a foreign potentate.

4757. Why, do you suppose, are special mis- ns sent for that purpose when we have am- ssadors and ministers abroad that might convey e honour?—I presume that it is, because there e a number of noblemen and others who belong ther to one party or to the other party who oc- sionally want a sop, and they are sent off with ese things. There is not the slightest result om sending them, except the waste of money d the advantage to themselves of taking a tle journey abroad, and taking their cousins th them, being given an order or decoration mselves, perhaps.

4758. But I understood that numbers of our plomatic service were entirely forbidden to ac- pt foreign orders?—When I was in the House of Commons I tried once or twice to get to the bottom of that, but I never was able to discover on what principle these gentlemen were allowed to accept foreign orders.

4759. Mr. Otway.] Can you say of your own knowledge that they have foreign orders?—Yes; Lord Bath has two.

4760. Mr. Rylands.] I understand you to say that the orders have been given; but are you aware whether the wearing of them has been permitted, because the two questions are entirely distinct?—When I was in the House of Commons, I did call attention to a mission (I forget who was at the head of it, but I think Sir Henry Storks) to Austria with the Garter for the Emperor; and I asked whether that gentleman or his staff going were to be allowed to receive a foreign Austrian order. Instructions were given to him, that his staff was not to be allowed to receive any order, but that he himself might. Lord Cowley, Lord Bath, and many others, have orders, and wear the orders; I do not go to Court myself, but I believe that any gentleman who goes there will see these orders.

4761. With regard to the Foreign Office agencies, I suppose that you had experience of them; I wish to ask whether when you were in the service, the Foreign Office agency system was popular in the service, as far as you know?—No, it was not popular in the service.

4762. Do you consider from your knowledge of the services and pay of the Foreign Office agents that they are entitled to any compensation? —No, I do not consider that they are entitled to compensation.

4763. You have no reason that you wish to lay before the Committee on the subject?—It would be rather a large matter to go into the whole question.

4764. Mr. Otway.] I observe that with regard to St. Petersburg and Constantinople, you have mentioned what you conceive to be the work in those embassies; you spoke from your own knowledge of those embassies?—I spoke from my own knowledge of them.

4765. It was very limited indeed at Constantinople, was it not?—You were telling me when I was there last time how long it was; I do not remember how long it was; I was there a few months, but at the Foreign Office they would know better how long it was; but it is not limited to that, because it is very easy to look over the archives and know what is done.

4766. But even supposing, first of all, that we went into the number of despatches written, which according to my account varies very much from that which you have given, still that would not represent by any means the whole work of the embassy at St. Petersburg, would it?—Yes, it would.

4767. Would it represent the whole work of the embassy?—Not the whole, but it would be a test of the whole.

4768. For instance, there would be a good deal of copying, would there not?—The minister sends in a draft of his despatch. In some embassies this draft is copied, and the draft is handed back to the minister, and a copy is made for the Foreign Office. In other cases a copy is made for the Foreign Office which the minister signs, and the draft is put in the archives; so that the copying does not amount to much. Besides, there might be a copying machine.

Mr. Labouchere.

4 July 1870.

4769. We have not come to that yet. There would be that in addition to the rank which you have mentioned; but are there not commercial statistics also provided at the Embassies?—Commercial statistics would form part of the despatches of the minister.

4770. There is a report to be made?—There is a report to be made by the secretary of embassy, but I apprehend that that is not copied in the chancellerie.

4771. It would form part of his work?—It would form part of his work.

4772. What do you consider the daily business of the chancery; because I observe that you have not alluded to that, the interviews with various people and communications with foreign officers?—But these interviews do not take place; they are perfectly mythical. The interviews with foreign officers are perhaps two a year; the interviews with other persons two, or perhaps three, a week.

4773. Would that be a fair representation, do you think, of the work at the Paris Embassy?—I am not speaking of the Paris Embassy, but of St. Petersburg; the embassy at Paris is quite exceptional.

4774. Would it be a fair representation of the work at St. Petersburg to say that three people come to the chancery in a week?—It would not be fair; I am exaggerating, because there were not so many as three when I was there. There is a consulate, you know, at St. Petersburg, where they go to.

4775. What minister was it, when you were at Munich, that said that he did not want to be bored by our despatches?—It was the Bavarian Minister for Foreign Affairs; of course it was an unofficial communication. The Foreign Office, in order to do something, I presume, were always sending the despatches which were sent home by the English minister in Greece to our minister in Bavaria, who transmitted them with his observations, sometimes to the Minister of Foreign Affairs there, and the Minister of Foreign Affairs said that really, as far as he was concerned, it was nothing to him that the king's son had been crowned as King of Greece, and that he did not want to be bored about it, and he hoped that we should discountenance it.

4776. You recommend consular officers for representatives of this country in Germany generally, and I think you said that a vice consul in many places would be a sufficient representation?—No; a chargé d'affaires and consul general at Munich. Now, for instance, take Darmstadt; you have got at Darmstadt a chargé d'affaires, and a vice consul at Frankfort—an unpaid vice consul, if I remember right. I should have thought that it would have been the better system to have had a paid consul, who could send in reports of the state of public opinion generally, at Frankfort, and no chargé d'affaires at Darmstadt.

4777. But you attach no importance at all to the representation of England at these Courts being on the footing with that of other countries, such as France, Prussia, and Austria?—It appears to me that, if we were to do that, we should be moving in a vicious circle. There was a debate that took place in the French House of Representatives the other day, and there several independent Members urged that it was a great waste of money to have envoys extraordinary and ministers plenipotentiary at these foolish little courts in Germany; the reply was, "We must continue so long as other countries do so"; so that, if we continue them as long as other countries do so, and other countries continue them as long as we do so, we shall never get rid of the system.

4778. Do you think that, with the stipend and the position which you would assign to those gentlemen, you would command that talent, character, tact, and personal influence, that are so necessary in diplomatic representation?—With respect to the talent, I do not know that any complaint has been made of the talent and tact of the chargés d'affaires and consuls general at present in South America, and they are members of the Diplomatic Service. With respect to the difference between the position of a chargé d'affaires and the position of a minister, the Minister for Foreign Affairs, taking a country such as Bavaria, will, when he has got any matters of importance to discuss, either go to Vienna or send over here, or come over here himself; he will not discuss them with the man who is there, whether he is a chargé d'affaires or a minister, because he does not consider him one of the important men of his own country.

4779. Do you really consider that your representation given to us the other day of our ambassador at Constantinople spending with difficulty 2,000 l. to 3,000 l. is a fair statement?—Well, I think that when you hear Sir Henry Bulwer, Sir Henry Bulwer will probably bear me out in what I say. At Constantinople the Ambassador is given a town house and a country house; his gardeners are paid for, his boatmen are paid for, there are persons who are employed to clean out the embassy house, who are paid for by the Government; consequently he has only to live in this house. With respect to entertaining, the only persons at Constantinople to be entertained are his colleagues, Levantines, Turks, and English travellers who came there. Turks, with very few exceptions, would not come to dinner if they were asked. His colleagues amount to about 50, and if he gives them two dinners a year (and that is quite enough), and putting it at 1 l. a head, that makes 100 l. There is not the slightest object in asking the Levantines to dinner; if he asks 50 in a year that is quite enough; and if he asks 50 English travellers in a year that is quite enough; so that you may put it down at 200 l. a year.

4780. Now, to come back to Munich, who is the minister who for eight months lived 70 miles away from the capital?—Sir John Milbanke.

4781. Is he alive?—He is dead.

4782. And who was the secretary there?—Mr. Bonar, who is now minister at Berne.

4783. And you consider it a fair representation which you gave of the work at Munich, that you wrote a description of wetnurses?—That was at Stockholm.

4784. Who was the secretary at Stockholm?—Mr. Gray.

4785. Was Mr. Corbett there then?—No, he came afterwards.

4786. Viscount Sandon.] Were you habitually at the minister's country house, 80 miles from Munich?—Never.

4787. So that you are not aware whether he was engaged upon the country's business when there or on his own pleasure?—As it was at a lake in the mountains, he could not have been engaged on the country's business long without my knowing it, because he would have brought in atches for me to copy, or they would have n registered in the archives.

788. You do not know whom he entertained e?—I presume that if he had friends over n England he would ask them there, but not arian society. Of course, persons living in the ghbourhood he would entertain.

789. From your personal knowledge, you are re that he did not entertain leading Bava- s there?—Of that, I am aware.

790. But you never were at his country house? Never.

791. Viscount Barrington.] I presume you sider that an English gentleman in the position n ambassador or minister who gave dinners, ht to give the best kind of dinners that ld be produced at the place where he was ng?—No, not of the best kind. You may e a dinner in Paris now that will cost you ut 20*l.* a head if you like to go to a restaurant.

792. Do you think that you can give a very d dinner, including wine, for a pound a head? Yes; I shall be happy to contract for a dinner ny capital in Europe, for a pound a head.

793. Including wine?—Yes; good enough e.

794. Mr. W. Cartwright.] I think you said t Sir John Milbanke was habitually at the gernsee?—Yes, when I was at Munich.

795. Mr. W. Lowther.] I think you wished give the impression that secretaries of em- sy or legation seldom did much in the chan- y?—Mr. Hammond, when he was here, stated t it would be as absurd to ask a secretary of ation to do any work in the chancery as to him in the Foreign Office to copy a despatch. thought it an extraordinary answer, because aetimes secretaries of legation do work and aetimes not; but they are not required to k.

796. Who was secretary of legation when u were at Munich?—Mr. Bonar.

797. He came pretty often to the chancery? When he was there.

798. And who was the secretary of legation Frankfort?—Mr. Edwards.

799. Did he not attend to his business?— cording to the Foreign Office, he had no work do at the chancery.

800. Did not the secretaries of legation make orts?—Yes; I remember Mr. Edwards made eport when I was there, so that there must ve been reports at that time.

801. I think you wished us to understand it the ambassador at St. Petersburg did not the English residents to meet the Russians? Certainly.

802. You knew the English merchants well? Very well.

803. Did you never meet in the merchants' ases there gentlemen belonging to the Russian bility?—When I was there Lord Napier was nister, and he found it necessary to give two rties, one party for the British residents, and e party for the Russian nobility; and also, nen he gave dinners, to give one dinner for e English residents, and another dinner for the ussian nobility; because, of course, although e Russians would not have refused to come th the others, they would not have amalga- ated together.

804. Mr. A. Russell.] Was not Sir John ampton obliged to conform to the local pre- judices at Washington when he entertained senators?—But there are no local prejudices at Washington.

805. He could have asked gentlemen of colour and respectable shopkeepers to dinner? —You could certainly have asked respectable shopkeepers. There are a great many respectable shopkeepers who are in Congress and the Senate. You could not have asked gentlemen of colour; but I should not put an English merchant on the same footing as a gentleman of colour; gentlemen of colour really was a waiter or a barber.

4806. Mr. W. Lowther.] Did not you yourself know English resident merchants at St. Petersburg who were, I will not say, on an intimate footing, but on a dining footing, with the Russian nobility?—A merchant might be on an intimate footing with a Russian nobleman, but, as a rule, an English merchant would not be asked to a Russian nobleman's house, nor would a Russian nobleman's wife go to an English merchant's house. Take the house like Princess Gotschakoff's; you would not have met an English merchant or his wife there.

4807. Is it much the habit of the Russians to ask anybody to dinner?—Yes, I think so, in a reasonable way; more to balls.

4808. You were at Munich in 1855; not since?—No.

4809. Is there a railway to Tegernsee?—There was none then.

4810. I think you seem to say that it was not the habit in other countries to employ gentlemen in so high a social position as our messengers, to carry letters and despatches?—Yes.

4811. Do you know at all or have you ever heard of any Russian or Austrian officers being employed for that service?—The Russians have not any service which is tantamount to our Queen's messengers. They have officers who are about the person of the Emperor, who are occasionally in exceptional cases sent; for instance, I believe that the Russians do not have any messenger from London to St. Petersburg, but they sent their despatches through our messengers.

4812. But do you know of any instances of Russian secretaries of legation being sent occasionally?—They are occasionally sent; as I have known cases in our service, of a secretary of legation being sent.

4813. When you were at Frankfort there was no English princess at Darmstadt?—None.

4814. You have said that a copying machine might be used for copying despatches; would you just describe what takes place when the head of a mission writes a despatch; he writes a draft, does he not, in the first instance?—Yes.

4815. And he very often make corrections?— Frequently.

4816. Then it would have to be copied, that is to say, a fair copy made of it?—Some ministers do not require that; they write their drafts and make no corrections; it depends upon the minister.

4817. He must be a very exceptional minister who would make no corrections?—Sir John Crampton hardly ever did; Sir Arthur Magenis hardly ever did.

4818. But he did sometimes?—Of course.

4819. Do you think it possible to introduce a copying machine into a chancery with advantage?—With great advantage. For instance, in Washington, very often a circular is sent round to the governors of the northern provinces; those might be done at once with a copying machine; three copies instead of one, made at the same time, and these copies sent to the governors. Or occasionally a circular is sent to consuls from the legation.

Mr. Labouchere. 4 July 1870.

4820. I suppose that it is not a frequent occurrence for three copies to be made of one despatch?—No; but this is a frequent occurrence, that a copy is made for the legation, or for the Minister for Foreign Affairs at home, and a copy is made for the Minister for Foreign Affairs of the country where the legation is situated. There are, no doubt, a great many cases in a legation where two copies are made of the same document.

4821. Were there no claims of English subjects going on when you were at St. Petersburg, of people connected with Poland, and so forth?—There was, if I remember right, one claim going on, that of a Mr. Mitchell, but it hung fire very much, and there was not much done in it.

4822. You talked about the very small expenses of an evening party, that there would be only the expense of the candles, the ices, the tea and the coffee; you do not speak from your own experience?—I speak from my own experience of enjoying the light of the candles, eating the ices, and drinking the tea and coffee.

4823. But not from experience of giving parties yourself?—No.

4824. You have never acted as private secretary to any chief, so as to be able to know what the expenses of those parties were?—Never.

The Right Honourable Sir HENRY EARLE LYTTON BULWER, G.C.B. (a Member of the Committee); Examined.

Rt. Hon. Sir H.L. Bulwer, G.C.B., M.P.

4825. Chairman.] YOU have been a great part of your life in the diplomatic service?—Yes.

4826. And have been through the various grades of the service?—Yes, I was in every grade but that of paid attaché; I was a long time attaché.

4827. And you were finally ambassador at Constantinople?—I was finally ambassador.

4828. Do you consider it an accurate representation, to say that the ambassador at Constantinople can live comfortably upon 2,000 l. or 3,000 l. a year?—I should say not from my own experience. I can only say that my ordinary house expenses were never less than 450 l. to 500 l. a month, without including extras and many things not entering into monthly expenses.

4829. Then your experience is not in conformity with such a statement as that?—Of course there are ways of living. At Constantinople you are put in a very large palace, and it requires a great effort to live in such a palace within the salary, and I do not think I ever did.

4830. I think you were minister at Madrid for a considerable period?—Yes.

4831. With reference to the salary of the minister there, should you say that it was more than adequate to meet the necessary demands upon the head of the mission?—I think that if a man had nothing to do but to look after his expenses, he might live cheaper than he does, but considering how much his occupations engross his time and mind, I don't think he can live for less, even without going to any very extraordinary display, but I must say that much depends upon management. I remember, for instance, that in the mere article of fuel at Madrid, at first I was made to pay nearly as much per month as by subsequent management I paid for a year; but that was owing to giving great attention to this expense.

4832. I suppose that when a minister is a little green, he is considered fair game at a foreign capital?—Well, in all those places, at least where I have had the misfortune to go, it has been the general idea that a minister was to be plundered, and as he has a great deal to do, and his mind is always constantly occupied with other affairs, he is not a fair economist for his own interests.

4833. What is your opinion generally with regard to the remuneration of the diplomatic service; should you say that it was more than adequate, or on the whole fairly adequate, or inadequate?—Of course this depends very much on the position that you intend a minister or ambassador to keep up. With my own views as to the manner in which a minister or ambassador should live, I should say that they are not overpaid; and considering that it is not a profession into which you go for the purpose of making money, I should say that they were not underpaid; but if anybody is to go into the service with the idea of saving money, then certainly the diplomacy would be underpaid.

4834. You consider that the hope of distinction and of eminence is one great inducement to gentlemen to embark in that profession?—I think that it is because there are a few great prizes in it, and it is also more or less an agreeable profession.

4835. You have heard in this Committee a great deal said of the block at present in promotion; you are aware, no doubt, generally, that there is such a stoppage in the rise in the profession?—I think there has been a great deal of exaggeration about that, because I remember that in my time, even taking those who were most fortunate, and who went through the grades of the profession, they rose very slowly. Take Lord Cowley; Lord Cowley was a long time in the under ranks of the profession. Sir John Crampton, who went into the profession before I did, was my secretary at Washington after I had been minister for five or six years. I am taking the fortunate ones; Sir Arthur Aston was a long time in rising. All those men rose afterwards, but there were a great many others who never did rise, and who never expected to rise much above the under ranks of the profession; and of course when there were fewer to promote, and whom the profession expected to see promoted, that number rose more rapidly.

4836. Do you think that in the profession there is generally a tolerably accurate estimate made of the worth of the component parts of it, and that they expect one man to get on and another not to do so, very much according to their real value?—I really think so; after a man has been a little time in work, I think, generally speaking, there is a fair estimate taken of him.

4837. In the more open professions of the Bar and the medical profession, a man's measure is taken pretty accurately by his professional brethren ren; is that so in the diplomatic service? hink so in general, but it depends very much e opportunities a man has had; a man may e placed in a position in which he may be to show superior abilities.

38. We have been told, what is no doubt a that several of the minor missions have been id of, and that that has contributed to make ppage in the course of promotion; there is ubt it has, I presume?—To a certain degree ; for though some posts have been created f Europe, the destruction of two or three pean posts has stopped promotion in Europe. I think that more persons who expect pro-n, and who are in the under grades of the ssion, have been employed than there used formerly.

39. You think that the door has been opened r wider in the lower ranks?—I think so, be-e a great number of the men who were for-y attachés, for instance, did not go into the macy with the idea of making it a profession, therefore they did not block up the profession.

40. But that state of things seems to have d almost entirely?—Yes, unfortunately, in pinion.

41. You think that the old system was a pre-ble one?—I do, much.

42. Perhaps partly for that very reason, that I take off a certain number of the attachés at arly part of their career?—It got you a very class of attachés who were generally more ss named at the suggestion of the minister or assador, and who were therefore very anxious lease him; they lived more together in a ly, and there was more familiarity amongst different members of a mission or embassy there is now.

43. There was a closer personal tie between chief and those under him?—Yes; an ambas-r would ask a man with whom he was pre-sly acquainted to do things for him which aps he would not ask a mere stranger, who sent there, to do.

44. Was that more the case at the earlier of your career?—I think it was; the conse-nce was that nearly every ambassador kept a for his attachés. Formerly what I conceive ave been the idea was this: there was a secre-of embassy who was the adviser and assistant e ambassador, and his help in the chancel-; then there was a paid attaché who over-ed the chancellerie and the work that was there; then there were attachés who were paid, some of whom continued in the career, rs of whom did not, but who were named by Foreign Office, not always, but in general, the assent of the ambassador, or at his gestion. It was the custom for the Secre-of State to write to an ambassador, and say im, "We think of naming So-and-so; would have any objection to him?" The ambas-r, in fact, was more considered than now.

45. Any practice of that kind is quite at an now?—My nephew was attached to me at request, but otherwise I was never asked m I would like to have; and once or twice n I have written for persons of special quali-which were wanted at the embassy or mission, ve had persons sent me who had none of e qualities.

46. And who, therefore, did not answer the pose for which they were required?—On the rary, they encumbered me.

4847. Would you recommend that the practice should be reversed then, and that we should aim at going back more to the old system?—I certainly should; if you wish to have economy combined with work, I should certainly say that having unpaid attachés was a very good plan; and it was a good plan for another reason, namely, that you saw whether these gentlemen would wish to remain in the profession, and also it was seen whether they were fit for it; whereas now a man very often goes into it, and when he has spent a certain time about it he finds that it does not suit him at all; and it is sometimes found that he does not suit it at all.

Rt. Hon. Sir H. L. Bulwer, G.C.B., M.P. 4 July 1870.

4848. Then do I rightly understand that you would suggest removing the entrance examination altogether?—No; I would have an entrance examination, but I would not have a very severe one. Perhaps I was the person who was principally instrumental in introducing examinations. I had gentlemen sent to me sometimes, once or twice in particular, who did not write English or French, or any other language with which I was acquainted, and then I took every means in my power to have examinations of some sort adopted.

4849. Then you would point to an examination which would secure you at least against such gentlemen as those?—Yes, certainly; I think that an examination secures you against perfect incapacity; I do not think that it secures you capacity for a diplomatist.

4850. I rather gather from you that you would not be in favour of introducing a system of competition for entering into the service?—I think that there is a great deal to be said on both sides; but I think that there is a great deal to be said, which has not been said, against competition altogether. In all the countries I have visited (and I have visited a great many) I have found the thing most detrimental to society and to the public service was a passion amongst the public generally for Government places, and I am afraid that we are introducing into the public here, judging from the letters I have seen as a Member of Parliament, a general desire amongst all classes to get their sons into public offices. I think that this takes away a great deal of energy from the general stock of energy in the country, because the young men who succeed are usually ambitious and clever; once in the inferior grades of the different departments, their advance is very much limited, and whatever talent and spirit they had originally, which they might have carried into other ranks of life, is absorbed and often nullified in mere official routine. Moreover I think we shall end in this manner, by making the public service more expensive, because the public will be more interested in having a great number of places, and having the persons who are in them well paid. Thus, I am not very favourable to competition for Government places in general; in other departments, and in diplomacy, particularly, I do not think it would answer, because you cannot test by competitive examination the fitness of a man for diplomacy.

4851. You cannot test the peculiar qualities which above all he is required to possess?—Exactly; for instance, firmness of character and suavity of manner, self-confidence without presumption, and a variety of other qualities are more essential to a man in diplomacy than mere learning. The chief qualities that you require cannot be tested by an examination of any sort.

Rt. Hon. Sir H. L. Bulwer, G.C.B., M.P.

4 July 1870.

An examination is necessary to prevent incapacity, but I do not think it can be taken as the measure of capacity.

4852. I forget whether you were at the university yourself?—I was, but I did not take a degree there.

4853. Should you say that the men who distinguished themselves most at the university were men markedly superior in respect to those characteristics to which you have referred as needed in the diplomatic service?—There is the old saying of Dr. Johnson's, "What becomes of all the clever boys?" I can only say for myself, that I was at Harrow five years, which is not a university, but is something like one, and there is not one of the very clever boys I remember there who has ever done anything in public life, or in life at all, I should say. I do not think that remarkably clever boys often prove superior men in public life.

4854. Mr. Otway.] Still a great number of the statesmen and distinguished public men of the day are from Harrow, are they not?—Undoubtedly; but I do not think that those men, with the exception of Sir Robert Peel, were remarkable for being clever boys, so far as my experience goes. I was looking over the list the other day of all the clever boys I remember in my time, and not one of their names has appeared since, coupled with any distinction. The fact is, that energy of character in public life is the thing which succeeds more than anything else; and it is the boys who have not energy who, generally speaking, pay most attention to their lesson; they get up their lesson instead of going to play at cricket, and the like. Any man who shows at the university that he has ability, may apply it afterwards to his profession or anything else, but I do not think it necessarily shows that he will do so.

4855. Chairman.] You would not be satisfied with university distinction as a test of competency for diplomatic employment?—As a general rule, the man distinguished at the university would evidently have given signs that he was competent for entering the diplomatic profession, as far as adequate education is concerned; in one or two instances there might be special circumstances independent of education which would be against him.

4856. Would you have any limit as to age?—I think not, because nature has given no limit as to age; one man at 60 is incapable, and another man at 80 is not; and therefore I would not attempt to do what nature has not done. In all those cases I think that, when you are looking at the advantages you wished to secure for diplomacy, you should look especially at the advantages you wish to secure for the public; and I would never myself do anything which might be called for the advantage of diplomacy, which I did not think at the same time was for the advantage of the public; and the public should have the advantage of having all the ability it can employ, whatever the age; therefore I should be sorry to make restrictions upon the subject of age.

4857. The object of the public is simply to have able, trustworthy, and influential men?—Yes, certainly; what is the object of a great public establishment which has business to carry on all over the world? It is to have the persons who are best qualified to carry it on; and that appears to me to be the object that we should have in view for our country.

4858. Then you would make the door, as I understand, to let in such men, a pretty wide one?—Certainly; I can never agree in diplomacy being an exclusive profession, because I could find many men in a drawing-room in London who were perhaps more fit than anyone that I could find in the profession for great posts, at particular moments; but I think it is fair that people who have served for a long time in a profession, should be employed in the higher grades if they are fit for them. I wish, however, to point out one thing which it is necessary to remember relative to that; you must consider that the foreign minister in every country is certainly one of the first men in that country; therefore the men who have to deal with him should be more or less men of equal capacity and calibre; well, I say that of 10 men who go into diplomacy there certainly is not above one who is fit to be intellectually upon par with the best men in the country (I am speaking of the great countries of Europe) to which he is sent.

4859. You mean when he has risen to a certain position in the service?—Yes, that is no argument against seniority.

4860. I understand you then to disapprove of its being an exclusive profession, and of the terms of promotion being wholly by seniority?—Yes.

4861. You would leave the discretion of the foreign minister in this country unfettered in both respects?—Except so far as it was fettered by public opinion, and all that sort of thing.

4862. There would be the sense of his own responsibility as well?—Yes; I think if you put a man in a conspicuous situation, the public are sure to find fault with him if he deserves it, and you should give him an opportunity of showing that he is fit for that position.

4863. What is your idea of the true composition of a large embassy or mission; what sort of staff should there be attached to it?—I am very much in favour of circumscribing the number of persons regularly employed, because I find myself that I have always got on better in proportion to the smallness of the number of gentlemen I have had with me.

4864. You got the work better and more efficiently done?—I got the work better done; I was more intimate with those under me, and they more intimate with me, and we worked more harmoniously together. If the Committee will allow me, I will mention some instances. I was chargé d'affaires at Brussels, at a time when the affairs there were very important; I had only Mr. Crampton with me as attaché, and we got on perfectly well.

4865. Was that at the time of the Belgian question?—Not precisely. The Belgian question was just concluded, but there was a good deal to do in consequence of it. Again, I was at Constantinople as secretary during an important time, and I made a treaty there with the approbation of my chief. Well, our number then was exceedingly limited, for there were only Lord Ponsonby and myself and Count Pisani, and one attaché. I was afterwards at Paris during 1840, which was a most critical time; and then I had Mr. Henry Greville and Mr. Howard with me, and I was besides commissioner for the Greek loan and commissioner for the settlement of the Portendic claims, and a commercial treaty which was on the point of being signed, if we had not had a difference with France about other matters. What I mean ean to say is, that there was an immense deal lo; we worked hardish, and if we took time in day to amuse ourselves, we sat up late at night I got all business regularly done. In America, I was minister; there we had a great deal to and I had only my nephew, a very young ow at that time, and a young man, Mr. Pennell, n the Foreign Office. And the first year that ent to Spain, I only had Mr. Paget and Mr. ningham. But then I had a private secre- y. I must say, and I think, that a minister uld be allowed to have a private secretary.

866. Sir Henry Elliot stated that he thought inister should be allowed to have a confi- ıtial employé of his own in the position of a vate secretary; you agree in that view?— s; I do not think that the Government should for that private secretary, but the minister self; and that his being employed in that acity should neither be a reason for his being erwards admitted into diplomacy, nor a reason his exclusion from it; it might test his ness.

867. Would you have an allowance made to minister in respect of a private secretary?— .

868. Is he debarred now from having one?— e minister is not debarred from having one; at st, I never was; but if the private secretary not attached to the mission, there is often a lousy on the part of the gentlemen who are.

869. He is not considered one of the corps? He is in an awkward position, and I think this ity, because I think it advantageous for the vice that a minister or ambassador should, in portant places, have a private secretary; for ry often, from good nature, and having no ect control over your subordinates, you do t give them things to do which you wish to ve done, and these things you get your private cretary, who depends on you, to do without uple.

870. If you made him in any way an attaché the mission, he would have a sort of moral aim to employment in the service, I presume? I should make it a condition that he had none. the first place he would not pass the examina- on, and that would be in itself a bar. But if was thought advisable, after a time, to retain m in the service, there should be no obstacle. I member I had one private secretary, now a ember of the profession, who was adopted by e minister who came after me, who found him very useful person. I believe the same was e case with Lord Howden's private secretary.

871. An able man in that position would with s chief almost engross the greater part of the ork of the mission, would he not?—No; the ere private letters of the minister would employ e person.

872. A great deal of the more important part the work of the mission is done through pri- ate letters, is it not?—A great amount of official siness not important, and some that is. I have ished sometimes to employ a member of the mbassy to be my private secretary. Well, if e says "No, I will not," what can you do? You annot force him.

873. Do you think that the relations between he chief and his staff, in that respect, are quite what they ought to be?—I do not; I see an im- nense change from the time at which I entered he profession. At that time the affairs of an em- assy were carried on very much between the ambassador and the Minister of State for Foreign Affairs. The Minister for Foreign Affairs remained in office a much longer time than he has done since, and consequently he did not lean so much on the office. The office has stepped in very much between the ambassador or minister and his employés, and has tried as much as possible to make everything depend on the office.

4874. The permanent office-holders, the bureaucrats of the office you mean?—Yes; the consequence is, that the regulations which they have made, nearly all detach the members of a mission from the chief. I remember when I was ambassador at Constantinople, one regulation (I do not believe that anybody has ever acted upon it) which forbade you, if you wanted anything done, to employ one of the attachés yourself, to get it done; you were obliged to call your secretary and say, I want this done, and leave him the control and selection as to who was to be the person to do it. Therefore, you might be very anxious to get a piece of work done; but if your secretary, as is to be supposed, had less knowledge of men, and less knowledge of affairs than you, it was done less properly and less completely than you would had it done, and this under your verynose. Now, again a minister or ambassador is never, I think, consulted as to who should be attached to his mission, and it sometimes occurs that the favour which an ambassador may show to any particular person on account of the ability or readiness he finds in him, becomes rather an objection to that person on the part of what I call the office. It thinks that he is not sufficiently under its shadow, and that he is more under that of the ambassador.

4875. Then do I rightly understand you to say, that you think the general staff of these larger missions might be advantageously reduced, and that you might have a smaller number of public servants there?—I think so; a smaller number of those who are paid, and led to expect, as of necessity, promotion.

4876. Then you would conjoin that, as I understand, with gentlemen who would be temporarily, as it were, attached?—With a possibility of naming them for posts in the service. Generally that power would not be wanted, but it might be; then they would pass the ordinary examinations.

4877. As to these persons, the heads of the great missions should have a certain consultative voice, in your opinion?—Exactly; that should be done in a friendly manner between the head of the mission and the Minister for Foreign Affairs.

4878. With regard to the higher posts and the subordinate officers in those missions, does not the Foreign Office generally consult the head of the mission, before it sends a particular gentleman to him?—I think not; I only know one ambassador who has been consulted, and he carries about the same attachés or secretaries wherever he goes; but that is an exception.

4879. Mr. Kinnaird.] May I ask who that ambassador is?—Lord Lyons; he has two attachés or secretaries who generally accompany him, and he finds the advantage of the arrangement.

4880. Chairman.] Have you ever been asked whether you approved of the secretary of legation or embassy proposed to be sent to you?—No.

4881. Can you enumerate to us what you think would be a competent staff for the larger missions?—I think a secretary of embassy, a paid attaché, and an archivist; allowing the ambassador a private secretary if he wanted one, and unpaid attachés if required. A second secretary might be allowed at Paris, with the permission of the foreign minister.

Rt. Hon. Sir H. L. Bulwer, G.C.B., M.P.

4 July 1870.

4882. Would that allow for sufficient leave of absence?—I think it would, but if not, it would be very desirable to have gentlemen from the Foreign Office; they would learn something of the country they went to, and the ambassador might learn something also as to the views of the Foreign Office.

4883. You are in favour of the suggestion made to us of having some sort of interchange between the Foreign Office and the Diplomatic Service?—Yes, I do not know whether I would have a constant interchange, because men get more fit for the employments to which they are most used, and I have no doubt that the clerks in the Foreign Office are better fitted for the Foreign Office, from having been so much in it; and the same, perhaps, applies to the members of the corps diplomatique; but I think that there are occasions when it would be very desirable to have some men from the Foreign Office sent out to foreign missions, and even when gentlemen employed at foreign missions should work for a time in the Foreign Office. In fact, in order to fit the men in the under grades for high employment, the great thing to secure is that they should pass through the great embassies, and that they should also pass every now and then through the Foreign Office, because it is only there that they learn great politics. At all the small places they learn nothing as to general politics, and their minds often get dwarfed. I look upon it as one of the greatest advantages possible to a man who aims to rise in the profession, to be, for instance, in the embassy at Paris.

4884. With reference to the present classification of the service, have you anything to suggest to the Committee about that; as to the rise from one step to another, from second secretaries to first secretaries, and so forth?—I think that the secretaryships are multiplied too much, and you have made a very large staff which you do not want, and which becomes a detriment to every one belonging to the staff; all expecting to get on, nobody can get on. But I should say, as far as rising from one step to the other goes, the reports of gentlemen when they are secretaries of legation, and examinations, if you have them, all more or less are something to go by; but then I think there should be added to them something else, which is the opinion given, upon his honour, by the head of the mission or missions where these gentlemen have been. That alone would be a further test of their capacity, and would give them a reason for endeavouring to be on good terms with their chief.

4885. Would that to a certain extent create a subordination which is rather wanting now?—Yes.

4886. We have had a suggestion made that it would be very advisable to have a very high leaping-bar, as it were, put up for all the gentlemen who want to get to the higher grades to get over before they can get promotion; would that be desirable in your view?—I do not think so, because if you have passed the best examination you could pass, it would not be a proof that you were a good man for an important situation as a diplomatist. It might be a test that you were a clever or learned man, but that is another thing.

4887. Viscount Barrington.] You would leave that part of it to the responsibility of the foreign minister?—I am very much for leaving as much responsibility as possible to the ambassador, in his particular situation, and as much responsibility as possible to the minister, as the administrator of his department; I would have responsibility in the higher ranks of the profession, and in the head of it, because the more responsibility is concentrated conveniently, the greater it is.

4888. Chairman.] But what would you do with respect to these gentlemen who are more or less failures, though probably each man himself thinks that he is entitled to get on in the profession?—The Minister for Foreign Affairs undertakes the task, and must undertake the responsibility of being Minister for Foreign Affairs, and he will generally be backed by the profession. But I think there should be a tendency to allow people to rise up to a certain rank by seniority if they do not do anything amiss, and then if they remain in that rank and are not promoted further I think after a period of eight or nine years, or something of that kind, they might have their option of retiring on a suitable pension or going on. People say that it would be a very hard case if they were not promoted; but take the position of a secretary of legation, and compare it with that of the head clerk in one of the departments at home. It really is quite as good a one, and yet you find gentlemen of a certain position in life, and certain qualifications, very well satisfied with the position of head clerk in one of the public departments as the ultimate reward of their services. Then there are the smaller missions to which men not altogether fit for the higher can be advanced; but, as there are many opportunities of knowing and seeing who are the men who ought to get on in the profession, I think those are the men to push.

4889. Then, I rather collect that you have a strong opinion against a mere seniority profession?—I think it is the ruin of any profession and particularly the diplomatic; also it prevents anything like satisfactory promotion, because, as I said before, if everybody is to wait in a profession where there are many fields of honour and none of death, until death has thinned the way there is no possibility of anyone getting promotion within a reasonable time.

4890. It saves a timid or indolent foreign minister from a great deal of trouble to give promotion by seniority; do not you think there is a risk in that respect?—That responsibility is just what I wish him to undergo. I think the tendency now is very much to avoid responsibility when people can; but I think it a mistake to allow this.

4891. With respect to the point which has been mentioned here, of changing the great ambassadors with the change of party at home, has there been any change of practice in that respect in your opinion?—Yes; when I entered diplomacy all ambassadors (not ministers) were changed as a rule; but then it must be remembered that at that time parties remained much longer in office than they do now, and therefore the policy of a minister became more identified with the head of the foreign department. For myself, I must own that the ambassador at Paris, as a general rule (I will not say that there are no exceptions) is so much a member of the cabinet that I think cept there was a particular reason for keeping n, the change there would not be disadvan-geous.

4892. You think that the older system of ving a change was the better one?—As far as is goes. At the same time I would say that there were a man doing very well, there should no obligation binding the Government to move him. I said something before on that bject when Lord Derby was being examined se, and I should just like to explain that. I said at I thought the case of a peer was a particular se. It seems to me that a peer, having duties to rform in the House of Lords, and having duties o to perform at the embassy, if he discharges his ties in the House of Lords, and connects nself with a party, ought to go out with that rty. I think that it lowers the position of an bassador that a foreign Government should see at he gives his vote to whatever minister is in ice. But when a man, like Lord Lyons, for stance, has originally belonged to the pro-sion and becomes a peer, I think that he should left to choose whether he will go to the House Lords and take part in its debates and in its visions, or whether he will not; but the Go-rnment should not force him if he remains in lomacy to come and vote for them, unless they ree to make him a party official, and then he ould go out with the party.

4893. You think that it lowers his position road to be supposed to be a mere follower of e minister of the day?—Exactly, it lowers his oral position.

4894. That, perhaps, is less so now that proxies ve been very much done away with, and he ist come over personally to vote?—If he does t vote he need not be supposed to belong to a rty, but if he does he becomes a party man.

4895. Mr. Rylands.] Would you put it in is way, that if a peer had known political aracter at home you would think it would be desirable that he should retain office abroad as bassador when his party went out; but that if were simply a diplomatist, without any political aracter at home, as in the case of Lord Lyons, then ou would not see any objection to his remaining?
—No, unless he made himself, to a certain degree, partisan by voting with a particular party.
hen I think that from that fact he puts himself an awkward position if he remain at his post hen another party is in; he must vote either gainst them or with them; if he votes with em he lowers his private character, and if he tes against them he complicates his public one.

4896. Chairman.] What do you say to the ansference of the junior members of the diplo-atic profession from one mission to another, by ay of enlarging their experience?—It depends on what you mean to make the diplomatic ofession; if it is to be a school for young gentle-en on the loose, it may be advantageous; but you consider that diplomacy is a sphere of blic employment and official duty, I think you ntrive a means by which you make a man use-l nowhere under the pretext of making him eful everywhere; in fact, I think it most detri-ental and contrary to common sense; and also, has another disadvantage, that it entails greater xpense upon the individual, and therefore you ake the profession more necessarily one of ealth.

4897. Is it not suggested, on the other hand, at by long residence in one particular capital a gentleman gets too much associated with the foreigners of that capital, and is too much imbued with their ideas and notions?—Of course everything may be carried to an extreme; but it is an immense advantage both to the ambassador and to the service, to have people who are well acquainted with the country they reside in. It saves an immense deal of time; in fact, if you have a special profession, it is for the purpose of obtaining special service; and if you send a man directly he has obtained a knowledge of one country to another country, you might as well take a stranger. For instance, I will take a man that goes to Constantinople. He is two years there. I am sure it is all he can do to learn anything about the East in that time, and he cannot learn the language even then. Then he is sent to Buenos Ayres; then, when he knows something of Spanish, and so forth, he is taken away and sent to a mission in Germany. What advantage is it to the public that he, as a member of this mission in Germany, has been at the other two places? He would be more fitted for the mission in Germany by having been a year in Germany than four years out of it; in short, I think that there might be certain spheres to which gentlemen might be, I do not say absolutely, but more or less confined; certainly there should be no rule to prevent their being so.

Rt. Hon. Sir H. L. Bulwer, G.C.B., M.P.

4898. Are not some diplomatic positions considered more eligible in locality than others for those in the profession, and would it not create jealousy if some favoured gentlemen were in some favoured spots, and the rest were banished to a remote corner of the world?—You cannot get anything satisfactory to everybody, and I am not for trying to do so; I look to the service and not to the individual, and for the service it is well that certain persons should be brought forward, and others, not according to their tested ability. A man of mediocre capacity may be very useful in one spot where you bring out his utility to the highest possible point by his local knowledge; but if you move him about, he loses the only good quality he had, and becomes fit for nothing; besides which, you create a degree of restlessness in his disposition and character, which in itself is an evil.

4899. Take your own example; you have moved over a large portion of the surface of the world; do not you think that you have acquired more real knowledge of men and human affairs from having seen them in different parts of the world and under different aspects?—I was a long time at nearly all the places I went to. I was at Paris a long time; at Constantinople a long time, in Spain a long time, and in America a certain time; and, I think, on account of that, I know those countries tolerably well. But I am talking, as a rule, especially of attachés and secretaries, and I consider this system of moving them about is absurd. As I said before, it is going upon the principle of making people useful at some indefinite time and place, and rendering them useless at nearly every place that they are sent to.

4900. But are you not obliged to contemplate the ultimate utility of a man when he arrives at a higher position?—I think that a man should be acquainted with the policy of his own country for those higher missions, and the policy of Europe. He will not get that knowledge by being jaunted about to Stuttgardt, and Buenos Ayres, and Rio de Janeiro; the general knowledge which will fit him for the higher grades of the profession, must be got at those places where such a general knowledge is attainable.

Rt. Hon. Sir H. L. Bulwer, K.C.B., M.P.

4901. We have had a good deal suggested to us with respect to the relative position of the consular and diplomatic services, and we have had the suggestion made that it would be advisable for the good of the service generally, that there should be something more of amalgamation between the two; what is your opinion on that point?—I cannot say that I agree in that; I think that it would end in the first place in this, either that the consuls would be absorbed by the attachés and diplomacy, which is most likely, as they are the strongest body, or the consuls would get into diplomatic posts, for which their education and training as consuls do not fit them. I think that the knowledge that you want in a consul is local knowledge; I have always found for myself that, if I could find a consul who had been a certain number of years at a place, he was a man of great importance and great authority, and could be of immense service to you at that place; whereas if you transplant him to another, unless he is a man of first-rate ability, which happens rarely, for a length of time he is next to useless, and without any consideration at all. Therefore, I think that the consular service requires a different class of men with different dispositions, different habits, and different desires. If you are to have a number of gentlemen circulating in diplomacy and among all these consulates (a rolling stone gathers no moss), they would never have any weight in any place which they went to, and, I speak generally, be bad consuls and bad diplomatists. I am quite against that suggestion. I would rather be able to offer a consul an increase of salary, if he stayed at the particular place where he was doing well, than be obliged, to the detriment of the service, to remove him from that place to another where he is certain not to do so well.

4902. As ambassador at Constantinople you had a great number of these gentlemen under your immediate superintendence?—Yes, I had a great many under me, both in America and in Spain, and also in the East.

4903. Some of them, no doubt, were men of considerable ability and attainment in that branch of the profession?—Some of them were, certainly.

4904. Should you say that as a class they are not the men whom you would like to see ultimately aspiring to the position of heads of missions, and dealing with great public affairs?—In the first place, as very few of them would get high in the diplomacy, nearly all would be dissatisfied, whereas they are now very satisfied with the career that they have entered upon. In the next place, I think that if you were to bear in mind that the man you named as consul might become an ambassador, you would exclude a great number of consuls who now make excellent consuls, and be obliged to make the consular service much more exclusive than it is now, which would not be an advantage.

4905. With reference to the consuls general, they are more in the capacity of diplomatic servants?—Yes, nevertheless I think that they should belong to the consular service. Though I would not make it a regular thing that consuls should enter diplomacy, I still would not positively exclude them from it, and places of that sort are intermediate places which may serve as a stepping stone. For instance, a man may be named consul general to Egypt, and may give evidence there of abilities which would make it desirable that he should go into the diplomatic service. Therefore the opportunity for it is open to him. You cannot say that a consul cannot become a minister, because many have become ministers by passing through those places. I would give them that chance.

4906. Viscount Barrington.] Then I understand that you would admit consuls general into the diplomatic service, but not consuls?—I would not refuse consuls if they were thought fit for it: but it is in places, like those of the consuls generals being promoted there as consuls, that consular officers can show diplomatic capacity. This permits men of the one service to enter the other, but I should not amalgamate the two services and make the one constantly running into the other.

4907. Chairman.] We have rather had the thing put in the other direction, that it would be a good thing for the public service to shunt diplomatists who did not get on well in the diplomatic profession into consulates; what is your view on that?—Young diplomatists would make bad consuls, and worse if they were merely consuls for a time to come back as diplomatists. What I think is a great disadvantage, and it is one which I often had the misfortune to find, is this: a man is doing exceedingly well at a place, has learned the place, he may be in one of the Greek Islands, Candia, for instance, and all of a sudden I would hear that he was carried off from there without any consultation with me, and placed in some place for which he was perfectly unfit, and of which he knew nothing, and that a stranger taken from America or Rio was put in his place. Lord Derby said that it would be hard to keep him at a place because he had done well there. You are sacrificing, therefore, the good of the public for the individual's good; but I would sacrifice neither, but would give him something additional to remain where he was useful.

4908. I did not ask you whether on the whole you approved of the present subjects of examination; what would you say as to the topics about which the service should be examined in?—I think that the first examination should show whether the gentleman is tolerably well educated. In the second examination I certainly should examine him in public law. I think that is of immense advantage. I went through a short course in Paris, and I found it of immense advantage in my profession to me; it is the study of equity.

4909. Did you attend the course of a professor there?—I read with a professor.

4910. French, I presume, you consider a sine quâ non?—Yes; I think so. Some gentlemen very often cite the American diplomatic service. I was speaking with the American minister at Paris, a very able gentleman, but he said "that he found it very inconvenient not knowing anything of French." Then you must consider this also, that the American diplomatists are generally men of known capacity, apart from diplomacy.

4911. They are men who have risen to distinction in their own party?—In their case you are not taking ordinary men such as you find in the mass of any profession. They are men already conspicuous in some way for their ability.

4912. The diplomatic appointments of the United States abroad are considered as prizes in America for very eminent men in public life, are they y not much more than they are here?—inent men often want and get them, but they ver stay long. A man wants to go to Europe; wants to educate his daughters; it gives him ertain position afterwards in life to have known inent Europeans, and all that sort of thing, d therefore in that way are prizes; but high lomatic posts are great prizes at times, though t like the prizes of the great offices in the ntry.

4913. I need not ask you whether the American presentatives in Europe play the same imrtant part in the public affairs of Europe, that e English representatives do generally?—In rope, in general, the American diplomatist mes into the field with a great advantage that have not. He says if you do not do so-and-so know what will happen, and he can threaten d he will be generally supported by his country threatening, whereas the English diplomatist ows that if he threatens he will be disapproved. olding stronger language, the American diplomatists are sometimes more attended to than rs, therefore they have that advantage; but as dividuals, not being so well acquainted with rope, nor so well trained for diplomacy, they e generally inferior as diplomatists to ours.

4914. Viscount Barrington.] I suppose that the case of an American diplomatist acting, as perhaps would say, on his own hook, in that nd of way, any decision he came to in the way a threat would be subject rather to revision the Home Government?—Certainly; but the ome Government reflects the country, and the untry in the United States has a strong national irit, which the Government rather encourages an suppresses. Consequently, on all national estions, an agent knows he can speak boldly, d that he will be approved of.

4915. I suppose that you would be in favour a change being made with regard to the stem of the present examination in French, as u say that you consider French indispensable, cause at present conversation in French and iting under dictation in French, have been minated from the examination?—I think it uld be very desirable that that should not be iminated; I think that a person ought to be le to write and talk French. There might be ceptions, but I think that that ought to be the le. It is certainly one of the most necessary ings after writing English.

4916. Do you think that any change ought to ke place with regard to the Foreign Office messngers in the present system under which they t?—I consider that a difficulty; if I had to stitute a new system I certainly should not institute the present one; but it is very difficult w having got gentlemen into that service to nange it and introduce persons of another class; t I think that persons of another class have ne the business as well.

4917. Persons like the Feld-jäger in Prussia?—Yes; persons of highly respectable character; t there are persons of highly respectable character in their particular grade of life as much to trusted as persons born in a higher sphere. I member some of the old messengers.

4918. Mr. W. Cartwright.] I think you said at formerly a good many went into the service without any intention of following it up a profession, whereas now those who do go in tend to follow it as a profession: is not that a nange which is rendered incumbent by the system introduced in 1861, and which made it obligatory upon persons to pass an examination?—I think it is; those persons who went in in the manner in which I suggest should not be made to pass the examination; they would be employed on the responsibility of the chief of the Foreign Office, the chief of a mission being satisfied that they would be an assistance to him, and then if they were carried from that temporary position regularly into the profession they would undergo examination.

Rt. Hon. Sir H. L. Bulwer, G.C.B., M.P.

4919. Therefore it would be necessary, in order to have the system that you recommend, to do away with the recommendations of the Committee of 1861 in its main features?—I would have those who went into the profession with the idea of remaining permanently pass through the examination, and that would fit them for the position of paid attachés, and to form a part of the staff which I would have maintained; but those who went in merely temporarily, and are named with the assent of the chief, need not, I think, pass an examination. No chief would wish to have an incapable aid.

4920. I think, if I understand you rightly in regard to the block, you said you thought that there was some misapprehension?—I think that there is some exaggeration; I think people think that everybody got on much quicker formerly than they do now; and I have cited a great number of persons who were fortunate in the profession, and who were nevertheless very long in the lower grades before they got to the higher ones.

4921. But is it not the case, that whereas formerly some men rose slowly, now all men rise slowly by the present system?—I quote those who rose the quickest; I quote the persons who have been the most eminent in the profession. Generally speaking (I was in some degree an exception), those men who reached high posts were a very long time before they got to them; others were put entirely aside, or never went beyond the lower grades; but it has always been a very slow profession. Mr. Temple was a very long time, though Lord Palmerston was always a member of the Government, before he got to be minister.

4922. But does not the rule of seniority render it absolutely impossible for any man to rise rapidly now?—Yes; now the idea of everybody is that he must rise, and therefore nobody rises.

4923. Whereas formerly there was room for those men who showed more merit to rise, now by the rule of seniority those men cannot rise?—Yes.

4924. Still I understand you to say that the measure of men is pretty fairly taken; how can that be?—I did not say that it is taken fairly in their promotion. I said that in the profession people, generally speaking, had a fair idea of the competency and the abilities of those persons who were in the profession. I did not mean to say that promotion followed their competency; on the contrary, I think it does not.

4925. That their competency was seen by their immediate superiors, but still their merits were not fairly rewarded by promotion?—This was my idea: that in the profession, generally speaking, if an able man among the subalterns is given an exceptional post, the profession knows enough of him to say, "Well, after all, he is a clever fellow, and has a right to be put there;" but I do not say that the Foreign Office acts on this idea; on the contrary, I believe that the clever men now do not get on quicker than the stupid ones.

Rt. Hon. Sir H. L. Bulwer, G.C.B., M.P.

4 July 1870.

4926. They do not get on so quickly as they were able to do under the old system?—Certainly that is the case.

4927. I think you suggested that one of the advantages of the unpaid attaché systems, was that these gentlemen, if they found that the service did not suit them, might exchange into other services?—Yes, into other walks of life.

4928. But would there not be some difficulty now, in consequence of the rule introduced into all public services of competitive examination, which would prevent these gentlemen, after having spent some years in a trial, from going into these other branches?—The class of men who would be unpaid attachés would not probably go into other professions, nor remain in the diplomacy unless they found that they had peculiar capacity for it; and then if you did away with seniority, and they were superior to other men, they would advance quicker, even if they went in late.

4929. But I apprehend that formerly it was more easy to enter other public services, when there were no fixed rules than now, when there are such, and limits of age; that would require modification therefore?—For other public services, but not for various other pursuits.

4930. I gather generally from your answers, that you have a decided opinion that the Secretary of State should be vested with the very highest degree of discretion, and full power in the selection of his instruments; that is the keystone of your system?—Yes, and I think that he should consult to a great degree with the ambassador, who should also have the responsibility thrown upon him.

4931. But that the principal secretary, in order to be able to fulfil his high functions, should be vested with very large power?—Yes.

4932. In speaking of the advantage of a concentrated staff, did you mean us to infer that generally our diplomatic staffs all over the world were too large?—I cannot answer for all over the world; but my general impression is that they are so. I found staffs, much less numerous than those which now exist, work very effectively when I had them under my control.

4933. But would there not be a difficulty in finding the raw material for the higher posts if you reduced the number of these recruits; I mean, finding trained servants at a fixed moment?—No; I think that there would still be a quite sufficient number to be able to select the men fit for those positions in the profession; and if they could not find them in it, you would have to look for them out of it.

4934. Did I rightly understand that you think in the course of late years the diplomatic profession has somewhat come under the rule of a bureaucratic encroachment on the part of the permanent officials of the Foreign Office?—Certainly my opinion is very much so, and it has gone to such an excess that they have very much diminished the self-confidence which a person in a high situation had formerly. I learn this from diplomatists who are now in the profession. It is very customary, for instance, to send out to a minister, if there is a note to write, the exact wording of the note he is to write. Perhaps he has to make a representation with his French colleague. His French colleague, who is not tied down by these rules, writes a very amiable letter to the minister of the country, which is well received, and says just the same thing. The English minister, who is tied down, writes a very disagreeable stilted official sort of note, which is exceedingly ill received, and makes him very unpopular. My idea of what formerly happened is this, that a minister generally took very great pains to make you thoroughly understand what he wished done, and the policy of the English Government with respect to the country to which you went, and then he left you very great discretion as to the means by which you should do it; but now the Foreign Office is apt to consider that nothing can be well done except that which is done at its own bureau.

4935. So that the position of the permanent officials is one of much more power and influence now than it was formerly?—It is a perfectly different thing.

4936. And the position of diplomatic servants abroad is one of decreased power now?—Certainly, in the higher diplomatic service. Having less responsibility, they become less fit on pressing occasions to assume it.

4937. I think you said that you considered that a great embassy was the true high school for diplomacy?—That and the Foreign Office.

4938. Do you think that any advantage would be derived if the heads of departments in the Foreign Office were, for a year or two, employed in these great embassies, so as to acquire greater insight into the peculiar matters that come under their consideration in the Foreign Office?—I think it would be, if it could be managed without detriment to the service of the Foreign Office. You must always consider this, that the Foreign Office knows nothing really of the living countries, or the personal character of the men in those countries. Whatever they do is done upon general principles and general ideas; and of course, if any man knows who the leading men are in foreign countries, and knows foreign countries practically, he carries much useful knowledge to the Foreign Office.

4939. Therefore you think that, if such a scheme could be arranged, it would be beneficial, and tend to the greater efficiency of the Foreign Office?—It would tend to make gentlemen there see that everything cannot be done at the Foreign Office, and enable them to do what they did there better.

4940. In regard to consuls, I understand you to say distinctly that you would not like to see the young diplomatic servants drafted into the consular service?—Certainly not; I think that they would make exceedingly bad consuls, and not gain much for diplomacy.

4941. I suppose you would admit that there are two distinct classes of consuls; some distinctly mercantile?—Yes; but there are very few political consuls who have not also some commercial business, and I think it fair to the consular body to leave it some gates open to the higher profession of diplomacy; you sometimes thus get able men out of that body.

4942. Still, in the French service there is a very close amalgamation between the consular and the diplomatic services, is there not?—Not very close; but the French consuls are more political and less commercial than ours, and therefore it is more frequent with the French to put men from the consular service into the diplomatic, particularly in the East; but then, as I have said, they are educated more politically than ours are.

4943. You think that detrimental?—I do; upon the whole, I think our own consuls, as consuls for our work, much better than the French.

4944. I think that you laid stress upon public law being included in our examination?—In the second examination.

4945. I suppose you meant thereby to imply that it is not sufficiently developed in our present examination?—From what I understand, it is not.

4946. And it is of very great importance in diplomacy?—Certainly; it accustoms men to consider what is right; it habituates their minds to consider what is equitable, and then you can judge nearly all questions by that test.

Mr. CHARLES HENEAGE, called in; and Examined.

4947. Mr. Otway.] YOU are a Secretary of Legation at Munich, are you not?—I am Third Secretary at Munich.

4948. Did you hear Mr. Labouchere's evidence here with regard to the work of the legation at Munich?—I did.

4949. Is that, in your opinion, in any way a correct representation of the work that is done at the legation there?—It is not a correct representation of the work at present at Munich.

4950. Would you give a short description of the work of a secretary of legation at Munich, taking your own case last year?—I arrived there last year; shortly after my arrival the other two secretaries went on leave, and I was there alone with the minister. I was on duty every day according to our regulations shortly before 11 to 2; I was busy almost the whole time with people coming in and different things and so on; and all my leisure time at home was occupied with translations of different things; I had no leisure time at all for nearly two months and a half.

4951. How many reports were you engaged on at the same time?—The first secretary was away; I was busy with a report on military education in Bavaria, which has since been published by the War Office. I had the translations to make of all the theological papers of Dr. Döllinger about the Œcumenical Council; we sent the original home with the translations; those translations are very difficult and require great care. I made also a translation of a very elaborate report by Dr. Mayer, about the venereal disease, a very important matter, and other private things.

4952. Could you give any account of the number of despatches written at Munich?—I think that Sir Henry Howard gives full details of everything that goes on at Munich; I think that there are something like 300 despatches a year. Those are principally political despatches; we also have commercial ones.

4953. Munich is a very interesting post just now, is it not?—It is a very important post.

4954. Where does Sir Henry Howard reside?—In the country in the summer time, on the Starnbergersee, about 14 miles from Munich; and in the winter time at Munich.

4955. Mr. Rylands.] How often does he come into Munich in the summer?—If he is residing in the country with his family, he gives very distinct instructions to me to keep him thoroughly acquainted with everything going on, by letter or telegraph, and I use my discretion in doing so.

4956. Mr. Otway.] Starnbergersee is about the distance from Munich of Richmond or Twickenham from London, is it not?—Yes, an hour in the train; and he frequently comes into Munich whenever there is the slightest thing to require his presence there.

4957. The other diplomatists live there too in summer, I presume?—Yes.

4958. Mr. Rylands.] Then the fact is, that you, as third secretary, can attend to all the routine business, even with this pressure upon you?—With the minister there to direct me.

4959. You can do the routine work by yourself?—I think I should explain that it is more than is generally expected.

4960. I understood you to say that it was two to three hours a day?—And all my private time too last year.

4961. Your leisure time was occupied in translating documents relating to the Œcumenical Council?—Yes, and other ones; those take a great deal of time.

4962. Mr. Otway.] Is it not the fact that from Bavaria came very important intelligence relating to the Œcumenical Council at Rome?—Yes.

4963. And that has considerably added to the work of the mission there?—It did so when I was there last year, and probably will this year.

4964. Mr. W. Cartwright.] How many miles is it to the Tegernsee from Munich?—I cannot say exactly; it is too far for an English minister to reside. The Russian minister resides there in the summer, but not the English minister.

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE EDWARD PLEYDELL BOUVERIE, IN THE CHAIR.

The Right Honourable JOHN LAIRD MAIR Baron LAWRENCE, G.C.B. (attending by permission of the House of Lords); Examined.

Baron Lawrence.
11 July 1870.

4965. Chairman.] YOU have been Governor General of India, as we know?—Yes.

4966. For how long?—For five years.

4967. And the whole of your active life has been spent on that side of the world?—Yes.

4968. We have had it stated here that the Persian Mission has twice been changed backwards and forwards between the India Office and the Foreign Office, and that now, under the last arrangement, it is under the Foreign Office; that is so?—Yes.

4969. No doubt you are satisfied that a great part of our relations with Persia must necessarily arise from our position in India?—I think so.

4970. Practically, a great part of the value of our having any relation at all with Persia depends upon our Indian empire?—I think so.

4971. Have you ever given your attention to the question whether it was expedient that it should remain under the Foreign Office, or that it should be under the direction of the Indian Secretary of State?—Yes; I have thought over the matter.

4972. Have you come to any clear conclusion as to which you think is the best course?—Yes; I think that, on the whole, it is best that it should be under the Secretary of State for India.

4973. When you were Governor General, had you direct communications with our diplomatic representative at Teheran?—Yes, but not numerous; the minister in Teheran used to send to the Governor of India copies of such despatches as he addressed to the Secretary of State, which bore upon India and Indian politics.

4974. Had you direct authority in any way over the Persian Mission in case of emergency?—No, none whatever; we could communicate, of course.

4975. Whatever you wished, or might have wished to have done in Persia, with reference to Indian interests, would have to be communicated home, and then to be sent out from here to Persia?—Yes.

4976. Have you ever had occasion to think that the public service was at all damnified by a want of direct communication between the Governor General and the Persian Mission, either in point of dispatch or in point of efficient discharge of any duty?—I cannot say that in my time it was so.

4977. We have been told that there was a very considerable advantage in having gentlemen who have been bred in the Indian service, and who are familiar with Eastern courts and Eastern habits to represent us in Persia, rather than gentlemen who have been bred in the ordinary diplomatic circles of Europe; is that your opinion?—I would certainly say so.

4978. Should you say that a man who had been accustomed to Eastern courts is a better man for the purpose of dealing with an Eastern despot and his Government, than one who had been accustomed to the more civilised courts of the West?—I should say so.

4979. From his familiarity with the habits and languages and modes of thought of Orientals generally?—Yes.

4980. Then I rather gather that if the Persian Mission was composed of gentlemen who had that familiarity from previous experience with Eastern habits and Eastern courts, instead of being composed of European diplomatists, if one may use the phrase, your objection to having the Foreign Office in superintendence of the Persian Mission might to a certain extent be obviated?—To a certain extent. I think that, in the first place, one great advantage in having the Mission in Persia under the Secretary of State for India is, that the Secretary of State would then be naturally led to make his selection of the chief officers in Persia from among officers who had served with distinction in India; whereas in the nature of things that could not be the case if the Persian Mission were under the Foreign Office, that would be one of the main points of difference.

4981. Matters of general policy, with reference to our mode of dealing upon great questions with the Persian court, of course, would be settled here by the Cabinet after communication between the two Secretaries of State?—Yes, of course, the policy would, but the mode in which that policy was carried out when settled would very ry much depend upon the individual man ere, and whether that man had been trained so to be able readily to acquire a knowledge of character of the people of that country. But n I think that beyond that, though the policy uld be settled at home, the Secretary of State England would be very much guided in his icy by the views of the man who was in Persia, ticularly if he was a very able man, because ugh the Secretary of State would decide the tter himself, he would, nevertheless, in the ure of things, in semi-official and even in cial communications with the minister, from e to time hear from him what were his views particular questions of policy, or with refer- e to our general policy, or our general re- ions with Persia, and in that way the Secretary State would hear a good deal from the minister Persia calculated to influence him, and bias his lgment, though, of course, that judgment would finally settled in England.

4982. You think that the eyes and ears of the nister in the Persian court would be more ined and skilled eyes and ears if he were an dian officer than if he were an European diplo- atist?—Yes, and those views would influence e Secretary of State; he would be free to lge from what was written to him or said to m, but he would be very much influenced by at he heard from the minister in Persia. If at man were a person who thoroughly understood siatics and Orientals he would be more likely come to a true, safe, and sound conclusion than man the main portion of whose life had been ent in European courts. It is quite one thing deal with Europeans, and it is quite another ng to deal with Asiatics. Then I think there another important point. I should say that if the inister in Persia is a gentleman whose chief me has been spent in Europe, his views of ques- ons bearing upon our interests in India might very different from the view of an officer of qual ability who had been for years in India, d who was conversant with our border politics the frontiers of India, our relations with ffghanistan and Belloochistan, and our com- unications with Central Asia.

4984. The relation of Russia to Persia is a uestion which affects both sides of the world, oes it not?—No doubt; our great interest in ersia arises from the dominant influence which ussia exercises in Persia.

4985. One of the objects of English diplo- acy has been always to uphold the Persian ndependence and the Persian Empire as opposed to Russian domination, was it not?—Yes; but so far as that went, the policy would be identical; it would be equally to support Turkey for Turkey's sake, as to support Persia for the sake of our interests in India. I meant, in speaking about Turkey, that border questions between Persia and Turkey, those questions, on the one hand, and great questions of policy affecting Indian interests on the other, would be altogether different and distinct.

4986. While you were Governor General, our Persian Mission was under the Foreign Office?—While I was Governor General it was under the Foreign Office.

4987. Had you ever occasion to doubt whether (without reference to particular persons) the Indian policy, and Indian interests and views, were sufficiently regarded in the action of our representative in Persia; or would you have thought that somebody with a greater knowledge of Eastern views and Eastern life would have been more equal to the occasion; I mean in a general way, because I do not ask for a particular instance?—I should say that was the case; I do not think that the minister of late years in Persia understood altogether what were really the interests of British India, as connected with his position in Persia; and I do not think that he was able, from his position in Persia, to gather that knowledge of Central Asia and Central Asian affairs that he would have acquired had he been previously trained in India.

4988. I suppose, to a great extent, Persia and the Persian Court is a kind of centre of intrigue for all the various interests affecting the West and the East?—I could not speak of that much, having never myself been in Persia; but whenever I looked at the question, I looked at it with reference to our tenure of India, and in that view, I consider it most important that the British minister in Persia should possess a large knowledge of India, and its circumstances.

4989. Have you a trained staff of skilled officers in India always available, men who have been bred in the functions of diplomacy?—There are a large number of officers of various ages and various periods of service in what is called in Europe the diplomatic line, but which we term the political service in India; these men, generally serving at different native courts from their earlier years. Many of them have been 25 or 30 years in different diplomatic positions, so that they have had a complete training in diplomacy.

4990. Are these gentlemen shifted from one station to another, and are they promoted from one post to another?—Yes; they are promoted in the department. In many cases they remain for years and years in the same province, and in other cases they are changed from one province to another, according to circumstances. Supposing that there was a great run of mortality or sickness in the diplomatic officers in one province, of course the Government would not give all the promotion in that province, but they would give some of those posts to the men backward in other provinces; but if the promotion went on pretty well in all, they would, as a rule, promote men on the principle of benefiting to the greatest extent by their local knowledge and local influence. For the highest posts, however, the Governor General would naturally be disposed to make his selection of the officials whom, in his judgment, were best fitted for the particular duty, irrespective of other considerations.

4991. Is it become more or less a profession, a distinct line of public life in India?—Yes; I think if you were to consult the Indian Directory, you would find probably 400 or 500 officers at this moment in different diplomatic and civil appointments in India among the military men alone, besides the civilians. There are fewer of the civilians in the Diplomatic Service; still there are a number. Thus you have an enormous field from which to select. Then again, after a certain time, officers return from India, men of large and extensive experience in different parts in India, and among them you could get men of known talents and known ability, and tried experience; and I should say that, on the whole, you might select among them men of greater fitness for service in Persia, than you would, in the nature of things, find among the men under the Foreign Office.

4992. Persian is the sort of French of the East?—At one time Persian was the language of all our courts, not only of diplomacy, but of justice; but the different vernacular languages of India are now the languages of the courts of justice, and Persian is confined to diplomatic relations.

4993. Still, a trained political man would be familiar with Persian?—Yes; and he would not only know Persian, but also various other languages of India which have a bearing on the knowledge of Orientals, and of their character and peculiarities; he would probably know three or four Eastern languages besides Persian.

4994. Viscount Barrington.] I gather from what I have heard of your Lordship's evidence, that you are in favour of the re-transfer of the Persian Mission to the India Office?—Yes, I am in favour of that change.

4995. And are you in favour of the Governor General of India having more influence over the Persian minister than he has at present?—I would have the Persian minister, as at present, under the Secretary of State in England; but I would encourage a more free communication between the Government of India and the minister in Persia in troublous times, on emergent occasions, and so forth; of course, the Government of India should not be able to alter or modify the policy that had been laid down from England, even if he wished to do so, which probably he would not; it should be thoroughly understood that he was not able to do so; still, by a more free communication with Persia from India, I think a great deal of good might arise, and a certain amount of friction at times be avoided. And then I would say that the two persons, the minister in Persia and the Governor General in India, being under the one Secretary of State, there would be less liability of friction and more probability of unity of policy and purpose, and system, under the one state of things, than under the other.

4996. That Secretary of State being, of course, the Secretary of State for India?—Yes; no doubt the Secretary of State for India and the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs would communicate with one another, but that is when things have gone to a certain extent. You want that the policy should be as homogeneous as possible; that it should be a policy consistent from one period to another period; and I think that is more likely to be the case when Persia is under the India Office. I think that the Secretary of State himself would, in difficult circumstances, where India was very much interested, apply to the Governor General of India, and he would from his own knowledge, or from the advice of those about him, his counsellors, be able often to give the Secretary of State in England sounder views connected with Indian interests, than those which would be acted upon, if Persia was under the one Secretary of State and India under the other.

4997. We have had evidence both ways with regard to the transfer and the re-transfer; could your Lordship give us any reason why there should be this very great objection on the part of the Foreign Office, beyond the jealousy which exists between all offices one with another, to give up the power of controlling the Persian Mission to the India Office?—I suppose it was simply that the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs wished to have our relations with Persia under himself. I recollect that I was in the Council of India when Persia was under the Secretary of State for India; it was then re-transferred, if I recollect right, at the wish of Lord Russell.

4998. Was it only in consequence of Lord Russell's individual opinion?—I am not aware of any other reason; I think it would be difficult for any one to say fairly that there were any great evils that arose from Persia being under the one or the other Secretary of State; but I think that things would have worked more smoothly and more satisfactorily on the whole for the public benefit, if the Persian Mission had been under the Secretary of State for India. The real question is, I submit, which arrangement is likely to answer best in times of trouble and commotion. These are the considerations which should decide it.

4999. I suppose you are of opinion that our representative in Persia should be thoroughly acquainted with the language?—Of course.

5000. Is it a language that is easily acquired?—Well, it is not difficult to acquire when you are young; but I think that if a man, however able he was, had not acquired it in his youth, he would not easily acquire it in middle age.

5001. Your Lordship has stated that diplomatic relations with Eastern powers are very different from those with European powers?—Yes, and the mode of dealing with them also.

5002. I suppose that one of the modes of dealing with them in the East, is the system of making presents, is it not?—When I said that it was a different mode of dealing in the East, I did not allude to giving presents or withholding them; some diplomatists think that it is of great importance to give and receive presents; I confess that I do not attach very much value to that. On our side of India the Government certainly do give and receive presents, but I do not myself think that it is of very much importance; I know, however, that there is a divided opinion on that subject.

5003. At the same time I conclude, that where that practice is carried out by other foreign powers, it would be necessary that we should act in the same way, in order not to diminish our influence?—I think so.

5004. Mr. W. Cartwright.] If I understood rightly, what you mainly pointed out in regard to Persia was, that it was a specific mission, requiring specific qualifications?—Yes.

5005. And that is the principal point, I think, of your observations?—Yes, and that those specific qualifications are with reference to India, our interests in India.

...I mean a mission requiring specific qua...tions on the part of those who are employed ...e mission, in contradistinction from the qua...tions which would fit those persons for mis... in Europe?—Yes, I think so.

...07. Therefore, if full discretion were given ...e Secretary of State at the head of the Foreign ...e to select any instruments that he might ...n in the service, there would not be so much ...tion to Persia remaining under the Foreign ...e as at present?—I do not think that that ...ld very much affect the question. I think ... the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs ...d naturally go to a different set of officers ... those to whom the Secretary of State for ...a would go in making his selections for ser... in Persia. Men naturally make their selec... from among those with whom they have the ... intimate relation. I mean to say that the ...retary of State for Foreign Affairs is in ...tant communication with the ministers in ... different courts of Europe; well, if he ...ted an able, good man for Persia, he would ...rally look among the lists of those gen...en, and select the best man that he could ...his hands upon for that particular post; he ...ld not look to the Indian list of officers for ... a man; of course he could do so, but in the ...re of things he would not; whereas, the ...retary of State for India would naturally look ...e Indian officers.

...008. Still, for China and Japan, which are ...idered specific and special missions of a special ...acter, the Foreign Office has of late selected ...ons who have got special knowledge of those ...ntries?—Of course, there is nothing to prevent ... Secretary for Foreign Affairs selecting an ...ian officer for the Persian Mission, or a par...lar man for China or Japan; but I think, in ...nature of things, he is more likely to select ...fficer for the Persian Mission who is not so ... qualified for that post, as one who might be ...cted by the Secretary of State for India, with ... aid of the advisers that he has about him.

...009. Hitherto it has been the rule of the ...eign Office, since the Committee of 1861, to ...sider diplomacy rather a close profession; ... if that rule were modified, and the Secretary ... State were empowered to use greater discre... in the selection of officers, I suppose that ... objection that you have raised would be in ...e degree met?—It would in some degree, ... not much, because I think that no rule can ...r the natural bias of a man to make selection ...n those with whom he is in the closest com...nication.

...010. I suppose that there is a considerable ...erence in the class and range of the political ...rest connected with the Persian Mission from ...e which are connected with any other mis... immediately within the sphere of the India ...ce?—I think that officers who have lived ...g our frontier, say in Scinde and in the Pun...b, beyond the Indus, and in constant relations ...h the Afghans and the Belooches, would be ...eedingly well adapted, if well qualified in ...er respects, for that kind of service.

...011. My question was not with regard to the ...lification of the officers, but with regard to ... nature of the mission itself as one that has ...leal with other political interests of a larger ...l, and of a more cosmopolitan kind than the ...51.

missions immediately under the Governor General of India?—I do not think that they could be larger than those interests which are directed by officers, say on the Punjaub frontier; those men have not only intimate relations with the chiefs within our own territory, but they have also a considerable acquaintance with chiefs beyond the Border, and the general state of affairs in Afghanistan. And then with regard to the merchants who are continually coming down from Central Asia into our territory, and going back again, these officers are in constant communication with them also; they have a great deal of important work to deal with, I should say quite as important as anything that is likely to occur in Persia, judging from the despatches I have seen.

5012. The relations in Persia also affect general European interests and those of Turkey?—Yes; it does not seem to me they affect them in great affairs, however, but in little border questions.

5013. You do not think that there is any substantial difference in the range of interests between those missions which are directly subject to the Governor General and the Persian Mission?—No. There is one thing that I would like to say with regard to the selection of officers, because that seems to me the grand question between the advantages of having one Secretary of State and those of having the other Secretary of State to control the Persian Mission. I said that the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs would naturally look, in making his selection, to the officers in immediate connection with his department. Even if he wished to make a selection of an officer of mark and distinction, who had served in India, he would hardly know of an officer or be able to select one. As a general rule, with rare exceptions, he would not know anything about the men who had served in India, whereas the Secretary of State for India is daily and hourly reading despatches in which the best officers of India are mentioned, and therefore their merits and qualities are specially brought to his notice. A Secretary of State for India who had been for any time in that office could probably tell off on his fingers all the leading officers of distinction in India; whereas the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs would know nothing about them.

5014. Mr. R. Shaw.] A difficulty has been suggested to the Committee in the way of the appointment of an Indian diplomat in connection with the Persian establishment, namely, that he might not be so competent to deal with European questions as a European diplomat. Am I right in assuming that the number of European questions arising at that mission is small in comparison with the number of Indian questions?—I have no absolute personal knowledge of the details of the Persian Mission, as I have never been in Persia, but I can fairly appreciate the kind of work which the minister there has to do; and I would say, under correction, that the work which he has to do connected with European matters is comparatively trivial in proportion to his work connected with Indian questions and questions bearing on India.

5015. If there is anything in the objection would it not apply with greater force to the appointment of a European diplomat, seeing that Indian questions preponderate?—Yes.

5016. Would there be any difficulty in laying down rules for the guidance of an Indian diplomat in all questions of a European character?—I should think not.

Baron Lawrence.
11 July 1870.

5017. Mr. Eastwick.] I should like to ask whether you think that the Foreign Office can be well acquainted with the affairs of Afghanistan and the States which border on India to the north?—I think it cannot.

5018. Do you think that the progress of Russia in Central Asia is likely to bring Persia more and more into the pale of European influence?—I can hardly form an opinion, and I should not like to venture to express one on that point.

5019. The progress of Russia in Central Asia must of course render the interests of India in Persia much graver and more important?—No doubt, if Russia advances.

5020. Any movement of troops, for instance, supposing it was intended to counteract the advance of Russia, or any negotiations, would probably be carried on from India, would they not?—That, of course, would depend upon the policy of England. I think the natural mode of dealing with the question would be to do it through India.

5021. And the Governor General would probably be kept much better informed of matters relating to Indian interests by an Indian officer as minister at Teheran, and supposing Persia was under the India Office than he would be if an European officer were there, and Persia were under the Foreign Office?—I should think so.

5022. When your lordship was in the Council of India, and when the re-transfer of the Persian Mission from the India Office to the Foreign Office took place, were you aware of any reason for that transfer in the bad working of the arrangement which put Persia under the India Office?—No.

5023. While Sir Henry Rawlinson was our minister in Persia, everything worked well, did it not, so far as your lordship is aware?—Yes.

5024. You are aware that Sir Henry Rawlinson resigned immediately that the Persian Mission was re-transferred to the Foreign Office?—Yes.

5025. Would you not think it probable from what you saw in India, that matters of grave importance are likely to take place on the frontier with reference to Affghanistan, Persia, and Central Asia, more so than, we will say, 10 or 15 years ago, owing to the progress of Russia?—I am rather doubtful upon that point; I have never been much alarmed about the progress of Russia myself; of course, it is on the cards.

5026. Your lordship would think it fair, I presume, that in the case of Persia being re-transferred to the India Office, the Indian revenue should bear the whole expenses?—I do not see why India should pay the whole expenses. India already pays the larger portion of the expenses of the Persian Mission, and as the mission in Persia is not entirely and solely for the interests of India, but as it is admitted that to a certain extent it is for European interests also, I think that England should pay a portion.

5027. You think that the present allotment of the expenses, which is something like three-fourths, namely, 12,000 l. from India, would be a satisfactory arrangement to remain?—Yes; I think that if it is altered at all, England ought to pay a little more rather than pay a little less.

5028. Mr. A. Russell.] Would not the difficulty be such if the Foreign Secretary were to be guided by the advice of the Secretary of State for India, as to any appointment to the mission in Persia?—I do not see that in the nature of things you could expect him to be so guided; they would consult, and no doubt he might be influenced by the Secretary of State for India. But I think that, as a rule, all men of marked ability and strong character would like to make their own selections.

The Honourable Edward Robert Lytton, called in; and Examined.

5029. Chairman.] What post do you hold in the Diplomatic Service now?—At present I am Secretary of Embassy at Vienna.

5030. How long have you been in the diplomatic service?—I have been, as nearly as possible, 21 years. I find, on looking at the distribution of that time, that, oddly enough, I have been seven years unpaid attaché, seven years paid attaché, and seven years a secretary of legation.

5031. Are you aware of there being a considerable amount of dissatisfaction in your profession, with the state of it, as regards promotion?—I think there is at this moment, undoubtedly, a feeling of great discouragement in the junior branches of the service.

5032. Do you think that it is founded upon any substantial ground?—There can be no doubt that promotion is exceedingly slow; but I hardly see how what is called the block in the service can be obviated, unless you can induce people who have already got to the top of the tree to retire. When a man has worked his way up to a high diplomatic post, his retirement from it opens to him in England no position comparable to that which he occupied abroad, and therefore he has no great inducement to retire.

5033. If he retires he practically goes upon the shelf altogether?—Practically, he goes upon the shelf; he keeps up no connection with the public life of his own country; and in a pecuniary point of view he is a loser.

5034. Do you think that there is anything in a suggestion which has been made to us, that some of the junior members, or gentlemen rather in a middle position in the profession, might be tempted to go for a consideration, so as to relieve the block in that way?—There can be no doubt that if those gentlemen were induced to go, there would be a great relief to the pressure which is at present stopping the way.

5035. It is represented to us as a sort of abandonment of hope amongst the lower grades of the profession, because they see the upper grades filled with very little chance of vacancies for their own promotion; do you think that a correct representation?—Yes; I fancy that that really is no exaggeration of the state of feeling; and I must honestly say that as long as you maintain the present system of promotion by seniority, I cannot see how it is to be obviated. I think that a hard-and-fast system of seniority promotion is very discouraging.

5036. You would prefer to see a selection made by he Secretary of State on his own responsiy?—Certainly; I think that the responsibif the Secretary of State cannot be too com-

; the fewer rules that are made by way of ing it the better.

37. Is there not a tendency observable in the matic profession, on the part of those who t the head of it and of the Foreign Minister , rather to foster that seniority as on the e a safe and easy way of promoting men?—
loubt it is a very convenient modus operandi ne Principal Secretary of State for Foreign irs.

38. At any rate, it relieves the head of a t department of observations that might be with regard to his selections?—Undoubt-
. I may say, that in conversation with some have been Secretaries of State for Foreign irs, I have occasionally ventured to bear wit-to the ability of some of my colleagues with n they were connected by family ties, and riably the reply has been, "Yes, the man is ry able man; but if I were to promote him, promotion that he received from me might nore injurious to him than otherwise." I k that this feeling is so strong, and the public racter of the Secretary of State so necessarily ted by that of his appointments, that no arary rule of seniority is required to prevent uritism or nepotism.

039. We have have had an opinion expressed s on the part of some great authorities that e might be a considerable diminution of the rdinate staff, with equal efficiency in the harge of the duties of the diplomatic servants he Crown; should you be inclined to confirm opinion yourself, with your knowledge and erience?—The fact of the matter is, that as as my own experience of a great mission or a at embassy, the work is of an exceedingly tuating character; there are some moments n the strain is very strong, and there are r moments when work is slack. Neither the iods in which work is heavy, nor the periods in ch work is light, can be foreseen; consently, if a pressure of work occurs when the bassy or mission is under-staffed, no doubt that ates a considerable amount of inconvenience.
t in missions to which some permanent officer ttached, I have generally found this inconveace much diminished. On the other hand, invenience constantly arises from the fact that gentleman who is really the organising head a chancery, by the time that he knows where place his hand upon every paper, and is per-tly cognisant of the state of the archives, and the whole routine of the chancery at his gers' ends, is removed to another post, and his cessor has to learn the working method and tem of that chancery, which it generally takes some time to do.

040. Then you would be in favour of a sugtion which has been made to us, that it is irable at the larger missions to have a gentle-n of the nature of a permanent officer con-ted with the mission?—I think that this uld very much depend upon the frequency with ich the junior members of the service are ved from post to post. I should not say, from own experience, that a man's diplomatic edu-ion is materially advantaged by frequently ving him about whilst he is in the lower grades the service.

5041. You think that a training in one court, in one circle of diplomatic action and ideas, is a better training than one derived from a variety of courts?—Well, my own impression is, that a man learns more by passing several years at a great embassy, a great centre of business, than by being frequently changed from one small post to another. I do not think that in the larger sense a young diplomatist has very much to learn from the minor missions to which he is sent. In the higher grades it is a different matter, because the question of a man's ability, whether in the diplomatic profession, or in any other walk of practical life, virtually depends very much on his power of rapid generalisation from details which are placed before him; but that makes it all the more important, I think, that a minister should find in the staff of his mission that amount of local knowledge which it is their business to accumulate, and his to employ.

5042. Then I rather gather that your idea is, that it would be to the advantage of the service if there were less frequent exchanges of the subordinate members, and that in consequence of the infrequency of those exchanges one or two of the subordinate members of the greater missions would acquire the skill or knowledge and experience which would be afforded in another way by having a permanent officer?—I think so; I have not carefully thought over that point; but I see that there is a difficulty with regard to a permanent officer, unless the position is very carefully defined, because all undefined positions very often lead to some amount of jealousy or misunderstanding. But I may mention that when I was at Lisbon, there was a gentleman employed, simply in the capacity of a translator to the mission at Lisbon. It happened that I was frequently in charge of that mission. He was an Englishman whose family was connected with the country; and his knowledge of the language and affairs of the country, his personal acquaintance with the men whom one had to deal with, his knowledge of their character, and his ability to give immediate information upon various subjects connected with the work of the mission, all rendered him so exceedingly useful that, with his assistance, I think I could almost have dispensed with any attachés at all. But fortunately, besides having that great local knowledge, he was a man of the most trustworthy character; and of course a very great element in the consideration of the utility of a man in his position would be his personal character.

5043. Was he a gentleman of the same class as the ordinary attachés at the mission?—No; and there is the difficulty which appears to me to arise in the consideration of how far officers of that class can be serviceably used.

5044. Practically, if you found a very efficient gentleman of that kind he would almost be a substitute for the whole of the minor and subordinate portion of the staff; at any rate, in a smaller mission he would do all the work, know all the people, and communicate with all the officers, would he not?—To a great extent he would, but I see no reason why the ordinary members of the mission, if left a sufficient time at their posts, should not be equally useful, and more so, in fact, in many ways; because this gentleman was hardly in a position which would have enabled me to ask him to go to the Minister for Foreign Affairs in case I were myself prevented from doing so, on the business of the mission; whereas the recognised members of the mission were all in that position, and that is a very material difference. Therefore, if they had the same local knowledge of the country, their utility would have been proportionately greater.

5045. That knowledge you would propose to aim at giving them by fixing them more permanently at the missions than they are now?—Yes, so far as such a system could be fairly and practically carried out, but I entertain a great disinclination to any positive system of hard-and-fast regulations in a service like diplomacy. I think the fewer rules the better in every way.

5046. I was going to ask how you would get over the apparent hardship of banishing one set of gentlemen to the minor missions, say in South America or the East, some remote and unsatisfactory portion of the globe, and sending the other and favoured set to the great missions?—Undoubtedly, that would be a hardship, and I do not think you can get over it.

5047. There must be some sort of compromise?—Unquestionably.

5048. Have you ever served yourself out of Europe?—My first post was in America; I was three years at Washington.

5049. With regard to the salaries of the diplomatic servants, we have had very general complaints laid before us, in the despatches written in answer to Lord Clarendon's Circular Despatch, of the deficiency of the public pay, and the great rise of the prices which diplomatic servants have to pay at times; do you concur in that?—Undoubtedly the value of money has decreased, and prices have risen all over Europe very much; so that salaries do not perhaps at this moment represent so much purchasing value as they did; there can be no doubt that the cost of living has very greatly increased in most places, certainly it has in the country where I am at this moment officially resident; even since the last campaign in Germany there has been a considerable rise of prices at Vienna; but I do not think that you can ever make diplomacy, by any scale of salaries, a profession which shall be pecuniarily profitable to any of its members; and there can be no doubt that in all the earlier stages of the profession, a man is spending his own capital. I do not know whether any junior member of the service has ever been able to live upon his salary; I know that I have never been able to live upon it myself; but I think that the natural compensation for that is a reasonably rapid promotion to higher posts, which represent many advantages that compensate the pecuniary outlay.

5050. The emolument is not the only consideration which a distinguished diplomat derives for his service; there is the power which he exercises and the distinction which he earns?—Precisely; whatever may be the salaries attached to the higher posts of the service, I do not think they can be based on the assumption that the recipient shall, as it were, recoup himself for the previous outlay of his private fortune; if he has a private fortune of his own, the salary ought to enable him to lay it by; but I do not think that any man in a representative character could put by any considerable portion of the salary he receives, without very much failing in that representative capacity.

5051. Then, as one of the profession, I rather understand you to contend that it ought not to be a mere debtor and creditor account of what is received on the one hand and expended on the other between the public and the Diplomatic Service, because, viewed in that light, there must always be rather a deficiency of payment than otherwise?—I think, under any circumstances considered in that point of view, the service must always be an underpaid service; at the present moment I think there is this difficulty in the way that the junior members of the service at present appear to be in the position of persons who have a certain claim upon the State which the State has recognised, but is scarcely able to pay. The examinations through which they have passed represent a certain value received by the State which entitles them to expect adequate remuneration as commissioned servants of the Government; but their payment is exceedingly small, and their chances of promotion are exceedingly remote; therefore, during the interval, a the junior members of the service are, I do think in a position which must naturally give rise to great deal of discontent from hope deferred and from a nominal, but at the same time an inadequate, payment for services rendered; it appears to me that the natural compensation to which a diplomatist looks is a reasonably rapid advancement to the higher branches of his profession not so much for the sake of pecuniary compensation, but for the sake of an agreeable position and one of increased public utility.

5052. I did not quite gather whether you expressed a distinct opinion or not that the staff of the larger missions could be fairly reduced and the work efficiently and rapidly done at all times or whether you think that the present staff, as far as your experience extends, is only sufficient for the bursts of hard work which occasionally you may have?—I should wish only to speak from my own experience of the missions I have been at; and I must honestly say, that I do not think they are over-staffed. I cannot consider such a question as this without expressing an opinion that it is extremely advisable that the natural difficulties which every member of our Foreign Service must experience in the endeavour to maintain his connection with his own country should, if possible, not be artificially increased; it seems to me very desirable that in all branches of the service diplomatists should be rather encouraged than discouraged to retremper themselves as often as possible in English ideas, by intercourse with their own country.

5053. We have had a strong opinion expressed from some high authorities, to the effect that it was essential that the diplomatic servants should occasionally refresh themselves and their views on public affairs by a visit home; you agree in that?—I think it is very desirable that a body of men who are to be the representatives throughout the Continent of Europe of the national mind of England, should be familiarized with it and maintained as much as possible in sympathy with it. Therefore, I think, that the more frequently they return to their country, and the more facilities they receive for maintaining that connection and sympathy with the main currents of feeling, and the great public life of their own country, the better it is for them, and the better it is for the public service.

5054. You do not think that much could be done to diminish the pressure by stopping the influx into the profession?—I merely mention that last point in connection with the number of the staff of the missions, because I think it desirable that the staff should be so organised as not to render it absolutely impossible for the juni r members of a mission to take frequent , with a view of returning to their own ry.

55. One suggestion we have had is that the er of entrances into the profession might be derably diminished, and that, in that way, ately there would be less of a block, parrly if you took away some of the higher by buying them out of the service, than is now; but you think, as I rather gather, you could not very well have fewer entries e service than there are now, and that the er of unpaid attachés could not be dimid?—I am not aware of the total number of id attachés in the profession, but it certainly not appear to me that it would be desirable ve an arbitrary limitation of admissions into ervice; that is a question which can be best ed of exclusively by the Secretary of State elf. I do not think that any advantage would ained by arbitrarily fettering him with any rule.

56. The whole of your view, as I understand, r hangs upon that point of leaving the Seary of State to his responsibility and not ring him by fixed rules?—Certainly; my strong impression is that responsibility in y department of the service cannot be too t.

57. I rather gather also that you think some e present inconveniences have arisen from hands having been somewhat tied of late s by fixed rules?—I think decidedly so. haps I may instance a case with regard to t appears to me the diadvantageous effect of ority. I should not like to mention the name, at a post where I happened to be myself, n I had lately been appointed secretary of ition, I found a junior member of the mission e (I think he was a second or third secre-) whose knowledge of the language, and ve all, whose special knowledge of the temament and character of the people of that ticular country rendered him an exceptionally ful public servant at that particular mission; I remember that our Government had been some time in correspondence, and rather a greeable correspondence, with the Government that country in regard to the supposed illegal ture of an English vessel; we had, I think the circumstances of the case occurred before rrived at this post), demanded compensation for s seizure, but had been refused; we had then nanded a mixed commission to investigate the cumstances of the seizure, and that demand had en refused three times; and as there could be no estion of going to war for refusals of that kind, re the matter rested. It so happened that the ntleman whom at this moment I have in my nd, finding himself, by a combination of cirmstances quite exceptional, in charge of that ssion, obtained, solely by his personal inence with the Government, an agreement to a xed commission, which had been three times icially refused (I am speaking from memory; t certainly that was, more or less, what occrred); he was then appointed a member of that mmission, and it is entirely due to his exertions at we ultimately obtained the compensation ich had been repeatedly refused to demands ade in the conventional official form. Well, I ink this man has rendered a public service ich, if the hands of the Minister for Foreign fairs were not tied by a fixed system, would have probably advanced him in his career; but he could not be promoted then, and I believe he has not been promoted since. Vacancies are of rare occurrence: stupid men cannot be removed in order to advance clever ones, and for a junior diplomatist to leap over the heads of half-a-dozen others to a high post is against all the traditions of the service. It appears to me that cases of this kind must tend to general discouragement in a service where everybody feels that advancement can only take place by regular order of seniority.

5058. As secretary of embassy, do you consider that it is part of your duty to do any work in the chancellerie, or that it is merely your duty to make your reports, and to superintend the staff subordinate to you?—Again, with regard to that, I come back to what I have been saying as to the practical impossibility of laying down fixed rules; I think that the organisation of the work must be very much left to the peculiar circumstances of it. I may say, with regard to myself, that I have frequently copied out despatches and done mechanical work in the chancery, both as secretary of legation and as secretary of embassy; but, as a general rule, I should certainly feel much surprise and some resentment, if my chief, or the embassy in general, were to expect that, as a matter of course, I should employ myself in the mechanical work of the chancery, for which it appears to me the staff of the chancery should be sufficient. In the first place, after a man has been for many years doing mechanical drudgery, when he has risen to a higher and more responsible rank in the profession, which gives him a great deal of intellectual work to do, he has a just disinclination to be still regarded merely as a manual labourer on the staff of the mission or embassy; and in the next place, the duties of a secretary of legation are so very varied, and often so heavy, that I do not think he could, advantageously to the public service itself, be doing the ordinary work of an attaché, or second or third secretary, in the chancery.

5059. A statement that he had nothing to do would not be an accurate representation of the fact?—No.

5060. I am not only asking you with reference to yourself, but with reference to your experience when you were not in the same rank as you are now in?—I have found generally that the secretaries of legation were perfectly willing to do any amount of work in the chancery that was necessary under a pressure; but I do not think that a secretary of legation or embassy considers himself called upon as a matter of course to be doing the work required of the other members of the chancery.

5061. I want to draw your attention to this statement, made by a witness in answer to Question 4635: "The secretary of embassy when I was there" (that is, at St. Petersburg) "did nothing. It is an understood thing, and, I think, even Mr. Hammond stated it was an understood thing, that a secretary of embassy should not work in the chancellerie; they occasionally do work, but usually they do not." That you have already answered; then the witness was asked, "Is it the fact that the secretary of embassy has this position, that he is there as a sort of relay; when the ambassador is present he does nothing, and when the ambassador is away he takes the position of the ambassador as chargé d'affaires?"; and the answer is "I think that is understood by the Foreign Office; but very often a secretary of embassy, if there is any stress of work, will work if a good many are away on leave; but he will do it more as an act of good nature than anything else; he is not required to do it by the Foreign Office"; is that an accurate representation of the fact, in your view?—Confining myself to my own personal experience both with regard to my own conduct and with regard to that of others whom I have known, I must emphatically say that the statement that a secretary of embassy or legation does not work when the ambassador is present at his post is one which surprises me; it is certainly in total opposition to my own experience. I can say for myself that during the presence of the ambassador at his post at Vienna, my own work is considerable; I am not speaking of work on reports which as secretary of embassy I am expected to make, but of the work of the mission. In most instances the relations between the ambassador and the secretary of embassy are of such a friendly and confidential character that the secretary will undertake a considerable portion of the correspondence of the mission; at least, it has been so in my own case. Very often the ambassador will ask him to draft the whole of the consular correspondence or some particular branch of the political correspondence; in fact, there are a vast number of subjects connected with the current work of the embassy in which the secretary of embassy may be, and, I think, ought to be, actively useful to the ambassador; and I do not think that if he were simply copying despatches, many of which he has written himself, he would be so efficiently employed; it is merely a question of the nature of his employment, not of the amount of it.

5062. Viscount Barrington.] I suppose that as you are in favour of a considerable amount of leave being given, you would consider it right that the present system of leave to the heads of missions should be made similar to that granted to attachés?—Decidedly so.

5063. Namely, that two years should be run into one?—I think that it is more desirable, if possible, in the case of heads of missions than in the case of attachés, because it seems to me more important that the head of a mission should be encouraged to return home, and there are more reasons why he should be in personal intercourse with his own Government and the public men of his own country. If it is good that these frequent returns to England should be encouraged rather than discouraged, obviously it is more important that they should take place in those cases where the agent who returns is in a more responsible position.

5064. With regard to the expenses of living of the junior members of our missions in Europe, what is the smallest amount of private fortune that they ought to possess in addition to their salaries?—Well, my own impression is, that it would be difficult for a single man to live in most of the places where I have been, under 400*l.* to 500*l.* a year.

5065. Independently of the salary?—Independently entirely of salary.

5066. There are some places where the expenses are very much greater than at others; for instance, at Vienna, St. Petersburg, and Paris, I should imagine?—Undoubtedly; the only really cheap place that I can remember is Lisbon; but even there I should say it would be decidedly difficult to manage without a private fortune. I do not think that any second secretary, certain I should say no third secretary, could dream living upon his salary.

5067. It is necessary now, is it not, at Vienn for a young man to keep a carriage if he go about in society much?—I think that he wou find it difficult to go about in society with one; of course, when you come to speak about necessity, it is difficult to say what is necessar it depends on the point of view. I should mys say decidedly that it was.

5069. So that a young man who went abo much in society could not avail himself of t ordinary means of conveyance used in oth towns?—Undoubtedly; but what is frequent done, as you are aware, is this: what are call the fiacres there are a very superior class of c riages, very much like our private broughan and many people hire these by the month, ju as you would hire a brougham in London; in th case they are not numbered, but they form to intents and purposes private hired carriages. F a young man it would be better to hire a fiac unnumbered, and retain that as a private carria than to hire any other vehicle; but, in point fact, it would be exactly the same thing, as r gards expense, because a private unnumber fiacre would be to all intents and purposes private brougham, and would cost at the ve least about 20*l.* a month.

5070. I suppose you consider it very desirab that a young man in the position of attac should go into society a great deal?—I think most important.

5071. By doing so he can pick up a va amount of information?—Yes; I was surpris to see that Mr. West had expressed an opini that it was no advantage to an attaché or secr tary to go into society. I can only say, speakin for myself, that I have found the greatest adva tage from endeavouring to have as much soci intercourse as I possibly could in the countri where I have been officially resident; and I ce tainly think when you come to the case of secretary of legation or embassy, who may any moment be placed in charge of that missio it is most important for him to be on terms intimacy with a great variety of people in th capital in which he is officially resident; I ha found great utility and advantage from it.

5072. I presume that if a different class persons were employed from those you have present, there would be difficulty in obtainin that social information?—I decidedly think so.

5073. Are you satisfied with the present sta of the examination for the Diplomatic Service?—Well, if I may say so, I have no very gre faith in examinations of any kind; it appears t me that all you can hope to do by examin tions is to make a sort of sieve that will keep o gross ignorance; but I do not think that yo can make them a criterion of ability; it appea to me that fitness in diplomacy is depende upon so many other things besides what you ma call book-knowledge; it is dependent also upo temperament, character, manners, and habits life; it cannot be tested solely by scholast examination.

5074. But you would have a standard ex minatio ation to keep out the ignorant?—I think so dedly; I have seen it mentioned that it was gested by Mr. Morier that Roman law should n the foundation of any system of study for omacy; and I must say, I think myself it ld be an immense advantage to anyone in Diplomatic Service to have a good knowledge hat subject.

075. And you would attach, of course, equal ortance to a very correct knowledge of nch?—I think that is a sine quâ non.

076. Have you found generally that young in the profession are well up in French in its branches?—I think so, as a rule; perhaps a regard to accurate French composition, re might with advantage be a greater general ficiency; but I should say that on the whole knowledge of French is generally very satisory throughout the profession.

077. You have not found any difference in t respect within the last few years?—I cannot that I myself have remarked any difference.

078. You have not been at any of the smaller rman missions, I think?—I have not been at of the smaller German missions.

079. Are you prepared to give any opinion ut the fusion of certain missions; because it been brought before this Committee that tain small missions in Germany are not very essary?—I should wish to speak with the atest possible diffidence on a subject of that d, because I really have no personal or practi- experience in the matter, and, therefore, I do think that I should be justified in expressing strong opinion on such a matter. I should, wever, regret to see a complete suppression of the small missions; it appears to me that the aller missions may at any moment become of precedented importance; for instance, at this y moment at which we are speaking, I can ceive that there are many reasons why the small missions which remain in Germany uld come to have an importance which a few nths ago they did not apparently possess.

080. Mr. F. Stanley.] For the same reason, suppose you would be of opinion that it is bad licy to keep a mission at merely the minimum ength required for the ordinary work?—I nk so.

081. And you would not be disposed to concur a recommendation, or rather a suggestion, de to this Committee, that clerks should be t out from the Foreign Office to complete the ff of a mission for the moment, supposing it be found inadequate for the performance of duty?—I own that for myself, I do not what advantage would be gained by that, and can see some practical disadvantages in it; cause practically the mere organisation of the chanical work in each mission or embassy is newhat different from what it is at others; and se who have been connected with the mission, d have acquired the habit of that particular ork, I should say were better persons to carry on than a man who has come out suddenly, and no, perhaps, has in his head a different system, nich may be a better, and may be a worse one, t which, in either case, is not unlikely to occasion some little confusion at first. I should say at practically it would be better that those who ve already acquired the habit of that particular gation or mission should go on with the work, an that the place of an absent member should be supplied occasionally by somebody totally disconnected with it.

5082. Can you give the Committee any opinion as to the feelings of the junior branches of the Diplomatic Service on the question of exchange between themselves and the Foreign Office, as to whether they express a wish to exchange more frequently with the Foreign Office, and vice versâ, than is now the case?—I really can hardly speak from any knowledge of my own on that subject; I have occasionally known cases of attachés who have very much desired, for special reasons, without leaving their profession, and without being unemployed, to pass a year or so many months in England; that must frequently occur in the life of an attaché, and I have no doubt that they would feel it a convenience to be able to effect an exchange with junior members of the Foreign Office; but I really have so few opportunities of gathering any opinion upon that point from my colleagues, that I should be sorry to attempt to represent their views in any way.

5083. Mr. A. Russell.] Do you think that greater facility of exchange between the foreign service and the Foreign Office would be desirable?—It appears to me that no material change of any kind would be effected if you confined those exchanges solely to the lower grades both of the office and of the service; for whatever it is desired to secure by such a fusion as you speak of, it appears to me that it can only be effected if you carry the thing very much higher and go very much further with it. I feel bound to speak with great diffidence on that subject also, for I really know very little of the internal organisation of the Foreign Office; but I have often felt strongly myself that it would be a great advantage to the foreign service if the great heads of departments in the Foreign Office were men who have had personal experience of the practical conditions under which the instructions that issue from the Foreign Office have to be carried out. I also think that it would improve the fibre of the foreign service if it had a greater connection with the public life of the country; if, for example, the foreign ministers and the secretaries of embassy and legation were occasionally employed in the work of the office at home; but, at the same time, I see many difficulties in the way of introducing such a change, and also many dangers which would result if it were incautiously done. For instance, the Foreign Office is, at present, administered by men who cannot possibly have any personal interest in questions affecting the appointment or promotion of diplomatists; but if the superior men in the foreign service were disinclined to exchange its great prizes for employment at home, then, perhaps, these Foreign Office departments might fall into the hands of second-rate diplomatists. Now, if you had the Foreign Office administered by second-rate diplomatists, I do not feel at all sure that the able men who remained in the service would at all benefit by that; it might be quite the contrary. Therefore there are, no doubt, many adverse considerations to be borne in mind; but, on general grounds, my strong impression is that such a change, if practicable, would be advantageous, and that the more the Foreign Office can be internationalised, and the more the foreign service can be nationalised, the better it would be; but it seems to me that in that case you would have to begin completely de novo.

5084. Mr. W. Cartwright.] I think you said that there was a very general discouragement to the juniors in the service at the present time?—Yes, I think so.

11 July 1870.

5085. In regard to the chances of promotion in consequence of the block?—Yes.

5086. Have you any practical suggestions to make in order to get rid of that block?—I ventured to say, just now, that the present block may arise out of purely temporary circumstances, because a certain number of missions have been suppressed, and so forth; but that there will always be a tendency, I think, to what is called a block in a service such as ours is, and I think that a fixed seniority system tends very much to perpetuate it.

5087. Then do you think that when you find fault with the principle of seniority, that is a feeling that is generally entertained by your contemporaries in the service?—I should say that in the higher grades of the junior members it was very strongly entertained; in the initiatory ranks of the service I think not.

5088. Where would you draw the line between what you call the initiatory ranks and the higher grades?—It is obvious that when a man first enters the service he can have no particular opportunity, as he is really learning his trade, of bringing himself forward, and the fairest mode of advancement for him he would consider to be advancement by seniority.

5089. But this matter of the block must have been very much considered by your contemporaries; they feel themselves face to face with a block which is, I suppose, mainly brought about by an accumulation of superiors who are occupying the prizes. What do you think is the general feeling on the part of the juniors in regard to this block?—I think they really are very much discouraged by it at this moment, but unless you can induce men to leave the service, I do not see what is to be done. There are at present only two ways by which relief can come to the block in the service, namely, by death and retirement.

5090. Do you think that the service is menaced with losing many of the juniors or some of the juniors, in consequence of this block?—I think so; three or four men who I think would be a considerable loss to the service, have spoken to me with so much discouragement of the prospect before them, that I think there is very considerable danger of losing them, and they are among the very best men in the service.

5091. They are seriously meditating retirement?—Yes; I can say that that is certainly my experience.

5092. Do you think that promotion is more rapid in other diplomatic services than in ours as a rule, according to your experience?—I should say that there are in all foreign diplomatic services a great number of men who never seem to rise, and never seem to expect to rise; but with regard to those who do, I think that greater leaps are made than in our service.

5093. Then the principle of seniority does not obtain in those services, I suppose?—Well, I think, to a certain extent it does; but, I think, it is subject to much greater exceptions.

5094. Up to a certain point it has been absolute with us since 1861, has it not?—Yes, I know of no exceptions.

5095. And, I apprehend, that that is not the case in foreign services?—Certainly; I do not think it is.

5096. That is the marked distinction between them and our service?—Yes.

5097. And it enables the men of merit to rise more rapidly, and to obtain the reward of their exertions more surely in foreign services?—Undoubtedly.

5098. I think you expressed an opinion that the examinations were really not of any great value in ascertaining the positive qualifications of a man?—I think that you can keep out ignorance by an examination, but I do not think that you can find any real criterion of positive qualifications in it.

5099. But you think it very essential that there should be kept up a certain periodical interchange between the foreign atmosphere and the home atmosphere?—I think it very essential; in proportion as we are naturally insulated, the more you can keep up the international fibre in our country itself, and the greater body of persons in the country that you can interest in foreign affairs, decidedly the better.

5100 There has been some evidence given before this Committee in regard to the advisability of keeping members of the Diplomatic Service who have acquired great and special knowledge of certain countries, permanently, or at least a good deal, in those countries; would not that rather be contrary to the principle which you at this moment are advocating, of their returning to England periodically; would they not become stereotyped if kept in those countries?—Undoubtedly; I should be sorry to see the class of foreign servants too greatly localised. I think that they ought often to mix with people in their own country; but, at the same time, I think that considerable practical inconveniences arise from continually changing the localities in which the junior members are employed.

5101. All that tends to show that it is very essential in this service to invest the Secretary of State with very great discretion?—Undoubtedly; I think that cannot be too much remembered.

5102. It appears to be a very delicate matter to adjust the detention and the removal; it requires great delicacy of judgment to decide in what case an individual should be kept at a post and in what case he should be removed?—Precisely; and I do not think you can generalise on such points as that. I think everything must be left to the individual responsibility of the Secretary of State, who would act with a knowledge of the peculiar circumstances, which admit of no previous rule on the subject.

5103. But I think you gave a very strong opinion against the temporary loan of clerks from the Foreign Office to missions in cases of emergency?—What I meant was this, that if you desire to effect a total change in the character of the foreign service and the Foreign Office, it appears to me that this change would not be carried out by a simple exchanging between the junior members of the foreign service and the junior members of the Foreign Office. With regard to the temporary loan of clerks from the Foreign Office to do the work of secretaries or attachés abroad, I really do not think that the mechanical work of a chancery abroad would be better done by a Foreign Office clerk, temporarily sent out, than it would be by the person at the mission itself.

5104. Have you observed at all whether the system prevails in the French legations of having a permanen rmanent chancelier?—Yes; and I must say my strong impression is that he is a very ful person. It appears to me that not only is very useful member of the French missions hich he exists, but also wherever I have seen loyés of that kind in our own service, they e always been the most useful men at the ion.

105. They are general in the French service? es; occasionally you will find in a mission there is some man, as I said before, who is sort of nondescript official position, but whose wledge of the country, and of the papers in office, and so forth, renders him peculiarly ful.

106. You have not observed that in the nch missions there is a tendency on the part hose officers to become stereotyped and rooted he country, and to acquire special and pecu- interests in the country?—I think there is er that tendency. As far as my experience s, I should say that the French chanceliers not very frequently moved; they are re- led as a totally different class of public ser- ts; they are not considered as belonging to t it is called the diplomatic profession at all, in French service.

107. They are more or less like our drago- ns in the East?—Yes.

108. Sir H. Lytton Bulwer.] Mr. Cart- ght asked you whether the feeling amongst junior members of diplomacy was favourable he principle of seniority or not; I suppose t if you were to poll them, you would find t the clever ones were not in favour of it, and t the stupid ones were?—Precisely.

109. Therefore it is a principle that acts in our of the stupid ones, and against the clever s?—Yes.

110. You, no doubt, remember the times en you were attached to me in Italy and the ited States; when we were in the United tes together, I think the mission consisted r. Crampton going away) of Mr. Pennell and rself, and myself?—Yes.

111. Had we a great deal to do then?—An nense deal.

112. And did we get it done?—I think we through it very well.

113. You were with me in Italy also?—I s.

114. I think that the mission then consisted r. Barron being away, and Mr. Stuart being ay) of yourself and Mr. Wolff, and me?—I nk it did, unless Mr. Macdonell was attached that time; I do not know whether he was then ached or afterwards. I think, at any rate, ring a portion of the time he was not there.

115. We had at one time, if you remember, great deal of business to do there; you remember about that affair when an Englishman was cut down in the streets?—Yes.

5116. You found that we got through the business there?—Yes, I think so, perfectly well.

5117. Mr. Cartwright seemed to consider that there was something antagonistic in the questions which he put to you between being moved from place to place at frequent short intervals, and coming home from time to time; what I understood you to say was that you thought that members of diplomacy ought to come home from time to time, but that upon the whole without saying that they ought to remain permanently in any place, there was an inconvenience in very frequently removing them?—Yes; for instance, an attaché, or second or third secretary, who has just made himself acquainted with every paper in the office, and knows where to lay his hands upon it, who has just got his register into perfect order, is suddenly sent away, and another man takes his place who does not even know the system of work in that chancery, and must necessarily pass a month or two in getting it up before he can be equally useful.

5118. Mr. Cartwright also asked you as to the advisability or advantage of having a chancelier, and he asked you whether if a man remained long in one place he would not become as it were stereotyped in it; I presume you think he is the sort of man who ought to be stereotyped?—Precisely; the more you stereotype him the better.

5119. For that reason you should make his local knowledge of use without consulting his local opinion?—Yes.

5120. Mr. Cameron.] In answering Sir Henry Bulwer as to the strength of the Legations at Washington and Florence, did you mean to give the Committee to understand that, in your opinion, the chief and two junior members would be a sufficient staff at a place like Washington?—No doubt, people very often find in private life that the more servants they have the worse things are done, because each servant says, It is not my place to do this or that; and, I think, if you lay down a hard rule that it shall be the business of this member to do that particular portion of the work, and of somebody else to do another portion of it, the work will be less well done than it would be by a smaller staff who are always pulling very well together, and who are all equally anxious to put their shoulder to the wheel. But as I have already said, I think it is of importance that attachés and secretaries should be enabled to take frequent leave without putting a stop to the work going on; and, therefore, I think it desirable that there should always be at each great mission or embassy a sufficient number of men to carry on the work when one or two are absent, by those who remain working with a little greater activity.

The Right Honourable Sir Henry Earle Lytton Bulwer, G. C. B. (a Member of the Committee); further Examined.

5121. Mr. Eastwick.] I think your answers several questions rather pointed to a reduc- n of the number of the staff, or at all events the paid staff of missions?—I cannot say that have in my mind the exact number that is em- oyed at all the different legations; but my neral opinion is, that a smaller staff, I speak of paid regular staff, would be much better for the service, and much better for those who serve.

Rt. Hon. Sir H. L. Bulwer, G.C.B., M.P.

5122. And I think also you are in favour of giving still greater power of choice to the Secretary of State, with a view to his filling up the higher appointments in the service, not according to seniority, but according to his view of what is best for the public service?—He has that power, but I am in favour of his exercising it; and I think that the abnegation of that exercise by merely naming people in rotation necessarily entails that out of every four that you name to a post of any mark you name three who are inefficient.

Rt. Hon. Sir H.L.Bulwer, G.C.B., M.P.

5123. That being the case, I would ask you whether, as there would be a considerable change in the service, supposing that the Secretary of State was to use those powers, and to fill up appointments only according to his views of the merits of persons, passing over the seniority question, you do not think that it would be fair to give gentlemen on the staff at present an opportunity of retiring on a moiety, or on a proportion of their pension, or a gratuity, if they wished to retire?—I think that any persons who had not obtained promotion, or were not satisfied with the situation which they held, after a certain number of years in a subordinate post, ought to have an opportunity of retiring upon a very fair and adequate allowance. I said before, I think, and that perhaps best explains my idea, that to be really minister of England, at a post of any importance, is a situation which requires a man of very considerable ability; he is matched there with the first men in the country to which he goes; I do not think that every man who goes into diplomacy is a man of considerable ability, and therefore I think it very advantageous that before he gets to that post which requires considerable ability there should be some way of letting that gentleman escape fairly and honourably, but still escape from a situation which he is not competent to fill.

5124. I do not know whether you have noticed the fact, that in the Indian Civil Service, within the last few years, they have allowed civilians to retire after a much shortened period of service, in case of their health failing; now would you not think it right that in cases where from being employed in bad climates, such as South America or China, the health failed, diplomatic officers should be allowed to retire earlier?—If it were quite certain that their health had failed, I would say, yes; but as doctors' certificates are given rather easily, I think we should be by such a rule encouraging malades imaginaires, who would easily persuade themselves they were ill when they did not like their posts. In short, I think that in that, as in other things, a great deal of discretion should be left with the head of the department.

5125. Mr. Otway.] Have you thought of any term of time, and of any portion of the allowance; did I rightly understand you to say a moiety?—I did not mention any sum. There is a regulation now by which a secretary of legation who is not promoted after a certain time, receives an additional salary; I think, then, following the same principle, that if a secretary of legation does not get to be named minister, and wishes to retire after he has been a certain time (10 years, I think) secretary of legation, he ought to be allowed to retire upon two-thirds of the salary that he has received as secretary of legation or secretary of embassy; the latter case would be rare, because a man rarely gets to be secretary of embassy unless he is fit for promotion afterwards.

5126. Would not that be placing him in a most strangely favourable position as regards other services; for instance, generals or admirals who have to serve 30 years before they can get anything like that pay?—You are not asking me about other services, and I am not a fit person perhaps, to give an opinion as to them. You are asking me what I think fair or desirable in the Diplomatic Service. I say that I wish to get rid of those persons who are very competent as subordinate officials, but not competent as persons in a superior position; and I wish to get rid of them before they get to that position, with a fair consideration for the number of years that they have dedicated to the profession if they wish to leave it; but my opinion is, that men used to diplomacy, and who get as high as secretary of legation, would very often be content to remain; indeed, a man said to me the other day that all he wished was, to be left where he was for the rest of his life; he was perfectly satisfied.

5127. But as that recommendation of yours in order to be effective, would require the consent of Parliament to an increase of pay such as you recommend, in order to bring about this retirement, do not you think that it would fail to commend itself to Parliament in consequence of the singularly favourable position in which you would put gentlemen of the diplomatic position with regard to all other professions?—I should begin by saving the country some money, because I should very much reduce the number of those persons who were paid; and then again I think that it is more advantageous for the country to pay a certain sum and to get rid of a man, than to pay a great deal more, and to have him in a post where he may do you a great deal of mischief. It is a choice between difficulties; but when I say a certain sum, of course I only say that loosely and indefinitely; it would be for the Minister for Foreign Affairs consulting with the House of Commons, and the general feeling of the service, to determine what it should be; I merely lay down the principle.

5128. Mr. Eastwick.] You said, in answer to Question 4865, that you think a minister ought to be allowed to have a private secretary; would you see any objection to his being allowed also to nominate at all events one unpaid attaché, any gentlemen that he might know of considerable abilities and otherwise qualified for the service who should reside with him in the capacity of unpaid attaché?—I think it would be very desirable that he should have the opportunity of suggesting such an appointment to the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs; but if he was to name any person of his own accord without that consent, he would place him in a very awkward position, both with the Secretary of State, and with the other persons employed; still, I think it very desirable that the Minister for Foreign Affairs should consult the ambassador or minister of the place as to the sort of assistance that he wants, and that he should be ready to take his recommendation.

5129. I observe, from your answers to two or three questions, that you seem to think that it is desirable that diplomatic officers should remain rather longer in their stations than they do at present, and that there should not be a very considerable change from one post to another?—There has been a new regulation established, which I think, as a regulation, is exceedingly bad, viz., that gentlemen should be moved after a very short period of time; I think that, as a rule, is very bad, because I think that, generally speaking, they require some time to learn the place and make themselves useful there; and if you take them away directly they have made themselves nselves useful, and carry them somewhere , and they have to learn again the same thing ll the different places to which they go, they not give their full amount of usefulness to country; but I do not mean to carry that to exaggerated extent, and say that a man uld remain all his life in a particular place.

130. Do you see any objection to making, as were, three great circles of diplomacy; for ance, Europe, taking with it North America, n South America, and then the eastern coun- s, China and Japan; because, I suppose, that expenses are considerably greater on the ole in Europe than they are in South Ame- a or in China, and that, therefore, many gen- nen who would not have sufficient means to in Europe, would be tolerably comfortable South America or in the East?—I must say t I speak without any practical knowledge on subject, but I should say that the China and pan services were services very much by them- ves. In regard to those circles that you ak of, I think that it would be very desirable the Minister for Foreign Affairs had some- ing of that kind in his eye; but at the same ne I should be loth to make an absolute rule, cause a great emergency might arise, when u might wish for a very clever man; then it nifies little where he has been; a very supe- r man will do well wherever he is put, and I ould not like there to be a bar to his being ployed anywhere.

5131. My question is particularly put with ference to another question, which I will put w, and that is whether you do not think that ere ought to be some compensation to officers ployed in China and Japan, and in other bad imates by shortening their period of service for pension?—If you make those special services, en the men who went into them would mea- re the disadvantages and the advantages; but rhaps it would be fair to make some allowance r the bad climate, if it is a very bad climate, of ose places. I should be loth to express any sitive opinion on that point, because I do not now the climate.

5132. Of course there are other disadvantages; ere is being shut out from European society; ere is living in a semi-barbarous country, and ere is also considerable risk to life in some of ese places?—I think that it would be difficult make the distinction, for when you enter into service you enter into it to go almost wherever ou are sent; for instance, a man has a weak nest, and it might do him a great deal more arm to be sent to St. Petersburgh than to be nt to China; and I think that if you laid down ose absolute rules you would create difficulties.

5133. You would leave a great deal therefore the discretion of the Secretary of State?— es.

5134. Mr. W. Cartwright.] There is also in ose services an exceptional chance of rising, is ere not?—Yes; look at Sir Rutherford Alcock, r instance; a man gets on much quicker, and he is not content with that particular place, he much more sure of his place, because there are uch fewer persons that can replace him.

5135. Mr. Eastwick.] In answer to Question 913 you said, "The American diplomatist comes nto the field with a very great advantage that e have not," as to the tone that he assumes; I ish to ask you whether you do not think that it ould be very much better for the public inte- rest if our ministers in some countries, for instance in South America, were allowed to assume a stronger tone; and whether it is possible to obtain the settlement of questions, as long as we are obliged to take a lower tone than the representatives of other countries?—Naturally, if you take a higher tone, you will get your questions much easier settled; but at the same time, you must remember, when you take that tone, that the country may back a minister who refuses to support you; it is no use to bark if you cannot bite. Now, in America, when a man takes that tone he is generally taken up by his countrymen; and they appear to have a stronger national spirit leading them to vindicate the honour and dignity of their country than exists at this moment in our own, and therefore they have greater influence. I said, in reference to this subject, that if you were to take the English diplomatists and the American diplomatists, I think in most cases, perhaps, the English diplomatist would be the most able man, better acquainted with the country, and better able to do what is required; but at the same time, he cannot use the tone and speak in the manner that would very often procure success for the Americans. And therefore when people say, "Look at the American diplomacy, see what they can do," it is unfair to make that a test as to the relative ability of the two services.

Rt. Hon. Sir H. L. Bulwer, G.C.B., M.P.

5136. But do not you think, from your knowledge of these Governments to which I have alluded, that if we showed ourselves decided in one case, we should probably have less necessity to use that tone in future?—I think so; not only with those Governments, but with all Governments; I am convinced that you would give yourselves a great deal less trouble, and run much less danger, if, in cases where you were right, you held a high, firm language.

5137. With regard to the Persian transfer, when you were Ambassador at Constantinople, were there many matters connected with Persia referred to you?—Yes, several; one or two which I settled when war was impending.

5138. Questions of frontier, I think?—Yes; in fact, in one case, I think the Persians had advanced over the line of frontier claimed by the Turks. I certainly felt it easier to settle those questions, knowing that the Persian question would be referred to the minister under whose department I was. I should not have been so perfectly at home if I had thought that it depended upon the Indian Board. My idea in regard to the Persian Mission is, that it is better to leave it under the Foreign Office, but that the Foreign Office ought to consult the India Office, and that great deference should be paid to their recommendation as to the class of persons best fitted to be employed there.

5139. With regard to the ground on which the Embassy-house at Constantinople is built, does that ground belong to us; do we rent it, or is it granted to us by the Sultan?—The Sultan granted it to us, but he granted ground at the same time to the ministers of nearly all countries, and it has happened to me to know and hear directly from the principal authorities that it is perfectly indifferent to them whether you part with that land or not; and several of the missions have parted with a portion of their land, and built a good house instead of a bad one upon the remaining ground; all that they wish is, that you should have facilities for having a proper residence. And if you ask me my opinion as to the question of the embassy at Constantinople, my own private opinion certainly is, that to build a house exactly on the model of the former one, I should even say to build one on the same site, but certainly to build one on the model of it, would not be advantageous; because, as I daresay you know, it is an immense palace; you cannot inhabit that palace properly upon the salary which the Government gives you, and you could live much more comfortably, and be able to live much less expensively, if you had a large suitable house, but nothing in the shape of a palace.

5140. Would that not take away a little from the dignity and prestige of the English Ambassador there?—I think not, because a house, well kept up, of moderate dimensions, or fair size, gives you greater prestige than having a palace which you cannot keep up.

5141. Mr. Kinnaird.] Is it absolutely necessary, do you think, to have two residences at Constantinople?—Well, I really think it is, and I will explain to you why, particularly if you have a palace in the heart of Pera. Certainly you can hardly live there in summer, and then nearly all, I may say all, the ministers, and all the foreign diplomatists live out of Constantinople, and it would be very inconvenient if you alone lived in it; but if you had a palace where, at the time when I was secretary of embassy, I wished to have it, that is upon the Bosphorus, at the bottom of Constantinople, where you are near all the merchants, and where you are in easy communication with all the ministers, I am not certain whether then one palace would not suffice, as one palace pretty well suffices for the Sultan.

5142. With reference to the present emergency, would it not be well to avail ourselves of the existing circumstances to get a site for the Embassy in such a place as would render the necessity of keeping up two houses less imperative upon the ambassador?—My own opinion is a very unpopular one, and therefore I express it with a certain degree of reserve, but my opinion is that it would be desirable if it could be obtained. When I spoke, it could have been obtained. You would then have had a palace near where the Sultan's palace is situated now; you would have been near all your affairs, and near Galata, and would not have had that immense hill to mount, and you would have been on the Bosphorus, and to a certain degree in the country; but such a site is more difficult to obtain now. I suggested as to the palace at Therapia that you might have sold the house there, the garden of which is an immense wilderness, and got a far better house near the same spot for half the money, and the rest, in my opinion, might have been put by, and been sufficient to cover the annual expenses of the Embassy for a considerable time without coming to Parliament.

5143. Were these views embodied in a despatch?—I forget whether I wrote a private letter or a despatch; still, I expressed those views at the time, though I did not like to take upon myself the responsibility of carrying them out; and, therefore, I suggested that a Committee should be formed, and I think there was a Committee, and it decided that the proper thing would be to build a fine palace on the site which we occupy, perfectly regardless, of course, of the expense.

5144. There can be no doubt, I suppose, that the two houses add very greatly to the charge of the embassy?—I do not know that the fact of there being two adds so much as you imagine. There is the expense of moving backwards and forwards which is the chief expense, but otherwise the establishments are the same. The expense of the establishment that we have now at Therapia is very large, the waterworks being in a very bad state while I was there, and requiring constant outlay.

5145. We gathered, in your evidence, that you have been in the habit of employing a private secretary. Did you ever apply to the Foreign Office for their sanction to that, or was it entirely at your own expense?—Entirely at my own expense; but it was always known, and Lord Palmerston very well knew who my private secretary was, and so did Lord Malmesbury and other ministers; and eventually the gentleman I had with me for the longest time was adopted into the service, partly at my recommendation, partly at that of Lord Normanby who succeeded me at Florence.

5146. You strongly recommend recurrence to the old practice of the ambassador having a private secretary?—Yes, I am satisfied that where there was much to do that would be the best way of getting it done.

5147. And it would be economical?—Yes, insomuch that if the minister has that assistance, and pays for it, he wants less assistance that the Government pays for.

5148. It is understood, is it not, that it is in the power of the Foreign Minister, in the case of misconduct, or a man being incapable, to dismiss him from the service?—He has not only the power of dismissing you if you are doing ill, but he has the power of dismissing you if you are doing perfectly well; he has a perfectly unrestricted power of sending anybody out of the service that he thinks proper.

5149. I think we may gather that in the course of your experience, you have fallen in with many members of the service who have shown a thorough inaptitude for the service; would it not be well if that power were exercised in the case of such men?—I should not say that exactly; I should say, speaking of the ordinary posts, that the gentlemen who fill them are very fairly qualified to do so. As to the very high posts, undoubtedly sometimes men arrive there who I do not think are perfectly up to the mark; but I would not say that under the system which we have followed it would be quite fair to remove them, because they have not been named there on account of their capacity, but because they have been somewhere else, and therefore they were advanced there, but if the Foreign Minister found an ambassador or minister for one reason or another not the best person to be there, of course he should exercise his power in removing him.

5150. When men are kept a great number of continuous years in smaller places it is for that reason probably, namely, that they would not be able to meet an emergency?—It would be an invidious thing to say, but, I suppose that the Minister for Foreign Affairs, who can judge better than I can, when he does that, keeps them there for that reason.

5151. Would it not tend to the relief of the block if those who are no longer of benefit to the service were removed?—They can be removed now; but as to the gentlemen who now fill the higher posts I should be very wrong if I expressed any doubt as to their competency.

5152. Mr. R. Shaw.] Who is the owner of the ... that you suggest as the proper one for the ... Embassy at Constantinople?—I do not know ...ll.

5153. What is the difficulty that you have sug...ted in the way of obtaining that site?—Because ...perty there, as elsewhere, is valuable, and it ...y be occupied by persons who have got houses, ...d so forth, on it; at the time that I first spoke ...it it was not built upon; since that time it has ...en.

5154. Would there be any difficulty in selling ... house at Therapia?—You would have got a ...y large price for it if you had sold it formerly, ...t there are crises at Constantinople which ...eatly affect prices, and may do so now.

5155. Mr. Rylands.] With respect to open ...npetition, you expressed an opinion, I think, ...her adverse to that, and you made a remark ... this effect, that "You cannot test by com...titive examination the fitness of a man for the ...culiar profession of diplomacy." From your ...perience, are you able to tell us whether you ...nk that practically the present system of ap...intments to the profession tests a man's fitness ... diplomacy?—I think that a minister has the ...wer, if he exercises it properly, of selecting ...rsons who would be well fitted for diplomacy; ... do not say that he always does choose the ...st; of course, he can only take a bird's-eye ...ew, because you cannot tell what a man will ...come till you try him; but under a system of ...mpetent examination you might have persons ...ho pass the best examinations, and who yet would ...t be the best persons to enter into that par...ular profession.

5156. But do not you think that there might ...e a mode under which, after persons had passed ... competitive examination, there should be a ...eriod of probation, in which their fitness of cha...cter might be tested?—When they were once ... the profession they would say, "It is a very ...ard thing, now that we have got in here, to turn ...s out." But it is difficult to describe, as any ...erson who has been in the diplomatic profession ...an say, why a particular individual is unsuit...ble; it may be his manner; it may be what ...he vulgar people call the cut of his jib: I cannot ...ell you what it might be, exactly, but there ...ight be cases here and there in which a man ...ight pass an excellent examination, and yet he ...ould not be exactly the person that you would ...ut into that particular profession.

5157. But, practically, I understand you to ...ay that persons of this unfitness do get in now; ... suppose it is not the case that every person in ...he service has the exact qualities that you de...ire, even now?—I think it is a different thing; ... think that now persons very often get in who ...certainly are not fit for the higher walks of the ...profession; but I think that those who come in ...are fit for the lower ones. But you might find, ...f you adopted the course which you suggest, ...hat they were not exactly the persons whom ...you would like to have, even in the lower ones. ...Take manner; take a variety of things which it ...is difficult to describe.

5158. At all events, we may quite take it as your opinion that the number of juniors in the Diplomatic Service is more numerous than we require?—I think, myself, that you have more men who enter the profession with the view of making it a profession, and whom it thereby becomes incumbent on the country to employ and advance than are required; and my opinion is decidedly that it would be better for them and for the service if the number of persons regularly and professionally employed, with claims on the service as belonging to the profession, were kept as low down as possible.

5159. Would you see any objection to the plan of making the ranks in the Diplomatic Service, up to the position of secretary of legation, equivalent with the ranks in the Foreign Office, as regards position and pay, so as to secure such a perfect amalgamation of the services as to enable the Foreign Minister to employ members of the Foreign Office, or of the Diplomatic Service, either at home or abroad, permanently or temporarily as he might think fit?—I do not think that there is any very great difference between the two now; this is the case with the Foreign Office, if I understand rightly, that you are certain there of arriving by seniority to certain positions, and you live, of course, in England; in the foreign service you are not so certain of arriving at those positions, and you live abroad; but I do not think that there is any very great difference in point of pay between a secretary of legation and a clerk in the Foreign Office.

5160. However, if there is any difference which would interfere with a complete amalgamation in the way you put it, you would not see any objection to removing that difference so as to secure a complete amalgamation?—If I did not by that means lower the salaries of the Foreign Office service below that which they ought to be.

5161. The suggestion which you have made rather, I think, goes in the direction of making the position of secretary of embassy or legation a more valuable one; is it with a view of making it to a greater extent the culminating point of the diplomatic profession?—I do not see that I make it a more valuable one, because now by seniority these gentlemen would be moved from the position of secretary of embassy or legation to the position of minister or ambassador. If I thought that they were incapable of being moved to those higher positions which require qualities of a perfectly different kind from those which suffice for a secretary of legation or embassy, I do not think that I should make their position more advantageous by saying that after a certain time they might retire on an adeqaate allowance.

5162. But would you not adopt some means by which the incompetency of persons in the Diplomatic Service should be found out and tested before they arrived at the position of secretary of legation?—I do not know that I would, because my experience tells me that you never know what a man is until he is tried. Responsibility is the great test of capacity for action. Now you have that, you know, with a secretary of legation, because he is at times left as chargé d'affaires; of course, if there is anything very important going on, and the minister at home knows that he is not perfectly capable of carrying it out, he either does not let the minister there come home, or he sends him out again as soon as a peculiar case arrives; but if he is capable, the minister at home leaves him there, and then you have an opportunity of ascertaining whether, as chargé d'affaires, he is capable of exercising the functions of ambassador or minister; you have the test in its most practical shape.

5163. Up to that point you think that you do not

Rt. Hon. Sir H.L.Bulwer, G.C.B., M.P.

11 July 1870.

not get a sufficient test to decide on a man's fitness?—I do not think that you do.

5164. You gave an answer the other day as to the undesirableness of having so many ranks of under secretaries of legation. I think I understood you to say that they were multiplied too much. Do you not think that by a greater equality in the division of the work in the legation you would have a better means of testing the qualities of the members of the legation?—If a man is moved every two years you must take a flying shot at him; you hardly know what he is. If he is remaining a long time under you, you would form an opinion pretty well. I say to a man, "Make a report," partly to test him, as well as to get the information, and I should thus get an opinion about him; but I do not know that the Foreign Office would take my opinion as a good one.

5165. I am assuming that your plan for preventing the constant transference of the junior members of legation were carried out, and assuming that they were more continually under the notice of a minister, and assuming also that the opinion of that minister prevailed with the Foreign Office in relation to the character and competency of his staff, do not you think that there might be a test of fitness before a man got to a position of secretary of legation?—You might be able to test certain qualities, but there is the quality of action, which you never can test till the man is in action. There is prompt decision, seeing clearly what you want to do, and a variety of things of that kind, which you really cannot test till you see a man in a responsible situation.

5166. But if you found a man who was stupid, or careless, or indifferent, you could at all events prevent that man being secretary of legation?—I could detect incompetency, but I could not be certain as to full competency until it was tried.

5167. That is to say, you would be able, probably, to tell, when a man was under secretary of legation, if he was not likely to have the capacity that would be required in the position of chargé d'affaires or minister, and therefore you might stop his promotion as secretary of legation; but yet a man promoted to that position might prove to be deficient in qualities for a still higher post?—I might form in my own mind an opinion that certain men were advisable to try in the position of secretary of legation, so as to test their further qualities for further promotion; and, if my recommendation was listened to, I being the chief of the mission, I think that there would be a fair chance that I was right.

5168. And you would also consider that the chief of the mission should prevent by his opinion the appointment of an incompetent person to the higher position of secretary of legation?—I would not take upon myself to say that he ought to overrule the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, but he ought to have an opportunity of giving his opinion; now he has not.

5169. Is it the fact that the Secretary of State, I mean, of course, the Foreign Office, have the impression that they can form an opinion in regard to the members of legations abroad, equally well, perhaps better, than the head of the mission himself?—Well, I speak under correction, but it seems to me that there is rather a jealousy on the part of the Foreign Office, as a department, of the ambassador's opinion.

5170. It is the fact that they do not encourage it, at all events?—They do not encourage an ambassador to express his opinion.

5171. I suppose you would consider that if the head of a legation could express an opinion to the Foreign Office in such a manner as might affect the future promotion of his subordinates, that would give to the head of the mission a very desirable control over those under him?—Yes: there are many who would try to shirk it, because it places great responsibility upon a man; but at the same time, if he exercised that responsibility with due courage and sagacity, it would be a great help to the Minister for Foreign Affairs.

5172. Do not you think that, having to deal with a state of the service which is now pretty much admitted to be unsatisfactory, in order to get out of it we must impose a great amount of individual responsibility on the heads of missions?—In my view we have got into very great difficulties by not making our ministers of late years sufficiently responsible; and if you like I will give you two or three instances. Take the American affairs. When Lord Derby came into office he was certainly desirous, if possible, to reconcile the two countries. What would a sensible man, unfettered by bad advice, have done in that case? Why, supposing that it had been Lord Palmerston, he would have written to the head of the mission at Washington, and he would have said, "Well, I want to make up these matters with the United States if I can, but I do not choose to make any proposition that will not be accepted; go and have a talk with the minister for foreign affairs there, and see what it is that would be accepted, and give me your opinion." Well, I venture to say, knowing something of that country and its people, that I could have gone to the minister of foreign affairs at Washington, and have come away with a perfectly clear idea in my own mind as to the sort of proposition that would succeed, and the sort of proposition that would not; and therefore the responsibility would have been thrown on me as to the course that the Government at home could adopt; but it would have been giving a great deal of power to me, as minister, and showing a great reliance on the minister at Washington. Instead of doing that, Lord Derby, apparently without consulting our representative in the United States, makes a proposition of his own, which directly it gets to the United States is refused, and was certain to be refused, because he said our Government will give this, and will not give that; and anybody who knows anything of negotiation knows that directly you say what you will not give, that becomes at once the important point in the mind of the person that you are dealing with, particularly in a country like America; and therefore the thing which Lord Derby said he would not give arose into supernatural importance in the minds of the Americans, and became the cause of all the differences that we had afterwards. Then, Lord Clarendon came into office; a negotiation was going on with Mr. Johnson here; I ventured, as I stated to the House of Commons at the time, to express an opinion to Lord Clarendon, that it was unwise to settle the question here with Mr. Johnson, first because the question could only be settled at Washington, and in the next place, because he was dealing with an administration that was going out on a matter which another administration that was coming in would have to decide upon. The proper course then would have been,

y opinion, to have referred the matter to ington, and left it to be settled at Wash- n, giving instructions to our minister, and, e all, giving him orders not to assent to any which would be refused by the Senate. t was the objection to that course? None, that you would give a greater power to the n at Washington than was liked by the gn Office; the consequence was, that our ter at Washington had not the power, gh he saw that it would not be accepted e Senate, to prevent a treaty signed by our ernment going up there, and both countries ne compromised in a manner which might y have been avoided. I mention the case use it is an important practical instance in h the Foreign Office assumed the part which t to have been exercised by our representa- there.

73. Of course, the Foreign Office system has advantage, that it makes a stupid diplomatist y nearly as valuable as a man of ability?— if you call that an advantage.

74. The Foreign Office acts on the principle in Downing-street they are able to deal with uestions absolutely, and instruct our repre- atives abroad, almost to the minute method of ing with everything that arises?—To speak kly, there is a gentleman in the Foreign e whom I have known a long time, a man considerable ability and immense industry, who I think deserves the highest encomiums the eminent qualities that he possesses; but ourse, if a man passes all his life at the , and knows nothing much of the world tically beyond that, he forms an over- mate of what can be done by merely writing espatch, and an under-estimate of what can done when the despatch gets to the place h it is destined for. He, of course, thinks everything depends upon the despatch. My rience tells me that nearly everything de- ds upon the man to whose hands that despatch . I do not mean to say anything which can all depreciate the qualities of the gentleman represents the bureaucratic influence of the eign Office; I merely mean to say that his cation and habits must give him certain lities, and prevent him from having others.

175. I am quite sure that there is no want of pect felt by any of us towards the permanent der Secretary; but still this is a matter of h vital importance in our inquiry, that I shall it necessary to ask one or two questions, cer- ly not from any disrespect to the gentleman olved; but as I understand it, from your great erience, the effect of the present system is , that young men go into the service about om there is not any certain test of fitness; t once in they rise by seniority; that when y are under the control of the heads of mis- ns, there is no opportunity of anything arising of their conduct or character either to pro- te or stop their further career; that they ulti- tely become ministers abroad; that during the ole of this period the entire control is with Foreign Office; and when they become misters abroad, starting as they may do as in- mpetent, and remaining so during the whole of ir career, they are directed by the Foreign fice how to manage affairs as representatives this country; is that at all a fair statement of e case?—I do not know whether I quite fol- wed all your observations, but it strikes me that the general outline of them is this: it is possible that a gentleman may go into the diplomacy who may not be fit for the highest posts; and that if he is to advance by seniority, and there is to be no check to his advancing by seniority, that gentleman may possibly get into one of those high posts." This is true; he may do so: I do not say that he will, because he may have bad health or die.

Rt. Hon. Sir H. L. Bulwer, G.C.B., M.P.

5176. But assuming that he were to continue in his career, he would do so?—It would be an extreme conclusion if he did not. An ambassador or minister has the power, of course, of saying that any one under him is incompetent, and in a very gross case he would say that; but he puts himself in a very awkward position by doing so The fair way, in my opinion, would be that, when there is a question of a gentleman's promotion, the ambassador or minister under whom he has served, should be asked, as a man of honour interested in the well-being of the service, to state what his opinion is fairly.

5177. I daresay you are aware that before the Diplomatic Committee of 1860 there were complaints made by Lord Lyons, and also by Lord Cowley, in reference to the insubordination of junior members of legations arising from the want of control on the part of the chiefs?—I think that this has been rather owing to what I have just stated, and also to the manner in which the subordinate members have been separated from the ambassador. And I must say that Lord Clarendon (of whom I should speak with still greater respect now than at any former time, and of whose judgments I had the highest opinion) answered rather hastily when he said, that if there was any difference between a subordinate member of the mission and the head of it, the fault must be in the head. Very often it happens that two gentlemen in a mission are not on good terms with each other; one complains of the other; perhaps you, as the head of the mission, may think that the man who complains is right and the other man wrong,; then he owes you a grudge. Therefore there may be many reasons why the chief of a mission (I never had but one quarrel, I think) may be placed in a position in which he is almost obliged either to abdicate his authority or to put down insubordination.

5178. Mr. Otway.] I think that you have misapprehended what Lord Clarendon said; I find that in answer to question 3467, he said this: "With regard to the statements which you refer to as made by Lord Lyons and Lord Cowley, I never heard them before, and I do not know whether they are answers to a Committee or whether they are enclosed in despatches; but they are hypothetical cases; and without the least disrespect to Lord Lyons or Lord Cowley (for most assuredly better heads of missions never were), I should say that any insubordination, any want of discipline, any incompetency of service, was entirely to be attributed to the head of the mission. I was six years a minister; I had a great variety of persons at the legation while I was there, and I never found the least difficulty. They were all well-conducted gentlemen; some of them might have been a little more diligent, and others a little more idle, but I never had the least difficulty. It was as present to every one of them that in case of misconduct I should report him, as it would be to the ensign of a regiment, that the colonel would report him; but I never heard of anything of a serious kind. I should should say that if there was any regular insubordination at a mission, if the discipline was not properly maintained, I should address myself more to the head of that mission than I should to the peccant attaché"?—Yes; but the head of the mission must feel that when any complaint is made to the Foreign Office, the Foreign Office in such a case will support him. I too was five years in Madrid and never had a quarrel with anybody, and a great many years at other places; but it does not follow that I might not have a quarrel at some place or other, though such a case is rare.

Rt. Hon. Sir H. L. Bulwer, G.C.B., M.P.

5179. Mr. Rylands.] I think I understood that at all events, in your opinion, if the head of the mission had perfect control and if the subordinates depended upon his judgment in reference to their future career, the probability is that there would not be any such difficulties?—I would not even go so far as that, because the head of the mission is liable to be mistaken as well as anybody else; therefore I would say that it should not altogether depend upon him, and it should not be altogether irrespective of him. A man should not be able to go to a mission and say, "All I have to do is to please the Foreign Office; it does not matter whether the chief is pleased or not."

5180. Something has been said about the subordination of an ensign to his colonel; there is not that subordination in the Diplomatic Service?—There is not; there is not that tendency on the part of the junior members of the mission to look up to their chief and regard him as a person who can be of use to them, and whom it is desirable to please.

5182. In your judgment it is very important that by some means or other we should have at the head of our missions abroad men of very distinguished ability and high public character?—I think that a man in a great position abroad, as representing a country like England, ought to be a man of mark, even independently of his particular position of ambassador; he should confer something upon the rank of ambassador whilst the rank of ambassador confers something on him.

5183. That would lead you to think it desirable that public men of position should be from time to time appointed to the principal embassies?—I certainly should not exclude them; at the same time I think that it would be very unfair if competent men could be found in the profession in which they had spent a great part of their lives, if they had not a fair consideration of their merits when any vacancy occurred; if they were competent, I think they should have the preference; if you take a competent man who has lived abroad, and knows the languages and the mind, I may say, of the people on the Continent, I should say that that man, if his abilities were equal to it, would be a better man to carry on a negotiation abroad than a person even of rather higher ability who had merely had a political life in England; just the same as a man in diplomacy, who was unacquainted with all the usages and customs of the House of Commons, would not have his fair station there.

5184. With regard to the influence of the Foreign Office upon our diplomatic representatives, do you think that there would be any improvement secured in that respect if the political Under Secretary took a higher position in relation to the management of the Foreign Office the second to the Foreign Secretary?—It certainly appears to me that, inasmuch as the political Under Secretary of State is in the House of Commons or in the other House of Parliament and therefore represents the Government in that position, he ought to have a higher place in the Foreign Office than the permanent Under Secretary; I do not know that I am qualified to give a very good opinion on that point, but that is my impression.

5185. I suppose that you consider that the policy of the Foreign Office at home should be expressed to the representatives of the Foreign Office abroad; that then greater responsibility should be thrown upon them in the carrying out of those instructions, and that, in fact, it should become less a bureaucratic system than it is at present?—I think that what I stated was done formerly is the right thing. Then the Minister for Foreign Affairs took the greatest care to let the head of an embassy or mission know the precise policy that the country was following; and then he left it very much to that minister to carry out such policy in the way that he thought best.

5186. Amongst the points which you were good enough to suggest for our examination there was a question as to the position of the heads of missions as ambassadors or chargés d'affaires. I presume that with regard to the great posts you would be of opinion that ambassadors should always be appointed to the great courts?—Yes.

5187. Then, with regard to the smaller courts, is it your judgment that it is necessary to have a minister in all the smaller courts of Europe, or do you think that it would be sufficient to have a chargé d'affaires, and to send a minister on special occasions: take, for instance, Sweden, Denmark and others of the smaller courts in Europe?—I think that you must regulate your conduct a little by what other Governments do in that respect. If I saw any economy to be practised it would be more by uniting missions under one head, and having persons stationed at the different places which were incorporated, as it were, in that mission, and who would be considered as belonging to that mission.

5188. I was just going to ask you that question; whether you had considered whether any of the smaller missions could be so blended under one head, having a subordinate at each of the courts?—I cannot say that I know the exact situation of the various smaller missions sufficiently to be able to have an opinion on this point; but if I saw two countries which it was our object to keep as united as possible, and which had the same interests, I think that naming a first-rate man to the two, and letting him have a person under him but belonging to his mission at one of them, would tend to effect our object better than having a minister at each, inasmuch as the two ministers would not have the same unity of purpose or action that one man would have. Let us take—I speak, however, rather loosely, because I do not feel confident that my opinion is a sound one on that matter—two countries like Holland and Belgium. It certainly is our policy, and the policy of those two countries, that they should be firmly united together, and that they should be able in case of any European struggle, to act together. I do not know whether, if you had an eminent man representing us at these two courts, going alternately ately to one and the other, with an able ary at one of them, your object, and the in- s of those two countries would not be better d out than by having two ministers who did uch correspond with each other, and might a different tone, and have a different mind, ae from the other.

9. With reference to the remark which you with respect to American diplomacy, am I in believing that the Americans do not in- e in any foreign affairs except those which diately touch their own interests?—They ere, I believe, in American affairs, much as hould interfere in European affairs, but pean affairs rarely touch their interest in any ial manner. But, for instance, we will sup- that something has occurred, and that an rican consul, or an American minister, thinks is countrymen have been improperly treated, r as to their persons or their property; he d hold a higher language to the offending Go- ment, probably, than our consul or minister d do.

90. You think that even in cases of that the representative of America would use a er tone?—I think that if you were to ask agents in general they would tell you that was their impression.

91. Mr. Otway.] Do you consider that their omacy is more successful than ours in that ect?—I think that where they interfere they rfere, generally speaking, with more effect; that that is not the consequence of greater ty on their part, but because they can hold lder and higher language. I have known nces, and I daresay that gentlemen who have ed abroad in general, have known instances ie requests or demands of Americans receiving ter attention than those of European govern- ts.

192. Mr. Rylands.] But I presume that you ld not think that in reference to smaller mat- the American Government would threaten ll, and not first ask for redress?—The agents ld threaten, for instance, that if so and so was done, all the vessels belonging to that State ld have an embargo placed on them in Ame- n ports; they would, in fact, say more than should say. And then there is a sort of idea, haps (I do not say that it is a right one), that American Government is more reckless of sequences, and that it would do something e than we should do.

193. Mr. Otway.] Is not that rather what might term a bullying policy?—You may it spirited, or bullying; much depends upon ds.

194. Would it not tend to reduce diplomacy bullying if our agents were more successful such means?—You may call it spirited, or lying; you must use the language which your ntry will respond to. I don't call it bullying, ou are in the right, to use strong language, viding you act up to it.

5195. Would you like to see the American tem prevail among our diplomatists?—I would e to see our Ministers and Government use, a fitting occasion, very high language; and I lieve that, for instance, if the Americans had en concerned in these affairs in Greece, they uld have had a much more satisfactory redress this time than we have had.

5196. Mr. Rylands.] You would not adopt a ferent tone towards a weak nation from what you would towards a strong nation?—I do not know about that; that is reversing human nature.

5197. But am I to understand you to express the opinion that it is desirable, in relation to the debts due to merchants as private individuals from the South American Republics, that we should send out diplomatists to South America to use a bullying tone?—I am against interfering in those private transactions myself; I think that when a man runs the chance of making great profit he runs the chance of great risk, and the Government ought to interfere only in very special cases.

5198. With regard to Constantinople, we have had the subject of the expenditure there before us; I suppose you agree that we can do with a less staff at Constantinople than the staff which at present exists there?—I have always thought one of the gentlemen employed there is perfectly useless.

5199. Is that the Oriental Secretary?—Yes.

5200. With reference to the dragomans, is it not the fact that the communications between the embassy and the Porte, through the dragomans, were formerly of a much more confidential character than is now the case?—Your head dragoman must be in your confidence; I think that Sir Henry Elliot spoke very well about that, and very truly, when he said that he knows so much of what you are doing, that it is much better not to disguise from him anything.

5201. You would not say that as to any but the head dragoman?—Only as to the head dragoman.

5202. There are, I believe, three dragomans; would you think it necessary to keep up that staff?—I cannot say, because nearly all the dragomans are employed on private business, business of claims, and things of that kind; the only one employed about public diplomatic business would be the head dragoman; what I think would be very beneficial, in fact, I recommended it strongly at the time, would be to have the consular and the dragomanic services intermingled; it very often happens that you wish to get rid of a dragoman; he might do very well with one minister at the Porte, but does ill with his successor; in fact, you are not perfectly satisfied with him, but there are not sufficient grounds to send him away, and to deprive him of his employment; it would be a great advantage, in that case, if you were able to name him to some consulate, and then you might make some consul your dragoman; you would in that way add to your dragomanic service, and you would add something also to your consular service; for instance, in the case of this head dragoman, you might feel it desirable, without imputing any great blame to him, to have somebody else in his place, and if you could name him as consul-general he would be very glad to get that office, and a consul would be very glad to be made head dragoman. This facility of interchange exists in other foreign embassies and missions in the East.

5203. Do you think that these dragomans receive fees, douceurs of any kind, from the people they serve in their private matters?—I am loth to express any opinion upon that point; I doubt very much whether our own do; I do not think that they do.

5204. There is an impression that the dragomans connected with the other Governments do?—There is that impression, but I will not say that it is correct; you rarely hear of a dragoman making his fortune.

Rt. Hon. Sir H. L. Bulwer, G.C.B., M.P.

11 July 1870.

5205. Mr. W. Lowther.] Have the dragomans access to all the papers at the embassy?—They have access to no papers; you only give the dragoman an affair; you generally write down what he has to do, and give him an order.

5206. You stated, I think, that there were some reasons why it was not advisable to have a peer as ambassador at Paris?—I wish to make that clear. What I stated was this, that if you have a peer who takes a part in public affairs in England, I think that then he is not a fit person to remain at that post if the Government changes, because he must either belong to his party, which has gone out, or he must degrade himself by belonging to any party that comes in; and therefore if he takes a part in politics at home I think that is a sufficient reason for his sticking to the House of Lords, and not sticking to diplomacy, except when his own party is in power.

5207. Therefore it would not be advisable to have a Member of the House of Commons as ambassador at Paris?—Not as long as he was a Member of the House of Commons belonging to a party, if that party went out of office; but the case of a Member of the House of Commons is different altogether from that of a peer. It is not likely that he would remain in Parliament when he became a diplomatist, so that he would cease to be a party man.

5208. With reference to the instructions which were sent from the Foreign Office to the minister at Washington, I understood you to say that the questions ought to have been handed over to the minister there and that he should have treated with the American Government and conducted the negotiations entirely free from the Foreign Office?—I did not say that at all. What I said was this, that when there was a question of opening a negotiation with the United States Government, it would have been desirable to have employed our minister at Washington to ascertain, previous to making any offers from home, what offers were likely to succeed and what were likely to fail; and then again, I said that afterwards, when we had pretty well drawn up what were the sort of conditions which we were likely to agree to, it would have been well to have left them to be handled by and settled through our mission at Washington, because if our minister there saw that what our Government would agree to would not be agreed to by the Senate as well as the Government of the United States, he would not put us in the awkward position of having a treaty that we had signed thrown back again in our faces.

5209. Then a very much larger amount of responsibility would thereby be thrown upon the minister at Washington?—Certainly, that is my idea of what is desirable.

5210. You think that the minister at Washington should be more responsible than the Secretary of State?—No; I do not think that, but that the Minister for Foreign Affairs should make him, as his subordinate, responsible to him; that he should make use of him, and get an opinion from him.

5211. Talking of the site at Constantinople for the embassy, you have no particular site in your mind?—No; I have none in my mind; but any of the sites near the Sultan's palace (I do not know whether they are free) would be advantageous.

5212. It is a rather low position, is it not?—Low; not unhealthy.

5213. Who would buy the house at Therapia it was for sale?—I cannot tell you now; at t time when I was there, there was a great dema for property there, and there would have b a plan for making a square of houses where t embassy stands.

5214. But would it be some private or publ persons?—I think there was a company th that would have done it.

5215. You are strongly of opinion that t house at Constantinople must be rebuilt?—I think there must be a house for the embassy.

5216. I think that in the year 1860 Lo Russell sent out an instruction to Constantinop with regard to the performance of public bus ness at the embassy, in which he laid down th everything should pass through the hands of t First Secretary?—I have alluded to that.

5217. And that circular was sent to oth embassies and legations?—It was sent to all.

5218. Do you approve of it?—Certainly not

5219. Ought not a secretary to be made awa of everything?—He ought to know everything but that was not the point; this circular was t make him the executive officer over the chan cellerie instead of the chief, which I thin absurd.

5220. Then we have had it in evidence tha living in Constantinople is very cheap; but I se that there was a very large increase in the ex traordinaries from 1854 to 1859; do you thin that the expense of living at Constantinople ha increased?—It increased then in an enormou proportion, on account of this, that your boa hire and every other expense was reckoned at s many piastres; I think for 1 l. you got 22 piastres; afterwards the paper money was with drawn, and you only got 100 piastres for 1 l., an the prices did not fall proportionately; therefor wages and everything else was nearly doubled t those who were paid in pounds.

5221. When you were at Constantinople yo had a full staff there?—Yes; I had a great man gentlemen; I forget now all.

5222. And one or two private secretaries?—I had one private secretary, but I had not an permanent one; I had a reason for changing Mr. Macdonell was my secretary latterly.

5223. But you generally had a private secre tary?—I almost always had a private secretary.

5224. And did you find that there was a diffi culty in defining what was his public work, an what was his private business?—No; because never gave him public work to do, unless yo would call my private letters public work; if h was a person that I trusted in those matters, would employ him to copy my letters to Lor Russell or to anyone else.

5225. But a private secretary would telegrap occasionally, would he not?—He could neve telegraph; that was always done in the chan cellerie.

5226. I suppose there is a great deal of con sular business to attend to at Constantinople?—A great deal.

5227. I think there are 60 consular agents; i is to be hoped that they do not write every day but there must be an immense deal to attend t in that way?—Yes.

5228. Is the ambassador able to attend to al that business himself?—I used to do so. I use to give general instructions every month to ou consul uls as to the course they should pursue. Those uctions I wrote myself, and then I read correspondence.

29. You were some years in diplomacy?—

30. Do you consider that the block is now er than it was when you began, taking into deration that three or four missions have been ressed?—I think that then, as now, people a long time in rising, and that persons have r exaggerated the peculiar difficulty of the now, but as there are more people employed mission at this time than formerly, they do get on so quickly; and then again you know was nothing like seniority.

31. I suppose that the Foreign Office have means of hearing from the heads of em- es or legations whether there are gentlemen who are more or less fitted for the posts h they occupy?—Well, really I do not think they ever ask you the question; and I cer- y never expressed an opinion without being d for it, unless there were some very glaring

32. But if you had a remarkably able man er you at your embassy, you would perhaps tion his name to the principal secretary?—I nt, if I was intimate with the principal secre- , mention such-and-such a person to him.

33. Do you think it would do him any good u did mention his name?—It would depend much on the terms I was on with the ign Secretary; but I do not think it would im a great deal of good, because, as I said re, the Foreign Office like to make appoint- ts more themselves.

34. Mr. Rylands.] In any case, I suppose, e would be no promotion in consequence of favourable opinion under the present system?—If promotion goes by seniority there could not be. I have not served for three or four years, but I understand that it does go by seniority now.

5235. Mr. W. Lowther.] Is it true that all correspondence is carried on in French with the Foreign Office at Constantinople?—I always wrote in English to the Turkish ministers.

5236. And they answered in French?—They answered in French.

5237. We have been told something about compulsory retirement at an early age in the French service; do you know something of that?—I read something said by Mr. Thurlow, but he was under a great mistake; he said, that in the French service, diplomatists must retire at 50; and I believe the Marquis de Lavalette must be near 74; that is quite an error; hardly anybody ever gets to a high position in the French service till he is 50.

5238. Viscount Barrington.] How do you propose to manage with regard to the staff of these great legations; you say that you wish to have only three, but there must be some kind of reserve to fall back upon?—I was asked what I thought would be sufficient; I stated that three would be sufficient at a mission, and you might have two secretaries, that is one more, perhaps, at an embassy; I do not think that you want anybody to fall back upon; there might be an occasional illness, of course.

5239. Some of them must go on leave?—When they went on leave you must spare one; all my propositions go on one supposition, namely, that you have the power of employing unpaid attachés. My remembrance of unpaid attachés is, that they did work quite as efficiently as those now paid.

5240. Mr. W. Cartwright.] You suggest an unlimited number of unpaid attachés?—Yes.

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE EDWARD PLEYDELL BOUVERIE, IN THE CHAIR.

The Honourable EDWARD ROBERT LYTTON, recalled; and further Examined.

18 July 1870.

5241. Mr. A. Russell.] You alluded in your previous evidence to the general utility of a gentleman employed as translator at the Lisbon Mission. Are we to understand from what you have said that the current work of a diplomatic chancery can, in your opinion, be better performed by copying clerks than by persons belonging to the social class from which attachés are generally selected?—Certainly not; and I am very glad of an opportunity to correct any such impression, if I conveyed it to the mind of the Committee. With regard to the possibility of substituting copying clerks in the work of our missions for the present class of secretaries and attachés, I think that you could not safely do that, because, in the first place, it is quite evident that these copying clerks would be strictly excluded from the society to which secretaries and attachés are at present admitted; and it appears to me that the function of a diplomatist, whatever his rank in the service may be, is so essentially a social one in various ways, that this social exclusion would involve a considerable loss of efficiency to the service: and then, in the next place, it is obvious that you could not promote these copying clerks to the position eventually of ministers or secretaries of embassy, and yet at the same time, from the moment of their entering into the service, you would be obliged to take them entirely into the confidence of the mission, and to confide to their knowledge and to their keeping all the confidential and political correspondence of the mission; therefore you would be able to offer them no greater inducement to guard and keep faithfully that confidence than the mere continuance of a very insignificant salary; whilst, if these gentlemen desired to make money by the betrayal of that confidence, there can be no doubt that it would be in their power in that way to make a great deal of money; and I do not think that that is a position in which it would be right or moral upon the part of the State to place a large class of public servants; I do not think that it would be advisable to expose them to such a temptation. But I should wish to explain that the reason why I alluded to the gentleman whom I remember in the capacity of translator to the mission at Lisbon was, that I wished to illustrate what I certainly do feel to be the great practical inconvenience of so frequently disturbing the composition of a mission, that, in point of fact, inste of allowing recruits to ripen into veterans an where, you are virtually turning veterans ir recruits everywhere. I have myself frequent experienced the inconvenience which arises wh the members of a mission, just at the time wh they have all got upon terms of intimacy wi each other, and adopted the same method work, and made themselves masters of t details of a particular chancery, and are acting harmoniously together, are suddenly d persed to different posts without any referen whatever to the convenience of their chief, a very often without any reference to the con nience of themselves; at the same time, of cour I should wish to guard against another misu derstanding in what I say upon that point; course I feel most strongly that it would be very real injustice, and a very great hardship a junior diplomatist to be left all his life at sor remote and obscure mission, simply because was rendering himself exceptionally useful ther in consequence of the local knowledge whi he had accumulated at that post. So far fr thinking that, I think that the more a man m have made himself useful at a small mission, t more entitled he is to advancement to a gr one, and that proof of general capacity anywhe is, so far as it goes, a guarantee for general c pacity everywhere. But the Committee is doubt aware that under the present system secon and third secretaries are liable to be transferr from one post to another, and very often fr one part of the world to another, every tw years, without any sort of promotion or advanc ment in the service, and generally without an direct reference to the convenience of their chi and very often without any reference to the own convenience; and so far as I am aware the feelings of my junior colleagues upon th point, I think that instead of regarding it as great privilege, they are disposed to regard rather in the light of an inconvenience. And n unnaturally so, because if you will take the ca of the men who are married and have famili (and unfortunately, with the present slow rate advancement in our service, it is quite possib that a man who is, by a figure of speech, a juni in the service, should be a senior in his ow household, and the head of a great many juni members of a household), there can be no doul th in a pecuniary point of view it is a very inconvenience to them; I can speak from personal experience on that point, because I was myself secretary of legation, it so ened that my post was changed, I think, times in the course of four years; and al- gh on each of those occasions the change ot involve direct promotion, yet I am bound y that it was of a character which I myself ded as decidedly advantageous to my pro- nal prospects; on all of those occasions my wishes were consulted, and in every one of I was exceedingly well pleased to have this ge of post, and therefore I do not refer to th any sort of personal complaint. Quite ontrary, indeed. But that does not alter act, that from a pecuniary point of view, y own case, there being in addition to my lling expenses (which to a man with a family servants, and a certain amount of furniture ove, were necessarily very heavy), the fur- expense of being obliged suddenly to set somewhat large private establishment in a try in which I arrived as a total stranger, and often to break up this establishment at very notice; the personal inconvenience was such I can honestly say that if to-morrow I was in pt of a first-class minister's salary, I should be for many years a very heavy pecuniary by my profession. Of course I think that is some distinction to be borne in mind, with rd to the frequent moving of junior diplo- sts, between the relative positions of a secre- of legation and a second or third secretary; use no doubt the business of a secretary of ion, generally speaking, is rather intellectual social than positively manual, and a secretary gation may frequently be changed with ad- ge to the public service, as well as to him- without in any way disturbing the routine of work in the chancery of a mission; but e case of second secretaries, who are virtually rganising heads of our chanceries, there can o doubt that it makes a very great difference eir chiefs, the heads of missions, whether have a man who can place his hands at a ent's notice on every paper, who knows e every document is to be found, and who is oughly conversant with the working order of hancery, or whether they are obliged to rely he services of a gentleman who has been ly sent out to the post, and who has, of se, not had time to get up all the details of particular chancery. Moreover, I think that ost of our great missions there is a great unt of work which is not confidential work, h is not political work at all; it is partly rial; it partly also consists of a mass of cor- ndence which is essentially unpolitical; and ink that all the work of that description d be very conveniently and advantageously rtaken by permanent officers attached to the ion in the capacity of the chanceliers who mployed in the French service. In saying however, I ought to mention to the Com- ee, that, so far as I am aware, the chanceliers e French service are, as a general rule, not per- ed to have access even to the political archives correspondence of the mission. The work h they undertake, and which they certainly, think, perform very efficiently, is current ness of a totally unpolitical character, very n, as I said before, notarial, and other busi- of that kind. They are generally selected for that post from the lower grades of the consular service, and they look for promotion, I think, to the higher grades of the consular service. Therefore, of course, they can hardly be regarded in the same light socially as the other members of the missions to which they are attached; in point of fact, I think that at Vienna I have never met the chancelier of the French embassy there except at the house of his own ambassador. I do not believe that the chanceliers are admitted to Court, and I think that they are seldom admitted to society. They are generally very intelligent and able men (I have known many of them), and I think that it is the experience of most of my French colleagues that the system of employing them works exceedingly well, and does very much ease the strain of current business in the French legations. This is all that I had to explain upon that point. The sum total of what I would say is this, that I think that there is a class of work at all our great missions which could be very advantageously performed by gentlemen answering to the chanceliers in the French service, but that I think it would be highly objectionable to substitute copying clerks for the present secretaries and attachés in the political and confidential work of our missions.

Hon. E. R. Lytton.

5242. Did I rightly understand you from your reply to Sir Henry Bulwer, that the current work of our diplomatic establishments could be efficiently performed by a smaller number of persons than is now generally employed on that work?—No, that was not at all my meaning. The facts referred to by Sir Henry Bulwer last Monday were all perfectly accurate, but the cases which those facts represent must, I think, for reasons which I could very readily point out to the Committee, be regarded as quite exceptional cases. With regard to the staffs of our missions, generally speaking, I think it would be most inadvisable to reduce them, and I should say that it would be practically impossible to maintain them on the footing of a permanent minimum. Those cases referred to by Sir Henry Bulwer were quite exceptional, because, in the first place, they did not involve the enormous amount of translation which, for various reasons, is now one of the least fluctuating and heaviest portions of the work done; and then, too, a great portion of the work done in the chancery in those cases was done by the private secretary of the minister, who was not officially attached to the mission at all, although he was in the confidence of the chief and actively engaged in the mission; that, as a general rule, I think, would not be advisable; and though, I think, men who are acting well together will undertake readily, for each other's convenience, a sudden amount of extra work, yet if they felt that their convenience was no matter of consideration to their employers, of course they would begin to work grudgingly, and therefore inefficiently; besides which, I do not see how anybody could obtain leave of absence in that case from a mission without inconveniencing the public service; and I do not think that this inconvenience would be remedied by sending out at the public expense some one to supply his place.

5243. Mr. W. Cartwright.] In referring to the work of translation just now as being less at certain places, I suppose you alluded to Washington?—I alluded to Washington; and also I had in my mind this fact, that it is rather a prevalent custom now amongst chiefs of missions to send home to the Government weekly, or sometimes almost almost daily, articles extracted from all the principal organs of opinion in the foreign press of those countries where they are officially resident, which, of course, must be accompanied by translations; and when I had the advantage of serving under Sir Henry Bulwer it was his custom, on the contrary, to treat all those subjects in his own despatches, in which they were analysed and explained; of course it may be that this system of cutting pieces out of the newspapers and sending them constantly home is more convenient to the heads of missions, but it must greatly add to the labour of their chanceries.

5244. Mr. A. Russell.] Should you say that, according to your own experience, the prospects of junior diplomatists have been improved by the recommendations of the Committee of 1861?—Well, so far as I have been able to observe, the present organisation of our service, with special reference to the result of the recommendations of the Committee of 1861, I am afraid I really must say that I have considerable doubts whether we have been working in a judicious or successful direction; and I rather fear that this present system will tend to produce results precisely the reverse of those which were intended. Because I do not doubt for a moment that one of the main motives of the adoption of this system was to remove, or at least to diminish, as much as possible, all just ground of discontent amongst the junior branches of the service; and I cannot help thinking that you will find that, in the long run, it has rather tended to augment the discontent which undoubtedly does prevail at the present moment. Of course I feel most strongly, so far as that goes, in the present almost desperately slow rate of promotion and advancement in the service, that it is decidedly preferable for a third secretary whose prospects of promotion are indefinitely distant, to be in the meanwhile receiving a commission and a small salary, rather than that he should be serving the state for many years with the monotony of discouraged hope, unrelieved in any sort of way by compensation, either present or prospective. As far as that goes, therefore, he is a gainer, and if you continue the present system, I cannot say how hard and unfair I think it would be to deprive this certainly not highly-paid class of public servants of the small salaries which the system now accords to them. But the Committee are no doubt aware that formerly it was the custom for a minister or an ambassador to attach to his mission, of course subject to the sanction of the Secretary of State, gentlemen who were personally known to himself, and whom he thought likely to be either agreeable or useful members of his staff; well, those gentlemen were either men of some private fortune, or else they were on terms of such previous intimacy with the minister to whose staff they were attached, that he was glad to receive them almost as members of his own family, and to board and lodge them in his own house with every possible comfort and luxury; and the majority of these unpaid attachés did not enter the service with any definite intention whatever of permanently remaining in it; they certainly entered it with no recognised claim upon the State, either for permanent employment or for immediate emolument. Those of them who felt that they had any special fitness or ambition for the really serious work of diplomacy were quite aware that the only claim they could establish to the prizes of the profession would lie in some personal effort of their own which should have the effe of achieving for them a reputation, either pr fessional or public, for marked talent a ability; and those who felt no such call spo taneously left the service after a few years' e perience of it, which was not unprofitab themselves, and which certainly had this adva tage, that it cost the State not a sixpence. cannot help thinking that there was a consid able advantage to the community at large in th system, as it appears to me much to be desired th the largest possible number of our well-to-do you I mean the sort of young men who eventually into Parliament and the liberal professions at hom should receive from the State every possible i ducement, and every possible facility, for acqui ing at least some personal knowledge of t social and political facts of foreign countries, a above all, for being able in this manner, as were, to re-import back into home society feeling of intelligent interest in foreign questio and respect for foreign opinion. I think th that sort of incessant, though perhaps imp ceptible, importation and diffusion of a cosm politan feeling at home was a certain advanta in the old system which is not possessed by t present one. But it is quite clear that the cla of paid and commissioned junior secretaries w have now succeeded to those unpaid attachés a in a totally different relation to the State, b cause the State has exacted from them cert preliminary pledges and guarantees for the p session of qualities which it requires, and up the receipt of those pledges it has covenant with them for certain permanent services, a therefore the secretaries look upon themsel in the light of men who have, as it wer signed a sort of service contract with the Stat and think that as long as they fulfil their oblig tions to the State, the State is bound to fulfil t expectations which that covenant raises in th own minds. Of course if the State cannot that, or if it is virtually in the position of saying these men, "I am not dissatisfied with your s vices, I have no fault to find with you, but the is, as you see, what is called a block in the se vice" (and that arises, I am afraid, the more look into it, not from any purely tempora cause, but from the permanent conditio of the service, which were overlooked at t time), there will be a great amount of not u justifiable discontent on the part of that cl of the profession. And I think that that disc tent already exists; I think it is an ascertainal fact which claims consideration in any attem to reorganise or improve the tone of the s vice; and the question is, how you will d with it?

5246. The heads of missions have now nothi to say to the appointment of attachés, I presum

m aware of no case in which the head of a on has been consulted in the appointment of ttachés; as a general rule, I should say that are not in any way consulted in such apments; and the effect of this is to take from eads of missions all personal interest in the l position, and all personal pride in the l qualifications of the members of their staff. ertainly has diminished the social intimacy een the heads of missions and their subortes.

47. With regard to the staff at the missions, correct to say, is it not, that the scale which intained is supposed to be sufficient to meet pressure that may occur?—Precisely; that e principle upon which the staff is organised.

48. As unfortunately I did not hear your er evidence, I do not know whether you sug- ed any different system, or any possible re- ion?—No; I was saying just now that I k it would be practically impossible to reduce permanent staff of our missions, and for rea- which I explained to the Committee.

249. You are in favour, are you not, of a uent change from one post to another?—No; the contrary, I should say that as a general it would be injudicious to disturb continually composition of a mission, because of course e must be a certain process of what you may social crystallisation, which is necessary for iency in co-operative work of any kind; and ink it is inadvisable to disturb that unnecesly. Of course promotion must almost inably involve a change of post; but where it ot a case of promotion, I should say that as a eral rule it would be more advantageous to service not arbitrarily to change the junior nbers of a mission; in short, I would not nge them, except at their own request. But ir own request, should, I think, be always plied with so far as the general interests of service will permit.

250. Mr. Eastwick.] But you might reduce staff, because if we are to adopt Sir Henry lwer's suggestion of having unpaid attachés, ected partly by the minister and partly by the cretary of State, in that case you might have y number of unpaid members that you please? Practically, so far from reducing the staff, you uld be rather increasing it by that means.

5251. But you would be reducing the paid ff?—You would limit the number of paid emyés certainly, and I think that it would be an vantage to do so. I think, if I may say so, that e sum total of the distinctive differences beeen the old system, which is really the system ich appears to have been recommended by Sir enry Bulwer, and the present system, is this, at under the old system it was precisely the ss of men whom you would not by any means sh to retain permanently in the service of the ate, I mean the rich idlers, who voluntarily and ntaneously left the service; and that, on the ner hand, the State had practically a quite united power of choice in the selection of its permanent paid servants from amongst a body of en who had all received a certain diplomatic aining; whereas it seems to me that by the esent system, in the first place, the State is edged and bound to employ, and pay permaently, and to recognise as eligible to all the ghest posts in the service, anybody who has ssed through what really appears to me a very perficial entrance examination, so that it has now no convenient means of discharging second-rate workmen, or encouraging good ones; and also I think that one disadvantage of the present system of examination is, that, for instance, thir year there may be three first-rate men, all candidates for admission to the service, and you may have no vacancy; it is not probable that these gentlemen will go on waiting indefinitely for the prospect of admission into the service, and they will therefore turn their attention elsewhere, and be absorbed into some other career at home; and then next year you may have three vacancies, and perhaps for those vacancies there may be as many as a dozen competitors, and it is quite possible that all these dozen competitors may be more or less second-rate men, and yet the State in that case will be obliged to accept out of those 12 second-rate men the three men whom the examination represents as, on the whole, the best.

5252. Except that one might certainly think, judging from the number of young men who go up from the universities for the Civil Service appointments in the East (which appear to me not so valuable as diplomatic appointments), that you would never want a good supply of young men of ability?—I should be much more in favour myself of a very much higher examination, if you made it a test examination, and if instead of making it a means of introducing men into the service, you used it rather in the sense of a machinery for filtering the best part of your raw material into what you might call a réserve d'élite of men, who should be henceforth eligible for the highest employments in the service. I do not think that the present examinations are much test of ability; of course they keep out gross ignorance, but it appears to me that they are the lowest standard you could fix upon.

5253. There is no escape, I presume, between the two alternatives; either that you should have a very strict examination, which you might make as strict as you please, and admit gentlemen who passed it to the permanent staff, and then, as of course they would all be men of ability, raise them mostly by seniority and pay them from the beginning; or that you should go back to the old system and allow gentlemen to be attached to a mission who should do all the mechanical work?—I do not know whether those two alternatives are not more or less compatible. I should say that the two great desiderata are, on the one hand to secure, or rather to restore, to the executive the most unlimited freedom, not only, I should say, in the selection but also in the use and employment of the instruments it has to work with; and, on the other hand, to provide the taxpayer, out of whose pocket the services are to be paid, with a fair guarantee that the nation shall have a bonâ fide quid pro quo for the money which it expends on the service. In regard to the first of those objects, it seems to me that really, at this moment, the Secretary for Foreign Affairs is in the rather unpleasant position of a carpenter who has to do a great deal of difficult work, and whom you oblige to take tools out of his box and to use them, not in the order in which he requires them, but in the order in which they may happen to lie uppermost; and, as regards the second object, that of giving a guarantee to the nation that it shall be provided with the value of the money spent on the service, I do not think that the present system of examinations is worth much.

5254. Then you would be clearly for increasing the strictness of the examination?—If the examinations were not competitive, but were test examinations, I think that that would be desirable; though I still think that in a service like ours the ultimate test must be responsibility, and the proper ground for promotion, success.

5255. Do you think that, supposing Government were to offer to grant to those members of the Diplomatic Service who have served for 10 years, a moiety of their pensions to retire upon, or a gratuity, many would retire?—If you mean in the minor grades of the service, I think there are a good many who would retire; but I think that the danger in that would be, that you might find the bad men willing to remain on and the good men willing to go; because it is quite obvious that a dull man who feels that he has no probability or chance of making a successful career in any other walk of life at home, has a great advantage in the service, because by the present seniority system you place him practically on an equality with all the clever men in the service as regards promotion, and though it may be slow, it is at least sure to him; whereas with regard to the sort of men whom I should think it most desirable to retain in the service, I mean men whose private means are not too large for ambition, and yet are large enough to represent a fair education and social position, men of the gentry and middle class of the country, who are ambitious of making a career somehow or other in life, and who would probably prefer diplomatic employment to any private profession, if you made it worth their while to remain in diplomacy, but whom you cannot expect to go on drudging upon a paltry salary for many years, with the additional annoyance of seeing their intellectual inferiors appointed to all the high posts, because they happen to be senior in the service, I think that those men will all feel that with the knowledge of mankind which they have acquired abroad, and with their knowledge of foreign languages and trained business habits, and their energy of character, they are pretty sure to find lucrative employment and to make a successful career at home either in connection with commercial companies or in some private profession, the law, literature, or what not; for surely a salary of from 400 l. to 500 l. a year is very much smaller than the income such men could secure from any other investment of brain and labour, by the time they reach middle age; and, therefore, if you retain the present seniority system, and also offer a premium on retirement from the middle ranks of the service, those men would certainly take it. A number of my own colleagues seem to be waiting for the result of the deliberations of this Committee with some anxiety, and, I think them very likely, if no change is effected on that point, even without an inducement in the shape of a gratuity, to leave the service.

5256. Mr. Rylands.] You are quite of opinion, as I understand, that the block which is complained of is a serious detriment to the service?—I think it is decidedly so, because it tends to perpetuate a tone of discouragement and languor in the service, and of course I think that that is a bad thing.

5257. It must necessarily tend to prevent that earnest and intelligent activity in the service which is necessary for the due performance of the duties of the different grades?—Precisely.

5258. I gather also that you would not think that any temporary expedient of buying off a certain number of men would be desirable for the service; and I daresay you would think that it would be sure to give some dissatisfaction outside the service?—Just so; I think that there is a danger there; and also, I must fairly say, that I think it is advisable to deal in some way with this discontent which is caused by what is called the block in the service; but at the same time I think you must put out of your head altogether the notion that you can organise and carry on efficiently a service like diplomacy without disappointing a great number of aspirants. I think that in the Diplomatic Service there must always be the probability of a certain number of people being disappointed, and, therefore, discontented; I do not see how it can be otherwise, because the real fact is that the number of persons whom you absolutely require for the mere mechanical work of the service is greater than the number of highly-paid posts which, under any circumstances, you can appoint them to. I think where many are called and so few can be chosen, you must expect a great amount of disappointment; and all that it can be desirable to undertake is to limit as much as possible the number of persons whose discontent can be fairly said to have any foundation in the non-fulfilment of a pledge or promise upon the part of the State.

5259. No doubt it is the fact that in all services there will be a certain amount of disappointment; yet I gather that in your opinion the present arrangements are such as to create a maximum of disappointment?—Just so.

5260. And you are prepared to consider whether there may not be some means of lessening that maximum of disappointment by bringing the proportion of juniors into a better relation to that of seniors?—Yes.

5261. You are, of course, aware that in the arrangement of the service everything depends upon the proportion of juniors in relation to the seniors?—Precisely.

5262. If the juniors are very numerous, and the senior appointments very few, there must necessarily be great disappointment?—Exactly.

5263. Then I suppose you would think that the course which the Committee should take in viewing this question, is to see whether there are no means for reducing the number of juniors in relation to the senior appointments, and also for giving to the juniors a greater inducement in their future prospects by opening to them the chance of success as the result of their own exertions?—Undoubtedly; I think that is the problem to be solved; you must always have a large number of juniors in the service, and I think that I would have a maximum of unpaid attachés, and only attempt to limit the number of persons to whom the State as it were pledges itself in any sort of way.

5264. Then your idea is, in the first place, that you would have the entrance into the service in the form of unpaid attachéships as formerly?—I think so, as the mere raw material; and that the mere entrance into the service should not, ipso facto, or necessarily imply any intention on the part of the State to keep a man in permanent employ.

5265. But leaving that idea out of the question for the moment, supposing that there were objections to the introduction of a large number of unpaid attachés into the service, do not you think that another plan might be adopted to remove the same

...e evil of the block, in this way: first of all by ...ng the mechanical work in the different large ...sions and embassies to a permanent official, ... by that means reducing the number of secre... ...es?—That comes very much to what I re... ...ed to in speaking of the employment of people ...the capacity of chanceliers. Of course I think ...nust be strictly understood that this would ...only for the mechanical work, and not for the ...tical or confidential work. I certainly do ...nk that this would relieve the strain.

5266. It would reduce the necessity for so ...ge a number of juniors as are on the line of ...motion at present?—Just so.

5267. Would you not consider that the doing ...ay with this transfer of under secretaries of ...ation from one post to another, and making ...m more competent in the post in which they ... placed, would also tend in the same direction ...reducing the necessity for the employment of ...number of under secretaries of legation?—...ll, I think that it would to a certain extent; ... then I think that you must always bear in ...nd what I think is the advisability of not so ...anising the staff of our missions, but what ...h member of the mission should be able to ...are, a moderately frequent amount of permis... ...n to absent himself from the mission. I think ...s very desirable that all classes of the service ...uld occasionally come back to England and ...ibe the ideas of their own country, and not ... permanently estranged from the great public ... of their own country.

5268. Still your idea would be that to a cer... ...n extent it would tend in the same direction? ...So far, I think that it would.

5269. I wish to direct your attention to another ...nt in view of this matter which we are con...ering; do you not think that if the service in ... Foreign Office and that in the Diplomatic ...vice were entirely amalgamated so as to make ... promotion in the two services correspond in ...h a way that a junior in one branch of the ...vice would be in the line of promotion in the ...er, that it would also tend, particularly if ...t promotion depended upon merit, to do away ...h this hopeless feeling which exists at the pre...t time in the profession?—I think that there ...not be a doubt that it would; only I should ... very sorry to express any opinion as to the ...ctical means of carrying that out; I can see ...t there would be very great difficulties in it, ...d, of course, I cannot speak in any way for ... feeling with which such a plan would be ...wed in the Foreign Office itself, for I know ...thing of the feeling of the Foreign Office; but ... course if you amalgamated the two services, ...re would be a larger play of movement in the ...le of the united service. But as I was saying ... other day, I think that it would be necessary, ... you attempted any plan of that kind (which ...ms to me surrounded with many practical ...ficulties), to guard against the possibility of ...ting permanently into the staff of the Foreign ...ice, a second-rate class of diplomatists who do ...t perhaps see their way to advancement in the ...eign service; and, I think, that at present one ... the advantages of the system of the Foreign ...ice is that the men who are in it have no sort ... personal interest whatever for or against the ...vancement of the foreign servants of the State. ...think that that is an advantage which it is ...rth while to bear in mind; but certainly I ...ve always felt very strongly that there would ...be immense advantages, apart from the question of facilitating promotion, in amalgamating the two services, and in fact I think that this is the system with most of the principal continental states. You will generally find that the heads of departments in the Foreign Offices, I think, of France and Austria, are all men who have held high diplomatic appointments abroad, and may do so again, and vice versâ.

5270. You have a natural hesitation in expressing an opinion perhaps on this subject without having thoroughly thought out this question, and I would therefore wish to read to you an opinion of Lord Cowley's, and I will ask you to be good enough to say whether, on the whole, you can concur in that opinion. Lord Cowley, in a despatch to the Foreign Office in 1860, which is published in the Report on the Diplomatic Service, says, "I have made the foregoing remarks on the supposition that the services at home and abroad, now under your Lordship's direction, are to remain distinct; but I must at the same time confess myself to be an advocate for their complete amalgamation. The clerks in Her Majesty's Foreign Office would, I conceive, profit as much from an occasional residence abroad as the secretaries and attachés of Her Majesty's foreign missions would gain by an occasional residence in England. If I saw how this system could be extended to the higher branches of the foreign services, I should equally advocate its application. But if the junior branches of the two services are amalgamated, it stand to reason that those who now enter the Foreign Office with no expectation beyond that of rising to a chief clerkship will be as eligible as any one else to a mission abroad. It seems to me that the chief clerks might be assimilated to secretaries of embassy, the second clerks to secretaries of legation, and the junior clerks to attachés, in one or more ranks, as may be deemed most convenient; and when I say 'assimilated,' I mean that there should be a constant change going on between the home and foreign services. The difficulty in questions of this nature is, to make a beginning; and it seems to that the plan, if adopted, should first be brought into operation in the junior grades, and so be gradually introduced into the upper. That Her Majesty's Diplomatic Service would eventually be improved by it I have not the smallest doubt"?—I entirely agree with every word of that; I have long felt that.

5271. With regard to the disadvantage to which my attention has been directed in your former evidence, the possible disadvantage that naturally struck you was, that the effect of it might be to the danger of the service. In your answer to Question 5083, you say, "For instance, it appears to me that there is this danger, that you might have a very superior class of men in the foreign service feeling a disinclination to give up the great prizes of the foreign service itself, and that then perhaps the second-rate men in the service would be more induced than the others to take posts in the Foreign Office." But I think you will see that there would be no danger in it, if the suggestion of Lord Cowley were carried out, and a chief clerk in the Foreign Office were eligible to be sent to a mission abroad?—Precisely.

5272. If you will just consider my question to you, in relation to a perfect amalgamation as set forth by Lord Cowley, I think you will see that that objection is obviated?—If the amalgamation is complete, and there is a perfect exchangeability between the foreign and home branches of the service, then I think that, of course, that objection is entirely obviated.

5273. I think you will see that the effect of it clearly would be that there would be at all times a sufficient number of good appointments connected with the foreign service (talking of the foreign service as embracing both the Foreign Office service and the Diplomatic Service) in relation to the juniors in the service, to enable the Foreign Secretary to reward zeal and merit, so far as to do away with the hopelessness which now prevails?—I think it would have very much that effect, as far as I can judge at present; and I also think that it would be a considerable advantage to the service at large that that class of public servants, I mean the heads of the different departments in the Foreign Office, who virtually, more or less, furnish instructions to our missions abroad (because no doubt a great mass of the instructions which are sent from the Foreign Office must practically be more or less drawn up by the heads of departments in that office), should have had before they are in that position some personal experience and knowledge of the local conditions under which instructions from home have to be carried out abroad, and some sort of personal experience of foreign statesmen and foreign governments; I think that that would be a very great advantage indeed.

5274. I suppose you would consider that if a gentleman had served in the embassy at Paris, for instance, for some years, he would be found to be exceedingly useful if required in the Foreign Office, to take the position of the chief clerkship of that department to which the French mission belongs?—I have no doubt that he would, because in that case I should presume that he would know all the principal French statesmen, that he would have a very large experience of persons and facts of such a kind as would very often enable you to approach a foreign government in a conciliatory manner, instead of the contrary. Very often, from a want of that sort of particular experience and knowledge, with the best intentions in the world, you may address a man in such a manner as quite unintentionally to offend him.

5275. I understood you to say a short time ago that one danger of the amalgamation of the two branches of the foreign service might be that the appointments to missions abroad might be affected by the circumstance that the officers in the Foreign Office might themselves have a desire to be placed in those positions?—Yes; assuming that the officials in the Foreign Office were men who had been in diplomacy, and who perhaps felt that they were not so likely to get on well in diplomacy as other members of it, and therefore had been more induced than another class of men in diplomacy would be likely to be, to accept permanent appointments in England. But of course that danger, I think, would not arise if the amalgamation were complete; if, for instance, the possibility of exchange was going on continually in this sense, that a man might be at one moment a secretary of embassy abroad, and at another moment the head of a department in England, without at all losing or foregoing his liability to be again employed in the foreign service abroad, and so on; that would obviate the danger.

5276. The line of promotion would be in no sense interfered with if the services were amalgamated; because a man would be in the same line whether he were serving in a particular rank at home or abroad?—Yes; I have always felt very strongly in favour of the plan which you advocate, and which is suggested by Lord Cowley in the passage you have read; only in carrying it out I think you would have to bear in mind that you are not dealing with a tabulâ rasâ; and I have no doubt that in such a matter the inclination of the gentlemen who have now entered into the service of the Foreign Office is a point which demands the very greatest consideration, because a man may have laid out his life in the "home" service of the State in such a manner that he will consider it a great inconvenience to go abroad; he may be a very efficient clerk in the Foreign Office, and perhaps he may not know very much of foreign languages even, except so far as he has learned them for an examination, which is quite distinct from the habit of continually speaking them; and also his pecuniary circumstances may be such that he would consider it a great inconvenience to have to set up an establishment abroad when he has looked forward to living permanently in England, where he has friends and relations, and so forth. I mean that there are a variety of considerations of that kind which will entirely depend upon the temper and feeling and disposition of the men who at this moment compose the staff of the Foreign Office; and I think that they are entitled to consideration, because of course if the change were carried out against the wishes of one whole branch of the service, we could not expect that it would be as efficient as if it secured their cordial co-operation.

5277. That would be, no doubt, a reason why the Secretary of State should not send a man abroad who had fair grounds for staying at home; but it would be no reason why the rank that he held at home should not be assimilated to the rank held by a similar officer abroad?—Certainly not.

5278. You alluded to the fact that members of the foreign diplomatic services occupied a higher position of distinction at home than members of our Diplomatic Service?—Yes, I think that is certainly the case, because, for instance, I think that one cause of the present block in the service is this, that there is really no inducement that I can see to any man who has worked his way up to a high position in the service and who is at this moment, we will say, minister or ambassador abroad, to retire into private life, seeing that he must do it upon a very small pension and exchange a position which has habituated him to a great amount of consideration abroad (because an English ambassador or minister abroad is of course one of the principle personages in the place where he may be, and is on a footing with all the most eminent public men there), for a position, when he returns to England, in which he retains no longer any connection with the public life of his country; and I do not think that he has any sort of social position in England derived from the fact that he has been a minister or ambassador abroad. Then of course his pension is really a very small one; if you compare it to the pensions of lawyers, to the retiring pension of a lord chief justice, for instance, or a lord chancellor, of course, the difference is enormous, and you must suppose that he is a man of high ability ity, and that he has rendered public services he country, otherwise he would not be, or ht not to be, in the position of an ambas-or.

279. With regard to your suggestion in rela- to the matter of patronage, which if we did y with, the rule of seniority would become a y important matter, do you not think that onage should practically depend upon the eign Secretary and the Under Political Se- ary, both of whom should be held to be onsible to the public for the exercise of that onage?—I should say certainly, as a general , it is the Foreign Secretary who has to ad- ister the whole service, and who is respon- e for the success of his work. I would give unlimited freedom with regard to appoint- nts, or "patronage," if you please, but of rse accompanied by all the conditions of great lic responsibility; of course he must feel t his appointments are liable to be challenged, he must be able to defend them.

280. And you think that public opinion would a sufficient safeguard under those circum- nces, in the working of the department?—I nk so; it seems to me so, because it must so iously, I think, be of the greatest importance a Foreign Secretary to get the best men that can, and there are sure, whatever appoint- nts he makes, to be a great number, as I said ore, of discontented people to object to them, l therefore he will always be permanently posed to the necessity of defending the ap- ntments that he has made, if he makes a really bad appointment: in fact, I would go the length of saying, that his freedom in selecting persons for diplomatic employment ought to be so unlimited and so great, that I do not think the service ought to feel aggrieved if on special and particular occasions (when, perhaps, the chief object of the Government may be to convey in the most immediate and impressive manner to some foreign government a correct notion of the precise state of public opinion and feeling in England upon some special question, or the particular relation in which the Government itself stands to the community in regard to that question) the State were to select, instead of a professional diplomatist, some public man in England of eminence, whose position at home might be expected to carry peculiar weight abroad, and who had special qualifications for that particular negotiation from his exceptional personal knowledge of the matter to be treated, or from his personal participation in the sentiment to be represented; and I think that he ought to be able to count in that case upon the co-operation of every member in the service with whom he comes into contact, and that he should not be exposed to any feeling of resentment on their part; but of course such resentment would be justified in every case where it was not clearly apparent on the face of it that an appointment of that kind was really dictated by a consideration of what was best for the immediate interest of the nation, and that it was not a mere political job for the convenience of the Cabinet.

(No. 5.)

REGULATIONS as to Advances on Extraordinaries; Payment of Salaries and Outfits; Allowances to Chargé d'Affaires and Acting Consuls; Constantinople Extraordinaries, 1853 to 1869; Regulations for the Diplomatic Service; Number of Second and Third Secretaries, &c.

Regulation as to Advances on Extraordinaries.

At Constantinople the Ambassador is allowed to draw, I believe, on the old footing, 600 l. in the first, 600 l. in the second, and 1,500 l. in the third.

The heads of certain embassies and missions, where the expenditure is large, are allowed to draw on the chief clerk, at the expiration of each month, a bill for seven-eighths of their expenditure; and other heads of missions, where the expenses are small, are allowed to draw a bill for seven-eighths at the end of the quarter.

In every case the balance due upon the account is paid at the Foreign Office by an order upon the Paymaster General as soon as the account has been examined and passed.

Regulation as to Payment of Diplomatic and Consular Salaries.

Diplomatic and consular salaries are paid quarterly, on the receipt of a life certificate from the person entitled to salary; the amount due to him is ascertained, and an order is drawn by the chief clerk on the Paymaster General, payable to such person or his duly constituted agent.

Regulation as to Outfits.

Diplomatic.—As a general rule the outfit allowance is calculated at the proportion of one-third of the yearly salary. The full outfit is granted to a person on his first appointment as a secretary of legation or of embassy; on his being named for the first time to a mission; on his being appointed for the first time ambassador; or on his being recalled into employment after an interval unemployed of more than eight years' duration. Two-thirds only of the outfit are given in cases of promotion from a secretaryship of legation to a secretaryship of embassy, and from the rank of a resident minister, or minister plenipotentiary, to that of an envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary; and from that of envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary at a mission of the second class to that of an envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary at a mission of the first class; and, lastly, on a person being recalled into employment after an interval of above three and under eight years' duration. One-half of the outfit is given on removal from one secretaryship of legation to another; from one secretaryship of embassy to another; from one place of minister resident or minister plenipotentiary to another; from one place of envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary to another; and from the place of ambassador at one court to the place of ambassador at another court.

Allowances to Chargé d'Affaires.

These allowances are, as the case may be, at the rate of 6 l., 5 l., 4 l., 3 l., and 2 l., a-day.

(See annexed Statement.)

Allowances to Acting Consuls.

If the acting consul be a salaried officer of the Crown, a sum is granted to him equal to one-half of the sum deducted from the consul's salary.

If the acting consul be a paid clerk of the consul, a sum is granted to him equal to two-thirds of the sum deducted from the consul's salary.

If the acting consul be neither a salaried officer of the Crown, nor a paid clerk of the consul, a sum is granted to him for his services equal to the sum deducted from the consul's salary.

Regulations for Her Majesty's Diplomatic Service.

(Revised and confirmed by the Earl of Clarendon, 23 April 1869.)

1. Nomination, qualification, and examination of candidates for attachéships.

THE junior members of the Diplomatic Service must pass two examinations before the Civil Service Commissioners; and at the time of presenting themselves for the first they must have completed the 20th year of their age, and have not exceeded the 26th.

In the first examination, which candidates for attachéships must be prepared to undergo within three months from the date of their nomination, they must satisfy the examiners in regard to the following points:—

1. Orthography.

2. Handwriting.

3. General intelligence.

4. Précis writing.

5. That they are well grounded in Latin Grammar, and are able to construe and parse a portion of some good classical Latin author, and to give the derivation of words.*

6. That they are acquainted with the first four rules of arithmetic and decimal fractions, as given in Colenso's Arithmetic, and with the first book of Euclid.

7. That they have a general knowledge of geography.

8. That they have a general knowledge of French grammar, and can translate correctly from French into English.

9. That they have a general knowledge of German grammar.

10. That they have a general knowledge of the constitutional history of England, to be acquired from Blackstone's "Commentaries" (Ker's Edition, 1862), and Hallam's "Constitutional History of England."

11. That

* Candidates who have passed the first public examination in classics at one of the Universities in Great Britain or Ireland, or at the Royal Academy at Woolwich, or one of the public examinations for the army or navy, will be exempted from being examined in Latin; but candidates claiming this exemption must, on going up for examination, exhibit to the Civil Service Commissioners a certificate from the duly-constituted authorities, examiners, or others, under whom they have been examined, that they have passed the first public examination in classics, in whatever manner that examination may have been conducted, and to whatever point directed.

Appendix, No. 1.

11. That they have a general knowledge of the political history of Europe, and of the United States of North America, from the Treaty of Paris, in 1815, to the Treaty of Villafranca, in 1860, comprising an acquaintance with the most important international transactions during that period.

In the second examination, which must be undergone in the interval between the grant of a commission as third secretary and that of a commission as second secretary, candidates will be exempted from re-examination in the 1st, 2nd, 5th, 6th, 7th, and 10th subjects in which they have passed in their previous examinations; but they must satisfy the examiners in regard to the following points:—

1. General intelligence, as evinced by the manner in which they acquit themselves, and specifically by the quickness they may show in seizing the points in papers read by them, or read over to them, once or twice.

2. Précis writing.

3. That they have a general knowledge of French grammar; that they can converse fluently in that language on ordinary topics; and can translate correctly from English into French, as well as from French into English.

4. That they have a general knowledge of German grammar, and can translate correctly from German into English; or if the candidates, between the first and second examinations, have not resided a reasonable time, twelve months for instance, in Germany they may, if they desire it, substitute in their second examination, for a general knowledge of German grammar and for correct translation from German into English, the same qualifications in some other foreign language besides French.

5. That they have a general knowledge of the political history of Europe, and of the United States of North America, from the Treaty of Versailles in 1783, to the Treaty of Villafranca, in 1860, comprising the most important international transactions during that period.

6. That they have a general knowledge of political economy, to be acquired from Adam Smith's "Wealth of Nations," and Mill's "Political Economy."

7. That they have a general knowledge of Maritime and International Law, to be acquired from Vattel, Wheaton's "Elements of International Law," and the first volume of Kent's "Commentaries."

8. They must satisfy the examiners, by submitting to them a general report on the commerce of the several countries in which they have resided, and on their political relations with other countries, that they are competent to draw up such a report; and they must be prepared to answer any questions put to them by the examiners within the limits of such report.

2. Period of service of attachés.

The services of attachés will reckon from the date of the certificate first granted by the Civil Service Commissioners, and will be considered as probationary for four years from that date, during which period the attachés must have been employed for six months in the Foreign Office, and must also have actually resided at one of Her Majesty's Embassies or Missions abroad, or have been actually employed in the Foreign Office for such a time as in the aggregate will make up a further period of three years. If these conditions as to employment and residence have not been fulfilled at the expiration of four years from the date of the certificate of the Civil Service Commissioners of their having passed the first examination, the probationary period will be prolonged until they have been fulfilled.

3. Commissions as third secretaries to be granted to attachés on completion of their probation.

Commissions as third secretaries under Her Majesty's Sign Manual, will be granted to attachés, on the termination of the probationary period, and on the fulfilment of the conditions specified in the present regulations, together with a salary at the rate of 150 l. a year; provided that the Minister under whom they have last served certifies that their general character and good conduct, during the time they have so served, have been satisfactory; and that, as far as such Minister has the means of forming an opinion, they understand and speak French well, and also one other foreign language.

4. A salary of 150 l. a-year will be granted, contingently, to attachés on completion of their probation.

Second secretaries will constitute an intermediate class between third secretaries and secretaries of Legation.

The Secretary of State will assign to each embassy or mission such a number of secretaries of the second and third classes as he may deem fit; it being always understood that secretaries of these two classes may be named indiscriminately to either an embassy or mission, without reference to their previous employment in one or other of them. They are to be designated as third or second secretary in the specific embassy or mission in which they may at that time be employed, but not as third or second secretary of Embassy or Legation.

5. Number of second secretaries.

The number of second secretaries is restricted to the number of first and second paid attachés in the service on the 15th of September 1862. Their salaries will be issued according to the scale established for the particular embassy or mission in which they may be actually serving, without reference to any previous amount of salary they may have received.

6. Rules as to pensions of the fourth class.

In virtue of Her Majesty's Commissions, the service of second and third secretaries will will count for their pensions, under the Act of 2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 116, from the date of the issue of their first commission; but the amount of pension to be assigned to them will be calculated, so long as they are eligible for a pension of the fourth class only, for each year that has elapsed since the date of their first commission at one-thirtieth part of the last salary of which they were in receipt at the time of the pension being granted; provided that no pension shall continue to be issued to a person not incapacitated by ill-health, medically certified, who may decline active service before he has reached the sixtieth year of his age, after which age no person shall be required to serve as second or third secretary.

7. Provision for the transfer of the junior members of the Diplomatic Service from one post to another; and payment of their expenses of removal.

Second or third secretaries, and attachés, as a general rule, will not be employed for more than two years, exclusive of the periods during which they may have been absent on leave, in the same embassy or mission, unless for special public reasons. Secretaries of embassy or legation, second and third secretaries, and attachés, will on their first appointment, or on any subsequent removal by reason of promotion or otherwise on public grounds, receive such an allowance as shall be sufficient to cover the actual expense of their personal journey by land, or the actual amount paid for their personal passage by sea, either from England to their post, or from one foreign post to another; and in the case of secretaries of embassy or legation, and of second secretaries, a similar allowance for one servant, if they have one; but no allowance will be made for the expense of the journey or subsistence of the families of any such secretaries or attachés. In the case of a mere change of post, not carrying with it increase of salary, an allowance of 1 l. a day, as subsistence money during a journey by land, will be given for each day actually employed in travelling by the direct road. In the event of a passage being afforded to secretaries or attachés on board of one of Her Majesty's ships of war, the allowance made will be in conformity with the Admiralty regulations.

No allowance will be made to the junior members of the Diplomatic Service for journeys undertaken for their own convenience, in pursuance of leave of absence; but in all such cases the expense of the journeys from and on returning to their post will be exclusively at their own charge.

It is understood, moreover, that in the case of any journey of which the expense is to be allowed, secretaries or attachés, unless specially excused from doing so, will be bound to take charge of despatches if required; and in that case they will be expected to perform the journey without delaying on the road.

8. Interchange of employment between second and third secretaries, and junior clerks in the Foreign Office.

The Secretary of State will, should he see occasion, for the advantage of the public service, allow second and third secretaries, and attachés to interchange for a time their duties with clerks of the three junior classes in the Foreign Office; the several parties being bound, for the whole period through which the interchange extends, in every respect to perform the duties and to submit to the obligations attaching to the situation which they may temporarily occupy.

The Secretary of State will, moreover, if he sees reason to do so, direct such temporary interchange of duties to be made, irrespective of the wishes of the parties, between second or third secretaries or attachés and clerks in the Foreign Office; or he will direct such persons to be employed for a time, at home or abroad, without any interchange, making in either case such an allowance to the parties as he may consider just and reasonable. In the event of any attaché being so employed in the Foreign Office, the period over and above the six months which are obligatory, as stated in section 2, during which he shall be actually employed in the Foreign Office, shall reckon towards the three years during which he is by these regulations to reside at an embassy or mission abroad.

In the case of temporary interchanges between secretaries and clerks, they will respectively rank, in the embassy or mission, and Foreign Office, as the case may be, during the period for which the interchange shall last, after the junior in the class of secretaries or clerks to which either of them belongs.

If a clerk in the Foreign Office should be permanently transferred to the Diplomatic Service, or should be temporarily employed with a special, or with an ordinary embassy or mission, he will receive a commission or an acting appointment, as the case may be, as secretary of the second or third class.

A first-class junior clerk who has acquired a standing in the office which qualifies him to act as assistant clerk will receive an acting commission as second secretary; and a second or third-class junior clerk will receive an acting commission as third secretary.

9. Deductions to be made from salaries of heads of missions on leave of absence.

With a view to relieve heads of missions on leave of absence on private grounds, the deduction to be made from their salaries will in future be limited, for a period not exceeding 60 days from the date of their departure from their posts, to the sum required to provide for the allowances of the Acting Chargé d'Affaires according to the present regulations; on the expiration of which period the deduction will be at the rate of one-half of their salaries. Such period of 60 days may either be one of 60 consecutive days, or of 60 days occurring at intervals in the course of one year beginning on the 1st of January and ending on the 31st December.

10. Allowances during war or interruption of relations.

Should an Ambassador, Minister, or Secretary, by reason of war or other interruption of Diplomatic relations, be withdrawn from active service before his services shall have qualified him for a Diplomatic pension of the class under which he would otherwise come, the Secretary of State will, as he may see fit, assign to any such person who cannot otherwise be immediately employed, and during any period not exceeding the continuance of such war or interruption of Diplomatic relations, a temporary allowance calculated on the rate of pension assigned to the class to which he belongs, regard being had to the length and general character of his services; such allowance being, however, strictly subject to the condition in regard to employment specified in the 7th section of the Act 2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 116.

Foreign Office, 23 April 1869.

Number of Second and Third Secretaries and Attachés in 1869, and Attachés in 1861.

In 1869, the number of second (34), and third secretaries (13), and attachés (17), was 64.

In 1861, the number of attachés (paid 39, and unpaid 42) was 81 (not including five temporary attachés).

Consular Fees.

At the expiration of each quarter, the Consuls who levy fees on Government account, transmit to the Secretary of State a certified statement of the gross amount of all fees collected at their Consulates during the quarter, and remit bills for the same.

Paymaster General's Office,
14 March 1870.

J. P. Collier.

French Diplomatic Service.

The number of first, second, and third secretaries and attachés is fixed by Imperial decree as follows:—

14 secretaries of the first class.
24 „ „ second class.
24 „ „ third class.
36 attachés.

It is important to remember that the three classes of secretaries in the French service do not correspond to the three classes of secretaries in the English service. In the French service many secretaries of the second class, and even of the third, occupy a position corresponding to that held by our secretaries of legation.

There is only one conseiller d'ambassade.

Besides secretaries and attachés, there are 25 chanceliers, making the total number of persons

Appendix, No 2. persons employed in embassies and legations (not counting heads of missions) 124, against 89 in our service, thus:—

There is a general instruction to members of the diplomatic service to report upon any matter which may appear to require it, but in practice reports are very rarely made except under special instructions.

Note.—Four secretaries of legation are not attached to any mission, but are employed independently; viz., Mr. Barnard, Mr. Russell, Mr. Burnley, and Mr. Morier.

Two vacancies among the second secretaries will shortly be filled up by the promotion of two third secretaries.

Property and Social Qualifications for Appointments in the Diplomatic Service of certain Foreign Countries.

French Service.—An attaché must have private means to the amount of 240 l. a year, at the least.

Austrian Service.—A candidate for admission into the Austrian diplomatic service must be a person fitted by education to move in the higher classes of society, and must have either sufficient means, or else such an allowance from his parents as to enable him to serve several years without pay at foreign missions.

Frankfort.—In Continental countries a decided preference is shown by all Governments for employing in this grade of the profession (attachés) young men of some definite rank or position, and there is no use disguising the fact that the want of these adjuncts acts as a virtual disqualification; and where, as occasionally happens, persons of inferior birth are employed, they meet with mortifications discouraging to young men seeking entrance into the first ranks of foreign society.

Netherlands.—The Minister for Foreign Affairs reserves to himself the right of judging whether the candidate is, by his social position and fortune, well adapted for the service.

Russia.—The diplomatic service is recruited from the classes eligible for the civil service generally, but in cases of diplomatic appointments preference is practically given to those who have private means sufficient to render them to some degree independent of the emoluments attached to their official position.

Italian Service.—A candidate for admission into the diplomatic service must furnish proof of his possessing a yearly income of not less than 320 l. a year.

Bavaria.—As the salary paid to diplomatic servants is altogether insufficient to enable them to maintain a proper social position, it is usually sought to supply the deficiency by nominating persons of independent means. This applies equally to the diplomatic appointments of all the minor German States. This branch of the service is most frequently recruited from the ranks of the aristocracy, to whom, with the exception of the army, diplomacy is the only public career left open.

Belgium.—The conditions on which persons are admitted to the diplomatic service are not determined by any regulations. Applications for admission are addressed to the Foreign Minister, who, in deciding upon them, chiefly takes into consideration the social position, character, and conduct of the applicants.

No property qualification is required, but the Department of Foreign Affairs takes care that only persons having the requisite means shall enter the service.

Denmark.—There are no fixed regulations for the admission of candidates into the diplomatic service. They have almost always received an university education, and have generally passed examinations in law and the political sciences. As there is no salary in the lower branches they must have independent means.

Prussia.

Prussia.—Candidates for the Prussian diplomatic service are chosen by the Foreign Minister. Educational tests are required. Nothing is said as to fortune or social position, but an attaché receives no salary for the first year of his service.

Spain.—All classes of society, even the most elevated, have always had the option in Spain of entering public life; as, however, the diplomatic career requires a literary education, and entails certain expenses, it is generally only adopted by persons belonging to the middle class and to the aristocracy. No salary is payable on first appointment.

United States.—No qualifications are necessary to enter the diplomatic service, either as regards fortune, social position, or education.

Portugal.—Candidates for the diplomatic service must possess an income of 177 l. a year.

PROPORTION between Heads of Embassies and Missions, and Second and Third Secretaries and Attachés, in the Years 1861 and 1870.

IN the year 1861 the number of embassies was four, and the number of missions 25; of the latter, five have since been abolished, and with them five secretaryships of legation; one mission has been converted into an embassy, and the secretary of legation made secretary of embassy.

In the year 1861 the number of paid and unpaid attachés, the former being now represented by second and third secretaries, was 81, which distributed between four embassies and 23 missions (two of the whole number of the missions having none of either class), provided less in the aggregate for each mission and embassy than three each.

In the year 1870 the number of second and third secretaries and attachés in 1861, which distributed between five embassies and 17 missions (two of the latter having none of either class), also provide less than three each.

In fact, the proportion between the junior members of these classes and the heads of missions is, in 1870, somewhat less than it was in 1861.

The block in the profession now existing arises not from its being over-manned, but from the abolition of five missions, and five secretaryships of legation, by which the prospect of promotion for the junior member is diminished by 10.

The number of attachés appointed since the 1st of January was eight; five of them were required to fill up vacancies, and three to make up the number of junior members of the diplomatic service, absolutely required for the work of the several embassies and missions.

LETTER from the Under Secretary, Foreign Office, to the Secretary to the Treasury.

Sir, Foreign Office, 26 January 1870.

Dated 26 January 1870.

I AM directed by the Earl of Clarendon to request that you will acquaint the Lords Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury that, from the 30th of November next, no clerk or other person in the Foreign Office will be allowed to act as private agent for any of Her Majesty's diplomatic or consular servants; his Lordship does not think it for the benefit of the public service, or for the interests of the diplomatic or consular servants of the Crown, or of the members of this office who have acted as agents, that a controversy such as has been carried on for some time past as to the merits or demerits of the present system should any longer be continued.

Lord Clarendon has come to this decision with much regret, as injuriously affecting the interests, not only of the agents themselves, but of Her Majesty's diplomatic and consular servants generally, for the result of a reference which was made to the latter, shows that, with very few exceptions, there is no desire, but, on the contrary, a general feeling of regret on their part, that a system should be abolished which had contributed very greatly to their personal convenience, which cost the public nothing to maintain, and which did not lead to the abuse which has been erroneously imputed to it of enabling the agents to exercise influence on appointments or promotions to the advantage or prejudice of members of either service.

But as the system must nevertheless be put an end to, it is necessary to make arrangements to ensure the punctual payment, after it has ceased, of the salaries of Her Majesty's diplomatic and consular servants.

Some of these gentlemen will doubtless obtain their salaries by giving powers of attorney to their bankers or agents unconnected with the office, but in numerous cases probably, especially where the salaries are of small amount, this resource may not be open to others.

It is of course important on every ground that the salaries should be received by the parties entitled to them as soon as possible after they become due, and the only means of providing for this in the case of persons who from any cause may not be able to draw their salaries under power of attorney, appears to Lord Clarendon to consist in allowing such parties to draw on the chief clerk of this office for the amount of salary nominally due to them on each quarter day, leaving for adjustment in the following quarter any excess or deficiency in the amount which they may be entitled to draw, and which can only be adjusted in this office.

If this suggestion meets with the concurrence of the Board of Treasury, Lord Clarendon will endeavour to carry it into effect, though it may be attended with considerable difficulty.

Lord Clarendon directs me at the same time to request you to bring under the consideration of the Lords of the Treasury, another point connected with the abolition of Foreign Office agencies.

Her Majesty's diplomatic and consular servants have heretofore been allowed to send and receive their correspondence under the seal of office. The privilege has been very valuable to them, among other reasons, for the security which the official seal extends to their correspondence. The Foreign Office agents have done what was requisite in this respect on behalf of the persons for whom they acted, but when the agencies are abolished there will be no person in the office to take their place.

Lord Clarendon would very much regret, and consider it a great hardship, if a privilege which they have hitherto enjoyed should be withdrawn from Her Majesty's diplomatic and consular servants, and he therefore submits to the Treasury that an arrangement might be made with their concurrence to relieve them from such a hardship. This Lord Clarendon considers might be done by appointing two persons, for two would be required, not actually clerks in the office, but who would still be under official control, so that abuse would be guarded against, to take charge of the forwarding of the private correspondence of Her Majesty's diplomatic and consular servants, and his Lordship thinks that a satisfactory arrangement might be made which would meet the requirements of the case for a sum not exceeding 300*l.* a year, and he requests the assent of the Treasury to such an arrangement.

Lord Clarendon would have been very glad if, on the abolition of the agencies in this office, he could have undertaken formally to recommend to the Lords of the Treasury to make some reasonable compensation to those clerks in this office who have been engaged in them, and who will henceforth be deprived of very considerable emoluments.

The late Board of Treasury, in reply to Lord Stanley's letter of the 17th February 1868, recommending that liberal compensation should be made to the agents if the system were put an end to, expressed their objection to granting such compensation as a charge on public funds, suggesting at the same time as a preferable course that the system should be gradually abolished.

Lord Clarendon, however, concurs with his predecessor in the opinion that this suggestion would provide a very insufficient and dilatory course for carrying that object into effect; but whatever Lord Clarendon's own feelings are in regard to the claims of the agents to compensation, he is reluctant under the circumstances to press the point on the present Board of Treasury. Nevertheless he feels it due to persons connected with this office, and in whom, as Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, he takes a warm interest, to express his decided opinion that such compensation is fairly due to them, and cannot be withheld on any ground of justice, or without setting aside the deliberate opinion of the House of Commons and of the Board of Treasury in analogous cases in which compensation has been admitted to be due. Lord Clarendon does not hesitate to lay before the Lords of the Treasury, and to invite their attentive consideration to, a statement which has been addressed to him by the agents, setting forth the precedents on which they rely in support of their claim for compensation, and his Lordship cannot doubt that if this statement were brought to the notice of the House of Commons, which is always just and generous to persons whose offices are to be abolished, that House would admit the identity of the claim of the Foreign Office clerks of 1870 with that of the clerks of the House of Commons in 1835, and show to the former the same measure of liberality which they recognised and insisted upon as justly due to the latter.

to

I am, &c.

The Secretary to the Treasury. (signed) E. Hammond.

MEMORANDUM by the Foreign Office Agents in support of their Claim to Compensation on the threatened Abolition of the existing Agency System. See also, "Statement respecting Foreign Office Agencies," presented to Parliament in 1868.

Now that the scheme proposed for the introduction of a new agency system by the retirement of Mr. Staveley from this office, and the acceptance by him of the position of sole unofficial agent for the diplomatic and consular corps, has been found to be impracticable, the Earl of Clarendon will no doubt at once proceed to consider what other substitute can be provided in the interest of the diplomatic and consular corps for the present system, which is about to be abolished.

The agents have no desire whatever that the existing system should be prolonged one single day beyond that which is absolutely necessary for the introduction of the new system, whatever it may be; but they would beg to be allowed to recapitulate to his Lordship the grounds upon which they base their claim to compensation for the very heavy losses which they must otherwise inevitably sustain whenever the old system, whatever substitute may be provided for it, shall be abolished, and they are, from that day forth, prohibited from acting any longer as private agents.

In the first place, they believe that it is without precedent in the history of the proceedings of Parliament or the Treasury to abolish a system which has been recognised by Order in Council and by Parliament, or even permitted by long-established usage, in order to effect changes held to be for the public good, or with a view to the more efficient working of any particular public department, without granting reasonable and just compensation to those who would, or who even might be expected to, suffer in a pecuniary point of view by such changes.

This principle has been so clearly admitted by the House of Commons to be the rule which has invariably governed them in their decisions on all cases of this nature, that the agents feel that they need only refer to one or two instances of this kind, and those of recent date, to establish this assertion. Before, however, they proceed to do so, they would wish to call special attention to the fact stated in the Paper which they prepared on the 24th of January 1868, that in addition to long-established usage, the permission for the clerks in the Foreign Office to act as agents to ministers and consuls abroad was distinctly recognised by an Order in Council, dated 27th February 1795, which has never been repealed so far as relates to such permission, and is therefore still in force. Such permission is indeed taken for granted in the Regulations for agents to ministers abroad framed by Lord Castlereagh in 1816, which further sanctioned and countenanced the system.

Laid before Parliament, 5 March 1868.

The cases to which the agents would beg to be allowed to refer as precedents which should govern their case are:—

1. That of the Clerks of the House of Commons who, up to the year 1836, were permitted to act as "private agents" for soliciting and passing Bills through Parliament.

In 1833 a Committee of the House of Commons was appointed to inquire into the "fees, salaries, and emoluments received by officers and public servants of that House, and the fees, charges, and expenses of passing Bills through Parliament," and the question of the employment of the officers of the House in private Parliamentary business, or, as they were called in subsequent Reports, "private agents," was fully inquired into by that Committee.

Commons Paper, 1833, vol. 12, pp. 181. 187. 190. No. 648, pp. 9. 12.

In August of that year they made their Report to the House, and in doing so they stated that "if in the course of their Report they had appeared to reflect upon any of the emoluments derived, as it appeared to the Committee, from improper sources, and in improper modes, they desired that it might be considered that they disapproved of the system, and not of the conduct of individuals who had succeeded to offices in which the same line of conduct had been pursued;" and further that, "in taking into consideration the different offices, and the salaries and emoluments attached to them, the Committee felt themselves bound, in justice and fairness to a very laborious and meritorious body of clerks, and by the rule recognised in numerous instances by the House, and observed in all public departments, on the abolition or regulation of any office, to pay due regard to existing interests," and although they recommend an immediate and general revision and alteration both of the offices and emoluments attached to them, they stated that they did so " with the full intention that such compensation should be made to the persons who might be thereby affected as might be consistent with the circumstances of each individual case."

Ibid.

Appendix, No. 2.

Commons, 1835, vol. 18, pp. 397. 399. No. 606.

In 1835 another Committee sat on the same subject, which suggested further changes, and also recommended that no clerk or officer of the House should be permitted to act in future as agent for Private Bills.

In the following year a Select Committee was specially appointed to report on the question of the amount of compensation to be granted to those officers of the House of Commons who would be affected by the carrying out of the changes recommended by the Committees of 1833 and 1835.

Commons, 1836, vol. 21, p. 79.

In May 1836 this Committee delivered in their Report, and with reference to the case of those clerks "having business as agents for soliciting Private Bills," and others who received fees and emoluments in addition to their salary, they passed the following Resolution: " That under the particular circumstances of the case the present holders of office should suffer no diminution of income in respect of salaries hitherto received by authority, of gratuities paid by Members, and of fees legally collected, but that the compensation to be granted on this principle should be paid so long only as those officers, severally, should continue to discharge the duties of their office."

Commons, 1836, vol. 21, p. 90. No. 249, p. 19.

The following statement on the part of the officers and clerks of the House of Commons " engaged in soliciting Private Bills," or in other words, " private agents," which was annexed to this Report, is given hereunder, as showing how nearly, in many particulars, their case resembled that of the Foreign Office agents.

" The clerks of the House have enjoyed the privilege of soliciting Private Bills time immemorial. Mr. Dorington's father practised previous to 1780, and his son has carried on the business since his death, a period altogether of more than 56 years.

" Committees have repeatedly inquired into the offices of the House, but never expressed any opinion adverse to the practice; but the Committee of 1833 determined that it ought to cease with the lives of the then possessors.

" Those who practised then, imagined they might securely calculate on the permanence of their employment; and though they could not pretend to any vested interest, still conceived they might plead a prescriptive right, and, after 1833, a recognised possession.

" The Committee of last Session reported against the custom, on the ground that it might interfere with some of the arrangements they recommended, though the Report distinctly admits that no complaint had been made against the practice.

" The Committee ultimately recommended that compensation should be given for the loss of office to those clerks who thought fit to resign, and it is hoped the Committee will now be pleased to determine the amount of compensation to which they will be entitled, in case they should resign their offices, as at present they cannot ascertain with precision the amount of compensation which would probably be granted them.

" The clerks submit to the Committee, that when, from no blame imputable to them, the public service is conceived to require an important change, it is hardly consistent with any principle of equity that they should be made the sufferers; and the Committee cannot but be aware that, however liberal the compensation may be on this compulsory resignation of office, still the loss sustained must be great, especially to those clerks who might ultimately have expected to be promoted, and arrive at the head of their respective offices.

" The mode of compensation, directed by the Committee of last Session, will compel many of the clerks to quit the service of the House, who would be most happy to remain, if, in lieu of receiving a compensation for loss of office, they could obtain it for their private business.

" The objection to this may appear to be the large amount, but if the compensation is confined to those of the clerks who are actually engaged in transacting the business of the House, it will not amount to a larger sum than that which would be required to make compensation for loss of office, as already proposed by the Committee of 1835."

1836, vol. 21, p. 7. 9. No. 249, p. 1.

The recommendation of the Committee of 1835 was, in consequence of this representation, practically set aside, and the recommendation of the Committee of 1836 adopted; consequently, the private agents were not called upon " to make the choice recommended by the House, either to discontinue their private agencies, or to surrender their public offices;" but they were allowed to retain their official appointments, and at the same time receive full compensation for the loss of their private agencies.

2. The next case is that of the agencies formerly held by clerks in the Colonial Office, which were abolished in 1830. The agents do not propose to quote this case as being a precedent precisely similar to their own; still the fact should not be lost sight of, that the two systems only differed in this respect, that, in the case of the Colonial Office, the agencies were official appointments held by certain clerks in that office, together with their clerkships;

clerkships; whereas the Foreign Office agencies are private agencies, carried on by clerks in the Foreign Office, together with their Government appointments, under the permission of an Order in Council; openly and "officially sanctioned by many successive Governments;" and with the full knowledge of Parliament. Appendix, No. 2. To Treasury, 20 March 1854.

But although the agents do not desire to quote this case as an exact precedent, they cannot refrain from drawing attention to the fact that, when those agencies were abolished, the Committee, which sat at the Colonial Office, expressed their opinion that it would be in the "highest degree unjust to withhold most ample compensation from these agents;" and they were, in consequence, most liberally dealt with.

It is also well worthy of remark, that the Committee, which sat at the Treasury in 1836, to inquire into the fees, emoluments, &c., of public offices, in recommending the abolition of the Foreign Office agencies, alluded to the fact that "the practice had already been abolished in some public offices" (referring, no doubt, to the case of the Colonial Office, and perhaps to the House of Commons, as precedents); and submitted that "the interests of individuals, which might be affected by a compliance with their recommendation, should be duly considered" (as they had been at the Colonial Office and House of Commons), and "that any arrangements consequent on the abolition of fees should be facilitated by the granting of due compensation." Commons, 1837, No. 162, p. 19.

3. The case of the proctors.

In 1857, Acts of Parliament were passed "to Amend the Law relating to Probates and Letters of Administration in England and Ireland"; and, as it was thought that the "fees and emoluments of the persons then practising as proctors might be damaged by the abolition of the exclusive rights and privileges which they had hitherto enjoyed," the Treasury were authorised to award to each proctor a sum of money, or annual payment, during the term of his natural life, equal, on an average of five years, to one-half of the net profits he had previously received, and under these Acts large sums are still paid annually by way of compensation. 20 & 21 Vict. c. 77, s. 105; c. 79, s. 112, 25 August 1857.

Other precedents could be quoted by the agents in support of what they firmly believe to be their just claim to a like consideration, but they feel that nothing that they could quote from the records of Parliament could possibly show more clearly and forcibly the liberal views which have invariably been entertained by Parliament in every instance in which the force of circumstances has rendered a change necessary for the public good which has materially affected the pecuniary interests of parties, whether public servants or private individuals; and as the system which has existed so long must very shortly be terminated, the agents trust that in devising some new scheme in lieu of the present one, their claim for compensation may be reconsidered, and in the same fair and liberal spirit which has hitherto guided the House of Commons and the Treasury in dealing with such cases. Finance Accounts for 1862, p. 55.

But the Treasury would appear themselves to have admitted, at least by implication, that it would be unjust to abolish such agencies without compensation, for they suggested, in their letter of the 13th of May 1868, when refusing to grant compensation, "whether the preferable course would not be gradually to abolish the agencies by prohibiting the appointment of any new agents, and, at the same time, directing that the present agents should not undertake any new duties of this nature;" and so far as the agents are aware (for they have only heard it indirectly, no decision having been communicated to them officially), the only ground upon which the Treasury have hitherto refused to grant compensation, has been that the Commissioners who were appointed in 1786 to inquire into "fees, gratuities, perquisites, and emoluments of public offices," expressed an opinion adverse to the agency system. Laid before Parliament, 1868.

This opinion, however, which was expressed on an imperfect knowledge of the facts of the case, was not concurred in by the three Secretaries of State, who were subsequently appointed to inquire more fully into the question, and who, so far from ratifying that opinion, on the contrary pronounced judgment against it, and it was consequently set aside entirely by the Order in Council of 1795, which "approved and confirmed" the new regulations drawn up by the three Secretaries of State for the management of their respective offices, which regulations did not disturb the agency system as it then existed, and had existed previously from time immemorial; in the same manner as the recommendation of the Committee of 1835, which sat on the question of fees and emoluments in the House of Commons offices, was not concurred in, but set aside by the Committee of 1836.

Moreover, the Committee appointed by the Treasury to "inquire into the fees, gratuities, perquisites, and emoluments of public offices," in their Report, dated the 18th of February 1837, stated that it was manifest that the objections which had been urged against the agency system by the Committee of 1786 had been obviated by the salutary regulations then in force, and the agents, therefore, naturally feel that it is stretching a point manifestly to their disadvantage to quote such objections, expressed more than 83 years ago, and to ground thereupon a refusal to grant them compensation; and this, notwithstanding the fact that the Committees of the House of Commons which sat on the Consular Service in 1858, and on the Diplomatic Service in 1861, although they went very fully into the question, failed on either occasion to pronounce an opinion adverse to the agency system; but on the contrary, in the case of the Consular Committee, actually negatived, without a division, a condemnatory clause in the Draft Report which was proposed by a Member of the Committee, but which was not even seconded; and moreover, in total disregard of the weighty opinions expressed by various eminent Statesmen, Secretaries of State, Members of Parliament, Secretaries of the Treasury, and others who have borne testimony to the highly satis- Commons, 1837, No. 162, p. 19.

Appendix, No. 2.

factory manner in which the agents have invariably conducted their responsible business, and discharged their duties, not only to the great advantage of the diplomatic and consular services, but also to the convenience and advantage of the public service, and some of whom have not hesitated to exclaim against the "injustice" which it would be towards the present agents to abolish a system in which they "might justly be considered to have a vested interest derived from long-established usage and official sanction," without granting them, if not full, at least "fair and just" compensation.

To Treasury, 20 March 1854.

To Treasury, 16 May 1868, Memorandum, Lord Stanley, 24 June 1868.

As these opinions would appear to have been overlooked at the Treasury (for the agents feel sure that they have not been intentionally disregarded), they conceive it to be a duty they owe to themselves and to the memory of their predecessors, to reproduce the few following extracts from the "Statement" they submitted to Lord Stanley on the 24th of January 1868, and to which they have already referred.

Mr. Backhouse, late Under Secretary of State, expressed his opinion that "if the abolition of the agencies did not lead to the establishment of a paid agency at the charge of the public, it would at least be attended with expense in satisfying the just claims of the present authorised agents to compensation for their loss."

Mr. Addington, late Under Secretary of State, recorded his opinion in the following words :—

"Supposing it were determined to abolish the agency, such as it at present exists, I cannot conceive that there can be two opinions as to the justice of making full compensation to those who have hitherto carried it on with the sanction of the Secretaries of State and the Government."

Sir Charles Trevelyan and Sir William Craig, when at the Treasury, declared that "they would not recommend any change unless they were satisfied that the parties interested would receive just compensation for any advantage they now enjoyed."

Mr. Hammond, as Under Secretary of State, stated before the Consular Committee of 1858, that "if the practice were abolished to-morrow, he thought, considering the length of time the agents had been allowed to practice as agents, that the Government would be bound to make compensation to them on the abolition of the practice," and that "it would be unfair to deprive them of their vested interests in this sort of work without adequate compensation."

To Treasury, 17 February 1868.

Lord Stanley, when Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, in proposing the eventual abolition of the existing system, declared the agents to be entitled to "liberal compensation;" and Lord Clarendon has never ceased to urge upon the Treasury the justice, in the event of the agencies being "compulsorily abolished on public grounds," of granting most liberal compensation to the present agents.

To Treasury, 20 March 1854.

On the grounds, then, of long-existing usage; of official recognition by successive Governments, by Order in Council, and by Parliament; and of the precedents which the agents have quoted as to the liberal course invariably adopted by Parliament in other cases similar to their own, and which liberal treatment they cannot believe that Parliament would deny to them, they once more earnestly appeal to Lord Clarendon to use his kind and powerful support with Her Majesty's Government to induce them to recognise that which has never until now been denied, but which has hitherto invariably been recognised by statesmen of all parties, namely, their just claim to liberal compensation whenever it shall please Her Majesty's Government to order the present agency system to be finally abolished.

PAPERS handed in by the Earl of Malmesbury, 21 March 1870.

MEMORANDUM of Claims to Leave for Two Months Annually, without Deduction of Pay.

HER Majesty's Ministers abroad are allowed no leave of absence without a deduction being made from their salaries. Their position in this respect however is somewhat better than it formerly was.

Previous to the Committee appointed by the House of Commons to inquire into the Diplomatic Service, Ministers lost half their salary from the day of leaving their posts to the day of their return. Under the regulations established after the sitting of the Committee, Ministers are now allowed 60 days' leave of absence in each year, subject to the deduction from their salaries of the extra allowance granted to the Secretary of Legation who acts as Chargé d'Affaires during the Minister's absence. But after the expiration of the 60 days the Minister is placed upon half salary. A Minister is not allowed to cumulate his leave of absence. Thus, for instance, if a Minister takes no leave in one year, he is not allowed to take two years' leave in the next, although this is permitted to the junior members of the profession. The prohibition of cumulating leave of absence is a source of very great inconvenience to the occupants of distant posts, from whence several days' travelling to reach England are required.

The Committee of the House of Commons stated in their Report that they "regard it as desirable that the great impediments in the way of Ministers returning home for a short period are of injurious effect, and that it is well that men in high Diplomatic stations should from time to time be enabled to observe for themselves the condition of affairs and the course of public opinion in their own country."

These impediments have however been but partially removed, and the actual system amounts almost to excluding the heads of missions who have families and small private incomes from taking any leave of absence whatever, for no diminution can be effected in their establishment during the short space of 60 days, and they have their travelling expenses besides. These cannot afford to take their leave under such conditions and never see England for years.

Her Majesty's Ministers abroad are the only class of servants under the Crown, whether civil or military, who are not allowed a certain period of repose and relaxation without its entailing upon them a pecuniary sacrifice; but it might be supposed that they of all others were the most entitled to it, in consequence of the constant separation from their country, relations, and friends which is imposed upon them by the nature of the profession in which they are employed.

If two months' leave were allowed to each Ambassador and Minister without deduction from their salary, the expense to the country would be as near as possible (supposing each head of mission availed himself of the privilege every year) 5,100 l., but more than double this sum has been saved to the country by the suppression of various missions during the last 10 years. But in my opinion half this sum would be a sufficient remuneration for the Secretaries of Legation, whilst locum tenentes.

Ambassadors and Ministers should have the faculty of cumulating two years' leave in one, subject of course as they always would be to the orders of the Secretary of State to return to their posts immediately, should he be of opinion that the public service required their presence there. If the two months were exceeded, a deduction of half salary immediately to commence.

The abolition of the present system of taxing Foreign Ministers on leave of absence would encourage the objects recommended by the Committee, and would be a certain compensation to them for their increased outlay, and at the same time be an act of justice which would place them on a footing of equality with other public servants.

Malmesbury.

EXTRACT

Appendix, No. 5.

Extract of Report of Committee of the House of Commons on the Diplomatic Service, 1861.

The new Regulation respecting the leave of absence of Secretaries from their posts appears to be satisfactory, and their extension generally throughout the Service would allay much discontent that is expressed at the present difficulty of returning home for short periods. The Chargé d'Affaires, however, although for so short a period he need not make any notable change in his manner of life, is liable to certain charges which it would be unjust not to defray. A fourth or sixth of the salary might fairly be transferred to the Chargé d'Affaires during the absence of his Chief, and it should be understood that this allowance is made to him to be spent in representation or other public objects.

Where the absence is postponed, the proportion enjoyed by the Chargé d'Affaires must be increased, and there seems no reason to alter the present rules in this respect, which results in a saving to the public.

He does not spend a shilling in representation, but lives as before.—M.

Whenever a Minister is on leave, your Committee regard it as desirable that the great impediments in the way of Ministers returning home for a short period are of injurious effect, and that it is well that men in high diplomatic stations should from time to time be enabled to observe for themselves the condition of affairs and the course of public opinion in their own country.

The greatest being the fine put upon them for doing so. —M.

PAPER handed in by Mr. Hammond, 28 March 1870.

It was formerly the custom, on the appointment of an Ambassador or Minister, to make him a grant of money to enable him to provide himself with a service of plate, but in order to avoid the frequent recurrence of the expense thus incurred, it was determined, in 1815, by Lord Castlereagh, that no such grant should be in future made, but that at each of the Courts of Paris, Petersburg, Vienna, Madrid, Constantinople, the Netherlands, Berlin, and Lisbon, a suitable service of plate should be provided at the public expense for the use of the resident Ambassador or Minister, to be taken care of at his cost or charge, and to be delivered up to his successor, on the removal of a Minister, according to an inventory deposited in duplicate in the office of His Majesty's Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs in London.

In pursuance of this decision, services of plate, the cost of which was shown in a Return laid before the House of Commons in June 1833, were furnished to the Ambassadors and Ministers at the Courts above mentioned. The plate supplied for the use of the Embassy at the Hague was brought back to this country on the substitution of a Mission for an Embassy and it has since been made use of to complete the service of plate for the Constantinople Embassy, the greater portion of the service originally consigned to that Embassy having been destroyed by the fire at Constantinople in 1831.

No. 1.

(Circular.)

My Lord,
Sir,

Foreign Office, 12 February 1862.

In order to insure regularity being observed in regard to the periods for which leave of absence is granted to the Diplomatic Servants of the Crown, I have thought it expedient to establish as a rule, that every Diplomatic Officer who has been permitted to absent himself from his duties for an undefined term shall report to the Secretary of State every two months his intentions with regard to his return to his post; and that every Diplomatic Officer who has been granted leave of absence for a fixed period of more than two months shall, on its expiration, report in like manner his intention respecting the resumption of his duties. I have accordingly to instruct you to act yourself in conformity with this rule, and to acquaint the Members of Her Majesty's that I desire them strictly to adhere to the same.

I am, &c.
(signed) Russell.

(Circular.)

My Lord,
Sir,

Foreign Office, 15 September 1862.

I transmit to you herewith, copies of certain Regulations which, in pursuance of the recommendations of the Diplomatic Committee, I have framed for Her Majesty's Diplomatic Service.

They apply, as you will perceive, more particularly to the junior Members of the Service; but I have been happy to take advantage of the opportunity to afford a certain amount of relief to the Heads of Missions in regard to the rate of deduction to be hereafter made from their salaries while on leave of absence.

You will communicate these Regulations to the several parties employed in your Mission to whom they apply; and it will be necessary for such of the Attachés, now unpaid, as under the Regulations will either at once, or at no distant day, have completed the period of four years from the date of their entrance into the Diplomatic Service, to establish, at the proper time, to my satisfaction, that they have fulfilled the condition as to actual residence abroad, specified under the 13th head of the Regulations, as requisite to entitle them to receive Commissions as Secretaries of the Third Class.

The allowance to be made under the head of journeys, to the Junior Members of the Diplomatic Service will be chargeable in the extraordinary accounts of the Mission to which they belong at the time that the journeys are completed; but Heads of Missions will not issue such allowances until the account of expenditure has been submitted to, and sanctioned by, the Secretary of State, and direct authority given for its payment.

I am, &c.
(signed) Russell.

Enclosure in No. 2.

Regulations for Her Majesty's Diplomatic Service.

1. Nomination, qualification, and examination of candidates for unpaid attachéships.

Candidates for the situation of Attaché in Her Majesty's Diplomatic Service will continue to be nominated by Her Majesty's Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs; and they must be prepared to undergo an examination before the Civil Service Commissioners within six months after their nomination if they elect to undergo only one examination (which single examination will, in that case, exempt them from any further examination previously to their receiving Commissions as Secretaries), or within three months if they prefer to undergo two examinations, as heretofore. In the latter case the second examination may be deferred until the candidate is prepared to undergo it.

Candidates, on presenting themselves for examination on their nomination, must have completed the 21st year of their age, and not have exceeded the 26th.

In the case of candidates electing to undergo only one examination, such examinations will comprise the following matters:—

a. Orthography and handwriting.

b. General intelligence, as evinced by the manner in which the candidate acquits himself, and specifically by the quickness he may show in seizing the points in papers read to him, or read over by him, once or twice.

c. Précis.

d. The candidate must satisfy the examiners that he is thoroughly well grounded in the Latin grammar, and that he is able to construe and parse a portion of some good classical Latin author, and to give the derivation of words.

e. An accurate knowledge of French grammar, fluency in French conversation, correctness of translation from French into English, and from English into French, and French composition.

f. An

f. An accurate knowledge of German grammar, a tolerable degree of fluency in German conversation, and correctness of translation from German into English and from English into German.

g. A fair knowledge of the political history of Europe and of North and South America, from the year 1660 to 1860 inclusive, and of the most important international transactions during that period.

h. A general knowledge of geography.

i. The first four rules of arithmetic and decimal fractions, as given with examples in Colenso's Arithmetic.

j. The first book of Euclid.

k. A general knowledge of maritime and international law, to be acquired from Wheaton's "Elements of International Law," and the first volume of Kent's "Commentary."

l. Cadidates will be allowed, at their option, to be examined in Spanish and Italian, in addition to the above subjects.

In the case of candidates electing to undergo two examinations, the first examination will comprise the following subjects :—

1. Orthography.
2. Handwriting.
3. Précis.
4. Latin.
5. Arithmetic.
6. Geography.
7. General intelligence, except as regards specific tests.
8. An accurate knowledge of French grammar, correctness of translation from French into English, and such a facility of speaking French as may show aptitude for acquiring fluency after a residence abroad.
9. An accurate knowledge of German grammar.
10. A general knowledge of the political history of Europe and of North and South America, from 1790 to 1815, comprising an acquaintance with the most important international transactions of that period.

In either case, candidates who have passed the first public examination in classics at one of the Universities in Great Britain or Ireland will be exempted from being examined in Latin.

Candidates who shall have elected to undergo two examinations must be prepared to satisfy the examiners, if required to do so, as to their acquaintance with the various matters which come within the single examination (except as regards Latin, Geography, and Arithmetic, in which such candidates are exempted from being re-examined); and they will, moreover, be required for their second examination, to draw up a Report on the general commercial and political relations of the several countries in which they may have resided, and on the internal polity and administration, social institutions, and the character of the people of such countries.

If a candidate offering himself for the single examination should fail to satisfy the Commissioners to the required extent, but should evince such a knowledge of the subjects on which he may have been examined as would have obtained for him a certificate of fitness if he had only offered himself for a first examination, the Commissioners will, in such a case, give a certificate as for a first examination; and the candidate will eventually have to present himself again before the Commissioners for the second examination.

2. Period of service of attachés.

The service of Attachés will reckon from the date of the certificate first granted by the Civil Service Commissioners, and will be considered as probationary for four years from that date, during which period the Attachés must have been employed for six months in the Foreign Office, and must also have actually resided at one of Her Majesty's Embassies or Missions abroad, or have been actually employed in the Foreign Office, for a further period of three years. If these conditions, as to employment and residence, have not been fulfilled at the expiration of four years from the date of the certificate of the Civil Service Commissioners, the probationary period will be prolonged until they have been fulfilled; and it will likewise be prolonged in the case of candidates who may have elected to undergo two examinations, until the final certificate of the Commissioners has been obtained.

3. A salary of 150*l.* a year will be granted, contingently, to attachés, on completion of their probation.

A salary, at the rate of 150 l. a-year, will be granted to Attachés on the termination of the period of probation, and on the receipt from the Minister under whom they have last served of a certificate showing that their general character and conduct, during the time they have so served, have been satisfactory; and that, as far as such Minister has means of forming an opinion, they understand and speak French well, and also one other foreign language.

4. Abolition of the designation of paid attachés. Commissions as second secretaries to be granted to paid attachés.

The designation of first and second paid Attaché is abolished; and in lieu thereof will be substituted the designation of Second Secretaries, which will be conferred by Commissioners under Her Majesty's sign-manual.

5. Commissions as

Commissions, as Third Secretaries, will also be granted under Her Majesty's sign-manual third secretaries to be granted to unpaid attachés on completion of their probation.

to persons now serving as unpaid Attachés, or who shall hereafter be appointed unpaid Attachés, on the fulfilment of the conditions, applicable to such persons as specified in the present Regulations.

It is clearly to be understood that the aforesaid commissions of Second and Third Secretaries will not imply appointment to any particular Embassy or Mission; but the holders thereof will be subject to the same conditions and liabilities as to removal from one Mission to another, at the discretion of the Secretary of State, as those to which Attachés of all classes are now liable.

Secretaries of the Second and Third Classes may be indiscriminately attached either to an Embassy or to a Mission; and the circumstance of having been attached in either of the above capacities to an Embassy will not preclude transfers in the same capacity to a Mission. Moreover, there may be more than one secretary of either of the above classes attached, at the pleasure of the Secretary of State, to any Embassy or Mission.

6. Number of second secretaries.

There will be a fixed number of Second Secretaries, determined by the number of First and Second paid Attachés at the date of the issue of these Regulations.

The salaries of Second Secretaries will be fixed at the same rates as those now assigned to First and Second paid Attachés in the respective Embassies and Missions; it being understood that such rates have reference to the character of the Embassy or Mission, and not to the services of the Second Secretaries, who may be removed, without claim to compensation, from an Embassy or Mission where the rates are higher, to an Embassy or Mission where the rates are lower.

7. Rules as to pensions of the fourth class.

In virtue of Her Majesty's Commissions, the service of Second and Third Secretaries will count for their pensions, under the Act of 2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 116, from the date of the issue of their first Commission; but the amount of pension to be assigned to them will be calculated, so long as they are eligible for a pension of the fourth class only, for each year that has elapsed since the date of their first Commission, at one-thirtieth part of the last salary of which they were in receipt, at the time of the pension being granted; provided that no pension shall continue to be issued to a person not incapacitated by ill-health, medically certified, who may decline active service before he has reached the 60th year of his age, after which age no person shall be required to serve as Second or Third Secretary.

8. Provisions for the transfer of the junior members of the diplomatic service from one post to another; and payment of their expenses of removal.

Second or Third Secretaries, and Attachés, as a general rule, will not be employed for more than two years consecutively, irrespective of the periods during which they may have been absent on leave, in the same Embassy or Mission, unless for special public reasons. Secretaries of Embassy or Legation, Second and Third Secretaries, and Attachés, will, on their first appointment, or on any subsequent removal by reason of promotion or otherwise on public grounds, receive such an allowance as shall be sufficient to cover the actual expense of their personal journey by land, or the actual amount paid for their personal passage by sea, either from England to their post, or from one foreign post to another; and in the case of Secretaries of Embassy or Legation, and of Second Secretaries, a similar allowance for one servant, if they have one; but no allowance will be made under the head of subsistence during a journey by land; neither will any allowance be made for the expense of the journey or subsistence of the families of any such Secretaries or Attachés. In the event of a passage being afforded to Secretaries or Attachés on board of one of Her Majesty's ships of war, the allowance made will be in conformity with the Admiralty Regulations.

No allowance will be made to the junior members of the Diplomatic Service for journeys undertaken for their own convenience, in pursuance of leave of absence; but in all such cases the expense of the journeys from and on returning to their posts will be exclusively at their own charge.

It is understood, moreover, that in the case of any journey of which the expense is to be allowed, Secretaries or Attachés, unless specially excused from doing so, will be bound to take charge of Despatches, if required; and, in that case, they will be expected to perform the journey without delaying on the road.

9. Interchange of employment between second and third secretaries and junior clerks in the Foreign Office.

The Secretary of State will, should he see occasion, for the advantage of the public service, allow Second and Third Secretaries, and Attachés, to interchange for a time their duties with Clerks of the three junior classes in the Foreign Office; the several parties being bound, for the whole period through which the interchange extends, in every respect to perform the duties, and to submit to the obligations attaching to the situation which they may temporarily occupy.

The Secretary of State will, moreover, if he sees reason to do so, direct such temporary interchange of duties to be made, irrespective of the wishes of the parties, between Second or Third Secretaries, or Attachés, and Clerks in the Foreign Office; or he will direct such persons to be employed for a time, at home or abroad, without any interchange, making in either case such an allowance to the parties as he may consider just and reasonable. In the event of any Attaché being so employed in the Foreign Office, the period, over and above the six months which are obligatory, as stated in section 2, during which he shall be actually employed in the Foreign Office, shall reckon towards the three years during which he is by these Regulations to reside at an Embassy or Mission abroad.

In the case of temporary interchanges between Secretaries and Clerks, they will respectively rank, during the period for which the interchange shall last, after the junior in the classes of Secretaries or Clerks to which each of them belong, the Clerks receiving an acting appointment as Secretary of such class. The same principle will apply in cases of permanent interchange.

If a Clerk in the Foreign Office should be permanently transferred to the Diplomatic Service, Service, or should be temporarily employed with a special, or with an ordinary, Embassy or Mission, he will receive a commission or an acting appointment, as the case may be, as Secretary of the Second or Third Class, according to the length of his service in the Foreign Office; but he will, as regards others then in the same class, enter it as the junior.

10. Deductions to be made from salaries of heads of missions on leave of absence.

With a view to relieve heads of Missions on leave of absence on private grounds, the deductions to be made from their salaries will in future be limited, for a period not exceeding 60 days from the date of their departure from their posts, to the sum required to provide for the allowances of the Acting Chargés d'Affaires according to the present Regulations; on the expiration of which period the deduction will be at the rate of one-half of their salaries. Such period of 60 days may either be one of 60 consecutive days, or of 60 days occurring at intervals in the course of one year beginning on the 1st of January.

11. Allowances during war or interruption of relations.

Should an Ambassador, Minister, or Secretary, by reason of war or other interruption of Diplomatic Relations, be withdrawn from active service before his services shall have qualified him for a Diplomatic pension of the class under which he would otherwise come, the Secretary of State will, as he may see fit, assign to any such person a temporary allowance calculated on the rate of pension assigned to the class to which he belongs, regard being had to the length and general character of his services; such allowance being, however, strictly subject to the condition in regard to employment specified in the 7th section of the Act 2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 116.

12. Date at which present regulations, shall take effect.

The foregoing Regulations shall take effect from the 1st day of October 1862; but unpaid Attachés appointed previously to the 1st of January 1861 will be allowed until the 1st July 1863 to undergo their second examination according to the Regulations now in force; and if, on such second examination, they obtain their certificates, they will retain their present precedence, but not otherwise.

All persons nominated as Attachés subsequently to the date of the present Regulations will be subject to the provisions, as to examination, therein contained.

The condition of employment for six months in the Foreign Office will not be enforced with regard to unpaid Attachés in the service abroad at the date of these Regulations; but such unpaid Attachés must have passed both examinations under the existing Regulations, must have actually resided for a period of three years at one or more of Her Majesty's Embassies or Missions abroad, must have completed four years from the time of their entering the service, and must be provided with the certificate from the Head of the Mission under whom they have last served, specified in Clause 3 of these Regulations, before they can receive a Commission as a Secretary of the Third Class, or the salary at the rate of 150 l. a-year assigned to that class. Those persons who continue in the service, or who shall hereafter enter the service as unpaid Attachés, will be denominated "Attachés."

No. 3.

(Circular.)

My Lord,

Sir,

Foreign Office, 5 November 1862.

Viscount Palmerston, when Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs in the year 1849, decided that the sum allowed for house rent to Her Majesty's Embassies and Missions should not be considered as a mere addition to the salaries of the Ambassadors or Ministers, but rather as an allowance for providing a suitable residence for the Embassy or Mission, and for the transaction of public business.

Acting on this principle, his Lordship confirmed the rule then existing, that no Ambassador or Minister should be entitled to the allowance for house rent for any period antecedent to his actual arrival at his post on first going out after his appointment, nor for any period subsequent to his departure from his post on his being recalled.

Viscount Palmerston further laid down that no allowance whatever, on account of house rent, should be paid to an Ambassador or Minister for any period during which he might be absent from his post on leave, unless he should show that during such period he continued to pay the rent of his usual house of residence at his post.

Viscount Palmerston, lastly, decided that as the allowance made for house rent had reference not only to the private accommodation of the Ambassador or Minister, but also to the transaction of public business, any Ambassador or Minister who might continue to hold his house during his absence on leave, should, on the application of the person in temporary charge of the Embassy or Mission, either allow such person to occupy a suitable portion of his house for the transaction of the public business, or, in lieu thereof, should pay him one-third of the amount of the house rent allowance, the option of either course being left with the Ambassador or Minister.

There being reason to suppose that the rules thus laid down by Viscount Palmerston are not generally known by Her Majesty's Diplomatic Service, I think it advisable to confirm and promulgate them; and, moreover, in order to remove any uncertainty as to the amount of accommodation which is to be held necessary for the transaction of public business, I further lay down that such accommodation must consist of the Chancery, or office of the Embassy or Mission, of a sitting-room for the use of the person in charge of the Mission, and of a waiting-room for those who may have business to transact with the Embassy or Mission. The charge for warming and lighting the rooms thus appropriated for the transaction of public business is to be borne by the person in charge of the Embassy or Mission, if there is no public allowance for expenditure of that sort; if there is, such allowance will be at the disposal of such person for the time being; and any Chancery servants paid by the public are for the time being to be at the disposal of the person in charge of the Embassy or Mission.

As a consequence of the rules laid down by Viscount Palmerston, and now confirmed, every Ambassador or Minister, on quitting his post on leave of absence, must, with a view to enable the Chief Clerk to prepare the quarterly salary list, report to this office whether he continues to pay rent for his house during his absence on leave; and what option he has made in regard to allowing the person in charge of the Embassy or Mission during his absence to occupy the portion of his house necessary for the transaction of public business, or paying to him one-third of the allowance for house rent.

If, on either of the grounds stated in this Despatch, no allowance for house rent is issuable to an Ambassador or Minister, a third portion of the allowance fixed by the regulations will be issued to the person in charge of the Embassy or Mission.

The deduction from the allowance for house rent, in the event of the Ambassador or Minister electing for that alternative, will be made by the Chief Clerk of the Foreign Office in the quarterly salary list, and will not form matter of personal adjustment between the Ambassador or Minister and the person to whom it is payable.

MEMORANDUM on the Claim of ——— to be allowed 300 l. a year as House Rent, and also upon the General Question of House Rent Allowance to Ministers while absent from their Posts.

THIS claim of ——— to be allowed 300 l. a year as house rent during the time he shall act as Chargé d'Affaires in the absence of the Minister, offers a fitting opportunity for bringing under the consideration of Lord Palmerston the general question, whether a Minister absent on leave from his post, and during such absence not encumbered with the tenancy of a house, is entitled to house rent at all?

By the 11th clause of the Letter to the Treasury, of 25th October 1830, it is said, "that no allowance for house rent shall in future be made for any period antecedent to the arrival of an Ambassador, Envoy, or Minister, at his post, or subsequent to the cessation of his functions." Nothing can be more clearly expressed than this decision; nevertheless, until the last seven or eight years the allowance for house rent has been considered as beginning and ending with the salary. The salary begins as a general rule "Ten days previously to the actual departure of a Minister for his post, and ends ten days after his return, on the cessation of his Mission;" and as during a Minister's temporary absence from his post no abatement is made from his allowance for house rent, as is the case with regard to his salary, it has grown into a rule to allow a Minister absent on leave to draw his full house rent, without inquiring whether he himself pays the rent of a house or not. I conceive that an allowance for house rent is a defraying allowance, and that where no expenditure is incurred no payment should be made; but that the house rent allowance should either become an absolute saving to the public either in whole or in part, or go to the payment of claims similar to that now put forward by ——, and that under no circumstances should a Minister absent on leave from his post, and not paying rent for a house, be allowed to draw any portion of the sum allowed to the Mission for house rent. Of course if the Minister, while absent from his post on leave, continues his tenancy of a residence in the capital of the country to which he is accredited, there can be no question that his house rent should be allowed him; but I submit that in conformity with what is laid down in a letter to the Treasury in 1825, the Minister in such case should allow the Acting Chargé d'Affaires either to occupy his house, or pay to him a sum equal to one-third of the house rent allowance during the period of his absence. Why this rule was set aside in subsequent arrangements does not appear; but I conceive it to be a reasonable one in principle, for the head for the time being of an Embassy or Mission ought to have a residence suitable to his rank, where he can receive persons and transact public business.

It is perfectly true that in some instances the Chargé d'Affaires may be able to show that it is impossible for him to obtain a proper residence at anything like one-third of the Government allowance for house rent; but this forms a special case to be decided on its own merits.

It is, therefore, submitted for Lord Palmerston to decide—

1st. That no allowance whatever shall in future be issued to an Ambassador or Minister on account of house rent, unless he shall be actually a tenant of a house during the period for which he claims the allowance.

2nd. That where an Ambassador or Minister is absent from his post on leave of absence, he shall allow the Acting Minister Plenipotentiary, or the Acting Chargé d'Affaires, to occupy a reasonable portion of his house during his absence; or, if he should not be disposed to do this, then to suffer an abatement from his house rent allowance of a sum equivalent to one-third of the allowance, such sum to be paid over to the Acting Minister or Chargé d'Affaires, as the case might be, it being clearly understood that the choice of the alternative rests entirely with the Ambassador or Minister, and that the locum tenens shall have no voice whatever in the matter.

With regard to the claim of ———, I submit that under the peculiar circumstances of his case, he should receive the special allowance at the rate of 300 l. a year which he has applied for; and, on the other hand, that the house rent allowance to ———, the absent Minister, Minister, shall be suspended from the 5th of January last, unless he shall show that he rents a house at ——— during his absence from his post: and I further submit that the principles herein laid down should, from the 5th of January last, apply in every case to which they are applicable, as well as with regard to the arrangement in favour of Acting Ministers Plenipotentiary, and Acting Chargés d'Affaires, as in regard to the suspension altogether of house rent allowance, where no expenditure for house rent is incurred.

Approved,

4 February 1869. (signed) P.

Since the foregoing was written, I have accidentally discovered some papers which show that this question of allowing the locum tenens of an Ambassador or Minister a certain portion of the allowance for house rent, was brought forward by Mr. Strangways, when Under Secretary of State in 1839. After a good many Memorandums on the subject between Mr. Strangways and Lord Palmerston, his Lordship observed,—

"I am not much disposed to change what I suppose was done after due consideration, but query."

To this Mr. Backhouse replied,—

"The reason why the regulation of 1825, respecting the deduction of one-third of an absent Minister's house rent for the benefit of the Chargé d'Affaires, was rescinded was, that it had been found to give rise to bickerings and discontent between the chiefs and their acting substitutes. And in consideration of the discontinuance of this benefit to the Acting Ministers and Chargé d'Affaires, their daily allowances when acting were left without reduction in the retrenching process of the same year, 1830, in which most of the salaries, both of Ministers and Secretaries, were more or less cut down."

And then his Lordship decided, "Let the matter stand as it does."

If his Lordship should now take the same view of the case, as regards the alternative proposed for the adoption of the Ambassador or Minister, namely the abatement during absence of one-third of the allowance for house rent, or the assignment of such a portion of his house to his locum tenens as may be sufficient for public purposes; I still submit that the public should not be charged with any sum for house rent in any case where the Ambassador or Minister does not himself pay for the rent of a house in the capital of the country to which he is accredited.

(Circular.)

My Lord,

Sir, Foreign Office, 23 December 1862.

My attention having been called to the nature of the expenses for which Her Majesty's Ambassadors, Ministers, and Chargé d'Affaires have been allowed to charge when absent from their ordinary place of residence on public duty, and therefore allowed to continue to draw their full salary, irrespective of any allowance which may be awarded to the person left in charge of the Embassy or Mission as Chargé d'Affaires or Chargé des Archives, I have to state to you, that under such circumstances an Ambassador, Minister, or Chargé d'Affaires will, from the 1st of January next, be only allowed to charge to the public the expenses which he may incur in travelling from place to place, and such other expenses as he may be obliged to incur in the execution of the public service on which he is engaged; but he will not be allowed to charge any other expenses on account of the maintenance of himself and of his establishment while in the receipt of the full salary assigned to his post.

In the event of the public service requiring that an Ambassador, Minister, or Chargé d'Affaires, employed as aforesaid, should be accompanied by one or more of the junior members of the Diplomatic Service, an allowance of 1 l. a day for each person so employed with the sanction of the Secretary of State, while not otherwise subsisted at the public expense, may be included in the account to be rendered by the Ambassador, Minister, or Chargé d'Affaires of the expenses which he is allowed to charge.

My Lord,

I wish to direct the attention of Her Majesty's Representatives at foreign courts to the adoption in their respective Chanceries of a practice similar to that to which Secretaries of Embassy and Legation are now required to conform, and to suggest to them the expediency of requiring the junior members of their several Chanceries, as often as opportunity may arise, to draw up reports on matters of public interest, more especially those relating to the commerce and industry of the country in which they reside, upon which it is necessary that heads of Missions should be accurately informed, in order that in their turn they may keep Her Majesty's Government fully acquainted with all matters bearing on the commerce and industry of the country.

The general occupations of heads of Missions may prevent them from devoting to the examination and digestion of materials the amount of time and attention which may be absolutely necessary in order that they may be presented to Her Majesty's Government, and through them to the trading and manufacturing interests of the country, in a clear and practical shape.

But this may be done by the industry and ability of the junior members of Missions, if rightly encouraged and directed; while, on the other hand, those gentlemen will derive great advantage from having their minds exercised and their attention engaged on subjects requiring more thought and consideration than the ordinary routine business of a Chancery.

I have dwelt more particularly on questions of commercial industry, to which the attention of the junior members of the Diplomatic Service may be directed, because they generally involve details which it requires time and industry to reduce into shape; but I by no means desire to exclude matters of general political interest. My object is that every encouragement should be held out to those gentlemen to improve the opportunities which are afforded to them in foreign countries, of acquiring knowledge and habits of observation which may qualify them hereafter for the higher duties to which they aspire.

My Lord,
Sir,

Foreign Office, 21 June 1864.

It appears from the answers which I have received from certain of Her Majesty's Ministers that the exact purport of my Circular of the 23rd of May has in some instances been misapprehended, and that my intention was supposed to be that the Reports on which I recommended that the junior members of Missions should, as occasion might arise, be employed, were to be sent home in the same manner as those of the Secretaries of Embassy and Legation now are.

This, however, was not my intention. The Reports to which I referred as those on which the junior members of Missions might usefully be employed, were such as are daily drawn up by clerks in the Foreign Office for the special information of the Secretary of State, on any subject in regard to which he requires information, without having his time taken up by reading through masses of papers when urgent affairs require his attention. The compilation of such reports requires great assiduity, and a habit of condensation in writing, so that they afford instruction to the individual who draws them up; while, if well done, they save great trouble to his principal, who in this case will be the head of the Mission.

My Lord,
Sir,

Foreign Office, 10 September 1864.

On examining the collection of the Reports of Her Majesty's Secretaries of Embassies and Legations, of which copies were forwarded to you in my Circular Despatch of the 2nd instant, it will be seen that while at most places very commendable diligence has been shown in complying with the instructions of the Secretary of State on this matter, at others, I am sorry to say, they have been altogether neglected.

It is not my purpose, however, to say more as regards the past; but as regards the future I wish to point out to heads of Embassies and Missions, that although the duty of compiling these Reports devolves upon the Secretaries, the responsibility of taking care that the Secretaries perform that duty rests with the heads of Missions.

These Reports have of late attracted so much public attention, and excited so much interest, that the credit of the Diplomatic Service in general, no less than that of the Secretaries in particular, is involved in their being ably and punctually drawn up; and I trust that for the future the Secretary of State will have no occasion to call the attention of heads of Embassies and Missions to any such shortcomings on the part of their Secretaries as have rendered it necessary for me to address to them the present Circular Despatch.

My Lord,

I TRANSMIT to you herewith, for your information, and to be deposited in the archives of your Mission, a memorandum setting forth the construction to be given to the 10th section of the Regulations for Her Majesty's Diplomatic Service, which were inclosed in my Circular Despatch of the 15th of September 1862.

I am, &c.

Enclosure in No. 8.

MEMORANDUM respecting the Construction of the Tenth Section of the Regulations for the Diplomatic Service of 15th September 1862.

A QUESTION having been raised as to the construction to be placed on the 10th section of the Regulations for the Diplomatic Service of 15th September 1862, Lord Russell rules as follows:—

That the period for which no deduction other than that which may be required to provide for the allowances of the persons acting as Chargé d'Affaires or in charge of the archives, according to the present Regulations, shall be made from the salaries of heads of Missions absent from their posts on private grounds, shall in no case exceed 60 days in any one year, commencing on the 1st of January and ending on the 31st of December; and that no portion of such 60 days allowed for one year shall be carried over to the next or any subsequent year. For any number of days beyond 60 in any one year during which Ministers may be absent from their posts on private grounds, the deduction from their salaries will be at the rate of one-half.

If, however, Ministers are absent from their posts on private grounds on the 1st of January, they will be allowed, provided they receive leave of absence on or before that day for any part of the ensuing year, to enter on that day upon the 60 days allowed for the year then commencing; and this notwithstanding that in the previous year the 60 days' grace may have expired before the 31st of December, and that they may consequently have, for a period antecedent to the 1st of January, been on half salary.

This construction of the 10th section of the Regulations of 15th September 1862, is to take effect from the 1st of January 1865.

Lord Russell must, however, remind Her Majesty's Ministers abroad that they are not entitled as of right to annual leave of absence from their posts. The granting or withholding any leave of absence, and the length of its duration, must in all cases rest with the Secretary of State, according to his estimation of the requirements of the public service.

A copy of this memorandum is to be sent to each of Her Majesty's Ministers, to be deposited in the archives.

My Lord,

Foreign Office, 17 July 1865.

AFTER an experience of nearly three years of the system of examination for Attachés in Her Majesty's Diplomatic Service, established by the Regulations of the 15th of September 1862, and looking at the result of examinations held under them, I have thought it advisable to revise those Regulations; and I now transmit to you, to be deposited in the archives of your Mission, copies of the new Regulations which have been finally adopted after communication with the Civil Service Commissioners, and which take effect from this day.

Enclosure in No. 9.

REGULATIONS for the Examination of Attachés in Her Majesty's Diplomatic Service.

LORD RUSSELL having seen occasion, after an experience of nearly three years, to revise the Regulations for the examination of Attachés in Her Majesty's Diplomatic Services which were issued on the 15th of September 1862, has deemed it advisable to amend those Regulations, and to lay down in lieu thereof the following Regulations, which will take effect from the present date.

Lord Russell considers it proper that the junior members of the Diplomatic Service should prove their competency, in all cases, in two examinations by the Civil Service Commissioners.

In the first examination, which candidates for Attachéships must be prepared to undergo within three months from the date of their nomination, they must satisfy the examiners in regard to the following points:—

1. Orthography.
2. Handwriting.

Appendix, No. 7.

3. General intelligence.

4. Précis writing.

5. That they are well grounded in Latin grammar, and are able to construe and parse a portion of some good classical Latin author, and to give the derivation of words.*

6. That they are acquainted with the first four rules of arithmetic and decimal fractions, as given with examples in Colenso's Arithmetic, and with the first book of Euclid.

7. That they have a general knowledge of geography.

8. That they have a general knowledge of French grammar, and can translate correctly from French into English.

9. That they have a general knowledge of German grammar.

10. That they have a general knowledge of the constitutional history of England, to be acquired from Blackstone's "Commentaries" (Ker's Edition, 1862), and Hallam's "Constitutional History of England."

11. That they have a general knowledge of the political history of Europe, and of the United States of North America, from the Treaty of Paris in 1815, to the Treaty of Villafranca, in 1860, comprising an acquaintance with the most important international transactions during that period.

In the second examination, which must be undergone in the interval between the grant of a commission as Third Secretary and that of a commission as Second Secretary, candidates will be exempted from re-examination in the 1st, 2nd, 5th, 6th, 7th, and 10th subjects in which they have passed in their previous examinations; but they must satisfy the examiners in regard to the following points:—

1. General intelligence, as evinced by the manner in which they acquit themselves, and specifically by the quickness they may show in seizing the points in papers read by them, or read over to them, once or twice.

2. Précis writing.

3. That they have a general knowledge of French grammar; that they can converse fluently in that language on ordinary topics; and can translate correctly from English into French, as well as from French into English.

4. That they have a general knowledge of German grammar; and can translate correctly from German into English; or if the candidates, between the first and second examinations, have not resided a reasonable time, twelve months for instance, in Germany, they may, if they desire it, substitute in their second examination, for a general knowledge of German grammar and for correct translation from German into English, the same qualifications in some other foreign language besides French.

5. That they have a general knowledge of the political history of Europe, and of the United States of North America, from the Treaty of Versailles, in 1783, to the Treaty of Villafranca, in 1860, comprising the most important international transactions during that period.

6. That they have a general knowledge of political economy, to be acquired from Adam Smith's "Wealth of Nations," and Mill's "Political Economy."

7. That they have a general knowledge of maritime and international law, to be acquired from Vattel, Wheaton's "Elements of International Law," and the first volume of Kent's "Commentaries."

8. They must satisfy the examiners, by submitting to them a general report on the commerce of the several countries in which they have resided, and on their political relations with other countries, that they are competent to draw up such a report: and they must be prepared to answer any questions put to them by the examiners within the limits of such report.

Candidates for Attachéships, on presenting themselves for examination, must have completed the 21st year of their age and not exceeded the 26th.

No. 10.

(Circular.)

My Lord,

Sir,

Foreign Office, 19 April 1866.

Considerable inconvenience has arisen from a practice which has grown up, of Heads of Missions recommending for leave of absence the junior members of their Diplomatic Establishments, and on such leave being granted and availed of, forthwith representing to the

* Candidates who have passed the first public examination in Classics at one of the Universities in Great Britain or Ireland will be exempted from being examined in Latin; but candidates claiming this exemption must, on going up for examination, exhibit to the Civil Service Commissioners a certificate from the duly constituted authorities, examiners, or others, as the case may be, in such university that they have passed the first public examination in Classics, in whatever manner that examination may have been conducted, and to whatever point directed.

the Secretary of State that temporary assistance is required to enable the business of the Mission to be carried on in the absence of the person or persons on leave. I accordingly think it necessary to call the attention of Heads of Missions to the passage in the 6th paragraph of Lord Russell's circular of the 10th of February 1860, in which it is laid down that the leave of absence to which the junior members of a Mission are to be considered entitled is "subject, of course, to its being limited, if the public service requires it."

If, therefore, the grant of leave of absence to one of its junior members, of whatever grade, is at any time incompatible with the carrying on of the business of a Mission, much as I should regret that any such gentleman should be obliged to forego the indulgence which he desires, he must, I fear, resign himself to the necessities of the public service.

In the Foreign Office, during the absence on leave of any of the clerks in the respective divisions, those who remain in attendance, of whatever rank, arrange for carrying on the business of the division with a limited staff, so that the public service suffers no delay nor prejudice; although, of course, the absence of their colleagues entails upon them, for the time, additional labour; so likewise in Her Majesty's Missions abroad, in regard to the junior members of which the principle of annual leave granted to the clerks of the Foreign Office was applied, for the first time, under Lord Russell's circular, whenever any junior member of a Mission is absent on leave, those who remain in attendance, of whatever rank, must make arrangements for duly carrying on the public business of the Mission.

As a general rule, regular attendance in the Chancery for five hours a-day should, I conceive, suffice for the daily work of any Mission, though, of course, that time is liable to be prolonged in case of emergency; but assuming five hours as the stated period of daily attendance, any extra work occasioned by the absence of a colleague on leave might easily be met, as in the Foreign Office, by coming to the Chancery earlier, or staying later, in order to dispose of it.

You will communicate the contents of this Despatch to the junior members of your Mission.

REGULATIONS for Her Majesty's Diplomatic Service—(Revised and confirmed by the Earl of Clarendon, 16th June 1866).

1. Nomination, qualification, and examination of candidates for Attachéships.

THE junior members of the Diplomatic Service must pass two examinations before the Civil Service Commissioners; and at the time of presenting themselves for the first they must have completed the 21st year of their age, and have not exceeded the 26th.

In the first examination, which candidates for Attachéships must be prepared to undergo within three months from the date of their nomination, they must satisfy the examiners in regard to the following points:—

1. Orthography.

* Candidates who have passed the first public examination in Classics at one of the Universities in Great Britain or Ireland, or at the Royal Academy at Woolwich, or one of the public examinations for the Army or Navy, will be exempted from being examined in Latin; but candidates claiming this exemption must, on going up for examination, exhibit to the Civil Service Commissioners a certificate from the duly constituted authorities, examiners, or others under whom they have been examined, that they have passed the first public examination in Classics, in whatever manner that examination may have been conducted, and to whatever point directed.

Appendix, No. 7.

6. That they are acquainted with the first four rules of arithmetic and decimal fractions as given in Colenso's Arithmetic, and with the first book of Euclid.

7. That they have a general knowledge of geography.

8. That they have a general knowledge of French grammar, and can translate correctly from French into English.

9. That they have a general knowledge of German grammar.

10. That they have general knowledge of the constitutional history of England, to be acquired from Blackstone's "Commentaries" (Ker's Edition, 1862), and Hallam's "Constitutional History of England."

11. That they have a general knowledge of the political history of Europe, and of the United States of North America, from the Treaty of Paris, in 1815, to the Treaty of Villafranca, in 1860, comprising an acquaintance with the most important international transactions during that period.

In the second examination, which must be undergone in the interval between the grant of a commission as Third Secretary, and that of a commission as Second Secretary, candidates will be exempted from re-examination in the 1st, 2nd, 5th, 6th, 7th, and 10th subjects in which they have passed in their previous examinations; but they must satisfy the examiners in regard to the following points:—

1. General intelligence, as evinced by the manner in which they acquit themselves, and specifically by the quickness they may show in seizing the points in papers read by them, or read over to them, once or twice.

2. Précis writing.

3. That they have a general knowledge of French grammar; that they can converse fluently in that language on ordinary topics; and can translate correctly from English into French, as well as from French into English.

4. That they have a general knowledge of German grammar, and can translate correctly from German into English; or if the candidates, between their first and second examinations, have not resided a reasonable time, twelve months for instance, in Germany, they may, if they desire it, substitute in their second examination, for a general knowledge of German grammar and for correct translation from German into English, the same qualifications in some other foreign language besides French.

5. That they have a general knowledge of the political history of Europe, and of the United States of North America, from the Treaty of Versailles in 1783, to the Treaty of Villafranca in 1860, comprising the most important international transactions during that period.

6. That they have a general knowledge of political economy, to be acquired from Adam Smith's "Wealth of Nations," and Mill's "Political Economy."

7. That they have a general knowledge of maritime and international law, to be acquired from Vattel, Wheaton's "Elements of International Law," and the first volume of Kent's "Commentaries."

8. They must satisfy the examiners, by submitting to them a general report on the commerce of the several countries in which they have resided, and on their political relations with other countries, that they are competent to draw up such a report; and they must be prepared to answer any questions put to them by the examiners within the limits of such report.

2. Period of service of Attachés.

The service of Attachés will reckon from the date of the certificate first granted by the Civil Service Commissioners, and will be considered as probationary for four years from that date, during which period the Attachés must have been employed for six months in the Foreign Office, and must also have actually resided at one of Her Majesty's Embassies or Missions abroad, or have been actually employed in the Foreign Office for such a time as in the aggregate will make up a further period of three years. If these conditions as to second examination, employment, and residence have not been fulfilled at the expiration of four years from the date of the certificate of the Civil Service Commissioners of their having passed the first examination, the probationary period will be prolonged until they have been fulfilled.

3. Commissions as Third Secretaries to be granted to Attachés on completion of their probation.

Commissions as Third Secretaries under Her Majesty's Sign Manual will be granted to Attachés, on the termination of the probationary period, and on the fulfilment of the conditions specified in the present regulations, together with a salary at the rate of 150 l. a year, provided that the Minister under whom they have last served certifies that their general character and conduct, during the time they have so served, have been satisfactory; and that, as far as such Minister has the means of forming an opinion, they understand and speak French well, and also one other foreign language.

4. A salary of 150*l.* a year will be granted, contingently, to Attachés on completion of their probation.

Second Secretaries will constitute an intermediate class between Third Secretaries and Secretaries of Legation.

The Secretary of State will assign to each Embassy or Mission such a number of Secretaries of the second and third classes as he may deem fit; it being always understood that Secretaries of these two classes may be named indiscriminately to either an Embassy or Mission, without reference to their previous employment in one or other of them. They are to be designated as Third or Second Secretary in the specific Embassy or Mission in which they hey may at the time be employed, but not as Third or Second Secretary of Embassy or Legation.

5. Number of Second Secretaries.

The number of Second Secretaries is restricted to the number of First and Second paid Attachés in the service on the 15th of September 1862. Their salaries will be issued according to the scale established for the particular Embassy or Mission in which they may be actually serving, without reference to any previous amount of salary they may have received.

6. Rules as to pensions of the fourth class.

In virtue of Her Majesty's commissions, the service of Second and Third Secretaries will count for their pensions, under the Act of 2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 116, from the date of the issue of their first Commission; but the amount of pension to be assigned to them will be calculated, so long as they are eligible for a pension of the fourth class only, for each year that has elapsed since the date of their first Commission at one-thirtieth part of the last salary of which they were in receipt at the time of the pension being granted; provided that no pension shall continue to be issued to a person not incapacitated by ill health, medically certified, who may decline active service before he has reached the 60th year of his age, after which age no person shall be required to serve as Second or Third Secretary.

7 Provisions for the transfer of the junior members of the Diplomatic Service from one post to another; and payment of their expenses of removal.

Second or Third Secretaries, and Attachés, as a general rule, will not be employed for more than two years, exclusive of the periods during which they may have been absent on leave, in the same Embassy or Mission, unless for special public reasons. Secretaries of Embassy or Legation, Second and Third Secretaries and Attachés, will, on their first appointment, or on any subsequent removal by reason of promotion or otherwise on public grounds, receive such an allowance as shall be sufficient to cover the actual expense of their personal journey by land, or the actual amount paid for their personal passage by sea, either from England to their post, or from one foreign post to another; and in the case of Secretaries of Embassy or Legation, and of Second Secretaries, a similar allowance for one servant, if they have one; but no allowance will be made for the expense of the journey or subsistence of the families of any such Secretaries or Attachés. In the case of a mere change of post, not carrying with it increase of salary, an allowance of one pound a day, as subsistence money during a journey by land, will be given for each day actually employed in travelling by the direct road. In the event of a passage being afforded to Secretaries or Attachés on board of one of Her Majesty's ships of war, the allowance made will be in conformity with the Admiralty Regulations.

No allowance will be made to the junior members of the Diplomatic Service for journeys undertaken for their own convenience, in pursuance of leave of absence; but in all such cases the expense of the journeys from and on returning to their post will be exclusively at their own charge.

It is understood, moreover, that in the case of any journey of which the expense is to be allowed, Secretaries or Attachés, unless specially excused from doing so, will be bound to take charge of despatches, if required; and in that case they will be expected to perform the journey without delaying on the road.

8. Interchange of employment between Second and Third Secretaries and Junior Clerks in the Foreign Office.

The Secretary of State will, should he see occasion, for the advantage of the public service, allow Second and Third Secretaries, and Attachés, to interchange for a time their duties with clerks of the three junior classes in the Foreign Office; the several parties being bound for the whole period through which the interchange extends, in every respect to perform the duties and to submit to the obligations attaching to the situation which they may temporarily occupy.

The Secretary of State will, moreover, if he sees reason to do so, direct such temporary interchange of duties to be made, irrespective of the wishes of the parties, between Second or Third Secretaries, or Attachés, and clerks in the Foreign Office; or he will direct such persons to be employed for a time, at home or abroad, without any interchange, making in either case such an allowance to the parties as he may consider just and reasonable. In the event of any Attaché being so employed in the Foreign Office, the period over and above the six months which are obligatory, as stated in section 2, during which he shall be actually employed in the Foreign Office, shall reckon towards the three years during which he is, by these regulations, to reside at an Embassy or Mission abroad.

In the case of temporary interchanges between Secretaries and Clerks, they will respectively rank, in the Embassy or Mission and Foreign Office, as the case may be, during the period for which the interchange shall last, after the Junior in the class of Secretaries or Clerks to which either of them belongs.

If a Clerk in the Foreign Office should be permanently transferred to the Diplomatic Service, or should be temporarily employed with a special, or with an ordinary Embassy or Mission, he will receive a Commission or an acting appointment, as the case may be, as Secretary of the Second or Third Class.

A First-Class Junior Clerk, who has acquired a standing in the Office, which qualifies him to act as Assistant Clerk, will receive an Acting Commission as Second Secretary; and a Second or Third Class Junior Clerk will receive an Acting Commission as Third Secretary.

9. Deductions to be made from salaries of Heads of Missions on leave of absence.

With a view to relieve Heads of Missions on leave of absence on private grounds, the deduction to be made from their salaries will in future be limited, for a period not exceeding 60 days from the date of their departure from their posts, to the sum required to provide for the allowances of the Acting Chargé d'Affaires according to the present regulations; on the expiration of which period the deduction will be at the rate of one-half of their salaries. Such period of 60 days may either be one of 60 consecutive days, or of 60 days occurring at intervals in the course of one year, beginning on the 1st of January and ending on the 31st of December.

Appendix, No. 7.

10. Allowances during war or interruption of relations.

Should an Ambassador, Minister, or Secretary, by reason of war or other interruption of Diplomatic relations, be withdrawn from active service before his services shall have qualified him for a Diplomatic Pension of the class under which he would otherwise come, the Secretary of State will, as he may see fit, assign to any such person who cannot otherwise be immediately employed, and during any period not exceeding the continuance of such war or interruption of Diplomatic relations, a temporary allowance calculated on the rate of pension assigned to the class to which he belongs, regard being had to the length and general character of his services; such allowance being, however, strictly subject to the condition in regard to employment specified in the 7th section of the Act of 2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 116.

(Circular.) No. 12.

My Lord,
Sir,

Foreign Office, 31 July 1867.

As the clause in the Regulations of 15th September 1862, and in the Revised Regulation of 16th June 1866, under which an allowance towards defraying the expenses of a journey is made to Secretaries of Embassy and Legation, Second and Third Secretaries and Attachés, on their first appointment, or on any subsequent removal by reason of promotion or otherwise on public grounds, has not on all occasions been correctly understood, and a wider signification has been given to the expression, "the actual expense of a personal journey," than it was intended to have, or than the words themselves properly convey; I think it right to inform you, and to instruct you to make known to the several members of your , that those words are not to be understood as comprehending articles forming part of the general establishment of such Secretary or Attaché, but are intended to cover merely the actual expenses of a personal journey, and that accordingly no allowance can hereafter be made for excess of baggage unless such excessive baggage consists bonâ fide of wearing apparel, and that the utmost weight to be allowed under this head must not exceed three hundred weight for Secretary and Servant combined.

(Circular.) No. 13.

My Lord,
Sir,

Foreign Office, 18 December 1867.

My attention since I have held the Seals of the Foreign Office has been turned to the system which has been in operation for a very long period of time under which the Clerks of this Department have been allowed to act as Agents for Her Majesty's Diplomatic and Consular Servants. But the arrangements in progress for carrying out the provisions of the Exchequer Audit Act of 1866, which, as regards the Foreign Office, will come into operation on the 1st April next, and under which the administration of all the funds required for the Service of the Department both at home and abroad, involving the duties of Issue and Audit, heretofore in a great degree discharged by other departments, will devolve on the Foreign Office, have induced me more particularly at the present time to consider how far the continuance of the Agency System is compatible with the altered circumstances arising out of that Act.

I have now arrived at the conclusion that they are incompatible; and, that being the case, it becomes necessary to ascertain by what means Her Majesty's Diplomatic and Consular Servants abroad can be secured in obtaining with punctuality payment of their salaries and allowances as they become due, without the intervention of Agents connected with the Foreign Office, who, with few exceptions, have acted hitherto in their behalf for that purpose.

I have accordingly to instruct you as soon as possible to ascertain and report to me in what manner the Government to which you are accredited, provides for the payment of salaries and allowances due to their Diplomatic and Consular Officers in foreign parts, and whether the payments on this account are made without any charge on the recipients for agency, commission, discount of bills or otherwise; and if not, what may be the estimated amount of such charges; and further, how soon after the expiration of each quarter such salaries and allowances are actually available for expenditure by the persons to whom they are due.

It is my earnest desire that the abolition of Agency in the Foreign Office, which I consider must be made absolute and complete, if made at all, should be effected with as little inconvenience as may be to Her Majesty's Diplomatic and Consular Servants who have hitherto availed themselves of it; and I will give my best consideration to any suggestions that you may offer with that view. And, under any circumstances, sufficient time will be allowed to enable Her Majesty's Diplomatic and Consular Officers to make such arrangements as they may think best to meet the change which I have in my contemplation to effect.

(Circular.) No. 14.

My Lord,
Sir,

Foreign Office, 28 May 1867.

I HAVE to inform you that the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty being desirous of extending the arrangement entered into with this Department in 1863, by which Officers of the China, Japan, and Siam Diplomatic and Consular Services taking passage in Her Majesty's ships of war in the Eastern Seas, pay the expense of their entertainment at once when the passage is completed, instead of leaving the claim to be adjusted by the Departments at home, have proposed to me the adoption of this system generally in the case of Her Majesty's Diplomatic and Consular Establishments.

As the arrangement thus proposed by the Admiralty will diminish correspondence between the two Departments, and prevent delays, which frequently occur under the present system, in the settlement of claims for passages taken in Her Majesty's ships. I have given my consent to this arrangement, which must henceforward be observed by all Consular Officers.

I am, &c.

My Lord,
Sir,

Foreign Office, 27 February 1868.

WITH reference to my Circular Despatch of the 28th of May last, in regard to the repayment by members of the Diplomatic and Consular Services of the expenses of their entertainment on board Her Majesty's ships of war immediately on their passages being completed, I now transmit to you, for your own information, and for that of the members of your Mission, copies of a circular which has been addressed by the Board of Admiralty to the commanders of Her Majesty's ships and vessels, containing instructions as to the manner in which the arrangement in question is to be carried into effect.

(Entertainment of Persons of the Diplomatic, Consular, and Colonial Services on board Her Majesty's Ships.)

Admiralty, 14 January 1868.

1. CONSIDERABLE inconvenience and delay having been experienced as to the arrangement of the expense incurred in entertaining persons of the above-named services on board Her Majesty's ships, my Lords are pleased to issue the following regulations, which have obtained the concurrence of Her Majesty's Secretaries of State for Foreign Affairs and the Colonies:—

2. When an Ambassador, Consul, Governor of a Colony, &c., shall be ordered a passage on board any of Her Majesty's ships, the captain of such ship is to direct the paymaster to inform such passenger of the rate laid down in the Queen's Regulations for his entertainment, and the Paymaster is to arrange for payment of the amount before the passenger leaves the ship, if possible, or, on his certificate, through the Consulate or Colonial Government on the spot, as the case may be.

3. In case the passenger should not be satisfied with the statement of the paymaster as to the clause of the regulations under which his passage is to be paid for, the matter is to be at once referred to the officer ordering the passage, or to their Lordships, and it will be arranged with the Secretary of State, as at present.

4. A report of the circumstances of each case, and of the amount paid by each passenger, is to be at once forwarded to their Lordships through the Commander in Chief.

5. It is to be understood that these regulations are not to be applied to the cases of Ambassadors, Consuls, &c., of foreign powers, whose passages are to be arranged as heretofore.

By command of their Lordships,

Henry G. Lennox.

To all Commanders in Chief, Captains, Commanders, and Commanding Officers of Her Majesty's Ships and Vessels.

(Circular). No. 16.

My Lord,
Sir,

Foreign Office, 20 April 1868.

I HAVE to acquaint you that, under the provisions of the Exchequer and Audit Departments Act, and the arrangements made for giving effect to them, the charges for Extra Couriers and Telegrams will no longer be included in the account of Extraordinary Disbursements of Her Majesty's Missions, but will form a separate account.

 I enclose

Appendix, No. 7.

I enclose an amended form of the account of Extraordinaries, in which those two items are omitted, and another form of account in which those two items are alone to be included.

I have further to acquaint you that, under the new arrangements, Her Majesty's Ministers are no longer to draw Bills on the Paymaster General on account of Extraordinaries; such bills are to be drawn upon the Chief Clerk, as also bills for expenses of Extra Couriers and Telegrams.

With a view to relieve Her Majesty's Missions still further from the obligation to make advances on public account, I have to acquaint you that, in lieu of the specific sum which you are now authorised to draw at the end of each month on account of Extraordinaries, you will henceforth be at liberty to draw on the Chief Clerk, at the expiration of each month, a Bill for 7-8ths of your Disbursements during the month on that Account, and also a Bill for 7-8ths of your Disbursements on account of Extra Couriers and Telegrams; and you will in each case, on the day you draw your Bill, send a separate letter of advice to the Chief Clerk in the form annexed.

At the end of each quarter you will send home two Accounts, supported as now by vouchers, the one of your Disbursements for Extraordinaries, and the other of your Disbursements for Extra Couriers and Telegrams, debiting yourself in each Account with the bills which you have drawn.

The balances due to you on the two Accounts will be repaid to you by the Chief Clerk when the Accounts have been examined and passed.

(Consular.)

My Lord,

Sir,

Foreign Office, 30 June 1868.

I enclose a copy of a Minute dated the 24th instant, and also a copy of some Papers recently laid before Parliament, explaining the circumstances under which I find myself precluded from giving immediate effect to the intention announced in my Circular Despatch of the 18th of December last with regard to Foreign Office Agencies, and recording the arrangements which I have thought it right to make with a view to the gradual instead of the immediate abolition of that system.

In instructing you to communicate the contents of this Minute to the several members of your Mission, I have to remind you, and at the same time to direct you to remind the members of your Mission, that there is no obligation on Her Majesty's Diplomatic Servants to employ as an Agent a Clerk in the Foreign Office for any purpose whatsoever; and that the decision whether, during the period that the system of Foreign Office Agencies may remain in force, Her Majesty's Diplomatic Servants shall continue to avail themselves of the services, as Agents, of those Clerks already acting as such, must rest entirely with them.

Further Papers respecting Foreign Office Agencies.

Memorandum.

The inability of the Board of Treasury to concur in the views expressed by Lord Stanley in his letter of the 17th of February, in regard to the claim of the Foreign Office Agents to compensation if the system of Agency were abolished, renders it necessary for his Lordship to determine what steps it may be possible now to take with a view to the eventual abolition of that system.

Lord Stanley considers that a system which for more than three-quarters of a century has, after repeated and full inquiry, been sanctioned by successive Secretaries of State, and which was explained in the most complete detail to two Committees of the House of Commons, one of which absolutely refused a proposal for its abolition, while the other did not see occasion to call in question by their report the propriety of its being maintained, and which, moreover, has been recognised by Her Majesty's Diplomatic and Consular Servants, almost without exception, as conducive to their convenience and advantage, must be held to have acquired such a degree of admitted permanency as to entitle those Clerks who have been engaged in carrying it on, to look upon it as a recognised source of emolument, and to expect compensation, if, on public grounds, it should be decided to put an end to it.

Lord Stanley, on the grounds stated in his letter of the 17th of February, was prepared to have made arrangements for the abolition, at the earliest possible period, of Foreign Office Agents on the one hand, and, on the other, for the convenience of Her Majesty's Diplomatic and Consular Servants who might be embarrassed by being deprived of the services rendered to them by the Agents as regards the forwarding of their correspondence; but, as matters now stand, he can only lay down rules for the eventual abolition of the existing system of Agencies when the interests which have grown up under it may be extinguished.

For this purpose Lord Stanley has decided—

First. That no Clerk or other person connected with the Foreign Office, except such as are, at the date of this Minute, acting as Agents, shall hereafter, directly or indirectly, undertake to act as such for any of Her Majesty's Diplomatic or Consular Servants.

Secondly. That, looking to the possibility of some arrangement being hereafter made for abolishing the Agencies on a grant of compensation, the emoluments derived by an Agent for any person who, after the date of this Minute, shall enter the service and appoint an Agent, shall not be taken into account in estimating the amount of compensation to be granted to an Agent on a general abolition of the system.

Lord Stanley directs that a Circular should be sent to Her Majesty's Ministers, informing them, and directing them to inform the members of their respective Missions, that for the reason stated in this Minute, Lord Stanley is precluded from carrying out any part of the arrangements contemplated in this circular of the 18th of December last. Lord Stanley, if the abolition of Agencies had been adopted as a general measure, would have endeavoured, with the concurrence of the Board of Treasury, to provide a substitute for them, so far at least as regards the transmission of the private correspondence of Her Majesty's Diplomatic and Consular Servants under official seal through the Foreign Office; but such a substitute could not be partially applied without serious inconvenience as regards the general arrangements of the office, and could only be adopted as part of a complete measure of abolition. Nevertheless, Lord Stanley thinks it right on this occasion to remind Her

Appendix, No. 7.

Majesty's Diplomatic Servants that there is no obligation on them, if otherwise willing to dispense with such services as are usually rendered to them by their Agents, to employ as an Agent a Clerk in the Foreign Office for any purpose whatever, and specifically not for obtaining payment of their salaries or any other allowances, such, for instance, as Extraordinary Disbursements, which may be due to them. Her Majesty's Diplomatic Servants may entrust to any person whom they may choose to employ, unconnected with the Foreign Office, their powers of attorney under which moneys becoming due to them may be regularly received, on application at stated periods to the Chief Clerk of the Foreign Office, to whom Her Majesty's Diplomatic Servants would only have to send, as now, their life certificates at the expiration of each quarter.

Lord Stanley directs that a copy of this Minute shall be entered in the books of the office, and a copy sent to each of Her Majesty's Missions, to be recorded and preserved in the archives; and Lord Stanley further directs that a Circular founded on it shall be sent to all Her Majesty's Consular Servants, for their information and guidance.

Mr. Addington to the Secretary to the Treasury.

Sir, Foreign Office, 20 March 1854.

The question of dispensing with the system of private Agency in the Foreign Office to Her Majesty's Diplomatic and Consular Servants abroad has been for some time under the consideration of the Earl of Clarendon. It is not that his Lordship thinks that inconvenience has resulted to the public service from that system, which has so long been openly sanctioned by successive Governments, and has unquestionably been productive of great advantage to the Diplomatic and Consular Functionaries. But as this description of extra-official Agency has been discontinued in other departments of the State, Lord Clarendon is willing to adopt a similar course, provided the abolition of the Foreign Office Agencies can be effected with perfect fairness towards individuals, and without prejudice to the public service.

Before, however, any step is taken in this direction, Lord Clarendon feels it to be necessary that the terms of the compensation to be allowed to the individual holders of Agencies should be clearly and definitively laid down and agreed upon between this Office and the Treasury; for it would obviously be an injustice towards those gentlenem to abolish a system in which they may justly be considered to have a vested interest, derived from long-established usage and official sanction, without having first settled the conditions of such abolition.

I am therefore directed to request that you will state to the Lords Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury that Lord Clarendon is of opinion that, if the Agency system in the Foreign Office is to be compulsorily abolished on public grounds, the Agents have an equitable claim to compensation to the full amount of the loss which they will sustain by that measure; such compensation to be ascertained and fixed, either according to the amount of profits actually received during the past year, or according to the amount received on an average of the last three years, and to be enjoyed by them as long as they remain in the Office. But with the view of anticipating any reasonable objection on the part of the Treasury to the amount of compensation which Lord Clarendon is of opinion should be made to the Foreign Office Agents, his Lordship, upon a full consideration of all the circumstances of the case, has determined to propose, for the concurrence of the Lords Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury, that there should be granted to the Agents a compensation allowance less by one-fifth than the amount of their actual receipts. Such rate of compensation Lord Clarendon would consider fair and just, and he therefore recommends recommends it on behalf of the actual holders of Agencies, as a necessary condition of any new arrangement.

The aggregate amount of the receipts of the different Agents in the Foreign Office during the year 1853 was 3,673 l. 11 s. The average of the years 1851-2-3 does not materially differ from that amount, being 3,633 l. 2 s. 6 d.

Whenever the Lords of the Treasury shall have informed Lord Clarendon that the principle and the conditions of compensation thus placed before them, namely, the allowance of the amount of each Agent's actual receipts, with a deduction of one-fifth, will be admitted, he will endeavour to make such further arrangements as may be necessary for providing a substitute for the system which it is proposed to discontinue.

MEMORANDUM on the Contemplated Abolition of Agencies in the Foreign Office, 9th March 1854.

[See "Statement respecting Foreign Office Agencies," presented to Parliament 5th March 1868, page 27.]

—No. 2.—

Mr. Addington to the Secretary to the Treasury.

Sir, Foreign Office, 20 March 1854.

WITH reference to my other letter of this date, on the subject of the contemplated abolition of the system of Agency in the Foreign Office, to Her Majesty's Diplomatic and Consular Functionaries abroad, and with a view to prevent any possible misconception as to the amount upon which compensation to the present Agents would have to be provided in the event of such abolition being carried into effect, I am directed by the Earl of Clarendon to transmit to you a copy of a Memorandum which has been presented to him by the Agents, explaining the grounds upon which they claim that the full amount of their actual receipts should form the basis upon which compensation should be calculated. Lord Clarendon desires me to request that in laying this paper before the Lords Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury, together with my other letter, you will state to them that his Lordship, having satisfied himself that the statements made by the Agents are correct, entirely concurs in the view of this matter which is taken by them in their Memorandum, and is of opinion that the principal of calculation against which they contend could not with justice be adopted.

(Enclosure in No. 2.)

MEMORANDUM on the Contemplated Abolition of Foreign Office Agencies.

LORD CLARENDON, with reference to the question of private Foreign Office Agencies desires that "the points respecting the per-centage and the sum en gros should be clearly stated."

The Agents presume that Lord Clarendon refers to a scheme of compensation which is known to have been mooted, and which would exclude from the amount, in respect of which compensation may be claimed, any amount of Agency charge in excess of one per cent. on the salary of the client, and also any amount of Agency charged on the expenses of special Missions, on the ground that such charges are inconsistent with the Regulations of 1816.

Upon this scheme of compensation the Agents beg leave to observe that the assumption that, according to the Regulations of 1816, the charge for Agency was to be confined to one per cent. on all salaries and pensions, is not only unsupported by the words of those regulations, but is directly at variance with the uninterrupted practice both before and since that time.

The clause of the Regulations of 1816 which bears upon this question is as follows :—

"6. The Agent not to be allowed to deduct more than one per cent. upon the salaries and outfit of the Ambassadors and Envoys for the service rendered to them, and to charge no per-centage upon the extra disbursements."

It will be seen that the limitation of charge for Agency to one per cent. is expressly confined to "Ambassadors and Envoys," and in no way applies to Secretaries of Embassy and Legation, or to Consuls. Indeed, the effect of the 6th clause of the Regulations of 1816 was, not to alter the amount of Agency to be charged upon the salaries even of Ambassadors and Envoys (for, in point of fact, it made no alteration in that respect, one per cent. being the amount charged both before and since), but to draw a distinction between the salary and the extra disbursements of Ambassadors and Envoys. The Agency which had always been levied on the salary was by that Regulation approved and sanctioned, while the Agency which had before been charged upon extra disbursements was declared to be thenceforward inadmissible. The question of Agency on salaries, other than those of Ambassadors and Envoys, was altogether untouched by the Regulations of 1816; and with regard to the amount of Agency on such salaries, the Agents continued after 1816, the same practice which, as can be proved by the books of Agents of the time was in force previously, and must have been well known to the framers of the Regulations of 1816, namely, charging a fixed annual sum, and not a per-centage. It cannot be supposed that if it had been intended by those Regulations to make so vital a change in the then existing practice with regard to the charge for Agency on salaries other than those of Ambassadors and Envoys as the fixing a maximum of one per cent., that intention would not have been clearly and unequivocally expressed, like the change in the existing practice with regard to charging Agency on extra disbursements; but on the contrary, as has been shown, the clause of the Regulations says not a syllable on the subject, and the Agents, some of whom were in the office at the time the Regulations were established, had never heard of such an interpretation being put upon them, until it was mooted not long ago. The change made by the Regulations in the practice, before 1816, of charging Agency on extra disbursements, has ever since been rigidly adhered to; and it cannot with any justice be contended that the Agents have violated those Regulations by simply adhering to their previous practice in regard to a point which not only is untouched by the Regulations, but seems to have been designedly excluded from their operation.

The Agents think, therefore, that they have clearly shown that there is no valid ground for the assumption which has been put forward on this point.

Neither is there, in the Regulations of 1816, any foundation for a further assumption which has been advanced, that the expenses of Special Missions should be classed with extra disbursements.

The expenses of Special Missions are not specifically mentioned in the Regulations; and as the charge of one per cent. on the amount of such expenses has been sanctioned and allowed by successive Secretaries of State in every instance, without exception, both before and since 1816, the Agents would not have thought it possible that any question could now have beed raised as to the charge been duly authorised. The Agency to a Special Mission involves more labour and trouble than the Agency to an ordinary Mission; the expenditure is in its nature analogous to salaries and not to extra disbursements; and the Agents are at a loss to conceive on what ground objection is now for the first time taken to a charge reasonable in itself, and constantly sanctioned by the competent authority.

For these reasons it is submitted that the only basis which can with justice to the Agents be taken for their compensation, is the actual amount of emolument of which they will be compulsorily deprived by a new arrangement adopted with a view to the public service.

Mr. Hammond to the Secretary to the Treasury.

Sir, Foreign Office, 10 August 1855.

I AM directed by the Earl of Clarendon to request that you will move the Lord Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury to have the goodness to inform him of the course which they are prepared to take on the recommendation submitted to them in the letters from this office of the 20th March 1854, as to the amount of compensation to be made to the Clerks in the Foreign Office acting as Agents to Her Majesty's Diplomatic and Consular Servants abroad in the event of their being required, by the abolition of Foreign Office Agencies, to cease to act in that capacity.

Lord Clarendon will be prepared, when the question of compensation is settled, to make arrangements for the abolition of Agencies, though he will require the concurrence of the Board of Treasury for such portion of those arrangements as regards the forwarding the correspondence of Her Majesty's Missions and Consulates; and it will of course be necessary to fix the date at which the abolition is to take effect, so as to afford sufficient time to Her Majesty's Diplomatic and Consular Servants to make their own arrangements for receiving their salaries without the intervention of Agents in the Foreign Office.

— No. 4.—

Lord Stanley to the Lords Commissioners of the Treasury.

My Lords, Foreign Office, 17 February 1868.

I HAVE the honour to request your Lordships' attention to the letters which were addressed to the Treasury by direction of the Earl of Clarendon, on the 20th of March 1854, and on the 10th of August 1855, and of which, for convenience of reference, I now enclose copies,* explaining his Lordship's views on the subject of the private Agencies, on account of Her Majesty's Diplomatic and Consular Servants, which the Clerks in the Foreign Office, in conformity with a practice of very long standing, were allowed to hold, and stating his readiness to abolish the system if adequate compensation were made to the Clerks at that time holding such Agencies in consideration of the losses which they would thereby incur.

The Board of Treasury, as far as I can ascertain, came to no decision at the time on the subject, and the practice has been allowed to continue as before.

The Committee of the House of Commons, which in the years 1858 and 1861 inquired into the Consular and Diplomatic Services, went very fully into the question of these Agencies, but pronounced no opinion upon their reports. However, a reference to the proceedings of the former Committee, in page xxxiv, will show your Lordships that a proposition condemnatory of them was moved by one of the Members of the Committee, and negatived without a division.

My attention, since I have held the seals of the Foreign Office, has nevertheless been turned to this matter, in connection with the arrangements for carrying out the provisions of the Exchequer Audit Act of 1866, under which the administration of all the funds required for the service of the Foreign Office, both at home and abroad, involving the duties of the issue and audit heretofore in a great degree discharged by other departments, will devolve on this department; and I have come to the conclusion that, all things considered, a question may arise whether the continuance of the Agency system would be compatible with the altered circumstances arising out of the application of the Act to the Foreign Office.

I need not, I am sure, tell your Lordships that I am not influenced in this opinon by any considerations incompatible with the fullest confidence in the personal honour and uprightness of the Clerks of this office who may, directly or indirectly, now or hereafter, be called upon to discharge any duties connected with the Act; but your Lordships will doubtless agree with me that it is important to forestall cavil and criticism, however misplaced, in regard to public servants, whether employed in the Foreign Office or any other department of the Government.

It is on these grounds, therefore, that I bring before your Lordships at the present time, the Earl of Clarendon's letters of 1854 and 1855, and I earnestly request your Lordships to enable me to effect the proposed abolition of the Agency system, by consenting to grant to those Clerks who now hold Agencies liberal compensation, to which I consider they are fully entitled, for the loss to which they will be subjected.

It is right that I should place before your Lordships a statement which the Agents have drawn up in support of their claims; and I add a schedule showing the amount of the emoluments they have derived from their Agencies in the last three years.

The abolition of the present system will, as intended by Lord Clarendon, involve the necessity of making some arrangements for enabling Her Majesty's Diplomatic and Consular Servants to obtain payment of their salaries and allowances which have heretofore been received on their account by their Agents in this office.

I have consulted, as you will see by the enclosed copy of a Circular Despatch, Her Majesty's Ministers at the Courts of Europe and in the United States, as to the practice observed on this point in the respective countries, and I will hereafter communicate further with your Lordships on the subject; while I shall also have to ask your consent to some arrangement, involving, I hope, but a very small expenditure, which must be made for forwarding the correspondence of Her Majesty's Diplomatic and Consular Servants.

I have, &c.

CIRCULAR addressed to Her Majesty's Ministers.

Foreign Office, 18 December 1867.

MY attention, since I have held the seals of the Foreign Office, has been turned to the system which has been in operation for a very long period of time, under which the Clerks of this Department have been allowed to act as Agents for Her Majesty's Diplomatic and Consular Servants. But the arrangements in progress for carrying out the provisions of the Exchequer Audit Act of 1866 (which, as regards the Foreign Office, will come into operation on the 1st April next, and under which the administration of all the funds required for the service of the Department both at home and abroad, involving the duties of issue and audit, heretofore in a great degree discharged by other Departments, will devolve on the Foreign Office) have induced me more particularly at the present time to consider how far the continuance of the Agency System is compatible with the altered circumstances arising out of that Act.

I have now arrived at the conclusion that they are incompatible; and, that being the case, it becomes necessary to ascertain by what means Her Majesty's Diplomatic and Consular Servants abroad can be secured in obtaining, with punctuality, payment of their salaries and allowances as they become due, without the intervention of Agents connected with the Foreign Office, who, with few exceptions, have acted hitherto in their behalf for that purpose.

I have accordingly to instruct you as soon as possible to ascertain and report to me in what manner the Government to which you are accredited, provides for the payment of salaries and allowances due to their Diplomatic and Consular Officers in foreign parts, and whether the payments on this account are made without any charge on the recipients for agency, commission, discount of bills, or otherwise; and if not, what may be the estimated amount of such charges; and further, how soon after the expiration of each quarter such salaries and allowances are actually available for expenditure by the persons to whom they are due.

It is my earnest desire that the abolition of Agency in the Foreign Office, which I consider must be made absolute and complete, if made at all, should be effected with as little inconvenience as may be to Her Majesty's Diplomatic and Consular Servants, who have hitherto availed themselves of it; and I will give my best consideration to any suggestions that you may offer with that view. And under any circumstances sufficient time will be allowed to enable Her Majesty's Diplomatic and Consular Officers to make such arrangements as they may think best to meet the change which I have in my contemplation to effect.

I am, &c.

The Secretary to the Treasury to Mr. Hammond.

Sir, Treasury Chambers, 13 May 1868.

THE Lords Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury have had before them Lord Stanley's letter of the 17th of February, submitting for the consideration of this Board a proposal for the abolition of the Agencies held by certain Clerks in his Lordship's department, and for the grant of compensation in respect of such abolition.

I am to request that you will inform Lord Stanley that after full consideration of the subject, my Lords regret that they cannot concur with his Lordship in recognising the claims of the Foreign Office Agents; and they are not prepared to admit that compensation for the abolition of their Agencies could with justice be made a charge upon public funds.

My Lords would, however, suggest whether the preferable course would not be gradually to abolish the Agencies by prohibiting the appointment of any new Agents, and at the same time directing that the present Agents should not undertake any new duties of this nature.

I am, &c.

Mr. Hammond to the Secretary to the Treasury.

Sir. Foreign Office, 16 May 1868.

I HAVE laid before Lord Stanley your letter of the 13th instant, stating that after full consideration of the subject the Lords Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury regret that they cannot concur with his Lordship in recognising the claims of the Foreign Office Agents, Agents, and are not prepared to admit that compensation for the abolition of these Agencies could, with justice, be made a charge upon public funds.

Lord Stanley desires me to say that he has received this decision with much regret. His Lordship continues to be of opinion that if the Agencies were abolished, compensation would be due to the parties who in pursuance of a system recognised for many years, and sanctioned, with the knowledge of the Board of Treasury, by successive Secretaries of State, have been allowed to carry on the business of Agents to Her Majesty's Diplomatic and Consular Servants.

The suggestions contained in the latter part of your letter for the gradual abolition of Agencies, would, Lord Stanley apprehends, provide a very insufficient and dilatory course for carrying that object into effect.

I am, &c.
(signed) E. Hammond.

MEMORANDUM.

THE inability of the Board of Treasury to concur in the views expressed by Lord Stanley in his letter of the 17th of February, in regard to the claim of the Foreign Office Agents to compensation if the system of Agency were abolished, renders it necessary for his Lordship to determine what steps it may be possible now to take with a view to the eventual abolition of that system.

Lord Stanley considers that a system which for more than three-quarters of a century has after repeated and full inquiry, been sanctioned by successive Secretaries of State, and which was explained in the most complete detail to two Committees of the House of Commons, one of which absolutely refused a proposal for its abolition, while the other did not see occasion to call in question by their report, the propriety of its being maintained, and which, moveover, has been recognised by Her Majesty's Diplomatic and Consular Servants, almost without exception, as conducive to their convenience and advantage, must be held to have acquired such a degree of admitted permanency as entitle those Clerks who have been engaged in carrying it on, to look upon it as a recognised source of emolument, and to expect compensation if, on public grounds, it should be decided to put an end to it.

Lord Stanley, on the grounds stated in his letter of the 17th of February, was prepared to have made arrangements for the abolition, at the earliest possible period, of Foreign Office Agents on the one hand, and, on the other, for the convenience of Her Majesty's Diplomatic and Consular Servants who might be embarrassed by being deprived of the services rendered to them by the Agents as regards the forwarding of their correspondence; but as matters now stand he can only lay down rules for the eventual abolition of the existing system of Agencies when the interests which have grown up under it may be extinguished.

For this purpose Lord Stanley has decided,—

First. That no Clerk or other person connected with the Foreign Office, except such as are, at the date of this Minute, acting as Agents, shall hereafter, directly or indirectly, undertake to act as such for any of Her Majesty's Diplomatic or Consular Servants.

Secondly. That, looking to the possibility of some arrangement being hereafter made for abolishing the Agencies on a grant of compensation, the emoluments derived by an Agent from any person who, after the date of this Minute, shall enter the service and appoint an Agent, shall not be taken into account in estimating the amount of compensation to be granted to an Agent on a general abolition of the system.

Lord Stanley directs that a Circular should be sent to Her Majesty's Ministers, informing them, and directing them to inform the members of their respective Missions, that for the reason stated in this Minute, Lord Stanley is precluded from carrying out any part of the arrangements contemplated in his Circular of the 18th of December last. Lord Stanley, if the abolition of Agencies had been adopted as a general measure, would have endeavoured, with the concurrence of the Board of Treasury, to provide a substitute for them, so far at least as regards the transmission of the private correspondence of Her Majesty's Diplomatic and Consular Servants under official seal through the Foreign Office; but such a substitute could not be partially applied without serious inconvenience as regards the general arrangements of the office, and could only be adopted as part of a complete measure of abolition. Nevertheless, Lord Stanley thinks it right on this occasion to remind Her Majesty's Diplomatic Servants that there is no obligation on them, if otherwise willing to dispense with such services as are usually rendered to them by their Agents, to employ as an Agent a Clerk in the Foreign Office, for any purpose whatever, and specifically not for obtaining payment of their salaries or any other allowances, such, for instance, as Extraordinary Disbursements, which may be due to them. Her Majesty's Diplomatic Servants may entrust to any person whom they may choose to employ, unconnected with the Foreign Office, their powers of attorney under which moneys becoming due to them may be regularly received, on application at stated periods to the Chief Clerk of the Foreign Office, to whom Her Majesty's Diplomatic Servants would only have to send, as now, their life certificates at the expiration of each quarter.

Lord Stanley directs that a copy of this Minute shall be entered in the books of the office, and a copy sent to each of Her Majesty's Missions, to be recorded and preserved in the Archives; and Lord Stanley further directs that a Circular founded on it shall be sent to all Her Majesty's Consular Servants, for their information and guidance.

Appendix, No. 7.

I am, &c.

My Lord,
Sir,

Foreign Office, 22 September 1868.

I HAVE to call your attention to the following passage in the Earl of Clarendon's Circular Despatch of the 19th of April 1866:—

"As a general rule, regular attendance in the Chancery for five hours a day should, I conceive, suffice for the daily work of any Mission, though, of course, that time is liable to be prolonged in case of emergency."

I have reason to suppose that some misapprehension exists as to the purport of this passage, which was intended to intimate to Heads of Missions that their Chanceries should, as a general rule, be kept open at least for five hours in each day, excepting Sundays. In the larger Missions the ordinary work, and the maintenance of the Archives in proper order, may provide full employment for the Secretaries and Attachés for such a number of hours; and, at all events, it is but right and proper that wherever a British Mission is maintained, the doors of its Chancery should be open to British subjects and others having business to transact with it, for the time specified.

You will accordingly have the goodness to take care that the rule laid down by the Earl of Clarendon in 1866, and which I now confirm, is duly observed in your Chancery.

I am, &c.

(Circular.) No. 19.

My Lord,
Sir,

Foreign Office, 20 April 1869.

PROVISION having been made in the Estimate for Diplomatic Services for the current financial year for such expenditure as may be incurred by Her Majesty's Embassies and Missions abroad, on account of Extra Couriers and Telegrams, it will no longer be necessary that these two charges should be rendered in a separate account, but they should be included, as in previous years, in your quarterly accounts of Extraordinary Disbursements.

In other respects, and with the exception, of course, of any authority you may have received to draw separate bills on account of Extra Couriers and Telegrams, and which is hereby cancelled, the Circular of the 20th of April 1868 remains in force; but as, besides the re-insertion of the above-mentioned items, sundry other modifications have been introduced into the estimate, a new model form of account is inclosed for your guidance, and you will for the future render your quarterly accounts of Extraordinary Disbursements in strict accordance with it; but I have to remind you, in the terms of the Circular of the 18th of May last, that this account is a pro formâ account, and that you are not to understand it as giving you any authority to insert in your quarterly accounts any items which you have not hitherto been allowed to charge, or which you may not have obtained a special authority to include in your account.

I take this opportunity of saying that as the bills which, under existing instructions, you may be authorised to draw upon the Chief Clerk on account of your Extraordinary Disbursements are in the nature of imprests or advances to be afterwards accounted for by you, it will be desirable that you should exclude fractions of a pound from those bills, and should carry on any balance in shillings and pence for final adjustment when your quarterly account is rendered.

I have to add that it is essential, in order to meet the requirements of the Exchequer Audit Act, that all charges of whatever nature should, where possible, be supported by proof of payment; and where from the nature of the case no vouchers can be obtained, a declaration should be made to that effect, and that the money has been properly disbursed on the Public Service.

In conformity with a Resolution of the House of Commons passed in the last Session of Parliament, "That, in the opinion of this House, all sums required to defray the expenses of the Diplomatic Service ought to be annually voted by Parliament, and that estimates of all such sums ought to be submitted in a form that will admit of their effectual supervision and control by this House," Her Majesty's Government have presented to the House of Commons an estimate of the sums required for the salaries and allowances for house rent of Her Majesty's Diplomatic Servants abroad for the year 1869–70, and a Bill has been prepared for giving Parliamentary sanction to this arrangement.

Those salaries and allowances will therefore no longer be charged upon the Consolidated Fund, but will be the subject of an annual vote; and as, in common with all other voted services, they will be payable for the quarters ending on the 31st of March, the 30th of June, the 30th of September, and the 31st of December, instead of the old quarter-days, Her Majesty's Diplomatic Servants abroad should in future render their life certificates accordingly.

(Circular.)

My Lord,
Sir,

Foreign Office, 14 August 1869.

SINCE the date of Earl Russell's Circular Despatch of the 25th of October 1860, and subsequent to the Report of the Committee of the House of Commons in the following year, various modifications have been carried out in the system of Her Majesty's Diplomatic Service; and it appears desirable that Her Majesty's Government should now be informed what have been the results of such modifications, with a view to a decision as to any further changes which may be desirable.

You are aware that the recommendations of the Committee of 1861, to which practical effects have been given by the sanction of the Secretary of State, are those which related to the examination of Attachés, the period during which their services should remain unpaid, their nomination as Secretaries, the issue of Commissions to them, and the temporary exchanges permitted between members of the Diplomatic Service and Clerks in this Office. Other changes have also been sanctioned by the Secretary of State, of which the different Missions concerned have been made aware, and political considerations have made it necessary to carry out alterations and reductions in the Establishment as it previously existed.

I shall be glad to receive from you such remarks as you may have to offer on the effect of these changes; and I shall be prepared to give my consideration to such suggestions as your experience may enable you to offer as to further improvements which can be carried out with advantage to the Public Service, explaining specially your views as to the Staff which you consider is absolutely required at your Mission.

I shall also be glad to receive from you information on the following points connected with the system in force in the Diplomatic Establishments of the Government to which you are accredited:—

1. What alterations of importance have been made in that service since 1861, either as regards terms of admission, general regulations, and arrangements as to salaries, pensions, or retiring allowances?

2. What rules are in force as regards a property qualification for entering the service?

3. What rules (if any) are laid down as to the marriage of junior members of the service?

4. On what footing is the establishment of Messengers connected with the service carried on; what is the annual cost; and what allowance is made for the expense of postage on the Public Service?

You will be so good as to report to me on these points at your early convenience.

No. 24.

(Circular.)

My Lord,

Sir,

Foreign Office, 16 September 1869.

Since my entrance into office in December last, the question of the Agencies held by various members of this Department under the appointment of the Diplomatic and Consular Servants of the Crown, and with the knowledge and concurrence of successive Secretaries of State, has been pressed on my attention, as it was on that of my immediate predecessor, who in his Circular Despatch of the 30th of June 1868, prepared Her Majesty's Diplomatic and Consular Servants for its ultimate, although not immediate, abolition.

The question of abolition, therefore, I found to be one merely of time; but as that time was left remote, my predecessor did not think it necessary to consider, and still less to express an opinion upon, the best means of providing such a substitute for the existing system as might prove convenient to Her Majesty's Diplomatic and Consular Servants who have heretofore employed as their Agents members on the establishment of the Foreign Office.

I have reason to believe that in a greater or less degree Her Majesty's Diplomatic and Consular Servants have found great convenience under the existing system, in regard to various matters, independently of the receipt of their salaries by their Agents under power of Attorney, and would regret the severance of their personal as distinct from their political relations with the members of the Department under which they serve.

I feel, too, that this severance will be not unattended with inconvenience as regards the transaction of the business of the Office, which, in numerous instances and in various ways, has been much facilitated by the exiting system.

I do not think it, however, for the benefit of the Public Service, or for the interests of the Diplomatic or Consular Servants of the Crown, or of members of this Office who have acted as Agents, that a controversy such as has been carried on for some time past, as to the merits or demerits of the present system, should any longer be continued; but, at the same time, I should much regret not only the pecuniary loss which its abolition would occasion to several members of the Foreign Office now acting as Agents, but in no less degree that its abolition should prove inconvenient to Her Majesty's Diplomatic and Consular Servants.

It has been a satisfaction to me to find that the Agents themselves are disposed to facilitate the abolition of the present system, if I should be willing to accept the resignation of his public employment and emoluments by one of their number, who would thenceforth undertake (though having no official connection with the Public Service, and being, therefore, under no official control) to perform for such members of the Diplomatic and Consular Service as might think proper to appoint him their Agent, duties corresponding with those which he and his fellow-agents have heretofore performed for them.

I am willing to facilitate this arrangement, though by so doing I should be compelled to deprive the Office and the Public of the services of Mr. Staveley, one of the most efficient members of the Establishment, who, I am informed, having come to an understanding with his fellow-agents, by which he would for a time appropriate to them a portion of the Agency receipts, would be willing to forego his position and present emoluments in the Public Service for the profession of a Private Agent, if before taking a step which has so material a bearing on his personal interests, he should be enabled to ascertain that he could reckon upon the transfer to him, as a Private Agent unconnected with the Public Service, of the confidence reposed by the members of the Diplomatic and Consular Service in his fellow-agents and himself while members of the Foreign Office, to such an extent as would warrant his undertaking the Agency without incurring too great a risk.

Mr. Staveley will himself communicate with the members of the two services with the above object; but it rests entirely with them to determine what course they may think proper to adopt in order to provide for themselves a substitute for the present system, which must be brought to a close, and in regard to which, as stated by my predecessor in his Circular of the 30th of June 1868, there was no obligation on the part of Her Majesty's Diplomatic or Consular Servants to have recourse to a Clerk in the Foreign Office to act as Agent for any purpose whatever.

I have only to add on this subject that if Mr. Staveley, on ascertaining the wishes and intentions of the members of the two services, should desire to renounce his Clerkship in this Office, to undertake the Agency, I will offer no objection to his doing so; and I shall greatly rejoice if by my acquiescence, I can contribute to an arrangement which may tend to the mutual convenience and advantage of the members of Her Majesty's Diplomatic and Consular Services, and of Mr. Staveley himself, who has uniformly discharged his public duties in a manner no less advantageous to the public service than creditable to himself.

As a matter of public convenience, I should be glad if, in answer to his application to you, you would intimate your intentions to Mr. Staveley with as little delay as possible, so that no time may be lost in inaugurating a new system, in place of the one that now exists; whether Mr. Staveley should be induced, by the result of his application to the members of the two services, to leave the Office, or whether, in the contrary case, some other course must be taken.

You will communicate this Despatch to the members of your Mission, for their information and guidance.

My Lord,
Sir,

Foreign Office, 29 September 1869.

By my Circular Despatch of the 14th of August last, I instructed you to report your opinion on the changes introduced into the organisation of Her Majesty's Diplomatic Service subsequently to the Report of the Committee of the House of Commons of the 23rd of July 1861, and upon certain points connected with the arrangements for the Diplomatic Service in the country in which you reside.

I shall be glad, however, to receive from you, in a tabulated form, a List showing the rank, salaries, and other allowances of the Chiefs of Diplomatic Missions accredited to foreign countries by the country in which you reside, and the numbers of the several persons, whether Cancelliers, Secretaries, Attachés, or Officers of other denominations, composing their Diplomatic Establishments, with the salaries and other allowances assigned to each of them.

I should also wish to receive your opinion as to the estimated amount of expenditure which the junior members of your own Diplomatic Establishment are obliged to incur for their lodging and maintenance, with reference to their social position in the place of their residence.

I have further to instruct you to obtain, from persons competent from their local knowledge to afford full and impartial information on the subject, such, for instance, as bankers or influential merchants, a comparative statement of the cost of living (I do not mean by this a detailed statement of the articles of consumption, but a general statement in round figures) at the present time and in the year 1850; and also a like comparative statement of the cost of house rent and furniture, carriages and horses, and wages of domestic servants, from which a judgment may be formed as to the comparative purchasing value at the present time of the salaries assigned to Her Majesty's Diplomatic Servants, and what it would have been in the year 1850. And, if such information can be obtained, I should be also glad to know whether the general style of living among the society in which members of the Diplomatic Body are in the habit of mixing is more moderate or more expensive now than it was in 1850.

My Lord,
Sir,

Foreign Office, 13 October 1869.

Lord Clarendon has just learned for the first time that Mr. Staveley's letter of the 16th of September, offering his services to you conditionally as Private Agent unconnected with the Office, was placed in the same cover with his Lordship's Circular of that day, acquainting you that the system hitherto existing under which Clerks in the Foreign Office were allowed to act as Agents for Her Majesty's Diplomatic and Consular Servants who might choose to employ them would be discontinued.

In case you should have been led to suppose by this circumstance that Mr. Staveley's letter was an inclosure in his Lordship's Circular, and that he desired to influence your decision in regard to Mr. Staveley's application, Lord Clarendon directs me to say that, although he was content to assist in relieving Her Majesty's Diplomatic and Consular Servants from the inconvenience which he fears may result to them from the abolition of a system which has continued for many years, by allowing Mr. Staveley to retire from the Office with a view to undertake the Agency of any of them who might desire to employ him, his Lordship had not the slightest intention or wish to influence them in a matter which bears exclusively on their own personal feelings, interests, and convenience.

You will make this known to the different members of your Mission.

I am, &c.

No. 27.

(Circular.)

My Lord,
Sir,

Foreign Office, 31 December 1869.

The Post Office have called my attention to the very heavy payments they have to make to Foreign Governments for transit postage on account of the Foreign Office, and I am desirous to assist them in reducing the amount of these payments.

I hope, indeed, that the heads of Her Majesty's Missions abroad bear constantly in mind the regulations laid down by Viscount Palmerston in 1840, in regard to the transmission of of letters by post, with the explanations by which those Regulations were accompanied, as set forth in his Circular Despatch of the 15th May 1840.

But it is not sufficient that the heads of Her Majesty's Missions should themselves observe those Regulations; it is necessary that they should see that they are observed by others also.

I do not here allude only to the placing inside of envelopes addressed to the Secretary of State or Under Secretary of State letters which ought not to be so forwarded, but also to the case of letters being sent from Her Majesty's Missions to private parties in this country, the postage prepaid on such letters being passed in the account of the Missions with the Foreign Post Office.

I need scarcely say that the latter proceeding would be equally, if not more objectionable than the former; and I must request the Heads of Missions to take such measures as may effectually put a stop to it, if it has been practised by any persons under their control.

I must beg you to impress upon the members of your Mission that the very great indulgence of receiving and sending their letters free, which was continued to them in 1840, is allowed on the express understanding that the conditions on which it is granted are faithfully observed, and that no letters except those bonâ fide written by or to members of the Diplomatic Service, or these members of their respective families who may be residing with them, are ever sent in covers passing through a Foreign Post Office.

But, in other respects, while strictly observing the Regulations of 1840, the members of Her Majesty's Diplomatic Service will go far to meet the objects of the Post Office, and my wishes, if in the case where Messengers pass periodically through the place of their residence, they refrain, except in cases of real emergency, and in which the dispatch of public business is concerned, from sending letters by post; and if, when they do send letters by post, they will write them on thin paper, prepaying the postage, and requesting their correspondents in this country to do the same.

I wish also to observe that these directions apply not only to letters sent in packets, but to those sent in bags, passing through Foreign Post Offices, as they do in some cases; and in regard to such bags, it must be clearly understood that the same restrictions are to be applied as in regard to letters sent in covers by post; and that in no case are such bags to be used for the transmission of parcels.

I am aware that a practice has grown up of considering that bags sent by sea in mail packets or other British vessels may be used for the transmission of parcels other than those specified by the Regulations of 1840; but though such a practice may not entail any payment to foreign countries for transit postage, it is unquestionably inconsistent with the Regulations of 1840; and though I will not at the present time peremptorily put a stop to it, I reserve to myself to do so at any future time if the indulgence is abused.

I will not, at all events for the present, interfere with the existing Regulations under which parcels of a certain weight may be sent in bags conveyed from and to London by Queen's Messengers. But my attention has been attracted by the very heavy charges in the Messengers' bills on account of extra luggage imposed by foreign railways, which it is impossible for me to allow to continue.

I fear that many things are sent in bags conveyed by Messengers under the extended privileges granted in 1863, which were wholly excluded by the Regulations of 1840, and which were scarcely contemplated by those of 1863; I allude more specifically to articles of dress, wooden cases, &c. I should be sorry to deprive Her Majesty's Diplomatic Servants of the convenience which they may derive from receiving and forwarding in the bags sent by Messengers, small packages which might be lost if sent by public conveyance; though I believe, at the present time, greater facilities than were formerly available exist for the sending and receiving parcels by such a channel. But I must look to Her Majesty's Diplomatic Servants generally, and more specifically to the Heads of Missions, for co-operation in my attempts to reduce the heavy expenditure on bags conveyed by Messengers.

I will add that Her Majesty's Diplomatic Servants must clearly understand that they are not authorised, except under very special circumstances, and with the direct approval of the Heads of Missions in each particular case, indicated by his signature on the direction in his own handwriting, to send even in bags conveyed by Messengers either letters or parcels for private persons.

My present Despatch is to be read with the Regulations of 1840 and 1863, of which, as well as of the Circulars of 1840, 1843, and 1863, for convenience I enclose copies; which Regulations are in every respect to continue to be observed, except in so far as they are modified by what I have now stated; and I have desired a copy of my Despatch to be circulated in this Office for the guidance of its members. (5.)

REGULATIONS respecting Parcels.

1. No more than one bag containing parcels for the private use of the members of Her Majesty's Mission, or of any other persons employed by this Office, at any one place shall be sent from the Foreign Office by a Messenger going to or passing through such place;

Appendix, No. 7.

and no such bag shall be made up for any place where there is not a Mission, or a person in the immediate employment of the Foreign Office.

2. No parcel shall be enclosed in such bag of other than moderate dimensions, and the whole weight of parcels other than those allowed by the Regulations of 1840, addressed to any one person shall not exceed 10 lbs.

3. No parcel addressed to a private person shall be sent in such bag except with the express permission either of the Secretary of State, of one of the Under Secretaries, or of the Assistant Under Secretary of State.

4. No parcel shall be sent in the parcel-bag from this Office to any of Her Majesty's servants abroad, unless it is accompanied, on delivery at this Office, with a letter from the person to whom it is addressed, and acknowledging the parcel [i. e., that is, authorising its delivery], or, in default of such letter, unless sanctioned by one of the Under Secretaries or by the Assistant Under Secretary.

Foreign Office, 10 January 1863.

Parcels cannot be forwarded to Her Majesty's Missions abroad otherwise than in conformity with the above Regulations; and even in the case of parcels coming within those Regulations, it is impossible to make any promise as to when any particular parcel or parcels shall be forwarded. It is, however, to be observed, that the smaller and lighter the parcel is, the greater will be the probability, provided it be securely packed, of its being forwarded; therefore every endeavour, consistent with proper packing, should be made to reduce the size and weight of the parcels. It is further recommended that parcels which it desired should be sent abroad without delay should be brought to the office as early as possible between the hours of 1 and 5 p.m.; and the letter or order referred to in paragraph 4 should be brought to the Foreign Office open, in order that it may be exhibited at the time of the delivery of the parcel to which it relates.

(Circular).

My Lord,
Sir,

Foreign Office, 10 January 1863.

My attention has been called to the enormous amount of the expenditure which is now incurred on account of the railway charges for extra luggage conveyed by the Queen's Messengers employed abroad.

The restrictions imposed by the Circular of the 15th May 1840, have become a dead letter; and the abuse has gone on increasing until it involves an annual expenditure of not much less than 2,500 l. a year.

It is impossible for me to allow such a state of things to continue.

I will not, however, enforce the very stringent regulations on this subject laid down by Viscount Palmerston in 1840, without first ascertaining whether the modification of those Regulations which I am prepared experimentally to make, is accepted and observed by Her Majesty's Missions abroad in a proper spirit; but if I should be disappointed in this respect, I shall, without hesitation, prohibit anything whatever beyond public despatches and letters being sent to any Mission that disregards the new Regulations which I now proceed to lay down:—

1. No more than one bag containing parcels for the private use of the members of Her Majesty's Mission, or of any other persons employed by this Office, at any one place, shall be sent from the Foreign Office by a Messenger going to or passing through such place; and no such bag shall be made up for any place where there is not a Mission, or a person in the immediate employment of the Foreign Office.

2. No parcel shall be inclosed in such bag of other than moderate dimensions; and the whole weight of parcels, other than those allowed by the Regulations of 1840, addressed to any one person shall not exceed 10 pounds.

3. No parcel addressed to a private person shall be sent in such bag except with the express permission either of the Secretary of State, or one of the Under Secretaries, or of the Assistant Under Secretary of State.

The agents of the several members of Her Majesty's Diplomatic Service will be held responsible to the Secretary of State for the observance of these rules, so far as they are concerned; and I look to the Heads of Missions to enforce them in their respective Chanceries, in regard to the contents of bags made up in them.

With this view I have to instruct you to make known the contents of this Despatch to all the members of your Mission; and you will acquaint them that they are specially prohibited from allowing private persons unconnected with Her Majesty's Service to receive under their cover parcels by Queen's Messengers. You will further point out to the members of your Mission that this prohibition applies equally to their sending parcels for private persons, without the express permission of the head of the Mission, who, when such permission permission is given, will affix his name, in his own handwriting, to the parcel; and you will warn the members of your Mission that if any instance of a wilful disregard of these prohibitions by any one of them should come to the knowledge of the Secretary of State, the party offending will not only incur a very serious personal responsibility, but may cause the privilege of having a parcel-bag to be entirely withdrawn from the Mission.

These Regulations do not apply with respect to parcels for the Queen or for any of the Royal Family.

To prevent any misunderstanding, I have directed that the Agents in this Office who make up the parcel-bags should reserve a proportionate and reasonable space in the bags for the several persons admitted to share in the privilege of having parcels for their private use conveyed by the Queen's Messengers.

You will understand that, except as hereby modified, the Regulations of Lord Palmerston of 1840, of which, with the Circular relating to them, I enclose copies, are to be strictly observed.

I am, &c.
(signed) Russell.

(Circular.)

My Lord,
Sir,

Foreign Office, 22 September 1843.

Frequent irregularities having recently been committed by several of Her Majesty's Embassies and Missions abroad, in contravention of the established Regulations, by the transmission of private boxes and parcels either in the despatch bags entrusted to Her Majesty's Messengers, or by post addressed to this Office, I have to call your immediate attention to the printed Regulations, already in your possession, for the transmission of the correspondence between the Foreign Office and Her Majesty's Embassies and Missions abroad, and to desire that you will strictly enforce in your Embassy / Mission the rigid and constant observance of those Regulations, modified as they are by the explanations contained in Viscount Palmerston's Circular, in which they were transmitted to Her Majesty's Embassies and Missions abroad.

See Viscount Palmerston's Circular of May 15, 1840.

I have further to state to you that henceforward any box, parcel, or packet which may be sent, contrary to those Regulations, in despatch bags or by post, addressed to this Office, will be forthwith placed at the disposal of the General Post Office, to be charged full postage from the place from which it came, at the cost of the individual to whom it may be addressed.

I herewith enclose some fresh copies of the printed Regulations above referred to, and have to desire that a copy may be kept constantly hung up in a conspicuous part of your Chancery or Secretaries' writing-room.

I am, &c.

Regulations for the Transmission of the Correspondence between the Foreign Office and Her Majesty's Embassies and Missions Abroad.

Regulation A.

For transmission

By Post.

No packets of any description other than Official Despatches, shall be forwarded by the post between the Foreign Office and Her Majesty's Embassies and Missions abroad: and no letters are to be so forwarded but such as are hereinafter specified, viz.:—

1. Official Despatches to and from the Embassies, Missions, and Consulates abroad.

2. Letters to and from the Royal Family of Great Britain.

Regulation B.

For transmission

By Queen's Messengers,

or,

By British Mail Packets or other Vessels carrying Mails or Letter-bags.

No packets or letters are to be forwarded by the conveyance above-mentioned, whether in Official Despatch-bags or in paper covers, other than such as are hereinafter specified, viz.:—

1. Official Despatches to and from Embassies, Missions, and Consulates abroad; and also letters to and from other Departments of Her Majesty's Government, vouched to be on the public service.

2. Letters and parcels to and from the Royal Family of Great Britain.

Appendix, No. 7.

3. Letters forwarded from the Foreign Office, with the name of the Secretary of State, or of one of the Under Secretaries of State, written on the outside cover, either by themselves or by officers specially authorised by them for that purpose; or letters addressed to the Secretary of State or to an Under Secretary of State by name, and countersigned by some member of the Embassy or Mission abroad.

4. Newspapers for the use of the Foreign Office, or for the Chief or the Secretary of an Embassy or Mission, sent in bands with open ends.

3. Letters forwarded from the Foreign Office, with the name of the Secretary of State, or of one of the Under Secretaries of State, written on the outside cover, either by themselves or by officers specially authorised by them for that purpose; or letters addressed to the Secretary of State or to an Under Secretary of State by name, and countersigned by some member of the Embassy or Mission abroad.

4. Newspapers and literary, statistical, or Parliamentary publications, sent for the use of Her Majesty's Government at home, or for any of Her Majesty's Embassies, Missions, or Consulates abroad.

5. Despatches, letters, and packets addressed by functionaries of foreign Governments to the functionaries of such Governments resident at the British Court, or at other Courts or Governments with which the British Court is in communication, and vice versâ; sent, in each case, under the sanction of the Secretary of State, or of the Chief of a British Embassy or Mission abroad; provided always that such letters or packets shall contain only papers or publications of moderate bulk; and that, if sent from the Foreign Office, there shall be written on the outside cover thereof the name of the Secretary of State or of one of the Under Secretaries of State, such name to be written either by those officers themselves or by officers specially authorised by them for that purpose: and that if such packets be forwarded from an Embassy or Mission abroad, there shall be written on the outside cover thereof the name of the Chief of such Embassy or Mission, such name to be written either by that officer himself, or by some member of the Embassy or Mission authorised for that purpose.

It is to be distinctly understood that no packets containing articles not being papers and publications, as above described (except as specified in section 2), are permitted, under these Regulations, to be forwarded between the Foreign Office and Embassies and Missions abroad.

Foreign Office,
7 May 1840.

(Circular.)

My Lord,
Sir,

Foreign Office, 15 May 1840.

The Lords Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury having, by a Warrant under their hands dated the 27th of December last, and issued under the authority of an Act passed in the last Session of Parliament, entitled, "An Act for the further Regulation of the Duties on Postage," directed that, from and after the 10th of January of the present year, the privilege of sending and receiving by post, free of postage, letters, either Parliamentary or Official, or of any other description whatsoever, shall be suspended during the time the said Warrant shall be in force; and the effect of this measure being to render the correspondence of this office liable to foreign postage, it has appeared to the Secretary of State to be expedient to revise the Regulations for carrying on the correspondence between this Department and Her Majesty's Embassies and Missions abroad, in order to prevent any correspondence, or other things, which have no relation to the public service, from being transmitted under Official covers, or in Official bags, so as unnecessarily and improperly to increase the annual charge of postage against the Foreign Office.

For this purpose the annexed Regulations have been framed, and I have to desire that you will yourself conform to the provisions thereof, and that you will cause the same to be strictly attended to and carried into effect by the members of your Mission.

With

With reference to section 3, Regulation A, you will understand that it is not intended to deprive Her Majesty's Diplomatic Servants abroad of the privilege which they have hitherto enjoyed of forwarding their own personal correspondence in the Official bags or by post. Under that indulgence may be admitted letters actually written by, or destined for, the gentlemen of the Embassy or Mission on their own affairs; or letters of the same kind to or from those members of their respective families who may be residing with them; or letters of the same kind to and from the members of the Foreign Office. But it must be clearly understood that the letters so allowed to be transmitted must be such only as belong to the personal correspondence of the parties to and from whom they are transmitted, and must on no account contain enclosures for any persons not entitled by these Regulations to send or receive such letters in their own name; and the writer of the letter must inscribe his signature on the outside cover, as vouching for the bonâ fide character of the letter, and for its being in strict conformity with the above-mentioned conditions.

You will accordingly understand, and you will distinctly explain to the members of your Mission, that this privilege can only be continued on the express condition that the limitations so laid down shall be punctually and conscientiously observed by every member of your Mission.

Orders in conformity with this Regulation are in like manner issued to the members of the Foreign Office, who are prohibited from receiving or forwarding through your Mission any letter or packet except such as are permitted by the annexed Regulations, or such as shall have received the especial sanction of the Principal Secretary of State.

You will cause a copy of the annexed Regulations to be hung up in the Chancery of your Mission, and you will enjoin the scrupulous observance thereof upon every gentleman who may, from time to time, belong to your Mission.

I am, &c.
(signed) Palmerston.

No. 28.

(Circular.)

My Lord,
Sir,

Foreign Office, 9 March 1870.

I HAVE to state to you, that I propose shortly to present to Parliament, copies of the Reports on Land Tenure and Industrial questions abroad, received from Her Majesty's Secretaries of Legation and other Officers, in pursuance of the instructions contained in my Circular of the 26th of August last.

In addressing those Circulars to Her Majesty's Missions, I was well aware that the matters to which the attention of the Secretaries and other Officers were therein directed would not come within their ordinary cognisance; but I had full confidence in the readiness of the Secretaries and other Officers efficiently to discharge any duty which they are called upon to perform.

In this anticipation I have not been disappointed, and in giving publicity to the Reports, I do not doubt that Parliament and the Public will recognise in them satisfactory evidence of the zeal, intelligence, and ungrudging industry of the respective writers.

I am, &c.

in a sum not to exceed three thousand dollars, and may be charged, proceeded against, tried, convicted, and dealt with, therefor, in the district where he may be arrested or in custody.

Provisions in case of desertion of seamen.

Sec. 25. And be it further enacted, That whenever any seaman or mariner of any vessel of the United States shall desert such vessel, the master or commander of such vessel shall note the fact and date of such desertion on the list of the crew, and the same shall be officially authenticated at the port or place of the Consulate or Commercial Agency first visited by such vessel after such desertion, if such desertion shall have occurred in a foreign country, or if in such case such vessel shall not visit any place where there shall be any Consulate or Commercial Agency before her return to the United States, or the desertion shall have occurred in this country, the fact and time of such desertion shall be officially authenticated before a notary public immediately at the first port or place where such vessel shall arrive after such desertion; and all wages that may be due to such seaman or mariner, and whatever interest he may have in the cargo of such vessel, shall be forfeited to and become the property of the United States, and paid over for their use to the collector of the port where the crew of such vessel are accounted for as soon as the same can be ascertained: first deducting therefrom any expense which may necessarily have been incurred on account of such vessel in consequence of such desertion; and settling the account of such wages or interest no allowance or deduction shall be made except for moneys actually paid, or goods at a fair price supplied, or expenses incurred to or for such seaman or mariner, any receipt or voucher from or arrangement with such seaman or mariner to the contrary notwithstanding.

Provision for the case of the discharge of seamen abroad.

Sec. 26. And be it further enacted, That upon the application of any seaman or mariner for a discharge, if it shall appear to the Consular Officer that he is entitled to his discharge under any Act of Congress, or according to the general principles or usages of maritime law, as recognised in the United States, he shall discharge such seaman or mariner, and shall require from the master or commander of the ship or vessel from which such discharge shall be made, the payment of three months' extra wages, as provided by the Act hereinbefore mentioned, approved February twenty-eight, eighteen hundred and three; and it shall be the duty of such master or commander to pay the same, and no such payment or any part thereof shall be remitted in any case, except such as are mentioned in the proviso of the ninth clause of the Act entitled "An Act in addition to the several Acts regulating the Shipment and Discharge of Seamen and the Duties of Consuls," approved July twentieth, eighteen hundred and forty, and as hereinafter provided; and the extra wages required to be paid by the said ninth clause of the last hereinbefore mentioned Act, and by this section shall be applicable to the same purposes and in the same manner as is directed by the said Act approved February twenty-eighth, eighteen hundred and three, in regard to the extra wages required to be paid thereby; and if any Consular Officer, when discharging any seaman or mariner, shall neglect to require the payment of and collect the extra wages required to be paid in the case of the discharge of any seaman or mariner, by either of the said Acts, as far as they shall remain in force under this Act or by this Act, he shall be accountable to the United States for the full amount of their share of such wages, and to such seaman or mariner to the full amount of his share thereof; and if any seaman or mariner shall, after his discharge, have incurred any expense for board or other necessaries at the port or place of his discharge before shipping again, such expense shall be paid out of the share of the three months' wages to which he shall be entitled, which shall be retained for that purpose, and the balance only paid over to him: Provided, however, that in cases of wrecked or stranded ships or vessels, or ships or vessels condemned as unfit for service, no payment of extra wages shall be required.

1803, ch. 9. Vol. ii. p. 203.

1840, ch. 48. Vol. v. p. 394.

Proviso.

List to be kept of seamen shipped or discharged, and of all vessels arriving or departing, and of their cargoes.

Sec. 27. And be it further enacted, That every Consular officer shall keep a detailed list of all seamen and mariners shipped and discharged by him, specifying their names and the names of the vessels on and from which they shall be shipped and discharged, and the payments, if any, made on account of each so discharged, and also of the number of the vessels arrived and departed, and the amounts of their registered tonnage, and the number of their seamen and mariners, and of those who are protected, and whether citizens of the United States or not, and as nearly as possible the nature and value of their cargoes, and where produced, and make returns of the same, with their accounts and other returns, to the Secretary of the Treasury; and no Consular officer shall certify any invoice unless he shall be satisfied that the person making the oath or affirmation thereto is the person he represents himself to be, that he is a credible person, and that the statements made under such oath or affirmation are true; and he shall, thereupon, by his certificate, state that he was so satisfied; and it shall be the duty of every Consular officer to furnish to the Secretary of the Treasury, as often as shall be required, the prices current of all articles of merchandise usually exported to the United States from the port or place in which he shall be located.

Prices current to be furnished.

Masters, &c., of ships obliged to apply to said officers when he has occasion for any of said services.

Sec. 28. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of every master and commander of a ship or vessel of the United States, whenever he shall have occasion for any Consular or other official service, which any Consular officer of the United States shall be authorised by law or usage officially to perform, and for which any fees shall be allowed by the said rates or tariffs of fees as aforesaid, to apply to such one of the said officers as may then be officially located at the Consulate or Commercial Agency, if any there be where such service shall be required, to perform such service, and such master or commander shall pay to such officer such fees as shall be allowed for such service, in pursuance ance of the provisions of this Act; and if any such master or commander shall omit so to do, he shall be liable to the United States for the amount of the fees lawfully chargeable for such services, as though the said services had been performed by such officer; and all Consular officers are hereby authorized and required to retain in their possession all the papers of such ships and vessels which shall be deposited with them as directed by law, till payment shall be made of all demands and wages on account of such ships and vessels.

Papers may be detained till payment of fees.

Duties of Consular Officers when citizens die abroad.

Sec. 29. And be it further enacted, That if any citizen of the United States who shall die abroad shall, by any lawful testamentary disposition, leave special directions for the custody and management, by the Consular officer of the port or place where he shall die, of the personal property of which he shall die possessed in such country, as contemplated by the Act entitled "An Act concerning Consuls and Vice-Consuls," approved April fourteenth, seventeen hundred and ninety-two, it shall be the duty of such officer, so far as the law of such country will permit, strictly to observe such directions; and if any such citizen so dying shall, by any lawful testamentary disposition, have appointed any other person or persons than such officer to take charge of and manage such property, it shall be the duty of such officer, whenever required by such person or persons so appointed, to give his official aid in whatever way may be necessary to facilitate the proceedings of such person or persons in the lawful execution of such trust; and, so far as the laws of the country permit, to protect the property of the deceased from any interference of the local authorities of the country where such citizen shall die; and to this end it shall be the duty of such Consular officer to place his official seal upon all or any of the personal property or effects, of the deceased, and to break and remove such seal as may be required by such person or persons, and not otherwise.

1792, ch. 24, s. 2. Vol. i, p. 255.

Fees, in what coinage payable.

Sec. 30. And be it further enacted, That all fees collected for and in the behalf of the United States, in pursuance of this Act, shall be collected in the coin of the United States, or as its representative value in exchange.

Construction of former Acts about Consular Officers.

Sec. 31. And be it further enacted, That in the construction and for the purpose of all other Acts and parts of Acts which shall remain in force after this Act shall take effect, defining any of the powers, declaring any of the rights, prescribing any of the duties, or imposing any penalty or punishment for any act of omission or commission of any Consul, Commercial Agent, Vice-Consul, or Vice-Commercial Agent, or allowing or enjoining the performance of any act, matter, or thing, with or before any such officer, all such Acts and parts of Acts shall in all these several respects, so far as may be consistent with the subject-matter and context of the same and with this Act and the Treaties of the United States, be deemed and taken to include and apply to all Consular officers as though all such officers were specially named therein; and the said official designations in contemplation of all such Acts and parts of Acts, and of this Act, shall be deemed and taken to have the respective meanings hereinafter assigned to them; that is to say, "Consul-General," "Consul," and "Commercial Agent," shall be deemed and taken to denote full, principal, and permanent "Consular officers," as distinguished from subordinates and substitutes; "Deputy Consul" and "Consular Agent" shall be deemed and taken to denote "Consular officers" subordinate to such principals, exercising the powers and performing the duties within the limits of their Consulates or Commercial Agencies respectively, the former at the same ports or places, and the latter at ports or places different from those at which such principals are located respectively; and "Vice-Consuls" and "Vice-Commercial Agents" shall be deemed and taken to denote "Consular officers," who shall be substituted temporarily to fill the places of "Consuls-General," "Consuls," or "Commercial Agents," when they shall be temporarily absent or relieved from duty; and the term "Consular officer," as used in this Act, shall be deemed and taken to include all such officers as are mentioned in this section, and none others; and the term "Diplomatic officer," as used in this Act, shall be deemed and taken to include all the officers mentioned in the first section of this Act, and none others.

Meaning of titles of Consular Officers.

Penalties on Consular Officers for violation or neglect of duty.

Sec. 32. And be it further enacted, That if any Consular officer shall wilfully neglect or omit to perform seasonably any duty imposed upon him by this or any other Act, or by any order or instruction made or given in pursuance of this or any other Act, or shall be guilty of any wilful malfeasance or abuse of power, or any corrupt conduct in his office, he shall be liable to all persons injured by any such neglect, or omission, malfeasance, abuse, or corrupt conduct, for all damages occasioned thereby; and for all such damages by any such officer, he, and his sureties upon his official bond, shall be responsible thereon to the full amount of the penalty thereof, to be sued in the name of the United States for the use of the person or persons so injured; provided that such suit shall in no case prejudice, but shall be held in entire subordination to the interests, claims, and demands of the United States, as against such officer, under such bond, for every wilful act of malfeasance or corrupt conduct in his office; and if any such officer shall refuse to pay any draft, order, or warrant which may be drawn upon him by the proper officer of the Treasury Department for any public moneys of the United States in his hands, or for any amount due from him to the United States, whatever the capacity in which he may have received or may hold the same, or to transfer or disburse any such moneys promptly upon the legal requirement of any authorised officer of the United States, he shall be deemed and taken to be guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be punished by imprisonment not to exceed ten years nor less than one year, or by fine not to exceed two thousand dollars nor less than two hundred dollars, or both, at the discretion of the Court; and any such officer so offend-

The compensation of salaried Consuls is limited to the amount of the salary, out of which the officer must defray the expense of clerk-hire.

The compensation of the feed Consuls is limited to $2,500, if the fees exceed that sum; but such Consuls are authorised to pay their clerks the fees received at the consulate.

The column of fees shows the amount of fees received at each consulate and agency from which returns have been made for the fiscal year en 30th June 1869.

It is the usual practice for the agent to retain one-half of the fees of the agency until the sum retained by him amounts to $1,000. This rule i universal. The Consul is entitled to retain $1,000 a year in the aggregate from the agencies under his consulate.

The column of expenses represents the amounts paid for seamen as well as the compensation of the consular officer and the proper expenses of consulate.

The amount of fees and expenses, respectively, are as reported from the Fifth Auditor's office of the Treasury Department.

The letter (n) indicates that the officer is a naturalised citizen, and the letter (b) that he is authorised to transact business.]

FEES COLLECTED BY CONSULAR OFFICERS.

CONSULAR FEES prescribed by the President of the United States, in accordance with the Provisions of the Act of Congress, approved 18th August 1856, regulating the Diplomatic and Consular Systems of the United States.

CIRCULAR, No. 49.

Department of State, Washington, 26 March 1864.

To the Consular Officers of the United States,

I TRANSMIT herewith, for your information and guidance, the revised rates or tariff of fees prescribed by the President, under the provisions of the 16th section of the Act to regulate the Diplomatic and Consular Systems of the United States, to be charged by all consular officers for the services "which shall be regarded as official services." The fees therefore "are to be collected in the coin of the United States, or at its representative value in exchange." The rates established by this tariff are intended to supersede those which were heretofore prescribed, and are to be carefully observed in all cases by consular officers.

At the expiration of each quarter, all fees collected by all salaried consular officers residing at seaports must be accounted for to the Secretary of the Treasury, pursuant to Forms Nos. 8, 33, 44, and 45; and by those residing at inland places; agreeably to Forms Nos. 9 and 33, and the respective amounts held subject to his draft or "other directions." Similar reports must be made quarterly to this department by all unsalaried consular officers. To enable this department to comply with the provisions of the 16th section of the Diplomatic and Consular Act, a report must be made, pursuant to Form No. 138, to this department by all consular officers.

Consuls are further instructed that the rates for consular services, in pursuance of the revised tariff, are to be charged from and after the 30th of June next.

(signed) William H. Seward.

(Approved.)

28 March 1864.

(signed) A. Lincoln.

Appendix, No. 8.

LETTER from Major Munro to the Earl of Clarendon.

My Lord, Monte Video, 19 October 1869.

I HAVE the honour to acknowledge the receipt of Mr. Otway's Despatch—Commercial—No. 17, of 31 of August last, conveying to me the intimation that the post of Chargé d'Affaires to this Republic will no longer be continued as a distinct appointment, but that Her Majesty's Minister to the Argentine Confederation would henceforward discharge the political duties connected with the Republic of the Uruguay.

Mr. Otway has also informed me that for the discharge of the Consular duties and the general superintendence of British interests within the territories of this Republic, it is your Lordship's pleasure that my services be retained, with the rank of Consul, in which capacity a salary will be allowed to me of eight hundred pounds (800 l.) a year, with the additional allowance of one hundred and fifty pounds (150 l.) for the service of a clerk, but that the fees collected at the Consulate will hereafter be carried to the public account.

Mr. Otway further instructs me to understand that my Consulate is placed under the superintendence of Mr. Stuart, and that it will be my duty to keep him accurately informed on all points of interest and be guided by his instructions.

My Lord, it is, in the first place, my desire to express to your Lordship my appreciation of your Lordship's kindness towards me, and the sincere gratitude which I feel at this manifestation of your Lordship's confidence in having appointed me to the important post of Her Majesty's Consul at the capital of the Uruguayan Republic.

But, my Lord, with relation to this appointment, there is a point which I most respectfully but earnestly solicit your Lordship to consider.

In Mr. Otway's Despatch, my Lord, already referred to, I am desired hereafter to carry all the fees of the Consulate to the public account, without any allowance, beyond 150 l. for a clerk, being mentioned in substitution; whereas, my Lord, in every other South American Consulate there is an allowance for office expenses in proportion to the amount of fees which had been, under previous arrangement, applied to that outlay.

In Buenos Ayres, my Lord, the Consul's salary is fixed at 900 l. a year, with 600 l. extra allowance; and, my Lord, I speak advisedly when I say that both in house-rent and every other description of expense, Monte Video is by much the dearer of the two places, and the salary and allowances accorded to Monte Video has been assimilated to the inferior port of Rio Grande, the return of fees from which is 246 l., while the last return from Monte Video was 715 l., and will be higher for 1869.

I now, my Lord, pay 372 l. a year, or 150 dollars a month, for the rent of my dwelling-house and Consulate, in which fortunately the united accommodation is combined; and I assure your Lordship that if I were to hire an office in an accessible locality for shipmasters, and lodge my family in the suburbs, it could not be done cheaper. I have but one clerk, and I give him 250 l. a year, and at the present rate of salaries ruling at Monte Video it is quite impossible to obtain an honest and tolerably intelligent clerk for a less sum.

These two expenses, my Lord, exclusive of stationery, lighting, and service, amount to 622 l.

My Lord, while I was a Vice Consul, with a salary of 500 l., when Monte Video was a far cheaper place of residence than it has since become, with the most rigid economy I never could bring my expenditure within 800 l. for the year; but I did not complain, I had no right to do so, having taken the appointment with a pre-knowledge of the salary; but, my Lord, I do not deem that I am unreasonable, if, in the responsible position of Her Majesty's Consul at the capital port of a separate country, with every expense to bear, I should solicit your Lordship to bestow on me a salary upon which I may be able to support my family without continuing to expend the whole of my private income in providing for the unavoidable necessaries of life.

As a proof, my Lord, that I have ground for what I state, I annex a sketch of some of my expenses, public and private, for the past year.

Appendix, No. 8.

Your Lordship will observe that in the above relation, which is strictly according to fact, there is nothing put down for subsistence, clothing, or education of a family of eight children, varying from 20 to 4 years of age, or for medical attendance, subscriptions, or charities, the latter, owing to the great number of pauper English that appear, being really a heavy burden, and one which a reference to the quarterly return of Consular expenditure, will show your Lordship is provided for without charge to Her Majesty's Government.

Your Lordship's generosity will excuse my having entered into this explanation, and I feel certain that in the arrangement that your Lordship has thought an equitable one for this newly-established Consulate, your Lordship has been unaware that Monte Video is now, without exception, the most expensive place of residence in South America, or your Lordship would have granted to me the same allowance, in proportion to the fees, which is the case in other Consulates.

I may be permitted here to refer to the fact, that in December of 1867 Mr. Lettsom, in his Despatch, No. 50, represented the insufficiency of his salary, and that since that date the price of living at Monte Video has advanced fully 25 per cent. I have, my Lord, in conclusion, the honour most respectfully to crave the attention of your Lordship to this, to me, most momentous question, and to suggest that it would be but equitableness to this Consulate that the fees be permitted to be retained by me, or that the salary and allowances be placed on an equal footing with Buenos Ayres, declaring to your Lordship, upon my honour, that in the foregoing statement I have used no exaggeration, nor have I referred to any luxury.

I have enclosed a copy of this Despatch to Mr. Stuart, but who is absent at present from Buenos Ayres.

I have, &c.

Comparative Statement of Fees charged by United States' Consuls, and by Consuls in Her Majesty's Service.

The following Memorandum has been drawn up in communication with, and under the advice of the Marine Department of the Board of Trade. The great differences existing in the nomenclature and arrangement of the fees used in the Consular Services of the United States and Great Britain have rendered only a proximate comparison practicable.

The numbers placed under the following headings of American Fees follow the order observed in the annexed United States Table of Consular Fees:

N.B.—The items of American Fees are given only where they correspond to English Fees charged in analogous cases.

Suggestions for Improving Position of the Junior Members of the Diplomatic Service.

Attachés.—After two years' service, of which six months shall have been spent in the Foreign Office and 15 months on foreign service, an attaché shall receive salary at the rate of 100 l. a year, until such time as by an aggregate length of service of four years, either abroad or in the Foreign Office, and after having passed his second examination, he shall become qualified for a commission as Third Secretary, with a salary of 150 l. a year as now.

Third Secretaries.—After five years' service as Third Secretary and until promoted to be a Second Secretary, a Third Secretary shall receive a salary of 200 l. a year.

Second Secretaries.—After five years' service as Second Secretary, an addition of 50 l. a year shall be made to the salary of a Second Secretary, and after 10 years' service a further addition of 50 l. a year, making in the aggregate 100 l. a year, to be made to the salary of a Second Secretary, on account of length of service, irrespective of the amount of salary properly belonging to the place which he holds as Second Secretary. This additional salary to be held by the Second Secretary till promoted to be Secretary of Legation.

Secretaries of Legation.—A Secretary of Legation, after five years' service as such, shall receive an addition to his salary, whatever it may be, for length of service, of 100 l. a year, until he has completed ten years' service, after which he shall receive an addition of 150 l. a year, making on the whole as now 250 l. a year to his salary, whatever it may be, according to Mr. Canning's regulation now in force.

Furthermore, and as an encouragement to Secretaries of Embassy, Legation, Second Secretaries, Third Secretaries, and Attachés, any person in these ranks who shall have acquired a fair colloquial knowledge, to be certified by the head of the mission, of the language of the country in which he resides, so as to be able for the purpose of ordinary intercourse with the natives of the country to dispense with the assistance of an interpreter, shall, while employed in China, Japan, Russia, Turkey, Persia, and Greece, receive an especial allowance on that ground of 100 l. a year over and above any other salary or allowance that he may receive.

PAPER handed in by Mr. Hammond, 7 April 1870. Appendix No. 1

COPY of a LETTER from Earl Russell to the Lords Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury.

My Lords, Foreign Office, 25 June 1863.

I REGRET to have to state to your Lordships that after an experience of several years, I find it impossible that the public service of this office should be carried on with the number of foreign service messengers who, since the year 1858, have been attached to this office.

Up to that period the stated number was eighteen, though in times of great emergency that number was insufficient, and it was necessary occasionally to employ persons unconnected with the office as well as the home service messengers, in conveying despatches to Her Majesty's representatives at foreign courts.

The Earl of Malmesbury in proposing to the Board of Treasury to reduce the establishment of foreign service messengers from eighteen to fifteen was under the impression that the extension of the electric telegraph throughout the continent would enable the Secretary of State very materially to reduce the numbers of journeys on which it would be necessary to employ messengers.

But the result has proved otherwise, and although if the state of Europe was generally one of tranquillity, which I need not tell your Lordships is very far from being the case now, nor very likely to be so hereafter, the wants of the office might possibly be provided for by fifteen foreign service messengers, that number has for a very long time past been found to be wholly inadequate to meet the demands of the public service.

I need hardly tell your Lordships that I should not feel myself justified in entrusting despatches to any chance person who might be picked up on an emergency; and it has been fortunate that I have been able at times to secure for occasional journeys the services of secretaries and attachés and retired foreign messengers, and of one or two other persons upon whom I could rely. Yet even with this assistance it constantly happens that the home service messengers must be sent on foreign journeys to the very serious inconvenience of the office and to the great disorganization of the latter service, which is not more than sufficiently provided for, when all the messengers are on duty.

I cannot doubt that in consideration of the circumstances which I have thus set forth, your Lordships will assent to the proposal which I have now the honour to lay before you, that the establishment of foreign service messengers should be increased by two, namely, from fifteen to seventeen; and I should be glad to be made acquainted at an early day with your concurrence in this increase.

I have, &c.
(signed) Russell.

PAPERS handed in by Mr. Kaye, 11 April 1870. Appendix, No. 12.

PERSIAN MISSION.

LETTER from Lord Malmesbury to Lord Stanley.

My Lord, Foreign Office, 12 November 1858.

I HAVE the honour to state to your Lordship that the Government of India being now directly administered by the Crown, it appears to me that it would be desirable that the management of the diplomatic and consular correspondence with Persia should be transferred to the Secretary of State for India.

It was placed, as your Lordship is aware, under the superintendence of the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs in the year 1836, in consequence of its being supposed that the counsels of Great Britain would have more weight with the Persian Government if urged in the name of the Sovereign than if tendered merely on behalf of the East India Company, and from that time the representatives of the British Government in Persia have always communicated with the Persian Government under credentials from the Crown, although they were also provided with credentials from the Governor General of India. But under existing circumstances there is no longer the same motive for separating the superintendence of British relations with Persia from that department by which it can most conveniently be exercised, for it cannot be questioned that the interest of Great Britain in Persia is founded on the position which this country occupies in India, and that almost every matter which may come under discussion between this country and Persia, more or less concerns the British Government in India.

At the same time, however, the intercourse of Persia with European nations has considerably increased since the year 1836, and many questions may from time to time arise in Persia in regard to which the diplomatic interference of Her Majesty's representatives at the several Courts of Europe may be required.

In proposing, therefore, to transfer to the Secretary of State for India the superintendence of British relations with Persia, I think it right to point out that in the event of that transfer being made, it will be indispensable that the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs should be kept accurately informed on all diplomatic transactions which may take place with the Court of Teheran, inasmuch as any communications to be held with foreign courts in regard to such matters must necessarily pass through the Foreign Office.

This also appears to be indispensable in regard to questions which arise in Persia, and which bear more or less upon the relations of that country with Turkey. The practice, therefore, of sending his Despatches under flying seal, through Her Majesty's ambassador at Constantinople, should be continued by the minister at Teheran.

Your Lordship is aware that the expenses of the Persian Mission have been defrayed by the East India Company, who have paid on that account a sum of Twelve Thousand Pounds (12,000 l.) a year into the Treasury. I enclose an account which I have received from the Treasury, showing the state of the fund at the present time, and as soon as the arrangement for the transfer has been made, I will apprise the Board of Treasury of the fact; and request that their Lordships will communicate with your Lordship, who will make arrangements to meet charges which may come in between the period of the transfer and the receipt by the mission in Teheran of instructions from the India Office as to the manner in which they are to draw for the future. But I may state at once that the salaries of the envoy and secretary of legation have been paid at the Treasury, while those of the subordinate members of the mission have been paid at Teheran by bills on Her Majesty's Treasury.

With the transfer of the mission it will be necessary that the consulates should also be transferred to the Secretary of State for India. These are three in number, namely, a consulate general at Tabreez, a consul at Teheran, and a consul for Resht and the Caspian ports. The salaries and expenses of these consuls have hitherto been defrayed from the Consular grant, but henceforth they must be provided by the revenues of India.

I enclose a statement, specifying the names of the different officers employed under the direction of this office in Persia, with the rate of salaries assigned to each of them, and the allowances for office expenses in the case of consuls; and also a general statement of the items of extraordinary expenditure which are allowed to be charged in the mission accounts.

Appendix, No. 12.

The correspondence with Persia has been forwarded to Constantinople once a month by the messenger sent with the Despatches for Her Majesty's Embassy, and the Embassy has sent on the Despatches as far as Tabreez, from whence they have been forwarded by messengers in the service of the Persian Mission. The expenses incurred by the Embassy on this account have formed a charge on the sum paid by the East India Company. The Embassy can, if your Lordship pleases, continue to provide for this service after the transfer, unless indeed it should be preferred to leave the duty, as in former times, to an agent paid by the Indian Government, the Despatches being in either case forwarded between this country and Constantinople by the Foreign Office messenger.

In order to secure uniformity, it may be convenient that the credentials for ministers and commissions for secretaries of legation and consuls in Persia, should continue to be made out in the Foreign Office, although sent, when ready for signature, to the India Office, in order that the Secretary of State for India may submit them for Her Majesty's signature, and that the seal may be then affixed to them at the India Office.

It will probably also be most convenient that the whole of the correspondence, both foreign and domestic, with Persia since the transfer of the mission in 1836, from the India Company to the Crown, should at once be transferred to the Secretary of State for India, with the understanding that any reference which circumstances may require the Secretary for Foreign Affairs to make to the archives of past years, shall be immediately attended to by the Secretary for India; and I shall be prepared, with your concurrence, to give directions accordingly.

As soon as the arrangements set forth in my present letter are concurred in by your Lordship, I will acquaint Her Majesty's Minister and consuls with the change, and desire them thenceforth to correspond with the India Office instead of with the Foreign Office.

It appears to me desirable to add that the above proposal is intended only as a transfer by the Crown of the duties of one of Her Majesty's Secretaries of State to another, for the sake of an improvement in a particular portion of the public service, and that Her Majesty, whose sanction I have obtained to the said transfer, wishes it to be distinctly understood that the appointment of any ambassadors, ministers, secretary or consul, will remain as at present, vested exclusively in the Crown.

The Queen having the power to charge any individual Secretary of State with a special duty, would, by my proposal, simply place the duties and responsibility of the Persian Mission in your Lordship's hands instead of mine.

I have, &c.

Paymaster General's Office, 9 November 1858.

(signed) E. A. Hoffay.

LETTER from Lord Stanley to Lord Malmesbury.

My Lord, India Office, 17 November 1858.

I HAVE the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your Lordship's letter of the 12th instant, stating that, in the opinion of your Lordship, the Government of India being now directly administered by the Crown, it is expedient to transfer the superintendence of British relations with Persia to the Secretary of State for India, and intimating that the sanction of Her Majesty has been given to the proposed arrangement.

In the considerations which have prompted your Lordship to suggest this important change I entirely concur; and strongly impressed that it will promote the interests of India, I cheerfully take upon myself the additional responsibilities which it involves. I shall lose no time in laying before the Council of India your Lordship's letter, with my reply, and requesting them to sanction such financial arrangements as may be rendered necessary by the transfer.

To the suggestions offered by your Lordship with respect to the conduct of the diplomatic correspondence, every attention shall be paid. I appreciate the importance of keeping Her Majesty's Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, and Her Majesty's ambassador at Constantinople, fully informed of all matters connected with the relations of the British Government with the Court of Teheran.

For the reception of the records which your Lordship proposes to transfer to the India Office, immediate arrangements will be made. I need not add that every facility of access to them will at all times be afforded to the department over which your Lordship presides.

I do not conceive that it would, at present, be advantageous to disturb the existing arrangements for the conveyance of the correspondence between Great Britain and Persia, though the system of inter-communication between the two countries may, at some future period, be otherwise determined, by the extension of railroads and electric telegraphs.

I have only to add that I concur in the suggestion offered by your Lordship with respect to the preparation at the Foreign Office of credentials for Ministers, and commissions for secretaries of legation and consuls in Persia. It will be the duty of the Secretary of State for India to recommend to Her Majesty fit persons for appointment to these offices; but to secure uniformity, the forms of appointment may expediently be made out at the Foreign Office, and then forwarded to this department, for the seal and signature of the Secretary of State for India.

I have, &c.

Appendix, No. 13.

(Separate.)

LETTER from Mr. Christie to Lord John Russell. Appendix, No. 13.

My Lord, Rio, 26 July 1860.

Mr. SCARLETT having represented to the Earl of Clarendon in his Despatch, separate of 10 October 1856, the great increase of late years in the expense of living at Rio de Janeiro, and especially the difficulty of obtaining a large house, and the enormous rate of house rent, received a reply (separate of 8 December 1857), granting him an additional allowance of 200 l. a year, to enable him to provide accommodation in the country during the unhealthy season at Rio. Mr. Scarlett had not made any reference to the need of a country house, or requested the addition in the particular manner in which it was granted, but had dwelt on the general expensiveness of living in Rio.

I revert to this subject, not in order to ask for any addition to the allowances as they now stand for this mission, but in order to explain that, besides the general discretion which is, I believe, left to a Minister, as to the appropriation of his house rent allowance, I have felt that I might regard the addition of 200 l. made, in consequence of Mr. Scarlett's application, to the house rent allowance of this mission, as a contribution to its general expenses, and that I have established my residence at Petropolis, where I have with me the archives of the mission. I proceed to explain my reasons for doing so, which I hope will meet with your Lordship's approval.

The heat of Rio is such that an European can live in its suburbs, without other discomfort than that of insects, only during four months of the year, and it is positively dangerous from yellow fever during six months, more or less, from January to June.

At Petropolis, which is at an elevation of 2,000 feet, there is, all the year round, a temperate and healthy climate; the Emperor has a palace which he always constantly lives in during the six hottest months; there are houses fit for the residence of a foreign Minister; with the aid of steamers and railroad one ascends from Rio in five hours, and descends in four; there are telegraphic wires from Rio which immediately inform me of anything that may require my presence, and I can go down and return, if I wish, in the same day.

Those diplomatists who live chiefly in Rio, live not in the city, but in a suburb some four or five miles from the centre. Mr. Scarlett's house, which he spoke of in his Despatch to which I have already referred, and for which he paid 540 l. a year unfurnished, was still further, seven miles at least from the centre of Rio, and 12 from the palace inhabited by the Emperor in another suburb. The high rate of house rent, and still more the great difficulties of domestic service in Rio, lead many of the Ministers, and nearly all the junior members of the missions, to live at hotels.

The only Ministers, besides the Royal Internuncio, who have houses in Rio, are the French and Austrian Ministers, who have lived almost all their lives in this country, and married Brazilian ladies, and the Portuguese and Oriental Ministers, who have necessarily special relations and sympathies with Brazil.

The Russian Minister has his residence all the year round at Petropolis.

I arrived in Brazil at the beginning of the yellow fever season, and proceeded at once to Petropolis. It is only within the last month that yellow fever is extinct in Rio and its suburbs; and having, in the meantime, acquired seven months' experience of the business of this mission, I am able to assure your Lordship that I can discharge my duties and fulfil the objects of Her Majesty's mission as well, when established at Petropolis, as if I made my chief residence in a suburb of Rio.

I should mention that there is extremely little business at this mission requiring interviews with British subjects; there are very few occasional visitors; the general wants of the resident British community have always been met by our excellent Consul, whose office is necessarily in the centre of the city. If any British subject wishes to see me on business in Rio, I consider it my duty to go down and see him; only two cases have occurred since my arrival, of British subjects requiring to see me on business.

I have thought it right to explain all these circumstances to your Lordship, and I hope you will be satisfied with my arrangements. My establishment at Petropolis necessarily takes more of my house rent allowance than would be needed for an occasional country house, and the remainder may be considered as absorbed in the expenses of visits to Rio, and in additional expenses arising out of my not having a house there; for instance, wishing to entertain the Brazilian Ministers, the Corps Diplomatique, and a number of British subjects, on Her Majesty's birthday, I gave a dinner at a principal hotel in Rio, at a much greater expense than I should have incurred if I had had my establishment there.

At the same time I am glad to be able to admit, that the arrangement which I make will, on the whole, be an economical one, the general expenses of living at Petropolis being lower than at Rio. But reverting to Mr. Scarlett's estimate of expenses at Rio, which I can quite corroborate, I have no hesitation in saying that I could not maintain a large house and establishment in Rio, together with such a house as I should find necessary for health, and suitable to my position at Petropolis, for the allowances of this mission, which, with the exception of the additional 200 l. a-year granted in Mr. Scarlett's time, were calculated when the expenses of living in Brazil were less than half of what they are now. Mr.

Appendix, No. 13.

Scarlett stated in October 1856:—"Within the last six years the price of everything in Brazil has more than doubled, indeed I am assured by the Russian Chargé d'Affaires, that he calculated living at Rio de Janeiro to be 25 per cent. dearer than at St. Petersburg." This was in 1856. In my Despatch to your Lordship, No. 18, of 13th February, of this year, was enclosed a letter from Mr. Castello, an old resident in Rio, who says, that within the last four years house rent and prices have risen 50 to 75 per cent., and in some cases even as much as 100 per cent.

The comparative economy of living at Petropolis is of course of more importance to the junior members of the mission, even than to myself. My living here has led to the establishment of the secretary and attachés at Petropolis. I was happy to hear that your Lordship had admitted the increased expense of living in Brazil as a reason for increasing the secretary's salary; but a secretary with a family could not possibly, having a house at Rio, live except at an expense considerably beyond the increased salary. The attachés would live there at hotels, and could not live with the greatest economy for less than 600 l. or 700 l. a year; and I have reason to believe that they are fully sensible of the superior advantages of a residence at Petropolis.

The statements which I have made will, I am sure, be confirmed by any of my predecessors, and I would refer confidently to any of them as to the general advantages and fitness of a residence at Petropolis. For myself, however, I must add that, having suffered since I came into this country from asthma, I cannot pass a night in Rio without great inconvenience, and I am satisfied from recent experience, that it would be impossible for me to live there, even in the coolest season.

I have, &c.

The Right Honourable the Lord John Russell, M.P., &c. &c.

(No. 159.)

LETTER from Mr. Christie to Lord John Russell.

My Lord, Rio de Janeiro, 12 December 1860.

I HAVE had the honour of receiving your Lordship's Circular Despatch, No. 70, of 6th November, enclosing a copy of another Circular Despatch addressed to certain embassies and missions, where the business is more extensive, on the duties of secretaries, attachés, and other officers; and I understand that the Circular Despatch is to serve generally, but not rigorously, as a guide for this mission.

I think it right to state to your Lordship that, as this mission is conducted, there is no regular chancery, and that there is no need for one, there being no passport business, and the business for the junior members consisting exclusively of copying, which they do at their own residences, one of them visiting me daily for instructions.

The archives are kept in my house, and are under the superintendence of the paid attaché.

The accounts of extraordinary expenditure have for many years past been superintended by the clerk of the mission, and I see no reason for disturbing this arrangement.

I have not hitherto complied with an instruction in your Lordship's Circular Despatch, No. 11, of 24th January, viz., to inform you, "what part of the public business of the mission is undertaken by the secretary, and whether he is in daily attendance at the diplomatic chancery."

Mr. Baillie did not arrive at this post till some little time after my receipt of that Despatch. I have now the honour to state that Mr. Baillie, except while absent on his recent tour in search of commercial information, has taken his share with the attachés in the copying of correspondence, and that all instructions as to correspondence will in future be sent by me to him, that he may distribute the work.

I wish to ask your Lordships whether I am right in understanding that the passage of your Lordship's Circular of 6th November, on the duties of the secretary, does not exempt him from a share in the actual work of copying. I ask this not in consequence of any doubt or difficulty raised by the secretary of this legation, but because I think it much better for all parties that your Lordship's precise meaning should be correctly understood. In this mission, as I have already said, there is no necessity of daily attendance at a chancery, the business is almost exclusively correspondence, and with only one paid attaché, and generally only one of two unpaid attachés in residence, the secretary's assistance in copying is generally useful, and when either the paid or unpaid attaché is away, indispensable.

I have, &c.
(signed) W. D. Christie.

The Lord J. Russell, M.P.

		10) 278

being an average of 27⅘ (say, 28) in each year.

Of these 278 letters 91 related to telegraph questions, and by far the greater number of the remainder (187) were replies to letters from this office. Some few contained copies of papers for the "information" of the Foreign Office on which no opinion was asked; others suggestions; others related to questions of finance, &c., and, in a few instances, proposed instructions from the India Office to the Bombay Government were submitted for the approval of the Foreign Office, relative to questions on which correspondence had already passed between the two offices.

A short abstract of the letters is annexed, from which it will be seen that out of 278, probably not more than 8 papers in the 10 years can be said to have contained "references" to this office from the India Office on political matters in which the interests of India were concerned. These are marked with a cross.

Appendix, No. 17.

PAPERS handed in by Mr. Morier, C.B.

MEMORANDUM put in, in reply to the Chairman's question as to whether I had considered the causes of the block in the service, and had any suggestion to make as to the means by which that block might be removed.

THE so called "block" in the Diplomatic Service must be considered from two points of view:

1. As resulting from permanent defects in the constitution of the service.
2. As arising from temporary and accidental causes.

I. Under the first head the evil can be traced to the attempt to apply a strictly professional system to a service to which, from its being in the first place numerically too small, and in the second place from the posts which require the higher qualifications being out of all proportion to the posts requiring mere routine qualifications, such a system is inapplicable (e. g. a system of seniority can be applied to the naval service, but could hardly be applied to an individual man-of-war). Out of about 122 persons composing the diplomatic service, some 64 are either heads of missions (or in some way have independent posts), or are first secretaries of legation, i. e. persons who at any moment can be placed in the position of heads of missions. Any one of these 64 individuals, may be called upon by his tact, knowledge, and presence of mind, to do invaluable service to his country, or may, by his deficiency in those qualities, run the risk of plunging the country into unforeseen difficulties.

A remedy very generally recommended for getting rid of this defect is, altogether to unprofessionalise the service, i. e., to appoint eminent men who have had no diplomatic training to the posts of envoys, and to assist them by an inferior class of officials trained abroad, but who are not to rise to the higher posts of the service.

The objection to such a system appears to me to be, that although, for the reasons above given, diplomacy ought not to be strictly considered as a profession, it is yet a service which more than any other requires a very high kind of professional training. To translate the political life of a foreign nation into the political language of one's own country is one of the highest and most difficult of the political arts, and an intellectually superior class of men cannot be expected to devote themselves to the acquisition of this art, unless they have the prospect afforded them of rising to the highest posts.

On the other hand it is not only necessary to leave the Foreign Secretary free to select the agents whom he requires to carry out his policy, which necessarily implies the employment of outsiders, but it appears to me very desirable that outsiders should in part at least be employed. The most efficient means for developing international knowledge and international sympathies in the quarters where this knowledge and these sympathies should exist, would be that Members of either House of Parliament should serve for a few years abroad and then return to Parliament.

It is, however, clear that the combination of outsiders, with a seniority system, constitutes a very real injustice to the non-outsiders. As regards the individuals themselves this may be a matter of little moment. A great public good may be cheaply bought by a good deal of private discontent. But the injustice is bad on public grounds, because such a system must necessarily drive the good men out of the service, or so entirely paralyse them as to prevent their becoming useful public servants.

Such is the problem to be solved. I do not pretend to solve it, but I think it possible to point out where the evil lies. Justice or injustice in the matter of professional advancement can only be predicated where a contract exists.

Before the recommendations of the Committee of 1861, the number of persons with whom the State had entered into contract was comparatively small. They were the heads heads of missions and the secretaries (now called first secretaries) of legation. Neither with the unpaid nor the paid attachés was there any manner of contract. The latter received pay in the form of a gratuity, but had no commission. By the action of the Committee, the whole service was made one of contract, for though the unpaid attachés now have no commission, they engage themselves under the distinct pledge that at the end of four years they shall receive a commission and be paid.

In my opinion, any radical reform of the service must be based on reducing the numbers of persons with whom the State concludes contracts to a minimum, and then strictly fulfilling the contract.

If there were a "tabula rasa" to start from I would suggest some such plan as the following, not as the best possible plan, or one that I have carefully elaborated, but as one which would circumvent the principal difficulties.

I would have three classes of diplomatic servants.

A first class, consisting of Heads of Missions, not necessarily professional, though largely, possibly wholly, consisting of professionally trained persons.

A second class, consisting of Secretaries, wholly professional.

A third class, consisting of unpaid attachés, from whom the second class should be selected by a very severe test examination. I subjoin a rough sketch of the kind of examination I would propose.

All unpaid attachés would have the right to present themselves yearly or biennially for examination. If they passed the examination they would have the right to be selected for the vacant secretaryships.

The State having undertaken no contract, either direct or implied, with these unpaid attachés, no injustice would be committed if some years should elapse before a vacancy occurred. A fixed sum, however, of 3,000 l. or 4,000 l. a year might be placed at the disposal of the Secretary of State wherewith to pay for the services of such exceptionally able men as were waiting for a vacancy. Besides, a man who had passed such an examination as I propose would be a very eligible candidate for employment, either by the State or in a private capacity.

The class of secretaries would be highly paid, so that the place would be desirable for its own sake, and irrespectively of ultimate promotion to the first class. The State would be under no contract to raise the secretary to a mission, because all idea of seniority would be removed, but the individual would know that the post of envoy would be the natural reward of superior merit. I would propose a scale, commencing with 500 l., and rising in the course of 20 or 25 years to 1,500 l., irrespectively of the post at which the individual was employed.

The Foreign Secretary would then be able to appoint either from amongst the secretaries, or from amongst outsiders, the persons he thought most fit, and in the case of outsiders, he would always be able to supply first-rate professional assistance.

II. As regards the momentary causes of the block, some means should be found of retaining the good men and getting rid of the bad men.

This might be done, either by the Foreign Secretary selecting such men in the three lower classes of the profession as had exceptionally distinguished themselves, and bracketing them at the head of the second secretaries as first for promotion to the rank of first secretary, or by a high test examination mostly in subjects chosen by the candidates themselves, and connected with countries in which the individuals have been employed, but which should include a real knowledge of international law and political economy, to which all unpaid attachés and second and third secretaries might voluntarily offer themselves within the next two years.

Those who passed it would be placed at the head of the list of second secretaries, and receive additional salary, till they became first secretaries. Those who did not pass it, or did not present themselves would have the option of remaining where they were, or leaving the service with a fair compensation sum. Perhaps both systems might be combined, i.e. selection by the Foreign Secretary and by examination.

In the next place, I would grant larger pensions than they would be otherwise entitled to, to some of the older servants in the various categories.

Lastly, if any missions are abolished, which, however, I altogether deprecate, I would not abolish the maltogether, but reduce them to chargé d'affairéships for secretaries of embassy, which would at once relieve the block where it is most felt.

Appendix, No. 17.

APPENDIX.

THE foundation of a diplomatic education should be a study of the civil law:—

1. Because international law if studied historically, as it ought to be, in the original writings of Grotius and the founders of the science, cannot be understood except in connection with the civil law.
2. Because it is the one element of culture common to all Latin and Teutonic nations except the English.
3. Because it is a matter of the greatest importance, for the purpose of mutual intercourse and negotiation, that the parties holding the intercourse and negotiating should have a body of thought and formulas in common; I arrange, therefore, my scheme of diplomatic study as follows:—

1. Civil law.
2. International law; history of it.
3. Commercial law.
4. History of treaties.
5. Modern history generally. A detailed knowledge of it since the Treaties of Westphalia.
6. English constitutional history and law.
7. Political economy.
8. A thorough knowledge of French, particularly as to writing.
9. One other foreign language.

The examination should consist of an essay in English, in connection with civil and international law. The subject should be given out a year before, and be of a kind requiring independent and learned research.

At the examination itself, the candidate should have to write a French essay on a kindred subject.

He should also some days previously give notice of the particular points in connection with civil and international law and modern history, on which he desires to be examined.

The examination should be carried on upon the Oxford system of lumping into classes (say, two classes) all the men who come up to a certain standard, and not upon the Cambridge system of classing the individual examinees according to merit.

The object should be not so much to test the amount of reading got through by the candidates, as to ascertain the amount and kind of knowledge actually assimilated, and the intellectual power brought to bear upon this knowledge.

The English essays written by the successful candidates should be made public by being presented to Parliament. This would be an effective check to the test standard imperceptibly falling to a low level.

In making civil law the basis of diplomatic education, my motives, in addition to those above given are, that I consider that the judicial powers of the mind require to be highly developed in a diplomatist. A study of law, therefore, appears to me indispensable, so far as it can be obtained without suffocating the mind in legal formalities, and for this purpose Roman law is peculiarly adapted. In the next place it is the diplomatic agents of the various countries of the world who, by means of precedents, are making international law, and they ought to have a scientific knowledge of the fons et origo of their science.

I have for many years advocated the making of the civil law a sine quâ non of diplomatic education, without being aware of this having been done by others.

I have, however, lately learnt from Mr. Grant Duff, that he has been advocating this reform on the very same grounds as myself, and that the great name of Professor Maine is enlisted in the same cause. Having come to my conclusions à posteriori, and by the negative test of perceiving how much my action as a diplomatist has been paralysed by an ignorance of civil law, it is a great corroboration of the soundness of the principle to have it advocated à priori by a man like Professor Maine, on the same grounds as mine. I subjoin an extract from a speech by Mr. Grant Duff, which contains his own testimony and that of Professor Maine.

EXTRACT from Mr. Grant Duff's Speech in the House of Commons, 19th June 1860.

THERE is another point connected with the education of our diplomatists to which I wish to call attention. By the recent regulations of the Foreign Office, a young man who is about to pass from the position of an unpaid to that of a paid attaché is required to prove his acquaintance with "Wheaton's Elements of International Law," and "History of International Law." Now Mr. Wheaton's books are very respectable, and very useful books, but they are hardly sufficient to be the beginning, middle, and end of a diplomatist's training in international law. I confess, sir, that it appears to me quite monstrous monstrous when we consider how enormously the whole modes of thought of the statesmen and publicists of continental Europe are coloured by the jurisprudence of Rome that some security should not be taken, that at least the outlines of that magnificent system, and especially its terminology should be mastered by the young diplomatist. I am sure all honourable gentlemen whose attention has been turned to this subject will agree with me; but in case I seem to some to exaggerate the importance of this branch of study, I may be permitted, perhaps, to read a few lines by the late eminent Professor of Civil Law at Cambridge, Dr. Maine, which bear directly upon the subject: "Nor are these remarks "answered by urging that comparative ignorance of international law is of little conse- "quence so long as the parties to international discussions completely understand each other; "or, as it might be put, that Roman law may be important to the closet study of the law of "nations, but is unessential as regards diplomacy. There cannot be a doubt that our success "in negotiation is sometimes perceptibly affected by our neglect of Roman law; for, from "this cause we and the public, or negotiators from other countries, constantly misunder- "stand each other. It is not rarely that we refuse respect or attention to diplomatic com- "munications, as wide of the point and full of verbiage or conceits, when in fact they owe "those imaginary imperfections simply to the juristical point of view from which they have "been conceived and written. And, on the other hand, State Papers of English origin, "which, to an Englishman's mind ought, from their strong sense and directness to carry "all before them, will often make but an inconsiderable impression on the recipient, from "their not falling in with the course of thought which he insensibly pursues when dealing "with a question of public law. In truth the technicalities of Roman law are as really, "though not so visibly, mixed up with questions of diplomacy as are the technicalities of "special pleading with points of the English common law. So long as they cannot be "disentangled, English influence suffers obvious disadvantage through the imperfect com- "munion of thought. It is undesirable that there should not be among the English "public a sensible fraction which can completely decipher the documents of international "transactions, but it is more than undesirable that incapacity should extend to our states- "men and diplomatists. Whether Roman law be useful or not to English lawyers, it is "a downright absurdity that on the theatre of international affairs, England should "appear by delegates unequipped with the species of knowledge which furnishes the "medium of international communication to the other performers on the scene." These, sir, are weighty words, and I do trust that the Government, whether they do or not grant the Committee, will at least inquire whether they ought not to be acted on, for sure am I that only a mere fraction of our existing diplomatists have ever read a page of the Institutes of Gaius or Justinian.

I N D E X.

[N.B.—In this Index the Figures following the Names of the Witnesses refer to the Questions in the Evidence; and those following App., to the Pages in the Appendix.]

A.

ACCOUNTS (Foreign Office). Temporary confusion in the accounts of the Foreign Office, owing to the new Exchequer and Audit Bill, Hammond 1429-1431——New forms of check introduced by witness, the accounts generally being very carefully examined, Alston 1904-1907——Entire inaccuracy of any statement that the accounts were in a very confused state when handed over to witness as chief clerk, in succession to Mr. Conyngham, and that there was a deficiency which had to be made up, ib. 1908-1910.

Admission to Diplomatic Service. See Age of Admission. Attachés, 4. Competition. Examinations. Nominations.

Age of Admission (Diplomatic Service). Strong objection to the rule limiting the age of admission to the service, Morier 4472.

Age of Retirement (Diplomatic Service). Objection to a limit of age for leaving the diplomatic service; large expense for pensions if there were compulsory retirement at the age of sixty-five, Hammond 214-217——Concurrence in the objection to any fixed limit of age for the retirement of ministers, Earl of Malmesbury 705, 706; Christie 3101, 3102; Sir H. L. Bulwer 4856.

Contemplated power in the Secretary of State to require retirement at an earlier age, Hon. T. J. H. Thurlow 3506-3515. 3635-3642.

AGENCIES (FOREIGN OFFICE):

1. Regret expressed at the Abolition of the Agency System: its Efficiency.
2. Exception taken to the System.
3. Tenure of Agencies by Clerks exclusively.
4. Optional Employment of Agents.
5. Action taken by Lord Stanley in 1867 and 1868 upon the Question of Abolition.
6. Question of Compensation.
7. New Arrangement necessary for the Transmission of Salaries, on the Termination of the Agency System.
8. Proposition in September 1869, for the Retirement of Mr. Staveley, with a view to his acting as Private Agent.

1. Regret expressed at the Abolition of the Agency System: its Efficiency:

Witness regrets exceedingly the approaching cessation of Foreign Office agencies; views of Lord Clarendon to the same effect, Hammond 170. 174——Opinion that the diplomatic and consular service will suffer very much, ib.——General feeling of regret in the service at the abolition of the agencies; difficulty of accounting for the agitation against the system, it having been most convenient to the officers abroad, ib. 1687-1693——There was no vote of the House abolishing the system, ib. 1720.

Statement that the abolition by witness of Foreign Office agencies was in a manner forced upon him by popular prejudice, Earl of Clarendon 3900——Opinion that the agency system worked extremely well, and that its abolition will cause universal regret to the diplomatic and consular staff, ib.——Utterly unfounded character of a report that the agents had some influence in the making of appointments, and in the distribution of patronage, ib.

2. Exception taken to the System:

Witness considers the agency system a bad one, Christie 3130.

3. Tenure of Agencies by Clerks exclusively:

Practice as to agencies being always held by clerks, an assistant under secretary not being considered a proper person to act as agent, Hammond 1697–1702——Relative position and importance of witness's office as chief clerk, and of that of the Assistant Under Secretary of State; good reason for the latter not acting as a Foreign Office agent, there being no such objection in witness's case, Alston 1997–2005.

Explanatory statement as to Mr. Murray, when appointed Assistant Under Secretary, having issued a circular in which he suggested that his clients should employ witness as agent; there was no payment for goodwill, Alston 2006–2009.

4. Optional Employment of Agents:

Employment by witness, when in the service, of a Foreign Office agent, which employment he understood was not optional, Christie 3126–3129.

Explanation in circular of June 1868, that the employment of agents is entirely optional, App. 455.

5. Action taken by Lord Stanley in 1867 and 1868 upon the Question of Abolition:

Statement by Lord Stanley, in circular letter of 18th December 1867, that the continuance of the agency system is incompatible with the provisions of the Exchequer and Audit Act of 1866, App. 460.

Memorandum by Lord Stanley, dated 24th June 1868, with respect to the steps to be taken in view of the eventual abolition of the agency system, App. 461, 462.

Circular of Lord Stanley, dated 30th June 1868, with reference to the gradual instead of the immediate abolition of the agency system, App. 455.

6. Question of Compensation:

Claim of the Foreign Office clerks, who have acted as agents, to compensation, Hammond 172-174——The agency system was in force long before 1785, when it was the subject of inquiry, ib. 173. 1691——Very serious loss about to be inflicted on those clerks who have held agencies; justice of their claim to compensation, ib. 1681. 1691. 1694–1707.

Feeling of insecurity between 1854 and 1858 as to the tenure of the agencies; confidence in their continuance after the Report of the Select Committee of the latter year, Alston 2007. 2010, 2011.

Opinion that the abolition of the Foreign Office agencies should not involve compensation, Labouchere 4761–4763.

Communication from the Foreign Office to the Treasury in March 1854, showing the views of Lord Clarendon as to the principle of compensation to be carried out, if agencies be abolished, App. 456, 457.

Memorandum by Foreign Office agents, dated 9th March 1854, explaining the grounds upon which they claim that the full amount of their actual receipts should form the basis upon which compensation should be calculated, App. 457, 458.

Letter from the Foreign Office to the Treasury, dated 10th August 1855, with reference to steps being taken by the latter on the question of compensation, &c., App. 458.

Letter from Lord Stanley to the Treasury, dated 17th February 1868, submitting the claim of the agents to liberal compensation, App. 459——Letter from the Treasury, dated 13th May 1868, stating that compensation for the abolition of the agencies could not with justice be made a charge upon the public funds, ib. 460——Regret experienced by Lord Stanley at the foregoing decision, ib. 460, 461.

Communication from the Foreign Office to the Treasury, dated 26th January 1870, relative to the abolition of agents, the steps to be taken in consequence as regards payment of salaries, and the claim of the agents to compensation, App. 426, 427.

Memorandum by the Foreign Office agents, dated 1st January 1870, in support of their claim to compensation on the threatened abolition of the existing agency system App. 427–430.

7. New Arrangements necessary for the Transmission of Salaries, on the Termination of the Agency System:

Inconvenience to the diplomatic servants abroad if obliged to receive their salaries through bankers; proposal under consideration for obviating this arrangement, Hammond 170, 171. 187——Arrangements made for the termination of the agencies on the 30th November, whereas the Treasury has not yet made any fresh arrangements relative to the payment or transmission of the salaries of the diplomatic and consular officers, ib. 1682–1686. 1720.

8. Proposition in September 1869, for the Retirement of Mr. Staveley, with a view to his acting as Private Agent:

Circular letter of Lord Clarendon, dated 16th September 1869, to heads of missions abroad, with reference to the abolition of the agency system, and the question of the employment in future of Mr. Staveley, who would be willing to forego his position in the Foreign Office, on certain conditions, in order to act as private agent, App. 465.

See also Bidgood, Mr.

Alison, Mr. Explanation of the circumstances under which Mr. Alison was appointed to the diplomatic service as an interpreting attaché in the East, Hammond 182, 183.

Alston, Francis Beilby. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is chief clerk in the Foreign Office; his varied duties in that capacity, 1899–1901. 1997–2000——Careful check exercised over the accounts from abroad as regards extraordinary expenses, 1902–1907——New forms of check introduced by witness, the accounts generally being very carefully examined, 1904–1907——Entire inaccuracy of any statement that the accounts were in a very confused state when handed over to witness as chief clerk, in succession to Mr. Conyngham, and that there was a deficiency which had to be made up, 1908–1910.

Explanation as to the item "lighting and warming diplomatic residences," having been specified under that head for the first time in 1865–66; 1911, 1912——Change of arrangements in regard to the consular salary at Paris, the fees being now surrendered to the Exchequer, 1913–1915——Discontinuance of an allowance made to the consul at Moscow for office expenses, 1914.

Statement in explanation and defence of the practice of retaining a legal adviser at Lisbon, though the practice is adopted only at that mission and at Washington, 1916–1922——Information as to the course pursued by the Foreign Office in obtaining legal advice; inability of witness to state the amount of law charges, 1923–1934.

Examination to the effect that witness knows nothing officially of certain mal-administration imputed to Mr. Bingham when consul at Venezuela; course pursued in the grant of a superannuation allowance to Mr. Bingham, 1935–1955.

Information as to the practice generally at the Foreign Office in reference to consular and diplomatic pensions respectively, 1945–1962——Cause of the larger outfit allowed to Mr. Lowther than Mr. Forbes, 1963——Details relative to the charge for chapels and chaplains in respect of the consular and diplomatic votes; special instances adverted to and explained, 1964–1996.

Good reason for the Assistant Under Secretary of State not acting as a Foreign Office agent, there being no such objection in witness's case, 1997–2005——Explanatory statement as to Mr. Murray, when appointed Assistant Under Secretary, having issued a circular in which he suggested that his clients should employ witness as agent; there was no payment for goodwill, 2006–2009——Feeling of insecurity between 1854 and 1858 as to the tenure of the agencies; confidence in their continuance after the Report of the Select Committee of the latter year, 2007. 2010, 2011.

Exceedingly efficient services rendered by Mr. Conyngham during his long tenure of the office of chief clerk, 2012–2016——Doubt as to there having been any instance of deduction from a consul's salary on account of debts incurred; case of Consul Mackenzie at Resht especially adverted to, 2017–2023.

Degree of check exercised by the Audit Office as regards Foreign Office payments for extraordinary expenditure, 2024–2026——Audit of the Siam accounts at the Foreign Office, they having never been audited in China, 2027–2029——Good reason for the abolition of the audit of China accounts at Hong Kong, 2028, 2029.

[Second Examination.]—Further explanation of the circumstances connected with the grant of a pension to Mr. Bingham; opinion that error in judgment should not have debarred him from obtaining a pension, 2855–2873.

Amalgamation of Services. Broad distinction between the consular and diplomatic services, an amalgamation being very undesirable, Hammond 251–263——Higher standard of intellect required for the diplomatic service, ib. 256, 257.

Objection to an entire amalgamation of the consular and diplomatic services, though there should be full powers of appointment from one service to the other, Sir H. G. Elliot 852–856. 1001, 1002. 1103. 1132.

Difficulties of an amalgamation of the two services, Earl of Derby 2288.

Proposition for amalgamation of the diplomatic service, consular service, and Foreign Office, by establishing equivalent ranks, and by a system of promotion or exchange from one service into the other, Sir H. D. Wolff 4226–4249——Opinion that such consular posts as are in their nature wholly political should be amalgamated with the diplomatic service, Morier 4307–4309. 4548–4553.

Proposition submitted in detail for an amalgamation of the diplomatic, consular, and Foreign Office services, with suggestions as to the staff to be employed, and as to the examinations, salaries, promotion, &c., Labouchere 4746-4748.

Grounds for disapproving of an amalgamation of the consular and diplomatic services, though consuls and consuls-general should be eligible for diplomatic posts, Sir H. L. Bulwer 4901-4907. 4940-4943——The younger diplomatic servants would make very bad consuls, ib. 4907. 4940.

See also Foreign Office, 3.

Ambassadors. Total of five ambassadors in the service, namely, at Vienna, St. Petersburg, Paris, Berlin, and Constantinople, Hammond 20-22——Difference between the functions of an ambassador and a minister; higher salaries of the former, ib. 23-28——Statement in justification of the first-class missions in Russia, Prussia, and Austria having been raised to embassies; advantage more especially on account of the right of ambassadors to communicate directly with the sovereign, ib. 421-448.

Expediency of a higher salary to an ambassador than a minister; enhanced expenditure in the former case, Hammond 442-452——Insignificance of the mere precedence conferred by the title of ambassador, ib. 432-441——Approval of the omission by the Foreign Office to act upon a suggestion by a Select Committee in 1850, that France and Turkey should be invited to join England in reducing the embassies of the three countries to first-class missions, ib. 1770, 1771.

Importance attached to the office of ambassador, though involving a larger salary than that of minister, Earl of Derby 2296. 2300-2302——Considerable importance attached to an ambassador's right of audience, Christie 3079, 3080.

Total of seven embassies contemplated by witness, in his scheme for the diplomatic service, Hon. T. J. H. Thurlow 3562——The ambassador should have 10,000 l. a year and a house, ib.——Expediency of full discretion in the Secretary of State as to the appointment of ambassadors, Sir H. D. Wolff 4225. 4256, 4257. 4261-4263.

Statement as to the unfitness of mere party men for the office of ambassador, Sir H. L. Bulwer 4891-4895. 5206, 5207——Importance of our embassies being filled by men of mark and position; competent men in the profession should have the preference, ib. 5182, 5183.

Statement showing the scale of salaries and allowances for house rent and outfit of the several ambassadors, App. 415.

Appointments (Admission to Diplomatic Service). See Competition. Examinations. Nominations.

Appointments and Promotions. See Promotions and Appointments.

Archives. Explanation and approval of the practice whereby the archives of any embassy are retained there, instead of being sent to England, Hammond 55-61——Encouragement given by the Foreign Office to the binding of the archives at the missions; fault of the minister if the matter be neglected, ib. 1565, 1566——Control of the head of the mission over the archives, plate, &c. ib. 1567-1569.

Objection to a power in the heads of missions to destroy papers, Hammond 1570-1573——Conclusion as to the destruction of archives in the fire at Constantinople embassy in 1831 having caused much inconvenience as well as expense, ib. 1665-1667.

Advantage of official and permanent mission houses, as not necessitating the removal of the archives, Christie 2646. 2962——Inaccuracy of a statement that the despatches are always bound, ib. 2962.

Particulars relative to the quantity of archives or correspondence bound at the several missions, App. 419.

See also Chancellers. Clerks.

Argentine Republic. Large British interests in the Argentine Republic, Hammond 597.

Return showing the staff, and the salaries and allowances for the year ended 31st March 1869, App. 474.

Estimate of the salaries, &c., required for diplomatic purposes in 1870-71, as compared with the amount for 1869-70, App. 405.

See also South America.

Army and Navy. Doubt whether the promotion and pay in the diplomatic service are worse than in the army and navy, Hon. T. J. H. Thurlow 3856-3859——Slowness of promotion in the army and navy as well as in the diplomatic service, Earl of Clarendon 3932. 3971——Respects in which the pay is less adequate than in the case of the army or navy, ib. 3966, 3967.

Athens,

Athens. Explanation as to there being three secretaries at Athens; obstacle to any reduction of this staff, Hammond 199-205——Larger French staff than English staff at Athens, ib. 295.

Return showing the staff, and the salaries and allowances, for the year ended 31st March 1869, App. 474.

Estimate of the salaries, &c. required for 1870-71, as compared with the amount for 1869-70, App. 406.

ATTACHES:

1. Position of Attachés, and question as to their Remuneration.
2. Employment in the Foreign Office.
3. Former System of Unpaid Attachés.
4. Suggestions for an Amended System of Appointment.

1. Position of Attachés, and question as to their Remuneration:

Improved position since 1861 of the unpaid attachés, these being now promoted to third secretaries after four years' service, when they enter upon salaries, Hammond 5. 13-16. 355-358——Necessity of attachés having private means, ib. 34——An unpaid attaché should have a private income of at least 500 l. a year, ib. 145——Opinion that no greater efficiency would be secured if the attachés were all paid, ib. 319, 320.

Disadvantage in the non-payment of attachés, Earl of Malmesbury 732, 733——The work is as well done by the unpaid as by paid attachés, Sir H. G. Elliot 834. 1124——Further objection to the system of unpaid attachés, Earl of Malmesbury 1202-1204. 1229, 1230——Less grievance of unpaid attachés since they have been paid after four years' service, Sir H. G. Elliot 1298.

Suggestion that an attaché should receive a salary of 100 l. a year at the end of two years, Hammond 1750——Each attaché should have at least 400 l. a year of his own for the first three years, Earl of Clarendon 3420-3422——Inexpediency of unpaid service, though there has been a great improvement in this respect, ib. 3451.

Expediency of the attachés receiving a small salary, Hon. T. J. H. Thurlow 3552-3554——Suggested payment of attachés who have passed the proposed examination, until they are appointed to vacancies, Morier 4391, 4392——Advantage of attachés having the means of going into society, Hon. E. R. Lytton 5070-5072.

Regulations as to the period of service of attachés, and as to commissions being granted to them on completion of their probation, App. 412.

2. Employment in the Foreign Office:

Practice as to the employment of each attaché in the Foreign Office for six months before being sent abroad, Hammond 11, 12——Approval of the employment of attachés for six months in the Foreign Office, Earl of Derby 2448-2450.

3. Former System of Unpaid Attachés:

Advantage of the former system whereby many young men entered the service, without intending to make a profession of it, Sir H. G. Elliot 831-834; Earl of Derby 2336, 2337——Unlimited number of unpaid attachés formerly, these not generally entering the service as a profession, Earl of Clarendon 3429-3431——Advantages of the former system whereby unpaid attachés were frequently appointed very much at the suggestion of the minister to whom they were to be attached, Sir H. L. Bulwer 4839-4847——Important advantages of the former system whereby there were facilities to young men of good position and private means to enter the service, though they did not intend to remain in it, Honourable E. R. Lytton 5244. 5251.

4. Suggestions for an Amended System of Appointment:

Advantage if ambassadors might appoint attachés not having any claim to promotion, Honourable T. J. H. Thurlow 3837, 3838——Disadvantage through the heads of missions not now having any voice in the appointment of attachés, Honourable E. R. Lytton 4244. 4256——Proposed return to the old system of unpaid attachés, of whom there should be an unlimited number, Morier 4328. 4390-4392——Absence of claim in the unpaid attachés who could not pass the proposed test examination, ib. 4405.

Advantage of the minister abroad being allowed to suggest to the Secretary of State the appointment at the mission of any particular unpaid attaché, Sir H. L. Bulwer 5128——Explanation that in proposing a reduced staff at embassies and missions witness contemplates a liberal employment of unpaid attachés, ib. 5238-5240.

Further suggestions by Mr. Morier for the establishment of a class of unpaid attachés, App. 535.

Bidgood, Mr. Belief as to the efficient discharge of his office duties at the present time by Mr. Bidgood, one of the Foreign Office agents, Hammond 1708.

Bingham, Mr. Examinations to the effect that witness knows nothing, officially, of certain maladministration imputed to Mr. Bingham when consul at Venezuela; course pursued in the grant of a superannuation allowance to Mr. Bingham, Alston 1935–1955.

Further explanation of the circumstances connected with the grant of a pension to Mr. Bingham; opinion that error in judgment should not have debarred him from obtaining a pension, Alston 2855–2873.

Witness, as solicitor to the Treasury, supplies sundry details relative to the payment by the Treasury of a sum of 3,404 l. on account of the maladministration by Mr. Consul Bingham of the estate of Mr. W. Ackers of Venezuela, Greenwood 3209–3214. 3217–3244. 3268–3296——Opinion that Mr. Bingham assumed the administration of Mr. Ackers' estate illegally, but that as there was no repudiation by the Foreign Office the latter were bound to make good the loss through mismanagement, ib. 3218–3242. 3244. 3269–3277. 3287–3296.

Explanation as to witness having given the opinion to the Treasury that it was very questionable whether Mr. Bingham's pension could be attached in respect of the payment made to Mr. Ackers' representatives, Greenwood 3222–3225. 3278——Evidence on the subject of payments made to Mr. Bingham on account of the estate, and questioned by him; belief that there was no malversation, ib. 3233. 3243. 3268——Statement as to Mr. Bingham having charged a commission of 2½ per cent. for the administration of Mr. Ackers' estate, ib. 3279–3286.

Board (Attachés and Secretaries). Doubt as to the present practice of ambassadors or ministers in regard to keeping table for the attachés and secretaries, Hammond 485–488——Inconvenience of any arrangement for providing the subordinate staff at any mission with board at the public expense, Sir H. G. Elliot 1271–1274——Doubt as to its being desirable to provide for the boarding of attachés and secretaries in the ministers' houses, Earl of Derby 2523, 2524——Practice formerly for the attachés to be boarded by the ambassadors, Earl of Clarendon 3425–3428.

Bondholders. Limited action taken by the heads of missions in South America in reference to the claims of British bondholders, Hammond 589–592.

Instances of diplomatic interference, by witness at Buenos Ayres, and Mr. Thornton at Monte Video, on behalf of British bondholders; statement in justification of such interference, Christie 3043–3047. 3098—— Refusal of witness to receive payments for the Buenos Ayres bondholders at a per-centage or commission; instances of other officials in South America having received per-centages, ib. 3048–3052.

Objection to diplomatic interference in the interests of British bondholders in South America, Sir H. L. Bulwer 5197.

Brazil:

1. As to the Staff at the Rio Mission, and its Duties.
2. Cost of the Mission.
3. Residence of Mr. Christie, when Minister, away from Rio.
4. Management of the Brazilian Dispute.
5. Consuls and Consular Service.

1. As to the Staff at the Rio Mission, and its Duties:

Cessation of questions in the Brazils respecting the slave trade, Hammond 587, 588 ——There is still much to be done at the mission in matters connected with domestic slavery, ib. 588.

Belief that a second class mission would be ample for Brazil, Christie 2632–2634—— Particulars relative to the staff at Rio when witness was there, and the amount of work performed by the different members; conclusion that a secretary of legation with two or three clerks would suffice, ib. 2669–2672.

Varied duties devolving upon witness when in Brazil, Christie 2967——Very little work of the mission at Rio in respect of the foreign slave-trade or of domestic slavery; inaccuracy of a statement by Mr. Hammond on this subject, ib. 2967–2977——Exaggeration of a certain statement as to the amount of accumulation of British claims during the suspension of diplomatic relations, ib. 2978, 2979——Great diminution since 1860 in the correspondence from Brazil respecting the slave trade, ib. 3092–3094.

Further explanation as to the staff under witness at Rio, and the amount of work devolving on the different members; circumstance of his not having made any complaint of neglect to the Foreign Office, Christie 3201–3205.

Letter from Mr. Christie to Lord John Russell, dated 12th December 1860, with reference to the actual duties of the secretary and other officers, App. 524.

2. Cost of the Mission:

Ample emoluments of the English minister at Rio, Christie 2630. 2637, 2638——The salary is 4,000 l. a year, with 700 l. a year for house rent, ib. 2637.

Return showing the staff, and the salaries and allowances for the year ended 31st March 1869, App. 473——Estimate of the salaries, &c., required for 1870–71, as compared with the amount for 1869–70, ib. 405.

3. Residence of Mr. Christie, when Minister, away from Rio:

Explanation as to witness's official residence, when in Brazil, having been at Petropolis, some four hours' journey from Rio; way in which the business was conducted, Christie 2638–2643. 2645——Further statement that there was no neglect of witness's duties at Rio by reason of his residing in Petropolis, ib. 2988, 2989.

Examination in further explanation and defence of the course pursued by witness in Brazil in residing some distance from the capital, Christie 3143–3168.

Letter from Mr. Christie to Lord John Russell, dated 26th July 1860, relative to the proposed establishment of the Brazilian mission at Petropolis, some four or five hours' distance from Rio, App. 523.

4. Management of the Brazilian Dispute:

Cordial approval by Lord Russell of witness's management of the Brazilian dispute, Christie 2966.

5. Consuls and Consular Service:

Proposition for placing the consular duties at Rio under the mission, a large economy in staff being thus feasible, Christie 2689–2695.

Statement as to the consuls in Brazil having been placed under witness's superintendence, and required to send their correspondence to him; insubordination evinced by the consuls, Christie 2698, 2699——Further statement as to witness having been placed in full control of the consuls in Brazil, ib. 3025.

Bulwer, the Right Honourable Sir Henry Earle Lytton, G.C.B., (Member of the Committee). (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Was for many years in the diplomatic service, having finally been ambassador at Constantinople, 4825–4827——Inability of witness to live upon anything like 2,000 l. or 3,000 l. a year at Constantinople, 4828, 4829——Opinion as to the salary at Madrid being none too much, 4830, 4831——Necessity of very careful management by ministers abroad in order to avoid being plundered, 4831, 4832——Fairness on the whole of the present remuneration of ambassadors and ministers, 4833, 4834.

Doubt as to there being now any greater slowness of promotion than in former years, save that the cleverer men do not now get on so quickly, 4835. 4920–4926——Fair estimate generally taken in the service of the capacities of each man, 4836, 4837. 4924–4926——Tendency to a block in the service through young men making it more of a profession than in former years; inexpediency of this change, 4838–4841. 4927–4929 ——Advantages of the former system whereby unpaid attachés were frequently appointed very much at the suggestion of the minister to whom they were to be attached, 4839–4847.

Approval of an entrance examination as a security against positive incapacity, 4848, 4849. 4851——Grounds for the apprehension that competitive examination is not desirable for the service, 4850, 4851——Fallacy of relying upon University degrees as any sure test of fitness for the profession, 4852–4855——Objection to any limit as to age 4856——Inexpediency of treating diplomacy as an exclusive profession, 4857–4860—— Importance of full discretion in the Secretary of State to depart from the system of promotion by seniority, 4858–4862.

Advantage of circumscribing as much as possible the staff at the larger missions; suggestions whereby reduction may be effected, 4863–4865. 4875–4883. 4932, 4933—— Proposal that each minister be allowed to have a private secretary, who should be paid by the minister, and should be eligible for admission to the service, 4865–4872——Alteration for the worse through the Foreign Office interfering too much between the minister and his employés, 4872–4874——Exceptional instance of an ambassador being allowed to name his staff; expediency of fuller facilities in this direction, 4874. 4876–4880. 4918. 4919.

Advantage of occasional interchange between the Foreign Office and diplomatic service, 4882, 4883——Undue multiplication of secretaryships, 4884——Suggestion that the head of the mission should report upon the capacity evinced by the secretary, 4884, 4885 —— Disapproval of a second examination of a very severe character before promotion to the higher grades, 4886——Expediency of a concentration of responsibility in the Foreign Secretary and ambassadors for all appointments and promotions, 4887–4890. 4930, 4931——Decided objection to a fixed rule of seniority beyond a certain rank, 4888, 4889.

Importance of not retaining mere party men in the office of ambassador, 4891–4895 ——Respects in which a change of ambassadors at Paris with a change of Government is desirable, 4891, 4892——Decided objection to a frequent transference of attachés and secretaries from one mission to another, 4896–4900. 4907——Grounds for disapproving of an amalgamation of the consular and diplomatic services, though consuls and consuls general should be eligible for diplomatic posts, 4901–4907. 4940–4943.

Suggestion that public law should be a subject of the second examination, 4908, 4909. 4944–4946—— Great importance of a knowledge of French, 4910. 4915——Relative capacities and influence of American and English diplomatists, 4910–4914——Equal efficiency of Foreign Office messengers if taken from a somewhat lower class, 4916, 4917.

Comment upon the tendency to increased bureaucratic encroachment on the part of the permanent officials at the Foreign Office, the responsibility and powers of the ambassadors and ministers being thereby injuriously impaired, 4934–4937——Advantage if the heads of departments in the Foreign Office could be employed for a time in the great embassies, 4937–4939.

[Second Examination.]—Further expression of the opinion that a smaller paid staff at the missions would be better for the service, 5121. 5127——Importance of the right of selection being much more largely exercised, 5122, 5123——Suggestions relative to the granting of retiring allowances to men not promoted beyond a certain grade after a certain length of service, 5123-5127. 5161——Difficulty as to facilitating retirement on the ground of health, 5124.

Advantage of the minister abroad being allowed to suggest to the Secretary of State the appointment at the mission of any particular unpaid attaché, 5128——Badness of the

the rule of frequent transfer from post to post, it being desirable that the Secretary of State should exercise full discretion in the matter, 5129, 5130 ——Doubt as to the expediency of special allowances or privileges in the case of men serving for a long time in such countries as China or Japan, 5131–5134——More effectual action of English diplomatists if, like American diplomatists, they were to use a firmer tone in their representations, 5135, 5136. 5189–5196.

Approval of the Persian mission being under the Foreign Office, the India Office being duly consulted by the latter, 5137, 5138——Information relative to the embassy site at Constantinople, together with suggestions as to the building of a new embassy house; conclusion that the house at Therapia might be sold and that one residence, somewhere upon the Bosphorus, would suffice, 5139–5144. 5152–5154. 5211–5215——Further statement as to the advantage of ambassadors having a private secretary; practice in witness's case at Constantinople, 5145–5147. 5222–5225.

Doubt as to there being incompetent men at any posts whom the Foreign Secretary should remove altogether from the service, 5148–5151——Respects in which examinations fail to secure some of the qualifications required, 5155–5157——Advantage of keeping as low as possible the number of those who enter the service with the view of making it a profession, 5158.

Prospects and pay of secretaries of legation adverted to with reference to the question of interchange with clerks in the Foreign Office, 5159–5161——Difficulty of ascertaining whether any man is fully competent until he has arrived at the post of secretary of legation, 5162–5167——Advantage of the heads of missions assisting the Secretary of State with their opinion previously to the promotion of any secretary to be secretary of legation, 5161–5171. 5175, 5176. 5231–5234.

Evil effect of the system of not making our ministers sufficiently responsible, 5172—— Comment upon the action of the Foreign Office in assuming functions which properly belong to the heads of missions; illustration of this in American affairs, 5172–5174. 5208–5210——Undue importance attached by the permanent under secretary to Foreign Office despatches, irrespectively of the action of diplomatists in following up such despatches, 5174.

Very exceptional departures from the rule of promotion by seniority, so that men become heads of missions without having shown any special fitness or superior ability, 5175, 5176——Expediency of greater subordination on the part of the junior members of legations towards the heads of missions; views of Lord Clarendon and Lord Cowley on this point, 5177–5181——Importance of our embassies being filled by men of mark and position; competent men in the profession should have the preference, 5182, 5183—— Opinion that the political under secretary should take a higher position than the permanent under secretary in the management of the Foreign Office, 5184.

Further statement that the policy of the Foreign Office being declared, it should be left very much to the minister abroad to carry it out, 5185——Suggestion whether economy and increased efficiency may not be secured by uniting some neighbouring missions, as in Holland and Belgium, under one head, 5187, 5188——Objection to diplomatic interference in the interests of British bondholders in South America, 5197.

Uselessness of the Oriental secretary at Constantinople, 5198, 5199——Necessity of placing full confidence in the head dragoman, but not in the others, 5200, 5201. 5205 ——Suggested interchange of service between the dragomans and consuls in the East, 5202——Doubt as to the dragomans receiving fees or douceurs, 5203, 5204.

Further statement as to the unfitness of party men for the office of ambassador, 5206, 5207——Disapproval of the secretary of legation being made the executive officer over the chancellerie, 5216–5219——Large increase in the cost of wages, &c. at Constantinople, between 1854 and 1859, 5220——Nature of the work performed by witness's private secretary at Constantinople, 5221–5225——Very large consular business at Constantinople to be attended to by the ambassador, 5226–5228.

Respects in which the block in the service has caused more dissatisfaction in recent years; removal of much of the evil, if seniority were not adhered to, 5229–5234——Error of Mr. Thurlow as to retirement being compulsory in the French service at the age of fifty, 5237——Explanation that in proposing a reduced staff at embassies and missions, witness contemplates a liberal employment of unpaid attachés, 5238–5240.

C.

Central America. Frequent change in the rank of the mission in Central America, Hammond 598, 599——Whilst we have but one representative, there are five for the United States, ib. 600, 601.

Chanceliers. Approval of a permanent clerk or chancelier in the larger missions, for keeping the archives, Earl of Malmesbury 700, 701. 767, 768——Improvement if at large missions a permanent officer were appointed in charge of the records, as at Constantinople; means thereby of reducing the staff, Sir H. G. Elliot 900–907. 911. 922–927. 1114–1116——Advantage of the employment of chanceliers further adverted to; disadvantage on the other hand as tending to prevent the attachés from learning their business thoroughly, ib. 1390–1394.

Grounds for objecting to the employment of a chancelier or archivist, as a permanent officer, save at such places as Paris or Constantinople, where the archives are very voluminous, Hammond 1671–1679.

Advantage of a permanent officer in charge of the records at the chief missions; inconvenience during leave of absence, Earl of Derby 2303. 2444, 2445. 2451–2456—— Views of witness in 1861 in favour of a permanent officer, or archivist, at every mission, Christie 2679.

Evidence in favour of the appointment at the embassies and at large missions of a permanent clerk or chancelier; facility thereby for a large reduction in the number of second secretaries, Hon. T. J. H. Thurlow 3520–3543. 3548. 3717–3719. 3824–3830. 3835——Witness contemplates a staff of seven chanceliers, but the number might be increased, ib. 3571. 3573. 3824–3826.

Objection to chanceliers, though at Madrid there are certain consular and notarial duties efficiently performed by a permanent clerk, Earl of Clarendon 3460–3464. 3872 ——Strong objection to a system of chanceliers, as destructive of confidence, Morier 4335–4342 ——Difficulty in regard to a permanent officer at each of the larger missions, unless his position is very carefully defined; illustration of this at Lisbon, Hon. E. R. Lytton 5042–5044——Large amount of work at the great missions which is not of a confidential character, and which could be very advantageously performed by permanent officers or chanceliers, ib. 5241.

Chapels and Chaplains. Details relative to the charge for chapels and chaplains, in respect of the consular and diplomatic votes; special instances adverted to and explained, Alston 1964–1996.

Return showing for each of the years from 1859-60, to 1867-68, the expenditure abroad in respect of chaplains and chapels, App. 435——Statement of expenditure charged to the sub-head "Chapels and Chaplains," in the year 1868-9, in respect of the consular service, ib. 518.

Chargés d'Affaires. Approval of some increase of salary of the chargé d'affaires when the minister is absent on leave, Earl of Malmesbury 765, 766——Suggestions as to the number of chargés d'affaires, and as to their being appointed from the secretaries of embassy or legation, Hon. T. J. H. Thurlow 3571, 3572——Advantage, if any missions are abolished, of establishing chargés d'affaireships in their place; relief thereby to the promotion block, Morier 4514 ——Room for a large reduction of diplomatic servants by the employment only of a consul general and chargé d'affaires at many missions, Labouchere 4743–4745. 477, 4778.

Statements of the allowance to an acting chargé d'affaires, at the different missions, App. 399, 400. 437——Nominal list of chargés d'affaires, ib. 409.

China. Belief as to the system of students established by witness in China having turned out very well, Earl of Malmesbury 688–692——Explanation in connection with a certain excess of China expenditure; great trouble recently taken in order to put the China accounts into a proper state, Hammond 1484–1489——Good reasons for the abolition of the audit of China accounts at Hong Kong, Alston 2028, 2029.

Instances of consuls appointed to diplomatic posts, in China and Japan; approval of this practice, Earl of Derby 2483–2485. 2494——Reference to certain correspondence between the Treasury and Foreign Office relative to the China consulates and their expense, Earl of Clarendon 3886–3888——Necessarily expensive character of these consulates, steps having, however, been taken to effect reductions, ib. 3886.

Decided objection to the work in China and Japan being done entirely by interpreters under the heads of the missions, Mitford 4053——Great importance of a system of interchange between the missions in Europe and those in China and Japan, instead of fixing in the latter missions men already conversant with the language, ib. 4053–4055. 4126–4147——Particulars relative to the supervision of the consulates in China and Japan by the heads of the missions, ib. 4116–4125.

Christie, William Dougal. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Was for about fifteen years in the diplomatic service; served in Switzerland, the River Plate, Brazil, &c., 2609–2613 —— Entered the service as secretary of legation, having previously been consul general in the Mosquito country, 2610. 2616, 2617.

Retirement of witness on a pension, he being liable to re-employment, 2613–2615—— Several precedents for the direct appointment of witness to the office of secretary of legation, 2616–2623—— Mode of calculation of witness's pension, which is 900 l. a year; necessity of his having served fifteen years, 2624–2626.

Evidence opposed to the view that the missions in South America should be raised in rank; room rather for reduction of rank and of expense, 2626–2636—— Importance in Europe of the rank of English diplomatists being equal to that of foreign diplomatists; instances of this in witness's experience at Berne, 2629——Ample emoluments of the English minister at Rio, 2630. 2637, 2638——Opinion that at Buenos Ayres a representative of the rank of chargé d'affaires and consul general is sufficient, 2631, 2632. 2635, 2636.

Belief that a second-class mission would be ample for Brazil, 2632–2634——Result of witness's experience of South American Governments, that their sense of right and justice cannot be relied on, ib.——Advantage, on special occasions in Brazil or the River Plate, of sending out a special representative of high rank, 2635, 2636.

Necessity of a larger salary to ministers in South America than to chargés d'affaires, 2636—— Explanation as to witness's official evidence when in Brazil having been at Petropolis, some four hours' journey from Rio; way in which the business was conducted, 2638–2643. 2645—— Great advantage if an official residence, furnished, were provided at every mission, 2644–2646.

[Second Examination.]—Grievance in ministers not being allowed leave of absence on full salary, 2647—— Grievance also in their not being permitted to run two years' leave of absence into one, 2647, 2648.

Suggestions for a complete change in the constitution of the staff of missions, 2649 et seq.——Proposal that every ambassador or minister be allowed to appoint a private secretary, to be paid by the public; important duties to be fulfilled by this officer, 2649–2653—— Statement as to the ambassador or minister not being now consulted as to the staff allotted to him, 2654, 2655——Proposition that, in addition to a private secretary, there be a secretary of legation, with a staff of clerks under him; efficiency and economy to be thus secured, 2656 et seq.

Sufficiency at small missions of a private secretary and a good clerk, 2657–2661. 2669—— Small working staff sufficient at Berne, 2657–2661.——Class of persons desirable for the proposed clerkships; conclusion that confidential work may be safely entrusted to them, 2661, 2662. 2673, 2674. 2679——Excellent clerk appointed by witness at Buenos Ayres; witness has not heard of his recent dismissal, 2662–2666, —— Expediency of the secretary of legation being required to do more regular work and a greater amount of work than at present, 2668, 2669. 2719-2722.

Views of Sir Henry Elliot, Mr. Ffrench, and Sir Henry Bulwer adverted to as showing that a reduction of staff may well be effected, 2669——Particulars relative to the staff at Rio when witness was there, and the amount of work performed by the different members; conclusion that a secretary of legation with two or three clerks would suffice, 2669–2672 ——Approval of Foreign Office clerks were more frequently employed in diplomatic posts, 2675–2677.

Advantage of clerks as being permanent officers, and as being readily amenable to discipline, 2678, 2679—— Views of witness in 1861 in favour of a permanent officer, or archivist, at every mission, 2679.

Personal explanation to the effect that witness has been retired and pensioned against his will, and has never been offered re-employment, though his services have been entirely approved by the Government, 2680–2688.

Proposition for placing the consular duties at Rio under the mission, a large economy in staff being thus feasible, 2689–2695——Important economy to be effected generally by merging consularships with missions in all capitals which are ports, 2690, 2691.

Statement as to the consuls in Brazil having been placed under witness's superintendence, and required to send their correspondence to him; insubordination evinced by the consuls, 2698, 2699——Complaint made by witness when at Rio, relative to the conduct of Mr. Morgan, the consul at Bahia, in associating himself with railway enterprises; serious injury to the public service by the action of this consul, 2698–2704. 2714——The fault in the foregoing case was in a great measure with the Foreign Office, 2698. 2700——Circumstance of witness having never been consulted by the Foreign Office, since his retirement, relative to South American affairs, 2705–2707.

Approval of an increase of salary of the secretary of legation at Buenos Ayres, 2708–2710——Further proposal for consolidation and reduction at Buenos Ayres by the appointment of an officer as chargé d'affaires and consul general, 2709–2711——Conclusion that there was an error at the Foreign Office in allowing Mr. Forbes only 800 l. instead of 1,100 l. for outfit, 2712.

Grounds for the conclusion that ambassadors and ministers have not proper control over the secretaries and subordinates, 2713–2722——Belief that the position of secretary of legation, in relation to that of the minister, is unduly independent; expediency of the latter having full power to utilize the services of the former as he pleases, 2716–2722—— Mistake involved in the system of reports by secretaries of legation as tending to render them independent of the ministers, 2717. 2722.

[Third Examination.] Statement as to witness, when at Rio, having deemed it his duty to make suggestions on the subject of reports by the secretary of legation, 2942, 2943. 2945——Argument in further support of the conclusion that the reports by secretaries should be made under the supervision, and with the active assistance of the heads of missions, 2944–2950.

Further evidence as to the expediency of the head of the mission having a directing control over all the staff, and over their employment, with a view to the discipline and effective working of the mission, 2950–2953——Result of the witness's experience that quarrelling at embassies and missions has been frequent, owing chiefly to the want of proper control in the heads, 2952, 2953——Expenditure by witness of secret service money, 2954.

Several important alterations made by the Act of last Session as to pensions, 2955–2957——Valuable provision in the Act of last year as regards pensions in the case of persons transferred from the consular service or the Foreign Office to the diplomatic service, 2957——Hardship of the distinction between first class and second class missions, in the matter of the pensions of envoys extraordinary and ministers plenipotentiary, ib.

Suggestion for bringing consuls at outports more directly under the superintendence of the mission in the country, 2958–2960——Important economy by the employment of resident merchants of respectability for the performance of consular work, 2959, 2960——Approval of the stamp system as the best mode of collecting fees, 2961——Anomaly in marriage fees being paid at consulates and not at missions, ib.

Inaccuracy of a statement that the despatches at missions are always carefully bound, 2962——Opinion that copying machines might be largely used at missions and consulates, for local and subsidiary correspondence, 2963——Expediency of various charges in the management of the Foreign Office, with a view to the greater efficiency of the diplomatic service; witness will submit a memorandum on this subject, 2964, 2965.

Further statement as to witness not having been re-employed, though he has made application on the subject to the successors of Lord Russell at the Foreign Office, 2966——Cordial approval by Lord Russell of witness's management of the Brazilian dispute, ib.——Non-complaint by witness in regard to Lord Clarendon or Lord Derby not having employed him, ib.

Varied duties devolving upon witness in Brazil, 2967——Very little work of the mission at Rio in respect of the foreign slave trade or of domestic slavery; inaccuracy of a statement by Mr. Hammond on this subject, 2967–2977——Exaggeration of a certain statement as to the amount of accumulation of British claims during the suspension of diplomatic relations, 2978, 2979.

Grounds for objecting to the arrangement by which the minister at Buenos Ayres is accredited as chargé d'affaires at Monte Video, 2980–2987——Exception taken to the proposal to give Venezuelaa minister resident, 2980, 2981——Further statement that there was no neglect of witness's duties at Rio by reason of his residing in Petropolis, 2988–2989.

Evidence in further support of the recommended employment of permanent clerks at the larger missions, 2990–2998——Value of a private secretary further adverted to, 2990. 3003–3006——Further statement that the secretary of embassy or legation should be made an efficient working man, 2991, 2992. 2994. 3003, 3004——Insufficiency of the salary of

of the translator at Lisbon, 2996. 3000 ——Explanation that a former clerk at Buenos Ayres was not dismissed because of any moral unworthiness, 2998.

Opinion that the salary at Stuttgardt should be equal to that at Berne, 2999——Importance of a British mission in Switzerland further adverted to, 3001——Advantage on several grounds of British representatives at Dresden, Darmstadt, and Coburg, irrespectively of the political work to be done, 3002.

Suggestion that private secretaries be very much in the position of attachés, and be eligible for appointment as secretaries of embassy or legation, 3005–3011——Approval also of Foreign Office clerks being sometimes appointed secretaries, 3008. 3011——Advantage also of outsiders being sometimes brought in as secretaries of legation or embassy, 3011.

Conclusion that the salaries of the diplomatic servants, whether in the higher or lower grades do not admit of reduction, but rather in some cases call for increase, 3012–3018——Further statement in favour of combining the diplomatic and consular establishments in South America under a chargé d'affaires and consul general; small political interests as compared with the large commercial interests of England in these countries, 3015 3021–3024.

Expediency of the stationery used at missions being in all cases paid for by the public, this being now the exception to the rule, 3019, 3020——Further statement as to witness having been placed in full control of the consuls in Brazil, 3025.

[Fourth Examination.]—Opinion recorded by Sir Richard Pakenham in favour of the arrangement for placing the consuls in South America under the resident minister, 3026——Commercial character of the work in the South American missions further adverted to, 3027, 3028. 3035——Advantage of more power in the ministers abroad to recommend persons for consuls, and to suggest the promotion of vice-consuls, 3029——Conclusion that commercial interests will not suffer by being placed under missions in charge of political officers, 3030–3033.

Considerations as to the class of persons desirable for the post of chargé d'affaires and consul general in South America; advantage in their being well acquainted with commerce, though there are also some political questions to be dealt with, 3033–3037——Necessity of a distinct consular office at distant posts from the capital, 3038——Convenience of a private secretary who should take charge of the mission during the absence of the chief, instead of bringing consuls from out-ports to take temporary charge, 3039–3042.

Instances of diplomatic interference, by witness, at Buenos Ayres, and by Mr. Thornton at Monte Video, on behalf of British bondholders; statement in justification of such interference, 3043–3047. 3098——Refusal of witness to receive payments for the Buenos Ayres bondholders, at a per-centage or commission; instances of other officials in South America having received per-centages, 3048–3052.

Information on the subject of marriages of British subjects, and of mixed marriages, at the missions and consulates in South America; suggested adoption of certain precautions not now taken, 3053–3078. 3206, 3207.

Considerable importance attached to an ambassador's right of audience, 3079, 3080——Suggestion that foreign governments might be asked to concur in extending a right of audience to ministers, 3080–3082——Relief as regards the block in the service if junior secretaries were selected by ambassadors and ministers for private secretaries, 3083–3085——Facility since the Pensions Act of 1869, for the transfer of diplomatic servants to the Foreign Office, 3085–3087——Room for much reduction in the consular service, so that junior diplomatic officers should not be drafted into it, 3086.

Further statement as to the propriety of equalising the pensions for first and second class missions, 3088——Belief that ten years' service, including leave of absence, is sufficient for a pension, 3089——Different position of witness and Sir Charles Wyke as regards pension; further statement on this point that witness's pension was forced upon him, 3090, 3091. 3136, 3137.

Great diminution since 1860 in the correspondence from Brazil respecting the slave trade, 3092–3094——Grounds for the conclusion that our relations with Paraguay are a proof of bad management on the part of the Foreign Office, 3095–3097——Want of more continuous attention by the Foreign Office to South American subjects, 3098.

Satisfactory effect of witness's mission at Buenos Ayres, 3098——Expediency of prompt steps for a settlement of outstanding claims in Brazil, &c., ib.——Increasing interests of this country in the River Plate and the Argentine Republic, 3099, 3100——Objection to any fixed limit of age for the retirement of ministers, 3101, 3102.

Further details relative to the case of Mr. Morgan, consul at Bahia, with reference more especially to his connection with a certain railway, the concession for which he sold for a large sum, 3103–3105. 3113, 3114. 3117–3125. 3196——Several instances of consuls in South America placing themselves in false positions as regards private employment, 3106, 3107. 3110–3116——Comment upon a certain return recently furnished by the Foreign Office relative to consular appointments otherwise than in the public service; inaccuracy of this return, 3107–3113.

Employment by witness, when in the service, of a Foreign Office agent, which employment he understood was not optional, 3126–3129——Disapproval of the agency system, 3130——Opinion that there should be open competition for the Foreign Office, and that more subjects should be embraced, 3131–3135——Nor can witness see any valid objection to a system of open competition for the diplomatic service, 3133——Objection to a second examination for the service, 3134.

Repetition of the opinion that the rank of our representatives in South America may be advantageously reduced, 3138–3140—— Further approval of the sending of special representatives on special occasions, 3141, 3142——Examination in further explanation and defence of the course pursued by witness in Brazil in residing some distance from the capital, 3143–3168.

Further statement that harmony at missions was the exception, rather than the rule, when witness was in the service, 3169——Tendency of the Foreign Office to support the heads of missions against the subordinates, 3170——Advantage of copying machines further adverted to; that is, chiefly for consular and local correspondence, 3171–3175.

Grounds for the statement that secretaries of embassy or legation do not, as a rule, make themselves useful when the chief is present, 3176–3183——Advanced age of the first secretaries, so that regular clerical work is not to be expected of them, 3176. 3178——Advantage of the employment of clerks further adverted to, 3184——Greater harmony at missions if there were a private secretary, and a reduced staff, 3185, 3186——Public work intended to be done by a private secretary, 3187.

Introduction of witness into the service by Lord Palmerston, to whom he had been well known in the House of Commons, 3188——Anomaly in their being a loss of pay on promotion from the rank of secretary of legation to that of secretary of embassy, 3189–3192——Instances of idle secretaries and of inefficient secretaries, in witness's experience, 3193——Good ground for the dissatisfaction as regards pay, 3194.

Statement that witness has complained to the Foreign Office respecting the inattention of secretaries or attachés under him, and that the Foreign Office has generally taken action on such occasions, 3195–3200——Further explanation as to the staff under witness at Rio, and the amount of work devolving on the different numbers; circumstance of his not having made any complaint of neglect to the Foreign Office, 3201–3205.

Christie, Mr. Explanation on the subject of the pension to Mr. Christie; service of Mr. Christie as agent and consul general before he entered the diplomatic service, Hammond 1505–1507.

Resolution of the Committee that the letter from Mr. Christie, dated 23rd May 1870, be not printed with the Evidence, Rep. xii.

Civil Law. Suggestions by Mr. Morier for making a study of the civil law the foundation of a diplomatic education, App. 536——Views of Mr. Grant Duff in 1860, as to the importance of a study of civil law, ib. 536, 537.

Civil Service Commission. Information relative to the open competition for clerkships in the Civil Service Commission, and the extremely satisfactory operation thereof, Walrond 3303–3325.

Claims (British Subjects). Expediency of prompt steps for a settlement of outstanding claims in Brazil, &c., Christie 3098.

Clarendon, The Right Hon. George William Frederick, Earl of, K.G., G.C.B. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Has had seven years' experience as Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs; was formerly an attaché, and afterwards served as Minister at Madrid for three years, 3404–3410——Has derived great advantage as Foreign Secretary from his service abroad as a diplomatist, 3411, 3412.

Satisfactory working of the system of limited competition for appointment to the Foreign Office, there being three competitors for each vacancy, 3413, 3414. 3418——Approval of the present system of nomination and examination for the diplomatic service; grounds for the conclusion that it is better than a system of open competition, 3415–3417. 3449–3455.

Limited pressure for nominations for the service, on account chiefly of the service being at first unpaid, and of the necessity of attachés having large private means, 3419–3422. 3449–3453——Well-grounded dissatisfaction in the junior grades as to the inadequacy of the salaries, 3423, 3428——Practice formerly for the attachés to be boarded by the ambassadors, 3425–3428——Unlimited number of unpaid attachés formerly, these not generally entering the service as a profession, 3429–3431.

Doubt as to the expediency of the second examination for the service; non-objection, however, if it be not made too severe, 3431–3435——Decided stagnancy in the service, 3436, 3437. 3456–3459——Impracticability of any reduction in the number of attachés,

3437, 3438. 3450. 3457——Anxiety of witness to effect economy by a reduction of staff, if it were feasible, 3438. 3443. 3450.

Advantage of the heads of missions being able to avail themselves of the services of any of their staff in the capacity of private secretary, 3439——Great satisfaction expressed with the industrial and commercial reports made by the secretaries of legation, 3439–3442——Willingness evinced by the secretaries of legation to do whatever work is required of them, 3439, 3440——Very useful character of the Land Tenure Reports by the Secretaries, 3440.

Sincere satisfaction given to witness by the appointment of the present Committee, as a means of removing the ignorance and prejudice which prevail upon the question of the efficiency of the diplomatic service, 3440-3443.

Opinion that the diplomatic servants are generally a hard-worked and very moderately paid body, whilst their services are most useful, 3443, 3444——Great increase in the cost of living abroad, so that the generality of the staff cannot live upon their pay, 3444. 3446——Expenditure by witness of 6,000 l. beyond his salary during the six years that he was minister at Madrid, 3444, 3445.

Approval of the heads of missions being allowed to run two years' leave into one, 3447, 3448——Importance of ample facilities for coming to England occasionally, ib. ——Inexpediency of unpaid service, though there has been a great improvement in this respect, 3451.

Objection, even if attachés were paid, to a system of open competition as not likely to secure the peculiar qualifications required, 3452–3454——Exception taken to a proposal for giving some nominations to the Universities, 3455——Advantage of complete responsibility in the Secretary of State for every nomination and appointment, ib.

Approval of the practice of promotion by seniority, concurrently with a severe examination, so as to secure efficiency, 3456——Decided objection to a proposal for the employment at missions of clerks who should do the drudgery work, and not be in the line of promotion, 3460–3464——Injury to the service if others than gentlemen were employed, in whom confidence could not be reposed, ib.

Opinion adverse to a system of reports by heads of missions relative to the conduct of the staff, and the special fitness of any number for promotion, 3465, 3466——Responsibility of the heads of missions rather than of their subordinates for any want of harmony and discipline, 3467–3471——Doubt as to there being frequent quarrelling at missions injurious to the public service, 3470.

Explanation that there is no absolute rule as to the appointment of the senior secretary of embassy to a vacant mission, 3472—— Full sense of personal responsibility upon which witness has declined to re-employ ministers on the pension list, 3473——Rule of the service under which Mr. Layard, as having been Under Secretary, was appointed to Madrid, 3474.

[Second Examination].—Statement in further explanation and justification of witness's appointment of Mr. Layard, 3860–3865——Necessity of exceptions to the rule of seniority, 3864——Practice not to appoint by seniority to the post of permanent Under Secretary in the Foreign Office, ib.

Grounds for objecting to the abolition of the Stuttgardt mission, 3866–3869——Objections also to an abolition of the mission at Munich, ib.——Equal importance of retaining missions, though the policy of this country is now one of non-intervention, 3869.

Belief that the staff at the chief embassies and missions is now sufficiently occupied without being able to undertake consular work, 3870, 3871——Further objection to chanceliers, though at Madrid there are certain consular and notarial duties efficiently performed by a permanent clerk, 3872.

Twofold object of the secretaries' reports upon trade and commerce: namely, the improvement of the secretaries, and the acquisition of useful information, 3873——Very valuable information in some of these reports, 3873–3875——Conclusion that the heads of missions exercise some supervision over the reports, 3874, 3875——Assistance doubtless given by the second or third secretaries in the preparation of the reports, if asked to do so, by the head of the mission, 3876, 3877.

Doubt as to there having been much ground for complaints by chambers of commerce previously to 1864, that the commercial interests of this country abroad were neglected, 3878–3880——Exceedingly harmonious working of the Foreign Office and Board of Trade, as regards all questions of foreign trade and commerce; decided objection to the commercial correspondence going to the Board of Trade, 3879–3885. 3929, 3930.

Reference to certain correspondence between the Treasury and Foreign Office relative to the China consulates, and their expense, 3886–3888——Necessarily expensive character of those consulates, steps having however been taken to effect reductions, 3886——Opinion that no practical utility would result from an inquiry by the Treasury, in conjunction with the Foreign Office, into diplomatic establishments and salaries, 3889–3891.

Explanation as to a pecuniary reward or bonus being sometimes conferred, after application to the Treasury, for specially valuable services rendered by any attaché, 3892, 3893——Entire responsibility of witness in respect of the expenditure of secret service money at the Foreign Office; he declines to give any detailed information on the subject, 3894–3899——Separate permission to each minister abroad to expend a certain sum in secret service, 3898.

Statement that the abolition by witness of Foreign Office agencies was in a manner forced upon him by popular prejudice, 3900——Opinion that the agency system worked extremely well, and that its abolition will cause universal regret to the diplomatic and consular staff ib.——Utterly unfounded character of a report that the agents had some influence in the making of appointments, and in the distribution of patronage, ib.

Explanation that witness was not aware of certain deficiencies which appear to exist in the examination in French for attachéships, 3901, 3902——Grounds for the conclusion that it is very desirable that we should have a regularly accredited representative at the court of Rome, 3902, 3903——Inexpediency of the Eglinton clause, prohibiting the Pope from sending an ecclesiastic to this country as his representative, 3903–3905.

Decreased emoluments of the diplomatic servants, by reason of the great increase in the cost of living, whilst the salaries have been stationary, 3906–3907. 3922–3924——Hardship in a man being required to spend his private means in order to enable him to perform his public duties properly, 3906——Expediency of a revision of salaries, 3908, 3909. 3922——Entire fitness of the present class of men introduced into the service, 3910–3912——Importance of diplomatic servants having every facility for mixing in society abroad, 3913–3916.

Opinion that equal responsibility rests with ministers since the use of the telegraph, whilst there is no diminution in the work, 3917, 3918——Concurrence in the view that the value and the successes of diplomacy are chiefly of a preventive character, and are for the most part unseen, 3919, 3920——Approval under certain conditions of an ambassador in lieu of a minister at Washington, 3921——Inexpediency of a discontinuance of the secret service fund, 3925.

Decided insufficiency of the salary of our minister at Washington, 3926, 3927——Advantage of small missions as nurseries for young diplomatists, 3931——Approval of transfer from one post to another every two or three years, ib.——Entire dissent from the view that able and hard-working men are discouraged from serving the public under the present system, 3932.

Slowness of promotion in the army and navy, as well as in the diplomatic service, 3932. 3971——Doubt as to the necessity of more liberal allowance for outfit than is now given, when a man is suddenly promoted from one mission to another, 3933–3936——Approval of the maintenance of the mission at Coburg for family reasons, 3937–3941——Valuable information likely to be obtained from the Darmstadt mission, 3940.

Importance of a property qualification for the service, though witness disapproves of an absolute rule on the subject, 3942, 3943——Decided objection to Government holding itself liable for debts contracted by any consular or diplomatic servants, 3944–3946——Special consideration due as regards salary or pension when a mission is of a very unhealthy character, 3947, 3948.

Advantage if our diplomatic representatives in South America were raised to the rank of ministers resident, 3949——Difficulty of obtaining a satisfactory return of the number of British subjects in South America, 3950, 3951——Exception taken to a proposition for giving ministers in South America a private secretary who might be sent to any consulate in the event of the death or absence of the consul, 3952.

Tendency of Persia to come more and more within the pale of European influences, this rendering it important that the Persian mission should be under the Foreign Office, instead of the India Office, 3954–3956. 3958——Apprehended offence to the Shah, if the mission were transferred to the India Office, 3956. 3957——Very small number of letters received at the Foreign Office from the India Office relating to Persia, 3958, 3959——Conclusion that except as regards the Persian Gulf, India has little, if anything, to do with Persia, 3960, 3961.

Dissent from the opinion of Mr. Hammond, that the block in the service is not greater than in former years, 3962——Objection to junior diplomatic officers being drafted into the consular service, 3963, 3964——Sufficient applications for attachéships, though the inadequacy of pay is well known, 3965. 3968–3970——Respects in which the pay is less adequate than in the case of the army or navy, 3966, 3967——Attainment of the rank of first secretary in an average period of less than fifteen or twenty years, 3972——Expediency of the salaries of the junior members being included in any inquiry or revision; readiness expressed by witness to undertake an inquiry in the matter, 3973, 3974.

Clerks (Diplomatic Service):

1. Evidence in favour of the Employment of Clerks at Missions, for Copying and other Purposes.
2. Evidence opposed to the foregoing Proposition.

1. Evidence in favour of the Employment of Clerks at Missions, for Copying and other Purposes:

Proposition involving a large employment of clerks in the service, Christie 2656 et seq. ——Class of persons desirable for the proposed clerkships; conclusion that confidential work may be safely entrusted to them, ib. 2661, 2662. 2673, 2674. 2679——Excellent clerk at Buenos Ayres, who was appointed by witness some years ago; witness has not heard of his recent dismissal, ib. 2662-2666——The clerks should not look for promotion in the service, ib. 2673, 2674——Advantage of clerks as being permanent officers, and as being readily amenable to discipline, ib. 2678, 2679.

Evidence in further support of the recommended employment of permanent clerks at the larger missions, Christie 2990-2998. 3184——Several instances of clerks being usefully employed, ib. 2996——Explanation that a former clerk at Buenos Ayres was not dismissed because of any moral unworthiness, ib. 2998.

Approval of a trial being given to the employment of clerks at large missions, Hon. T. J. H. Thurlow 3831-3834.

2. Evidence opposed to the foregoing Proposition:

Evidence in support of the conclusion, that neither economy nor efficiency would be attained by the employment of copying clerks in lieu of attachés or secretaries, Hammond 148, 149. 321——Necessity of a sufficient staff for the discharge of confidential business, though the pressure of such business is not continual, ib. 321——Grounds for disapproving of a staff of copying clerks at the missions, Earl of Malmesbury 699——Objection to the employment of mere copying clerks, confidence being most important, Sir H. G. Elliot, 917. 936–940.

Decided objection to a proposal for the employment of clerks who should do the drudgery work, and not be in the line of promotion, Earl of Clarendon 3460–3464. 3872——Grounds for strongly objecting to a system of chanceliers or copying clerks, as tending to destroy that confidence which is the vital principle of international intercourse, Morier 4335-4342.

Conclusion that neither economy nor efficiency would result from the employment of clerks in lieu of second secretaries, Sir H. D. Wolff 4413–4416——Non-objection, however, to the employment of a clerk at large embassies like Paris, ib. 4413. 4416.

Opinion adverse to the employment of clerks as a means of reducing the junior staff in the line of promotion, Mitford 4162–4173. 4182–4190——Explanation that witness strongly objects to copying clerks being substituted for secretaries and attachés in the political and confidential work of the missions, Hon. E. R. Lytton 5241. 5246.

Climate. Special consideration due as regards salary or pension when a mission is of a very unhealthy character, Earl of Clarendon 3947, 3948——Fairness of reducing the term for pensions in respect of service in unhealthy climates, Mitford 4106, 4107——Doubt as to the expediency of special allowances or privileges in the case of men serving for a long time in such countries as China or Japan, Sir H. L. Bulwer 5131–5134.

Coburg. Special circumstances which make it desirable to keep up the Coburg mission; limited cost incurred, Hammond 164——Usefulness of a representative at Coburg, Earl of Malmesbury 771–773. 776-778——Non-removal of the minister at Coburg adverted to and explained, ib. 780–783——Approval of the maintenance of the mission at Coburg for family reasons, Earl of Clarendon 3937–3941.

Estimate of the salaries, &c., required for 1870–71, as compared with the amount from 1669–70, App. 405——Return showing the staff, and the salary for the year ended 31st March 1869, ib. 473.

Competition (Attachéships):

Objection to limited competition for attachéships, as well as to open competition, Hammond 329-336——Reluctance of witness to offer any comment upon the opinion of Lord Derby (in 1853) that the diplomatic service should be thrown open, ib. 415——Disapproval of open competition for the diplomatic service, Earl of Malmesbury 671-674

——Decided objection to attachéships being thrown open to public competition, Sir H. G. Elliot 1003, 1004. 1117–1119——Further disapproval of competition for attachéships, it being necessary to appoint men of good social standing and of private means, Earl of Malmesbury 1181–1183. 1222–1225.

Approval of the principle of limited competition on entry to the public service generally; doubt, however, as to the expediency of applying the principle of competition to the diplomatic service, Earl of Derby 2268–2271. 2319–2328——Grounds for objecting to a plan suggested by Mr. Grant Duff in 1861 for a system of competition for attachéships; advantage of the plan, as excluding incompetent persons, ib. 2548–2554. 2590——Open competition should first be tried in the civil service rather than in the diplomatic service, ib. 2554.

Approval to some extent of a scheme of competitive examination proposed by Mr. Grant Duff in 1861, by which the twelve best men were to be eligible for selection for vacancies within twelve months, Walrond 2894, 2895. 2899, 2900. 2909. 2922, 2923. 2940, 2941——Improbability of many persons coming for the diplomatic service if there were open competition; obstacle on account of the peculiar qualifications required for the service, ib. 2906–2908. 2916–2921. 2936——Witness cannot see any valid objection to a system of open competition for the diplomatic service, Christie 3133.

Opinion that it is hardly yet time to apply to the diplomatic service the system of competition proposed by Mr. Grant Duff, Walrond 3297, 3298. 3333——Special reasons which render open competition less desirable in the case of the diplomatic service than of the civil service generally; opinion that ultimately it may be applied to the diplomatic service, ib. 3298. 3326, 3327. 3396–3403——Suggestions for a limited competition for the diplomatic service, by an annual examination of competitors nominated by the Secretary of State, or by any of his predecessors, ib. 3298–3301. 3328, 3329. 3334–3338. 3346–3354. 3383–3385.

Conclusions adverse to a system of open competition as compared with the present system, Earl of Clarendon 3449–3455——Objection even if attachés were paid to a system of open competition as not likely to secure the peculiar qualifications required, ib. 3452–3454.

Approval of three nominations by the Secretary of State for each vacancy, in the same way as in the Foreign Office, Hon. T. J. H. Thurlow 3654, 3655. 3813——Conclusions strongly opposed to competitive examinations for the diplomatic service, Morier 4350–4355. 4466–4473——Opinion that on the score of social requirements, there is no valid objection to the appointment of diplomatic servants by competitive examination, Labouchere 4619–4623——Grounds for the apprehension that competitive examination is not desirable for the service, Sir H. L. Bulwer 4850, 4851.

CONSTANTINOPLE:

1. Salary of the Ambassador, and Cost of the Embassy.
2. Extraordinary Expenses.
3. Question of Reduction of Staff.
4. Dragomans.
5. Embassy House.
6. Objection to frequent Removal of the Ambassador.

1. Salary of the Ambassador, and Cost of the Embassy:

Reasons for the much greater cost of the British mission in Turkey than in the United States, Hammond 569, 570——Explanation as to the higher salary of the British ambassador at Constantinople than of any other ambassador or minister there, ib. 570–574.

Advantage of the position of ambassador over that of minister at Constantinople, Sir H. G. Elliot 961–968. 1104–1113——Great expense of living at Constantinople, ib. 1088, 1089——Doubt as to the English embassy being more expensive than the Russian embassy, ib. 1095–1099——Explanation that witness has nothing to do with any fees taken by the consul general, ib. 1100–1102.

Statement that there is no reason why the ambassador at Constantinople need spend more than from 2,000 l. to 3,000 l. a year, Labouchere 4644–4650——Unnecessarily large salary further adverted to, ib. 4779.

Inability of witness to live upon anything like 2,000 l. or 3,000 l. a year, when ambassador at Constantinople, Sir H. L. Bulwer 4828, 4829——Large increase in the cost of wages, &c. between 1854 and 1859, ib. 5220.

Return showing the staff, and the salaries and allowances, for the year ended 31st March 1869, App. 472.

Estimate of the salaries, &c. required for 1870–71 as compared with 1869–70, App. 407

2. Extraordinary Expenses:

Reduction effected in recent years in the charge for boats, &c., Hammond 623-625——Circumstance of witness having never received anything for extraordinary expenses at Constantinople, Sir H. G. Elliot 877, 878——Limited extent to which there is any room for economy in the extraordinary expenses generally ib. 989–998.

Information relative to the annual amount of extraordinaries from 1853 to 1869, App. 411——Comparative statement of extraordinary expenses at the embassy, from 1857 to 1869, inclusive, ib. 434.

3. Question of Reduction of Staff:

Necessity of retaining the services of the oriental secretary at Constantinople, Hammond 636——Opinion that a second secretary and one dragoman might be dispensed with at Constantinople, and also the oriental secretary when an opportunity offers, Sir H. G. Elliot 927–931. 957–960. 1086——Inability of witness to explain the failure of the scheme for Oriental attachés, ib. 1269, 1270——Varying amount of correspondence on Persian matters, ib. 1288–1292.

Exceeding numerous staff at Constantinople when witness was sent there in 1863, Labouchere 4670——Impression of witness as to his having been eight months at Constantinople; on examination, he admits that his stay there was not so long, ib. 4671–4681.——Amount of reduction which might be effected in the staff, ib. 4692–4694——The oriental secretary is entirely useless, ib.

Uselessness of the oriental secretary, Sir H. L. Bulwer 5168, 5199——Very large consular business to be attended to by the ambassador, ib. 5226–5528.

4. Dragomans:

Information relative to the system of employment of dragomans; necessity of an equivalent expenditure in another shape if these be abolished, Hammond 48–50. 150–153. 626–635——Particulars relative to the staff of dragomans; important functions discharged by the chief dragoman, Sir H. G. Elliot 877–899. 925–927. 969–971——Obstacles to the employment of English interpreters in lieu of dragomans; advantage if regular members of the diplomatic service could be employed, ib. 893–897. 972–980. 999, 1000. 1032, 1033——Increase desirable in the salaries of the dragomans, ib. 925–928. 954–956. 1073–1077.

Very little work devolving on the dragomans in connection with the embassy, Labouchere 4695–4697——Influence of the dragomans adverted to; statement as to the chief dragoman having received a valuable house from the Sultan as a present, ib. 4998–4700——Necessity of placing full confidence in the head dragoman, but not in the others, Sir H. L. Bulwer 5200, 5201. 5205.

5. Embassy House:

Enormous expenditure since 1843 upon the British embassy house; sanction given to such expenditure by the Treasury, Hammond 576–584——Necessity of keeping up the ambassador's house at Therapia, Sir H. G. Elliot 1050, 1051——Further information relative to the embassy house at Constantinople; necessity of building the house instead of hiring one, Hammond 1547–1551——Possession of a country-house as well as a town-house by the several foreign missions at Constantinople, ib. 1554.

Information relative to the embasssyite at Constantinople, together with suggestions as to the building of a new embassy house; conclusion that the house at Therapia might be sold, and that one residence, somewhere upon the Bosphorus, would suffice, Sir H. L. Bulwer, 5139–5144. 5152–5154. 5211–5215.

6. Objection to frequent Removal of the Ambassador:

Approval of the ambassador at Constantinople remaining there for a long time, frequent removal being very undesirable, Sir H. D. Wolff, 4253–4255.

CONSULAR SERVICE:

1. Question of Amalgamation with the Diplomatic Service.
2. Question of the Appointment of Diplomatic Officers to Consular Posts.
3. Question of Separation between Political and Commercial Consulships.
4. Necessity for a Revision of the Service.

12. Statistics of Expenditure.
13. Inability of the Committee to undertake the Consular Inquiry until next Session.

1. Question of Amalgamation with the Diplomatic Service:

Broad distinction between the consular and diplomatic services, an amalgamation being very undesirable, Hammond 251–263——Line of demarcation between the consular and diplomatic services, through there having been some appointments from the former to the latter, Earl of Malmesbury 793–795. 804, 805——Objection to an entire amalgamation of the consular and diplomatic services, though there should be full power of appointment from one service to another, Sir H. G. Elliot 852–856. 1001, 1002. 1103–1132.

Difficulties of an amalgamation of the consular and diplomatic services, Earl of Derby 2288——Belief that the staff at the chief embassies and missions is now sufficiently occupied without being able to undertake consular work, Earl of Clarendon 3870, 3871.

Proposition for amalgamation of the diplomatic service, consular service, and Foreign Office, by establishing equivalent ranks, and by a system of promotion or exchange from one service into the other, Sir H. D. Wolff 4226-4249.

Opinion that such consular posts as are in their nature wholly political should be amalgamated with the diplomatic service, Morier 4307–4309——Distinct separation desirable to be maintained between the mere shipping or commercial consular service and the diplomatic service, ib. 4406——Doubt whether in all cases consular work could be done by members of missions, though merely notarial work might be so done, ib. 4533–4536. 4591——Further statement in favour of amalgamating with the diplomatic service consularships which have a political character, such as that of Alexandria, ib. 4548–4553.

Decided appproval of an amalgamation of the consular and diplomatic services, Labouchere 4746-4748——Proposition submitted in detail for an amalgamation of the diplomatic, consular, and Foreign Office services with suggestions as to the staff to be employed, and as to the examinations, salaries, promotion, &c., ib. 4748.

Grounds for disapproving of an amalgamation of the consular and diplomatic services, though consuls and consuls general should be eligible for diplomatic posts, Sir H. L. Bulwer 4901-4907. 4940–4943——The younger diplomatic servants would make very bad consuls, ib. 4907. 4940.

2. Question of Appointment of Diplomatic Officers to Consular Posts:

Obstacle to the employment of junior diplomatic servants at Warsaw and other consular posts, Hammond 225, 226——Natural dissatisfaction in the consular body if diplomatic servants were appointed to the large commercial consulates, ib. 258–264.

Suggestion that the block in the diplomatic service might be relieved by appointing some of the secretaries and attachés to consular missions; doubt as to this being a just grievance to the vice-consuls, Earl of Malmesbury 702, 703. 760–764. 797. 800–804——Examination in explanation and defence of the proposition for an increased appointment of diplomatic servants to consular ports; statement hereon as to outsiders being already appointed to consulships, Sir H. G. Elliot 1063–1072. 1293, 1294. 1299–1326.

Power at present to appoint diplomatic officers to consular posts; approval of such appointments, efficiency being duly considered, Earl of Derby 2287——Room for much reduction in the consular service, so that junior diplomatic officers should not be drafted into it, Christie 3086——Objection to junior diplomatic officers being drafted into the consular service, Earl of Clarendon 3963, 3964.

The consulships at Bucharest, Warsaw, Tunis, and Egypt are amongst the posts which should be filled by a political agent, Morier 4309——Groundlessness of the apprehension that diplomatic servants in certain consular posts would be prone to meddling and intervention, ib. 4393-4395.

3. Question of Separation between Political and Commercial Consularships:

Objection to any attempt at separation between commercial and political consuls, with a view to the former being placed under the Board of Trade, and reporting directly to the Board, Sir H. G. Elliot 1283–1287——Doubt as to the expediency of separating shipping consuls from political consuls, and of placing the former under the Board of Trade, Earl of Derby 2495–2498——Belief as to the practical facility of separating the political from the non-political correspondence of consuls; question, however, as to the expediency of such separation, ib. 2603, 2604.

4. Necessity for a Revision of the Service:

Expediency of a very careful revision of the consular service, there being consular posts which might be abolished, whilst there are other places where consuls should be appointed, Earl of Malmesbury 730, 731.

5. Suggestions

5. Suggestions by Mr. Christie for an Amendment of the Consular System:

Important economy to be affected generally by merging consulships with missions in all capitals which are ports, Christie 2690, 2961. 2695, 2696——Suggestion for bringing consuls at outposts more directly under the superintendence of the mission in the country, ib. 2958-2960——Important economy by the employment of resident merchants of respectability for the performance of consular work, ib. 2959, 2960.

Advantage of more power in the ministers abroad to recommend persons for consuls, and to suggest the promotion of vice-consuls, Christie 3029——Conclusion that commercial interests will not suffer by being placed under missions in charge of political officers, ib. 3030-3033——Necessity of a distinct consular office at distant ports from the capital, ib. 3038.

6. Employment of Consuls otherwise than in the Public Service:

Comment upon a certain Return recently furnished by the Foreign Office relative to consular appointments otherwise than in the public service; inaccuracy of this return, Christie 3107-3113.

7. Promotion:

Advantage of better security for promotion in the consular service, Earl of Derby 2288, 2289——The service has always been held to be an entirely open one, ib. 2486.

8. Removal from one post to another:

Evil of the removal of consuls from countries, the language and people of which they are well experienced with, to countries of which they know nothing, Earl of Derby 2534. 2543. 2578.

9. Fees:

Total of 109 fees levied in the United States consular service, and of thirty-nine in the English service, Hammond 1434——Payment to the Treasury of the consular fees received at Paris, ib. 1796, 1767——Amended regulations about to be applied to the fees received at Constantinople, ib. 1798——Circumstance of no fees being taken at Florence, ib. 1799.

Regulation as to the commission of consular fees to the Foreign Office, App. 414.

Comparative statement of fees charged by United States consuls, and by consuls in Her Majesty's service, App. 510.

Amount of general consular fees, exclusive of those taken in Turkey, China, Japan, and Siam, in each year since 1860, App. 513——Total of consular fees received in the years 1868-69, ib.

10. Reduction of Expenditure:

Economy of nearly 6,000 l. a year effected by witness by reductions in the service, Earl of Clarendon 3438. 3456.

11. Administration of Estates of British Subjects:

Absence of any right in British consuls to undertake the administration of the estates of British subjects dying abroad, Greenwood 3288-3290.

12. Statistics of Expenditure:

Return showing the charges transferred from the Consular to the Diplomatic Grant and from the Diplomatic Grant to the Consular Vote since 1851, App. 431——Annual charge for British consular service, exclusive of China and Japan, as per Estimates, for each year since 1854, ib. 512——Particulars of annual services in China, Japan, and Siam, ib.——Analysis of British consular salaries, exclusive of those of consuls in China, Japan, and Siam, ib. 513.

13. Inability of the Committee to undertake the Consular Inquiry until next Session:

Report by the Committee that they have not been able to enter upon the consular branch of their inquiry; they recommend, therefore, the re-appointment of the Committee, Rep. iii.

Conyngham, Mr. Denial that the Foreign Office accounts were in a very confused and unsatisfactory state when handed over to witness as successor to Mr. Conyngham, Alston 1908-1910——Exceedingly efficient services rendered by Mr. Conyngham, during his long tenure of the office of chief clerk, ib. 2012-2016.

Copenhagen. Reasons for a higher class of minister at Copenhagen than at Stockholm, Hon. T. J. H. Thurlow 3839-3841.

Return showing the staff, and the salaries and allowances, for the year ended 31st March 1869, App. 473——Estimate of the salaries, &c. required for 1870-71, as compared with the amount for 1869-70, ib. 405.

Copying Clerks. See Clerks.

Copying Machines. Decided objection to copying machines in the Foreign Office, Hammond 149——Grounds for the conclusion that copying machines would not answer in the Foreign Office or diplomatic service, although they may be very successfully used by large commercial firms, ib. 1736-1742——Disapproval of copying presses in the missions in China and Japan; liability thereby to confidential information being divulged, Mitford 4152-4164. 4190.

Opinion that copying machines might be largely used at missions and consulates for local and subsidiary correspondence, Christie 2963——Advantage of copying machines further adverted to; that is, chiefly for consular and local correspondence, ib. 3171-3175.

Important economy of labour by the use of copying presses; satisfactory use of these by the United States, Hon. T J. H. Thurlow 3544-3547. 3748. 3808-3812——Conclusion that copying machines may be introduced into the chancelleries with very great advantages, Labouchere 4814-4820.

Correspondence. Number of volumes of diplomatic correspondence adverted to as some indication of the amount of business transacted at the English and foreign missions, Hammond 145-147. 1783-1786. 1793.

Particulars as to the number of volumes of diplomatic correspondence bound from 1857 to 1867, at the different foreign missions; aggregate of 2,703, App. 419.

Danube Navigation Commission. Information relative to the Danube Navigation Commission, instituted by the Foreign Office, and its very valuable operation, Hammond 1775-1778.

Darmstadt. Exceptional reasons for keeping a representative at Darmstadt, the allowance being only 700*l.* a year, Hammond 166 —— Special ground upon which the missons at Darmstadt and Coburg are retained; valuable reports received from the former mission, Earl of Derby 2424-2426. 2467-2472——Valuable information likely to be obtained from the Darmstadt mission, Earl of Clarendon 3940.

Inferior diplomatic position of witness as compared with the representatives of other countries at Darmstadt; his recognised position there is that of a chargé de affaires, Morier 4266-4269——Special circumstances which render it important that there should be a diplomatic agent of this country at Darmstadt, ib. 4270-4272. 4275. 4288-4290——Circumstance of the Empress of Russia being sister to the Grand Duke, whilst the Royal Family is also immediately connected with the Grand Ducal Family, ib. 4271——Salary of 700*l.* a year allowed to witness, there being no staff whatever, ib. 4273, 4274.

Varied and onerous duties devolving upon witness, his time being fully occupied, Morier 4276-4278——There are about eighty or ninety English residents, or rather the congregation consists of this number, ib. 4289, 4290——Stuttgardt is now the nearest place having a diplomatic representative, ib. 4290, 4291——Large increase in the cost of living at Darmstadt, ib. 4296.

Part taken by witness in connection with the negotiatons for the Austrian commercial treaty; long absence from Darmstadt on this occasion, Morier 4299-4305——Witness considers himself very much underpaid, ib. 4388——Importance of a mission at Darmstadt further adverted to, ib. 4474-4478. 4574. 4599-4613.

Further

Darmstadt—continued.

Further reference to the nominal position of chargé d'affaires filled by witness at Darmstadt, his salary of 700*l.* a year being very inadequate, Morier 4574–4584.

Absence of necessity for any chargé d'affaires at Darmstadt, Labouchere 4739–4741. 4750, 4751. 4776. 4813.

Return showing the staff and the salary for the year ended 31st March 1869; similar salary estimated for 1870-71 as in 1869-70, App. 405. 473.

Debts (Diplomatic and Consular Officers). Degree of immunity enjoyed by diplomatic and consular officers in regard to debt; very rare complaints on this score, Hammond 1723–1728——Explanations as to the course pursued with reference to debts contracted by the representative of the Shah of Persia in England; some debts contracted by our late consul in Persia are in quite a different category, ib. 1872–1875.

Doubt as to there having been any instance of deduction from a consul's salary on account of debts incurred; case of Consul Mackenzie at Resht specially adverted to, Alston 2017–2023.

Decided objection to Government holding itself liable for debts contracted by consular or diplomatic servants, Earl of Clarendon 3944–3946.

Derby, Earl of. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Experience of witness as having filled the offices of Secretary of State and Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, 2255–2257——Satisfaction expressed with the system of examinations for the diplomatic service, 2259-2262——Less eagerness evinced to enter the diplomatic service than the Foreign Office or other branches of the public service; witness, however, found no difficulty in nominating a sufficient supply of competent men, 2263–2267. 2271——Approval of the principle of limited competition on entry to the public service; doubt, however, as to the expediency of applying the principle of competition to the diplomatic service, 2268–2271. 2319–2328.

Satisfactory working of the present system of nomination of attachés, it being very essential that the service should consist of gentlemen, 2272. 2275. 2323, 2324——Very little value of a university degree as a qualification for nomination, 2273, 2274——Dissent from the view that there is any peculiar stagnation in the service requiring urgent remedy, 2276–2278. 2283. 2335–2339——Opinion that promotion should be by selection, with due regard to seniority; expediency of selection for the higher posts more especially, 2279–2281. 2340–2346——Approval of the occasional appointment of outsiders to the higher posts, 2282. 2359, 2360——Means of remedying any block in the service by keeping down the number of new appointments, 2283, 2284.

Power at present to appoint diplomatic officers to consular posts; approval of such appointments, efficiency being duly considered, 2287——Difficulties of an amalgamation of the consular and diplomatic services, 2288——Advantage of better security for promotion in the consular service, 2288, 2289.

Large increase in recent years in the cost of living abroad; opinion that on this and other grounds diplomatic salaries do not admit of reduction, 2290–2296. 2382–2393. 2462, 2463——Importance attached to the office of ambassador, though involving a larger salary than that of minister, 2296. 2300–2302——Exception taken to the American system of diplomacy, there being no regular service or profession, 2297–2299——Advantage of a permanent officer in charge of the records at the chief missions; inconvenience during leave of absence, 2303. 2444, 2445. 2451–2456——Dissent from the view that there is any grievance in the matter of leave of absence of heads of missions, 2304–2306.

Full concurrence of witness in the transfer of the Persian mission to the India Office by Lord Malmesbury in 1858; 2307–2309——Balance of advantages in favour of the Persian mission being under the India Office rather than the Foreign Office; witness, however, has no very strong opinion on the subject, 2310–2318. 2446, 2447.

Approval generally of the present system of remuneration of the junior officers, the work being efficiently done, and the staff being adequate to meet any sudden crisis: advantage as compared with a smaller staff of better paid men, appointed by competition, 2325–2339——Fair amount of work done at foreign missions, 2329, 2330——Valuable character of the secretaries' reports, 2330. 2394-2405——Concurrence in the view that upon the question of removing or promoting any junior, it is desirable that the opinion of the head of the Mission should be taken, 2345-2349.

Evidence opposed to the local permanence of secretaries of legation, in lieu of the system of transfer every two years or so, 2350–2367——Approval of the system of promotion by selection to the higher grades in the Foreign Office, 2374–2376——Grounds for the conclusion that the chief diplomatic posts abroad should be filled irrespectively of change of Government at home, 2377–2381——Careful investigation necessary in comparing the salaries of English heads of missions with those of foreign countries, 2386–2393.

Doubt whether any curtailment could be advantageously made in the amount and classes of work performed at the foreign missions; valuable information frequently supplied, 2394–2407—— Inexpediency of relying upon the Press for foreign information, 2396. 2403. 2464–2466——Admission as to some treaties having been made by secret negotiations, the operation of which treaties has not been satisfactory to this country, 2408–2413—— Argument that, as regards peace or war, the diplomatic officers are responsible only for the efficient carrying out of the instructions of the Government, received through the Foreign Office, 2414–2421.

Opinion that the minister at Munich might do the little work which is done at Stuttgardt, 2422, 2423——Special ground upon which the missions at Darmstadt and Coburg are retained; valuable reports received from the former mission, 2424–2426. 2467–2472 ——Conclusion that there is now little, if any, necessity for a mission at Dresden; reduction of this mission by witness, 2427–2431. 2475–2478—— Grounds for objecting to a withdrawal of the missions in Switzerland, Sweden, and Denmark, 2432–2435—— Doubt as to the expediency of direct official communication with the Court of Rome, 2436–2440—— Efficiency of Mr. Odo Russell, 2437.

Obstacle to the occasional employment of Foreign Office clerks at foreign missions, 2441, 2442 —— Objection to any rule or restriction in regard to the practice of entertaining, 2443——Approval of the employment of attachés for six months in the Foreign Office, 2448-2450——Impression that heads of missions sometimes testify to the Foreign Office relative to zeal and industry in the juniors at the missions, 2457–2459—— Great care taken by the diplomatic servants not to put forward their own political opinions, 2460, 2461.

[Second Examination.]—Explanation that second and third secretaries are not necessarily removed at the end of two years, 2479——Removal of some complaints as regards leave of absence, by throwing two years' leave into one; doubt as to any other amendment being required, 2479, 2480——Admission as to special embassies and missions being of a costly kind, 2481, 2482.

Several instances of consuls appointed to diplomatic posts, especially in China and Japan; approval of this practice, 2483–2485. 2494——Consideration of the circumstances attending the appointment of Admiral Harris to a diplomatic post; there is no rule excluding appointments of this kind, 2485–2493——Approval of the appointment of outsiders being the exception to the rule, 2490——Doubt as to the expediency of separating shipping consuls from political consuls, and of placing the former under the Board of Trade, 2495–2498.

Further reference to the comparative absence of pressure to enter the diplomatic service, and the probable causes thereof, 2499–2508——Explanation as to some officers having served for many years in America, Persia, and other distant places: claim in such case to removal to more eligible posts nearer home, 2507–2510——Expediency of full discretion in the Secretary of State as to not re-employing any officer who for a time has been unemployed, 2511–2513.

Inexpediency of any test or condition which should exclude from the service those who have received a good general education, though they may not have passed through the Universities, nor obtained honours, 2514–2522——Doubt as to its being desirable to provide for the boarding of attachés and secretaries in the ministers' houses, 2523, 2524 ——Important authorities in favour of the Persian mission being under the India Office, high authorities also on the other side, 2525–2532.

Exceptional instances in which it might be well to promote an attaché or secretary at any post, and to keep him there instead of removing him, 2534. 2544, 2545——Evil of the removal of consuls from countries, the language and people of which they are well experienced with, to countries of which they know nothing, 2534. 2543. 2578——Small number of attaches appointed by witness, as compared with the vacancies during his tenure of office 2534.

Question considered whether heads of missions should not have a voice in the selection of attachés under them, and should not be referred to as to their promotion, 2536-2542. 2544. 2559——Probability of increased pressure of work at the Foreign Office when there is increased pressure at the foreign missions, 2546, 2547——Grounds for objecting to a plan suggested by Mr. Grant Duff in 1861, for a system of competition for attachéships; advantage of the plan as excluding incompetent persons, 2548–2554. 2590.

Further consideration of the rule and practice as to the removal of attachés and secretaries, 2555–2558. 2570——Doubtful advantage if it were the rule that some of the promotions in the Foreign Office were to be by selection, on the recommendation of the under secretaries, 2560–2562——Further evidence in favour of diplomatic servants being persons of the higher ranks of social life; aristocratic connection is not material; 2565-2568.

Objection to any alteration of the examinations in order to facilitate the entry of men not intending to make the service a profession, 2569——Question considered whether a consulate consulate should not be established at Pesth; the ambassador at Vienna can best give an opinion on this matter, 2571–2579——Boon to consuls general if allowed the same leave as diplomatic officers, 2580–2582.

Convenience in retaining a full supply of Queen's messengers, though there may not be full work for them in time of peace, 2583——Advantage of the present trained staff of messengers, as compared with Foreign Office clerks employed as messengers on special occasions, 2584, 2585. 2605–2608——Exception taken to a suggestion by Sir Henry Elliot, relative to the employment of private secretaries by ambassadors and ministers, 2586, 2587.

Examination as to the amount of responsibility of the Foreign Secretary for the acts of heads of missions whom he has not appointed; inexpediency in any case of a system of new appointments when there is a new Secretary of State, 2588–2602——Strong objection to widening the scope for political patronage in the administration of the diplomatic service, 2594–2596——Very little reference in recent years to party politics in the distribution of diplomatic patronage, 2597–2600——Belief as to the practical facility of separating the political from non-political correspondence of consuls; question however as to the expediency of such separation, 2603, 2604.

Despatches. Statement as to its being very unsafe to send despatches in cipher, by post; less safety than in sending telegrams, Hammond 1756. 1758–1764.

Diplomatic Service. See the Headings generally throughout the Index.

Discipline. Denial that there is good ground for charges of insubordination and want of discipline in the diplomatic service, Hammond 306–309. 393–402.

Grounds for the conclusion that ambassadors and ministers have not proper control over the secretaries and other subordinates, Christie 2713–2722——Undue interference with discipline so long as the secretary of legation is independent as regards reports, &c., ib. 2495. 2950–2954.

Further evidence as to the expediency of the head of the mission having a directing control over all the staff, and over their employment, with a view to the discipline and effective working of the mission, Christie 2950–2953——Result of witness's experience that quarrelling at embassies and missions has been frequent, owing chiefly to the want of proper control in the heads, ib. 2952, 2953.

Further statement that harmony at missions was the exception rather than the rule, when witness was in the service, Christie 3169——Tendency of the Foreign Office to support the heads of missions against the subordinates, ib. 3170——Greater harmony at missions if there were a private secretary and a reduced staff, ib. 3185, 3186.

Responsibility of the heads of missions rather than of their subordinates, for any wants of harmony and discipline, Earl of Clarendon 3467–3471——Doubt as to there being frequent quarrelling at missions injurious to the public service, ib. 3470.

Expediency of greater subordination on the part of the junior members of legations towards the heads of missions; views of Lord Clarendon and Lord Cowley on this point, Sir H. L. Bulwer 5577–5181.

See also Secretaries of Embassy and Legation.

Dragomans. Failure of a plan tried by Lord Palmerston for obtaining interpreting attachés in Turkey, so as to dispense with dragomans; objection to any further attempt of a similar kind, Hammond 48–50. 150–153. 626–635——Advantage of the knowledge of French now possessed by high officials in Turkey, so that our ambassador is not obliged to rely on dragomans, ib. 50–52.

Suggested interchange of service between the dragomans and consuls in the East, Sir H. L. Bulwer 5202——Doubt as to the dragomans receiving fees or douceurs, ib. 5203, 5204.

See also Constantinople, 4.

Dresden. Several grounds for maintaining a diplomatic representive at Dresden, the allowances amounting to 950 l. a year, Hammond 165. 167–169.

Conclusion that there is now little, if any, necessity for a mission at Dresden; reduction of this mission by witness, Earl of Derby 2427–2431. 2475–2478——Convenience, however, in having a diplomatic agent in or near Dresden, ib. 2475–2478.

Statement in support of the conclusion that there is no need of a legation at Dresden, and that there should be a consular agent there who should act for Leipsic also, Labouchere 4728–4738.

Return showing the staff, and the salary, for the year ended the 31st March 1869, App. 474——Estimate of the salaries, &c., required for 1870–71, as compared with the amount for 1869–70, ib. 405.

E.

Education. Expediency of a special diplomatic education, very different from the present education of attachés, Morier 4347-4349.

Efficiency (Diplomatic Servants). Zeal and ability of the staff; denial that there is any good ground for charges of insubordination, Hammond 306-309. 393-402——Efficiency of the service under a close system, and under the rule of promotion by seniority, subject to occasional exceptions, Hammond 322-328. 375-385; Hon. T. J. H. Thurlow 3621——Opinion that the diplomatic servants are generally a hard-worked and very moderately paid body, whilst their services are most useful, Earl of Clarendon 3443, 3444——Entire fitness of the present class of men introduced into the service, ib. 3910-3912——Greater efficiency of English diplomatists than of those of foreign countries, Sir H. D. Wolff 4226.

Egypt. Alterations under consideration at the Foreign Office with respect to consular jurisdiction in Egypt, Sir H. G. Elliot 1276-1279.

Elliot, The Right Hon. Sir Henry George, G.C.B. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is Ambassador at Constantinople, now home on leave, 818, 819——Explanation of the present arrangements as to leave of absence, and of the distinction made between heads of missions and their subordinates; amendment required, 820-826——Long experience of witness in the diplomatic service, 827——Importance of the change made in his time as regards pensions, by giving commissions to second and third secretaries, 828-830——More close character of the service than in former years, the effect being that promotion is much slower, 831-835.

Suggestion that the entrance examination be very light, and that there be a second examination of a very strict kind for second secretaries, 835-841. 1009, 1010. 1030, 1031. 1048, 1049. 1052-1054——System of cramming for the present examinations, 838, 839. 1055-1057——Better knowledge of French since the examinations have been in force, 842. 1090-1094——Similar class of society from which attachés continue to be taken, 843, 844.

Large number of consuls and vice-consuls in the East under witness; heavy commercial business in consequence at Constantinople, 845-851——Objection to an entire amalgamation of the consular and diplomatic services, though there should be full power of appointment from one service to the other, 852-856. 1001, 1002. 1103. 1132——Prevention of blocks in the service by keeping the junior staff as low as possible, 857. 1063-1066.

Belief that at many missions the staff is larger than is required for the work, 857. 1011-1014——Doubt as to there being now too many hands at St. Petersburg, 858-862——Irregular way in which the staff used to attend at Vienna, 863, 864——Sufficiency of one man for the work at the Hague, 865——Difficulty in doing with only one attaché on account of leave of absence, ib.——Suggestion that some one might be sent from the Foreign Office to any mission when leave was being granted, and where one man would suffice to do the work, 865, 866. 1005, 1006. 1008. 1044-1047.

Very decided block in the service, the discontent in consequence being very undesirable, 867-871. 1080-1083——Undue extent to which the seniority system has been carried, 869. 1026-1029——Non-complaint as to the salaries of heads of missions, 872-875——Expediency of raising the salaries of the second secretaries and of the secretaries of legation, 873-876. 1010. 1086, 1087——Circumstance of witness having never received anything for extraordinary expenses at Constantinople, 877, 878.

Information relative to the staff of dragomans at Constantinople: important functions discharged by the chief dragoman, 877-899. 925-927. 969-971——Obstacles to the employment of English interpreters in lieu of dragomans; advantage if regular members of the diplomatic service could be employed, 893-897. 972-980. 999, 1000. 1032, 1033——Improvement if at large missions a permanent officer were appointed in charge of the records, as at Constantinople; means thereby of reducing the staff, 900-907. 911. 922-924. 1114-1116.

Respects in which the telegraph tends to increase the difficulty of carrying on diplomatic business, 908-910. 945-949. 981, 982. 1039-1043——Suggestions on the subject of the heads of large missions being provided with a private secretary; opportunity thereby of reducing the permanent staff, 911-915. 950-953. 983-988. 1017. 1034-1038.——Objection to the employment of mere copying clerks, confidence being most important, 917. 936-940——Irregularity at some large missions in the performance of the work, 918, 919——Advantage of the secretaries of legation being frequently changed from one mission to another, 920, 921.

Increase desirable in the salaries of the dragomans, 925–928. 954–956. 1073–1077——Opinion that a second secretary and one dragoman might be dispensed with at Constantinople, and also the oriental secretary when an opportunity offers, 927–931. 957–960. 1086——Amended regulations on the score of pensions further adverted to, 932–935. 1067, 1068——Advantage of the position of ambassador over that of minister at Constantinople, 961–968. 1104–1113.

Limited extent to which there is any room for economy in the extraordinary expenses at Constantinople, 989–998——Decided objection to attachéships being thrown open to public competition, 1003, 1004. 1117–1119——Room for some reduction in the consulships in the Levant, 1007——Importance of the diplomatic servants often coming to England, 1015, 1016——Political character of the consulships in the East, efficient and well-paid men being very essential, 1018–1025——Necessity of keeping up the ambassador's house at Therapea, 1050, 1051.

Relief to the service by appointing some men to consular posts, or by retiring them altogether, 1063–1072——Room for reduction of staff if the secretaries of legation had more distinct regular work imposed upon them, 1084, 1085——Great expense of living at Constantinople, 1088, 1089——Doubt as to the English embassy at Constantinople being more expensive than the Russian embassy, 1095–1099——Explanation that witness has nothing to do with any fees taken by the consul general, 1100–1102——Approval of the system of unpaid attachés, provided the secretaries and second secretaries are much better paid, after passing a severe examination, 1120–1124.

Further statement as to the control of witness over the consuls in Turkey and as to the efficiency generally of the service; advantage of the consuls being English, but for the difficulty as to the languages, 1125–1140.

[Second Examination.]—Communication made by witness to the Foreign Office upon the question of reduction in the consular staff in Turkey and the Levant; very little reduction feasible, 1247, 1248. 1327–1352——Fewer men of good expectations in the service than in former years, 1249–1253——Exception taken to a university degree, as sufficient test of fitness for the service, 1254–1268.

Inability of witness to explain the failure of the scheme for oriental attachés at Constantinople, 1269, 1270——Inconvenience of any arrangement for providing the subordinate staff at any mission with board at the public expense, 1271–1274.

Absence of alteration since 1861 in consular jurisdiction in Turkey, 1276——Alterations under consideration at the Foreign Office with respect to consular jurisdiction in Egypt, 1276–1279——Difficulty in drawing a line between commercial and political matters, as regards the reports of the consuls to the embassy at Constantinople, 1280–1283——Objection to any attempt at sparation between commercial and political consuls with a view to the former being placed under the Board of Trade, and reporting directly to the Board, 1283–1287——Varying amount of correspondence at Constantinople on Persian matters, 1288–1292.

Examination in further explanation and defence of the proposition for an increased appointment of diplomatic servants to consular posts; statement known as to outsiders being already appointed to consulships, 1293, 1294. 1299–1326——Importance, as regards promotion, of the junior diplomatic servants being kept as limited in number as possible, 1295–1297——Less grievance of unpaid attachés since they have been paid after four years' service, 1298.

Explanations relative to the consular jurisdiction in Turkey and in Egypt; grounds for objecting to any surrender of the capitulations or treaties obtained from the Porte on the subject, 1353–1384——Inconvenience still to be removed on the score of quarantine in Turkey, 1385.

Further statement as to the advantage of Englishmen as consuls in the East; efficiency, however, of the present consuls generally, 1386–1388——Impolicy of going very far in the way of reduction of small missions, 1389——Advantage of the employment of clerks or chanceliers further adverted to; disadvantage, on the other hand, as tending to prevent the attachés from learning their business thoroughly, 1390–1394.

Embassies. See Ambassadors.

Embassy Houses. Practice as to taking embassy houses for a term of years; doubt as to this being an economical arrangement, Hammond 53, 54——Advantage in the embassy houses being taken or leased by Government, the ministers paying the rent allowed, ib. 1556–1563——Great importance attached to the provision of embassy houses, Hon. T. J. H. Thurlow 3562–3570. 3749–3751.

EXAMINATIONS (DIPLOMATIC SERVICE):

1. Information relative to the present Regulations.
2. Effect of the Examinations upon the Efficiency of the Service.
3. Number of Rejections.
4. Suggestions for an Amendment of the present System.
5. Question of Competitive Examinations.

1. Information relative to the present Regulations:

Re-arrangement in 1865 as to the examination of attachés, a second examination being now imperative before the grant of a commission as second secretary, Hammond 6. 14 —— System of test or pass examination, there being no competition, ib. 7–10. 94–99 —— Frequent change as to the examinations; approval of the present regulation as to service abroad before the second examination, ib. 176, 177.

System of cramming for the present examinations for the diplomatic service, Sir H. G. Elliot 838, 839. 1055–1057 —— Satisfaction expressed with the present system of examinations, Earl of Derby 2259–2262 —— Instrumentality of witness in introducing the examinations, Sir H. L. Bulwer 4848.

Circular, dated 17th July 1865, transmitting revised regulations respecting the examination of attachés, App. 447, 448 —— Revised regulations for the examination of candidates, dated 23rd April 1869, ib. 411.

2. Effect of the Examinations upon the Efficiency of the Service:

Exceedingly efficient young men who have entered the service since the examinations have been established, and have been more stringent, Hammond 35. 116. 175 —— Superior body of junior servants since the introduction of the examination test, Morier 4364–4367.

Approval of an entrance examination as a security against positive incapacity, Sir H. L. Bulwer 4848, 4849. 4851 —— Inadequacy of examinations as a test of fitness for the diplomatic service, though they are useful as keeping out the really ignorant, Hon. E. R. Lytton 5073, 5074. 5098 —— Respects in which examinations fail to secure some of the qualifications required, Sir H. L. Bulwer 5155–5157 —— Opinion that the present system of examinations does not secure ability though it may exclude gross ignorance, Hon. E. R. Lytton 5251–5254.

3. Number of Rejections:

Increased proportion of rejections in the examinations for the diplomatic service in recent years, owing to the tendency of pass examinations to reduce the standard of efficiency, Walrond 2876–2879.

4. Suggestions for an Amendment of the present System:

Suggestion that the entrance examination be very light, and that there be a second examination of a very strict kind for second secretaries, Sir H. G. Elliot 835-841. 1009, 1010. 1030, 1031. 1048, 1049. 1052–1054 —— Approval of the suggestion that the entrance examination should be very light, and should be followed by a strict examination for the post of second secretary, Earl of Malmesbury 1240, 1241 —— Disapproval of the system of examinations suggested by Sir Henry Elliot; sufficient severity already of the second examination, Hammond 1894–1897 —— Objection to any alteration of the examinations, in order to facilitate the entry of men not intending to make the service a profession, Earl of Derby 2569.

Outline of the examination desirable, Walrond 2896–2898 —— Objection to a second examination for the service, Christie 3134 —— Amendment suggested as regards the second examination for the service, there being now too great an interval after the first examination, Walrond 3389–3395.

Doubt as to the expediency of the second examination for the service; non-objection, however, if it be not made too severe, Earl of Clarendon 3431-3435 —— Approval of a strict second examination for those intending to continue in the profession, Hon. T. J. H. Thurlow 3813, 3814.

Objection to the present system of examination of attachés, witness proposing that there should be no examination for unpaid attachéships, but that there be a maximum test examination before advancement, Morier 4328-4334. 4391, 4392. 4402–4404 —— Value of a maximum test examination, as securing the best talent for the service, ib. 4402–4404.

Suggestion for the establishment of a high test examination, for which all unpaid attachés and second and third secretaries might voluntarily offer themselves for the next two years; those who passed being placed at the head of the list of second secretaries, and receiving an additional salary, Morier 4495–4520.

Those named by the minister should not be required to pass an examination, unless they were afterwards taken into the profession, Sir H. L. Bulwer 4876 —— Disapproval of

4. Suggestions for an Amendment of the present System—continued.

of a second examination of a very severe character before promotion to the higher grades, Sir H. L. Bulwer 4886.

Memorandum submitted by Mr. Morier, containing further suggestions relative to the subjects of examination desirable, App. 536.

5. Question of Competitive Examinations:

Objection to limited competition for attachéships, as well as to open competition, Hammond 329-336——Reluctance of witness to offer any comment upon the opinion of Lord Derby (in 1853), that the diplomatic service should be thrown open, ib. 415——Disapproval of open competition for the diplomatic service, Earl of Malmesbury 671-674——Decided objection to attachéships being thrown open to public competition, Sir H. G. Elliot 1003, 1004. 1117-1119——Further disapproval of competition for attachéships, it being necessary to appoint men of good social standing and of private means, Earl of Malmesbury 1181-1183. 1222-1225.

Approval of the principle of limited competition on entry to the public service generally; doubt, however, as to the expediency of applying the principle of competition to the diplomatic service, Earl of Derby 2268-2271. 2319 2328——Grounds for objecting to a plan suggested by Mr. Grant Duff, in 1861, for a system of competition for attachéships; advantage however of the plan, as excluding incompetent persons, ib. 2548-2554. 2590——Open competition should first be tried in the civil service rather than in the diplomatic service, ib. 2554.

Approval to some extent of a scheme of competitive examination proposed by Mr. Grant Duff in 1861, by which the twelve best men were to be eligible for selection for vacancies within twelve months, Walrond 2894, 2895. 2899, 2900. 2909. 2922, 2923. 2940, 2941——Improbability of many persons coming forward for the diplomatic service if there were open competition; obstacle on account of the peculiar qualification required for the service, ib. 2906-2908. 2916-2921. 2936.

Witness cannot see any valid objection to a system of open competition for the diplomatic service, Christie 3133.

Opinion that it is hardly yet time to apply to the diplomatic service the system of competition proposed by Mr. Grant Duff, Walrond 3297, 3298. 3333——Special reasons which render open competition less desirable in the case of the diplomatic service than of the civil service generally; opinion that ultimately it may be applied to the diplomatic service, ib. 3298. 3326, 3327. 3396-3403——Suggestions for a limited competition for the diplomatic service by an annual examination of competitors, nominated by the Secretary of State, or by any of his predecessors, ib. 3298-3301. 3328, 3329. 3334-3338. 3346-3354. 3383-3385.

Conclusions adverse to a system of open competition as compared with the present system, Earl of Clarendon 3449-3455——Objection, even if attachés were paid, to a system of open competition as not likely to secure the peculiar qualifications required, ib. 3452-3454——Approval of three nominations by the Secretary of State for each vacancy, in the same way as in the Foreign Office, Hon. T. J. H. Thurlow 3654, 3655. 3813.

Conclusion strongly opposed to competitive examinations for the diplomatic service, Morier 4350-4355. 4466-4473——Grounds for the conclusion that competitive examination is not desirable for the service, Sir H. L. Bulwer 4850, 4851.

Opinion that on the score of social requirements there is no valid objection to the appointment of diplomatic servants by competitive examination, Labouchere 4619-4623.

Expenditure (Diplomatic Service). Circumstance of the limit of expenditure declared by the Act in 1832 for the diplomatic service, namely 180,000 l. a year, having never been exceeded; on the contrary, the expenditure has generally fallen far short of the appointed sum, Hammond 421——Necessity, under Act of last Session, of the sanction of the Treasury with reference to any future increase of pay or pension, ib. 462.

Very little room for economy without prejudice to efficiency, Earl of Malmesbury 775——Witness could make many suggestions for increasing the expense and efficiency of his department; he can make none for reduction of expenditure or of staff, Hammond 1804.

Opinion that the cost of witness's scheme would not be very great, Hon. T. J. H. Thurlow 3848——Moderate cost of the service, considering the work done, Morier 4357——Calculated saving of about 30,000 l. a year by the adoption of the scheme of amalgamation proposed by witness, Labouchere 4749.

1. Examinations: Question of Competition:

Competitive examination for clerkships in the Foreign Office, Hammond 10. 99—— Very slight examination for the Foreign Office as compared with the examinations for the diplomatic service, ib. 177-120——Satisfaction expressed with the modified competitive examination for the office, ib. 178, 179.

Satisfactory working of the system of limited competition for appointments, there being three competitors for each vacancy, Earl of Clarendon 3413, 3414. 3418.

Opinion that there should be open competition for the Foreign Office, and that more subjects should be embraced, Christie 3131-3135.

2. Promotions:

System of seniority promotion of the clerks, selection being exercised for the upper appointments, Hammond 42. 45——Approval of the system of promotion by selection to the higher grades, Earl of Derby 2374-2376——Practice not to appoint by seniority to the post of permanent under secretary, Earl of Clarendon 3864——Doubtful advantage if it were the rule that some of the promotions in the office were to be by selection on the recommendation of the under secretaries, Earl of Derby 4560-4562.

3. Question of Amalgamation with the Diplomatic Service:

Obstacles in practice, and objection in principle, to an assimilation of the grades of promotion and of pay in the Foreign Office and diplomatic service; facilities of interchange without amalgamation, Hammond 337-354.

Suggestions in detail for amalgamating the Foreign Office, diplomatic service, and consular service; important economy to be effected thereby, Labouchere 4748.

Evidence to the effect that a complete amalgamation of the Foreign Office and diplomatic service is very desirable; concurrence in certain suggestions of Lord Cowley on this subject, Hon. E. R. Lytton 5269-5277——Propriety of due consideration being paid to the feelings and expectations of the Foreign Office clerks before amalgamation with the diplomatic service, ib. 5276, 5277.

4. Question of Interchange of Employment between the Foreign Office and the Diplomatic Service:

Limited extent of exchange of service between Foreign Office clerks and secretaries abroad; obstacles to an extension of the practice, Hammond 75, 76——Very different training of attachés and of Foreign Office clerks, each system being equally good, ib. 310-314——Decided objection more especially to any interchange between diplomatic officers and the senior clerks in the Foreign Office, as tending to destroy the efficient working of the office, ib. 343. 351-354——Discountenance by witness of interchange between a Foreign Office clerk and a secretary at an inferior mission, ib. 1522.

Improvement if Foreign Office clerks were more frequently employed in diplomatic posts, such as secretaries of legation, Christie 2675-2677. 3008. 3011——Facility since the Pensions Act of 1869 for the transfer of diplomatic servants to the Foreign Office, ib. 3085. 3087.

Witness has derived great advantage as foreign secretary from his service abroad as a diplomatist, Earl of Clarendon 3411, 3412.

Decided approval of more frequent transfers between the diplomatic service and Foreign Office, whereas the Foreign Office systematically opposes interchange of service, Hon. T. J. H. Thurlow 3574-3579. 3645-3653. 3752-3754.

Service of witness for some years in the Foreign Office before interchanging into the diplomatic service, in which he is now second secretary, Mitford 3975-3986——Importance of greater facilities for interchange of service between the diplomatic staff and the

4. Question of Interchange of Employment, &c.—continued.

Foreign Office; suggestions as to the relative grades to which exchange should apply, Mitford 4060–4070. 4174–4176.

Evidence in support of the view that the heads of departments in the Foreign Office should have personal experience of the diplomatic service, and should have served for a time in the countries comprised in their respective departments, Morier 4314–4327—— Greatly increased interest of the attachés in their work if they knew it would come before men personally acquainted with the circumstances of the country in which they are employed, ib. 4314. 4316—— Forcible illustration, in the case of Lord Clarendon, of the great value of diplomatic experience in the head of the Foreign Office, ib. 4316. 4325——In France and Prussia there are more men in the Foreign Office than there are in the English Foreign Office, who have served abroad, ib. 4327.

Respects in which mutual advantage would arise to the diplomatic servants and the Foreign Office clerks if the two branches were amalgamated for an interchange of services, Morier 4521–4529.

Advantage of occasional interchange between the Foreign Office and diplomatic service, Sir H. L. Bulwer 4882, 4883——Improvement if the heads of departments in the Foreign Office could be employed for a time in the great embassies, ib. 4937–4939—— Prospects and pay of secretaries of legation adverted to with reference to the question of interchange with clerks in the Foreign Office, ib. 5159–5161.

Convenience to attachés in being able sometimes to effect an exchange with Foreign Office clerks, Hon. E. R. Lytton 5082——Advantage of an interchange of service between the heads of missions and the heads of departments in the Foreign Office, there being however some drawbacks to be guarded against, ib. 5083–5099.

Regulations relative to the interchange of employment between second and third secretaries and junior clerks in the Foreign Office, App. 413.

5. Question of Employment of Foreign Office Clerks at Missions Abroad, concurrently with a Reduction of the Mission Staff:

Suggestion that some one might be sent from the Foreign Office to any mission when leave was being granted, and where one man would suffice to do the work, Sir H. G. Elliot 865, 866. 1005, 1006. 1008. 1044–1047.

Grounds for objecting to the proposal of Sir H. G. Elliot for reducing the staff at foreign missions, and for sending out Foreign Office clerks to the place of men on leave, Hammond 1545. 1623, 1624——Inability of the Foreign Office to supply extra hands to missions, when pressed with work, ib. 1545.

Exception taken to the proposal to send clerks from the Foreign Office to assist foreign missions occasionally, Earl of Derby 2333. 2441, 2442——Probability of increased pressure of work at the Foreign Office when there is increased pressure at the foreign missions, ib. 2546, 2547.

Disapproval of keeping any mission at the minimum strength required, to be supplemented by assistance from the Foreign Office when pressure arises, Hon. E. R. Lytton 5080, 5081. 5103.

6. Changes suggested in the Management and Administration of the Department:

Expediency of various changes in the management of the Foreign Office with a view to the greater efficiency of the diplomatic service; witness will submit a memorandum on this subject, Christie 2964, 2965.

Consideration of the practice as to distribution of work in the office; expediency of amendment with a view to the political under secretary having the means of expressing an opinion upon every paper of importance before the final decision is taken, Sir H. D. Wolff 4417–4443. 4458–4462.

Opinion that the political under secretary should take a higher position than the permanent under secretary in the management of the office, Sir H. L. Bulwer 5184.

7. Question of Employment of Copying Clerks:

Decided objection to copying clerks in the Foreign Office, Hammond 148——Evidence strongly opposed to the employment of more copying clerks in the commercial department of the Foreign Office: denial that any economy is feasible on this score, as every one of the present confidential staff must in any case be retained, ib. 1656–1664—— Necessity of the employment of confidential persons in the consular and commercial branch, it being impracticable to apportion the works between confidential and non-confidential clerks, ib. 1656–1658.

8. Charge

8. Charge of Undue Interference with the Heads of Missions:

Alteration for the worse through the Foreign Office interfering too much between the minister and his employés, Sir H. L. Bulwer 4872–4874——Comment upon the tendency to increased bureaucratic encroachment on the part of the permanent officials at the Foreign Office, the responsibility and powers of the ambassadors and ministers being thereby injuriously impaired, ib. 4934–4937——Comment upon the action of the Foreign Office in assuming functions which properly belong to the heads of missions; illustration of this in American affairs, ib. 5172-5174. 5208–5210.

Undue importance attached by the permanent under secretary to Foreign Office despatches, irrespectively of the action of diplomatists in following up such despatches, Sir H. L. Bulwer 5174——Further statement that the policy of the Foreign Office being declared, it should be left very much to the minister abroad to carry it out, ib. 5185.

9. Efficiency of the Staff:

Very efficient working of the Foreign Office in witness's experience, Earl of Malmesbury 728, 729——Testimony to the great ability and industry of the Under Secretary, Sir H. L. Bulwer 5174.

10. Registers of Correspondence:

Importance of the ready facility of access to old papers, Hammond 60, 61——Excellent plan of keeping the registers of correspondence, ib. 61.

11. Number of Despatches:

Return of the number of despatches, &c., received at and sent from the Foreign Office in each year, from 1826 to 1869, distinguishing between the different departments, App. 417——Total of 51,107 despatches, &c., received and sent in 1869 ib.

12. Protest against the Misrepresentation to which the Department has been subjected:

Statement as to the Foreign Office being a well-abused office, and being obliged to submit to misrepresentation; illustration of this in the agency matter, Hammond 1690–1693——Belief that no other public office in the country has been decried and vilified to the same extent as the Foreign Office, ib. 1898.

Prevalence of much ignorance and prejudice as to the efficiency of the Foreign Office and diplomatic service, Earl of Clarendon 3440. 3443.

France. Less separation in France than in England between the consular and diplomatic services, Hammond 101–104. 110, 111——Much larger diplomatic staff of France than England, ib. 295.

Very early age of retirement in the French service; impression that it is near the age of fifty, Hon. T. J. H. Thurlow 3509. 3635-3637. 3642–3647——Better pay in the lower grades of the French service than of the English service, ib. 3555——Occasional appointment of outsiders in the French service, there being however much greater scope for promotion than in the English service, ib. 3629, 3630. 3762, 3763. 3788–3790——Witness has seen very few French ministers above fifty years old, ib. 3644.

More political and less commercial character of the French than the English consuls; preference for the latter, Sir H. L. Bulwer 4942, 4943——Very useful services rendered by the chanceliers in the French service, Hon. E. R. Lytton 5104–5107. 5241——Error of Mr. Thurlow as to retirement being compulsory in the French service at the age of fifty, Sir H. L. Bulwer 5237.

Amount of the salaries of the heads of missions in the French service, App. 418——Statement of the staff of the French diplomatic service as compared with that of the English service, ib. 421, 422.

Hamburg. Arrangements in contemplation for having a consul at Hamburg in lieu of a diplomatic representative, Hammond 1490–1497——Abolition of the mission at Hamburg upon that city becoming part of the North German Confederation, Earl of Clarendon, 3869.

Hammond, The Right Honourable Edmund. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Has been Permanent Under Secretary of State at the Foreign Office for sixteen years; had thirty years' experience previously as clerk, 1, 2——Reference to the Report of the Select Committee of 1861, and the principal changes made in the diplomatic service in consequence of such Report, 3–6——Development given to promotion since the Report of the Committee of 1861; 5——Improved position since 1861 of the unpaid attachés, these being now promoted to third secretaries after four years' service, 5. 13–16.

Hardship removed since 1861 as regards pensions, these now dating after four years' service, 5——Re-arrangement in 1865 as to the examination of attachés, a second examination being now imperative before the grant of a commission as second secretary, 6——System of nomination and test examination for the diplomatic service, there being no competition, 7–10. 94–99——Employment of each attaché in the Foreign Office for six months before being sent abroad, 11, 12.

Necessity of two examinations before appointment as second secretary, 14——Promotion of the attachés and secretaries by seniority, as a rule, but not compulsorily so, 17, 18——Slowness of promotion, 19——Total of five ambassadors in the service, 20–22——Difference between the functions of an ambassador and a minister; higher salaries of the former, 23–28——High prices exacted from the English diplomatic body in foreign cities, 26. 77–79. 122–126——Varying salaries of the second secretaries, the third secretaries having a fixed salary of 150*l.* a year, 29–33——Necessity of attachés having private means, 34.

Exceedingly efficient young men who have entered the service since the examinations have been established, 55. 116——Important and onerous work performed by the secretaries of legation in the preparation of reports to the Foreign Secretary on the commerce, &c., of the countries in which they are placed; valuable information thus acquired by the Foreign Office, 35–37——Valuable reports prepared by the second secretaries for the use of the ministers under whom they are employed, 37, 38.

Disapproval of confidential reports from the heads of the missions as to the conduct of their subordinates, 39–43——System of seniority promotion of the clerks in the Foreign Office, selection being exercised for the upper appointments, 42–45——Fair expectation of the secretaries that they may ultimately become ministers, according to seniority, 44, 45——Necessity of full power in the Secretary of State to depart from the practice of seniority; several instances of ministers and others being imported from the consular service, 44–47. 80–92. 112–116.

Failure of a plan tried by Lord Palmerston for obtaining interpreting attachés in Turkey, so as to dispense with dragomans; objection to any further attempt of a similar kind, 48–50. 150–153——Advantage of the knowledge of French now possessed by high officials in Turkey, so that our ambassador there is not obliged to rely on dragomans, 50–52——Practice as to taking embassy houses for a term of years; doubt as to this being an economical arrangement, 53, 54——Explanation and approval of the practice whereby the archives of any embassy are retained there instead of being sent to England, 55–61——Importance of the ready facility of access to old papers in the Foreign Office, 60–61——Excellent plan of keeping the registers of correspondence, 61.

Reference to certain returns relative to salaries in the diplomatic service, and explanations thereupon, 62–68——More expensive salaries in the French than the English service, 68——Much smaller amount of the salaries in the United States service than in the English service; much larger interests of England in European diplomacy, 68–100——High salaries of the United States as compared with England in respect of missions in South America, ib.

Statement in approval of the rule by which the junior diplomatic servants do not remain more than two years in the same place, 69–74——Explanation that witness has nothing to do with any diplomatic appointments, these all resting with the Secretary of State, 74. 91, 92——Opinion that the junior diplomatic servants should begin their career at small missions, and should work upwards, 74——Limited extent of exchange of service between Foreign Office clerks and secretaries abroad; obstacles to an extension of this practice, 75, 76.

Very bad prospects of young men entering the diplomatic service; discouragement if consular servants or others were largely brought in to fill vacancies in the higher posts,

86-90. 103. 112-116——Several applicants for attachéships, notwithstanding the bad prospects, 93——Less separation in France than in England between the consular and diplomatic services, 101-104. 110, 111——Explanation as to the time for which attachés or secretaries stay at the Persian mission; promotion whilst there, 105-109——Facility of learning the Persian language, 108.

Circumstances under which a consul general is considered a diplomatic officer, and is entitled to a diplomatic pension, 114, 115——Very slight examination for the Foreign Office as compared with the examinations for the diplomatic service, 117-120——Necessity of a consul-general at Warsaw, 128, 129——Exception in the case of Russia and Turkey as regards the secretaries and attachés being required to know the language of the country, 130-135.

Good grounds for the complaint of the diplomatic servants as to the slowness of promotion, 137-144——Increased block in the service through there being five fewer missions than formerly, 141. 160——Suggestion that after a certain number of years' service the salaries might be increased, in the absence of promotion, 144, 145——Hardship in the third secretaries necessarily spending a much larger sum than their salaries, 145——Immense increase of work performed by the diplomatic servants; enormous amount of diplomatic correspondence, as shown by a Paper submitted by witness, 145-147.

Evidence in support of the conclusion that neither economy nor efficiency would be attained by the employment of copying clerks in lieu of attachés or secretaries, 148, 149——Decided objection to copying clerks in the Foreign Office, 148——Explanation in regard to Mr. Barnard, who entered the service in 1816, having been for twenty-two years at Coburg; this has had no effect in blocking the service, 154-160——Explanation also as to Mr. Watson, after only ten years' service, being now secretary of legation at Athens, 161.

[Second Examination.]—Further statement in explanation of the position and salary of Mr. Barnard at Coburg, 162, 163——Special circumstances which make it desirable to keep up the Coburg mission; limited cost incurred, 164——Several grounds for maintaining a diplomatic representative at Dresden, the allowances amounting to 950*l.* a year, 165. 167-169——Exceptional reasons for keeping a representative at Darmstadt, the allowances being only 700*l.* a year, 166——Evidence in defence of the Stuttgardt mission, as beneficial for the political interests of this country, 167-169.

Regret expressed at the approaching cessation of Foreign Office agencies; views of Lord Clarendon to the same effect, 170. 174——Inconvenience to the diplomatic servants abroad if obliged to receive their salaries through bankers; proposal under consideration for obviating this arrangement, 170, 171. 187——Claim of the Foreign Office clerks, who have acted as agents, to compensation, 172-174.

Promising class of young men appointed to the diplomatic service since the examinations have been more stringent, 175——Frequent change as to the examinations; approval of the present regulation as to service abroad before the second examination, 176, 177——Satisfaction expressed with the modified competitive examination for the Foreign Office, 178, 179——Advantage of a university education in diplomatic servants, 180, 181. 192-194——Explanation of the circumstances under which Mr. Alison was appointed as an interpreting attaché, 182, 183——Conclusion as to the necessity of a property qualification in young men entering the service, 184-187——Grounds for objecting to the appointments being thrown open to the universities for competition, 188-194.

Relative amount of the French and English diplomatic staff adverted to; the English service is none too numerous, 195-198——Explanation as to there being three secretaries at Athens and certain other places; obstacle to any reduction of this staff, 199-205——Statement that the secretary of legation cannot be expected to work in the chancellerie, 202. 205——Mention of the five missions abolished in recent years, 206, 207——Diminution in the junior staff since 1861, there being now no supernumeraries to dispose of, although five missions have been abolished, 208-213.

Objection to a limit of age for leaving the service; large expense for pensions if there were compulsory retirement at the age of sixty-five, 214-217——Approval of paid attachés being sent to the South American missions, and of these missions being raised in character, 218-224——Obstacle to the employment of junior diplomatic servants at Warsaw and other consular posts, 225, 226.

Comparatively easy character of the Persian language further adverted to, 229-232——Particulars in connection with the Persian mission, and its transfer and re-transfer between the India Office and Foreign Office, 233-240——Grounds for objecting to the Persian mission being again placed under the India Office, 240-247——Expenses of the mission; payment of 12,000*l.* a year by India, 245-250.

Broad distinction between the consular and diplomatic services, an amalgamation being very undesirable, 251-263——Natural dissatisfaction in the consular body if diplomatic servants were appointed to the large commercial consulates, 258-264——Explanation

Explanation relative to the appointment of Mr. Monson, who had left the diplomatic service, to the consulate in the Azores; trade of the Azores adverted to hereon, 265–275.

Entry to the diplomatic service through nominations made exclusively by the Foreign Secretary, 276–283——Average number of vacancies annually in the higher posts as compared with the number of unpaid attachés who enter the service, 284–291——Dissent from the view that the aristocracy are unduly favoured as regards nominations to the service, 292–294.

[Third Examination.]—Much larger diplomatic staff of France than England, 295——Larger French than English staff at Athens, ib.——Requirement of a property or social qualification in most of the foreign services, ib.——Considerable trade of the Azores, ib.——Total of fifty diplomatic servants connected directly or remotely with noble families, whilst there are seventy not so connected, 295. 299–301.

Further reference to the more limited field of promotion since the abolition of five missions and secretaryships, 295——Statement of the vacancies, and of the appointment of attachés in the last five years, 295–298——Defence of the system of appointing young men of good family position and of private means, rather than sons of tradesmen or of gentlemen of small means, 302–306. 319——Zeal and ability of the staff; denial that there is good ground for charges of insubordination and want of discipline, 306–309. 393–402.

Very different training of attachés and of Foreign Office clerks, each system being equally good, 310–314——Modes of employment of attachés; objection to regular hours of attendance being required, 314–318——Opinion that no greater efficiency would be secured if the attachés were all paid, 319, 320——Further objection to the employment of copying clerks at the missions, 321——Absence of complaint of inefficiency under the system of promotion of attachés and secretaries by seniority; departure from this system if efficiency were not secured, 322–328. 378–385.

Objection to limited competition for attachéships, as well as to open competition, 329–336——Dissent from the views of Mr. Ward on the question of open competition, 333–336——Obstacles in practice, and objection in principle, to an assimilation of the grades of promotion and of pay in the Foreign Office and diplomatic service; facilities of interchange without amalgamation, 337–354——Decided objection more especially to any interchange between diplomatic officers and the senior clerks in the Foreign Office, as tending to destroy the efficient working of the office, 343. 351–354.

Dissent from the view that jealousy naturally arises by reason of the relative positions of the secretaries of legation and the heads of missions, 347–350——Arrangement as to the attachés entering on salaries after four years' service, 355–358——Difficulty of calculating the progress of promotion of secretaries in the present state of the service, 358–361——Witness further advocates increased salaries, failing promotion after a certain time, 358.

Employment of the third secretaries in various other ways besides copying, 362, 363——Origin of the system of reports by the secretaries of legation further adverted to; increased utilisation thereby of the services of these officers, 364–368——Belief that the reports always come through the heads of missions, 369–371——Expediency of the reports being the work of the first secretaries, rather than the joint productions of the first and second secretaries, 372–377.

Evidence in further disapproval of reports by heads of missions relative to the conduct of their subordinates, as tending to destroy the harmony of the missions; means of the Foreign Office for otherwise acquiring information relative to the staff abroad, 386–394——Further statement in defence of the system of frequent transfer of attachés and secretaries from one post to another, 403–414——Objection of witness to offer any comment on the opinion of Lord Derby (in 1853), that the diplomatic service should be thrown open, 415.

Direction by the Secretary of State under which several second-class missions were raised to first-class missions in 1862; increase of pension involved in this arrangement, 416–420——Statement in justification of the first class missions in Russia, Prussia, and Austria having been raised to embassies; advantage more especially on account of the right of ambassadors to communicate directly with the sovereign, 421–448.

Circumstance of the limit of expenditure declared by Act in 1832 for the diplomatic service, namely, 180,000*l.* a year, having never been exceeded; on the contrary the expenditure has generally fallen far short of the appointed sum, 421——Great increase in the cost of living abroad, so that the salaries attached to the principal missions are altogether inadequate, 421. 453, 454.

Reasons for the United States not having ambassadors in Europe, whilst it is very expedient that England should have them, 426–431——Insignificance of the mere precedence conferred by the title of ambassador, 432–441——Expediency of a higher salary to an ambassador than a minister; enhanced expenditure in the former case, 442–452.

Dissatisfaction in the United States service on account of the inadequacy of the salaries, 454–457——Large salaries of the United States diplomatic officers as compared with the salary of the Secretary of State, 455, 456——Painful position in which American ministers are placed, through their inability to return hospitalities, 457.

[Fourth Examination.]—Statement as to the sanction of the Treasury not having been required in raising second-class to first-class missions in 1862; 458–462——Necessity, under Act of last Session, of the sanction of the Treasury with reference to any future increase of pay or pension, 462.

Examination in support of the "cost of representation" being duly considered in reference to the amount of salary of the ambassadors at Paris and elsewhere, 463–501——Advantage in the ambassador being in a position to entertain, not only his own countrymen abroad, but influential people of the country in which he is located; facility thereby for the acquisition of valuable information, 466–484——Doubt as to the present practice of ambassadors or ministers in regard to keeping table for the attachés and secretaries, 485–488.

Unpleasant position of American ministers on the score of hospitality further adverted to, 489, 490——Explanation relative to the increase of the salary of the ambassador at Paris from 8,000 l. to 10,000 l. a year in 1856, there having been a previous reduction to 8,000 l.; 491–496——Grounds for larger salaries to ambassadors than to the chief officers of State at home, 497–501.

Disapproval generally of permanent officers at the head of foreign missions, 502, 503——Discontinuance of the practice of change in the heads of the great missions with each change of government at home, 504——Disadvantage of a permanent chargé d'affairs in lieu of a minister at the smaller missions; great political importance of many of these, 505–516——Dissatisfaction of the South American republics by reason of our having only chargés d'affaires there, 505, 506.

Importance of efficient diplomatic representation with reference to the industrial interests of this country, 515, 516——Equal necessity of tact and discretion in diplomatic officers abroad, since the use of the telegraph, and the greater facilities for communication with the authorities at home, 519–533——Similar system now pursued as in former years in regard to the acquisition of local information, 534–537——Inexpediency of reliance upon the press as regards foreign political information, 538–547.

Further explanations relative to the system of reports by the secretaries of legation, more especially as regards the question of supervision of such reports by the heads of the missions, 548–566——Statement that the importance of foreign missions cannot be measured in all cases by the amount of trade, 567——Further reference to the South American missions, and the importance of giving them higher rank, 568. 585–588. 596–598.

Reasons for the much greater cost of the mission in Turkey than in the United States, 569, 570——Explanation as to the higher salary of the British ambassador at Constantinople, than of any other ambassador or minister, 570–574——Inadequate payment of United States ministers further adverted to, 575——Enormous expenditure since 1843 upon the British Embassy House at Constantinople; sanction given to such expenditure by the Treasury, 576–584.

Limited action taken by the heads of missions in South America in reference to the claims of British bondholders, 589–592——Statement in explanation and defence of the expenditure incurred in respect of the mission at Buenos Ayres, 593–597——Frequent change in the rank of the mission in Central America, 598, 599——Obstacles to any reduction of the present missions in South America, 600.

Larger expenditure of the United States than of England upon missions in South America, 601–604——Onerous duties discharged by some diplomatic servants of the United States, 604——Absence of necessity for any staff under Mr. Odo Russell at Rome; ability of this gentleman adverted to, 605, 606.

[Fifth Examination.]—Reference to a certain Return (App. 432), showing the establishment of the French embassies and missions, 607——Explanation relative to the annual amount of extraordinary expenses, and the steps taken for keeping down certain items included therein; decrease in the last ten years, there having been a large increase in the ten years previously, 608–638——Allowance of 1,000 l. a year for warming and lighting the embassy house in Paris; necessity otherwise of increasing the salary of the ambassador, 620–622.

Reduction effected in recent years in the charge for boats, &c. at Constantinople, 623–625——System of employment of dragomans further adverted to; necessity of an equivalent expenditure in another shape if these be abolished, 626–635——Necessity of retaining the services of an Oriental secretary at Constantinople, 636.

Explanatory statement in reference to the expenditure of the Foreign Office for secret service; circumstances under which the expenditure is controlled by witness as Permanent Under Secretary, instead of by the Parliamentary Under Secretary, 639–667.

[Sixth

[Sixth Examination.]—Reasons for an unusually large outfit allowance to the ambassador at Paris, though, as compared with other ambassadors or ministers, his travelling expenses are very small, 1395–1412——Provision of some public furniture in the embassy house at Paris, 1397–1400——Disapproval of any alteration generally in the scale of outfit, with reference to the amount of travelling expenses, 1401–1412.

Explanation relative to the provision of plate for certain embassies and missions; its cost in each case, 1413–1416——Objection to a deduction from the outfit allowance where plate is already provided, 1417——Return of the outfit if the minister to whom it is issued does not go to his post; instances in the cases of Mr. W. Lowther and Mr. Forbes, 1418–1427.

[Seventh Examination.]—Witness hands in sundry Papers and Returns with reference chiefly to the consular service, and submits explanations in connection therewith, 1428–1436——Temporary confusion in the accounts of the Foreign Office, owing to the new Exchequer and Audit Bill, 1429–1431.

Recent reduction of the number of Queen's messengers from seventeen to fifteen; intention to reduce the number to twelve, as opportunity offers, 1437–1440. 1470——Information relative to the messengers' journeys and the reduction therein; inexpediency of further reduction, 1440–1454. 1471–1478——Explanation as to there being a weekly messenger to Berlin; necessity of this arrangement, 1445–1453. 1476——Restriction upon the amount of luggage taken by messengers, with reference more especially to the parcels conveyed for the diplomatic servants, 1454–1463——Statement to the effect that the remuneration of the foreign-service messengers is none too large, 1464–1469. 1473, 1474.

Further statement as to the return of outfits by Mr. Lowther and Mr. Forbes, 1479–1483——Explanation in connection with a certain excess of China expenditure; great trouble recently taken in order to put the China accounts into a proper state, 1484–1489——Arrangement in contemplation for having a consul at Hamburg in lieu of a diplomatic representative, 1490–1497.

Information as to the several regulations on the score of pensions, with reference to age, length of service, &c., 1498–1519. 1528. 1628–1631——Official correspondence of Mr. Odo Russell and certain others directly with the Secretary of State, 1520, 1521——Discountenance by witness of interchange between a Foreign Office clerk and a secretary at an inferior mission, 1522——Inadequacy generally of the allowance to ministers for house rent, 1523, 1524——Quantity and character of the public furniture in the embassy house at Paris further adverted to, 1524–1527.

Further statement as to the second secretary not being required to assist in the preparation of reports, 1529–1531——Further approval of the occasional appointment of outsiders to heads of missions, 1532–1534——Practice as to the promotion of secretaries of legation to secretaries of embassy, 1535–1537——Explanation as to Mr. Lowther having lost 50*l.* a year by promotion to the rank of secretary of embassy, 1538–1541.

Inability of the Foreign Office to supply extra hands to missions when pressed with work, 1545——Considerable number of commercial despatches received at the Foreign Office from Paris, 1546——Further information relative to the embassy house at Constantinople; necessity of building the house instead of hiring one, 1547–1551——Large rent necessary if an embassy house at Paris had to be hired, 1552, 1553. 1555——Possession of a country house as well as a town house by the several foreign missions at Constantinople, 1554.

Great difficulty in getting a house at Berlin for Lord Augustus Loftus, 1556——Advantage in the embassy houses being taken or leased by Government, the ministers paying the rent allowed, 1556–1563——Opinion that the secretaries of legation should give regular attendance daily, 1564——Encouragement given by the Foreign Office to the binding of the archives at the missions; fault of the minister if the matter be neglected, 1565, 1566——Control of the head of the mission over the archives, plate, &c. 1567–1569——Objection to a power in the heads of missions to destroy papers, 1570–1573.

Heavy work of some of the foreign ministers, the pay not having increased in proportion to the work, 1574–1579——Practice as to secretaries' reports further adverted to; instances of reports by second secretaries, 1580–1582——Impression that the diplomatic service is looked upon as a profession more than it used to be, 1583, 1584——Occasional employment of junior secretaries in making translations, 1585, 1586.

Evidence in further justification of the system of appointing persons from the upper classes of society to the diplomatic service, and to the Foreign Office; confidential character of the work adverted to hereon, 1587–1596. 1632–1645.

Further statement as to its not being necessary to alter the outfit money with reference to the length or cost of the journey, 1597, 1598——Amount of outfit allowed on removal from one post to another, 1599, 1600——Conclusion as to the insufficiency generally of the outfit, the salaries also being very inadequate, 1602–1609.

Advantage if the British ministers in South America had the title of minister resident or minister plenipotentiary; this might be tried without increase of salaries, 1617, 1618——Opinion as to there being good grounds for the complaints of the smallness of the salary of the consul at Monte Video, 1619–1622——Grounds for objecting to the proposal of Sir Henry Elliot for reducing the staff at foreign missions, and for sending out Foreign Office clerks to take the place of men on leave, 1623, 1624.

Improbability of men who take good degrees at the Universities caring to enter the diplomatic service, unless they have ample private means, 1625–1627——Due consideration of all cases of promotion in the Foreign Office by the Under Secretaries of State before any recommendation is made; great difficulty in departing from the seniority rule, though this is sometimes done, 1646–1650——Comparative expense of the French and English missions at Stuttgardt and Baden, 1651.

Several small missions maintained in Europe by the United States, 1652——Comparison between the cost of the diplomatic and consular services of the United States and of England; larger cost of the former service with reference to the amount of trade and shipping represented, 1652–1655——Immense trade of Great Britain, as compared with that of the United States, with China and India, 1652.

[Eighth Examination.]—Evidence strongly opposed to the employment of mere copying clerks in the commercial department of the Foreign Office; denial that any economy is feasible on this score, as every one of the present confidential staff must in any case be retained, 1656–1664——Necessity of the employment of confidential persons in the consular and commercial branch, it being impracticable to apportion the work between confidential and non-confidential clerks, 1656–1658.

Conclusion as to the destruction of archives in the fire at the Constantinople embassy in 1831 having caused much inconvenience as well as expense, 1665–1667——Improved arrangements now in operation for retaining books and papers at the Foreign Office; very valuable character of the new library, 1668–1670——Grounds for objecting to the employment of a chancellor or archivist as a permanent officer, save at such places as Paris or Constantinople, where the archives are very voluminous, 1671–1679.

Very serious loss about to be inflicted on those clerks in the Foreign Office who have held agencies; justice of their claim for compensation, 1680, 1681. 1691. 1694–1707——Arrangements made for the termination of the agencies on the 30th November, whereas the Treasury has not yet made any fresh arrangements relative to the payment or transmission of the salaries of the diplomatic and consular officers, 1682–1686. 1720——General feeling of regret in the service at the abolition of the agencies; difficulty of accounting for the agitation against the system, it having been most convenient to the officers abroad, 1687–1693.

Statement as to the Foreign Office being a well-abused office, and being obliged to submit to misrepresentation; illustration of this in the agency matter, 1690–1693——Practice as to agencies being always held by clerks, an assistant under secretary not being considered a proper person to act as agent, 1697–1702——Belief as to the efficient discharge of his office duties at the present time by Mr. Bidgood, 1708–1711.

Very serious effect of the depreciation in the value of gold in the United States upon the salary of our minister at Washington, and upon the consuls' salaries, 1712–1718——Argument that, on the score of policy and harmonious relations, it is very important that the British minister at Washington should be in a position to entertain liberally, 1712.

Further statement as to the very large sum required to provide a new embassy house in Paris, and to furnish it, 1719——Doubt as to there having been any formal complaint relative to the effect of the rate of exchange upon the salaries at Teheran, 1721, 1722——Degree of immunity enjoyed by diplomatic and consular officers in regard to debt; very rare complaints on this score, 1723–1728——Functions performed by the Foreign Office and the Treasury respectively in the consideration of applications for pensions, 1729. 1734, 1735——Explanation as to the Foreign Office having been overruled by the Treasury in the matter of the pension to Mr. Griffith, consul at Bogota, 1730–1735.

Grounds for the conclusion that copying machines would not answer in the Foreign Office or diplomatic service, although they may be very successfully used by large commercial firms, 1736–1742——Explanation that a certain return relative to the salaries paid by foreign Governments to heads of missions does not include any extra allowances; data for this Return adverted to, 1743–1747. 1779–1781——Statement as to there never having been supernumeraries in the English diplomatic service, 1748, 1749.

Outline of witness's plan for improving the position or salaries of the attachés and secretaries, in the absence of increased promotion, 1750——Suggested special allowance of 100*l.* a year to any secretary or attaché at St. Petersburg, Constantinople, Teheran, and certain other places, who could obtain a colloquial knowledge of the country, ib.——Conclusion that the present state of the service does not constitute any new grievance as regards promotion, so far as concerns the junior members, 1751——Impracticability of conducting the service with any smaller staff than at present, 1752.

Particulars

Particulars relative to the character of the despatches carried by the Queen's messengers, 1753-1758——Statement as to its being very unsafe to send despatches in cipher by post; less safety than in sending by telegram, 1756. 1758-1764——Exceptions taken to the employment of a lower class of persons as messengers, though this may be the practice of foreign Governments, 1765, 1766.

Considerations by which the Secretary of State would be guided upon the question of adopting the recommendations of any Select Committee of the House; expediency of discretionary action in the matter, 1767-1769——Approval of the omission by the Foreign Office to act upon a suggestion by a Select Committee in 1850, that France and Turkey should be invited to join with England in reducing the embassies of the three countries to first-class missions, 1770, 1771——Explanation as to a period of two years being the time fixed for juniors to remain at any post, 1772-1774.

Information relative to the Danube Navigation Commissioners, instituted by the Foreign Office, and its very valuable operation, 1775-1778——Further reference to a certain comparative Return of English and foreign diplomatic salaries, more especially as regards house-rent not being included in the English salaries, 1779-1782.

Number of volumes of diplomatic correspondence adverted to as some indication of the amount of business transacted at the English and foreign missions, 1783-1786——Efficient discharge of the work at Rome by Mr. Odo Russell, without any assistant, 1787-1789——Difficulty of supplying a statement of the absence of heads of missions on leave, 1790.

[Ninth Examination.]—Circumstance of Mr. Russell having strictly no official character at Rome, 1791, 1792——Further statement as regards the correspondence of certain missions, that there is in many cases a large amount of business transacted personally, 1793——Dissent from the views of our representatives at Washington, Constantinople, and Stockholm that there might be a reduction of staff at those places, 1794, 1795.

Payment to the Treasury of the consular fees received at Paris, 1796, 1797——Amended regulations about to be applied to the fees received at Constantinople, 1798——Circumstance of no fees being taken at Florence, 1799.

Witness could make many suggestions for increasing the expense and efficiency of his department; he can make none for reduction of expenditure or of staff, 1804.

Further details relative to the journeys of the foreign messengers; obstacles to any curtailment in order to curtail the staff, 1808-1812. 1822-1837——Statement as to the practice of exemption of our ministers abroad, and of foreign ministers in England, from import duties, 1813-1821——Advantage if there were a periodical messenger to Madrid, the post being very insecure, 1826-1828. 1892, 1893——Doubt as to the expediency of the further reduction proposed in the staff of Queen's messengers; difficulty in supplying their place in time of emergency, 1832-1837. 1848-1857——Retirement of the foreign messengers on the basis of 525*l.* a year, 1838. 1847——Grounds for objecting to the employment of home service messengers on foreign service, 1839-1846. 1864-1867.

Contemplated transfer of one of the clerks in the slavery department; impracticability of doing with less than a senior clerk and two juniors, 1858-1863——Examination of the foreign messengers in French, German, or Italian, 1868-1870——Explanation as to the course pursued with reference to some debts contracted by the representative of the Shah of Persia in England; some debts contracted by our late consul in Persia are in quite a different category, 1872-1875.

Explanatory statement as to the despatches of our consul-general at Warsaw being usually sent as far as Berlin by the French messenger, 1876-1885——Doubt as to any difficulty having arisen in filling up vacant diplomatic posts, 1886-1888——Larger salary at Munich than at Stuttgardt, the former being the more important place, 1889-1891.

Disapproval of the system of examinations suggested by Sir Henry Elliot; sufficient severity already of the second examination, 1894-1897——Denial that there is stagnation in the service, 1897——Necessity of retaining the present number of juniors in the service, ib.

Belief that no other public office in the country has been decried and vilified to the same extent as the Foreign Office, 1898——Assurance felt by witness that his department will receive justice at the hands of the present Committee, ib.

Harris, Admiral. Consideration of the circumstances attending the appointment of Admiral Harris to a diplomatic post; there is no rule excluding appointments of this kind, Earl of Derby 2486-2493.

Heads of Missions:

Evidence in disapproval of reports by heads of missions relative to the conduct of their subordinates, as tending to destroy the harmony of the missions; means of the Foreign Office for otherwise acquiring information relative to the staff abroad, Hammond 39–43. 386–394——Discontinuance of the practice of change in the heads of the great missions with each change of Government at home, ib. 504.

Concurrence in the view that upon the question of removing or promoting any junior, it is desirable that the opinion of the head of the mission should be taken, Earl of Derby 2345–2349——Grounds for the conclusion that the chief diplomatic posts abroad should be filled irrespectively of change of Government at home, ib. 2377–2381——Impression that heads of missions sometimes testify to the Foreign Office relative to zeal and industry in the juniors at the missions, ib. 2457–2459.

Question considered whether heads of missions should not have a voice in the election of attachés under them, and should not be referred to as to their promotion, Earl of Derby 2536–2542. 2544. 2559——Examination as to the amount of responsibility of the Foreign Secretary for the acts of heads of missions whom he has not appointed; inexpediency in any case of a system of new appointments when there is a new Secretary of State, ib. 2588–2602.

Statement as to the ambassador or minister not being now consulted as to the staff allotted to him, Christie 2654, 2655——Opinion adverse to a system of reports by heads of missions relative to the conduct of the staff, and the special fitness of any member for promotion, Earl of Clarendon 3465, 3466——Advantage if ambassadors might appoint attachés, not having any claim to promotion, Hon. T. J. H. Thurlow 3837, 3838——Disadvantage through the heads of missions not now having any voice in the appointment of attachés, Hon. E. R. Lytton 4244. 4256.

Suggestion that the head of the mission should report upon the capacity evinced by the secretary, Sir H. L. Bulwer 4834, 4835——Exceptional instance of an ambassador being allowed to name his staff; expediency of fuller facilities in this discretion, ib. 4874. 4876–4880. 4918, 4919.

Further statement as to the advantage of the minister abroad being allowed to suggest to the Secretary of State the appointment at the mission of any particular unpaid attaché, Sir H. L. Bulwer 5128——Advantage of the heads of missions assisting the Secretary of State with their opinion previously to the promotion of any secretary to be secretary of legation, ib. 5161–5171. 5175, 5176. 5231–5234——Evil effect of the system of not making our ministers sufficiently responsible, ib. 5172.

K.

Kaye, John William. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Has been secretary in the Political and Secret Department at the India Office since 1858; important duties devolving upon him, 2030–2034——Information relative to the Persian mission, as regards its superintendence and control by the Foreign Office or by the India Office at different periods, 2035 et seq.——Circumstances attending the transfer of the mission to the India Office in 1858; letters on the subject handed in, 2035–2038. 2051–2053——Practice as to the conduct of the business, and the appointment of officers when the mission was under the Secretary of State for India, 2054–2059.

Large proportion of the correspondence with the Persian mission which relates to India, 2060–2062. 2125. 2156–2158——Statement of the present course of business with respect to Persian affairs; inconvenience and delay by reason of the dual government of the Foreign Office and India Office, 2063–2067. 2104–2124. 2136–2142. 2149–2151. 2159–2168——Several officers of the Indian Government in Persia, 2066–2074——Conclusion that the superintendence of Persian affairs should be placed under the Secretary of State for India, and that the chief appointments in Persia should be given to officers of Indian experience, 2075 et seq.——Expediency of the control being with the Secretary of State instead of with the Viceroy, 2075–2079. 2132–2134. 2155.

Large payment paid by the India Office towards the Persian mission, as compared with the Imperial payment; complaint on this score, 2083–2091. 2128, 2129. 2135——Statement as to the Indian Government not having any diplomatic relations with Siam, 2096–2101—— Less complication if the Persian mission were under the India Office; contemplated control by the Foreign Office whenever Imperial interests are directly concerned, 2125–2131. 2136–2142.

Approval of payment by India of all the expenses in Persia, if the whole control be vested in the India Office, 2129. 2135. 2169——Explanation that the Viceroy cannot now give instructions to the minister at Tehran, 2145–2148——Antagonism likely to arise between the Imperial Government and the India Office through there being two sets of officers in Persia, 2149–2151——Explanation as to Sir Henry Rawlinson having been entrusted with presents to the Shah when he went as minister to Teheran, 2152, 2153.

Great ability of some of the men sent to India under the system of open competition; doubt, however, whether on the whole these are a more valuable class than the old civil servants, 2170–2175——Competition for appointments in the India Office, there being three nominations for each vacancy; opinion that the appointments under the new system are no better than those under the old, 2176–2178.

L.

Labouchere, Henry Du Pre. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Considerable experience of witness as to the working of foreign missions, 4615–4618. 4624–4626——Opinion that on the score of social requirements there is no valid objection to the appointment of diplomatic servants by competitive examination, 4619–4623——Grounds for the conclusion that the staff of the St. Petersburg embassy may well be reduced, 4626–4631. 4635–4643——Statement as to there being no necessity for the staff at St. Petersburg to live in an expensive way, or to go much into society, 4632–4634.

Exception taken to the system whereby a secretary of embassy is not expected to do any work in the chancellerie, 4635–4643——Probable expenditure of their salaries by the ambassadors at Paris, St. Petersburg, Vienna, and Berlin, 4644——Statement that there is no reason why the ambassador at Constantinople need spend more than from 2,000*l.* to 3,000*l.* a year, 4644–4650—— Social rather than political character of the entertainments given by our ambassadors; very moderate expense of these entertainments or receptions, 4651–4662.

Usefulness of the minister's entertainments at Washington, 4663—— Little, if any, room for reduction in the staff at Washington; nor is the salary of the minister too large, 4664–4669——Excessively numerous staff at Constantinople when witness was sent there there in 1863; 4670——Impression of witness as to his having been eight months at Constantinople; on examination he admits that his stay there was not so long, 4671–4681.

[Second Examination.]—Amount of reduction which might be effected in the staff at Constantinople, 4692–4694——Very little work devolving on the dragomans in connection with the embassy, 4695–4697——Influence of the dragomans adverted to; statement as to the chief dragoman having received a valuable house from the Sultan as a present, 4698–4705.

Sundry particulars in connection with the mission at Munich; little, if any, business of political importance whilst witness was there, the minister residing for eight months in the year at his country house, some sixty or seventy miles off, 4707–4720. 4775. 4780–4782. 4786–4800. 4808, 4809——Information relative to the mission at Stockholm, and the almost total absence of work when witness was there; conclusion that there is no object in keeping up a legation there, 4721–4727. 4783–4785.

Statement in support of the conclusion that there is no need of a legation at Dresden, and that there should be a consular agent there who should act for Leipsic also, 4728–4738——Absence of necessity for any chargé d'affaires at Darmstadt, 4739–4741. 4750, 4751. 4776. 4813——Opinion that a higher salary should be given to the minister at Stockholm than at Copenhagen, 4742——Room for a large reduction of diplomatic servants by the employment only of a consul general and chargé d'affaires at many missions, 4743–4745. 4777, 4778.

Decided approval of an amalgamation of the consular and diplomatic services, 4746, 4747——Proposition submitted in detail for an amalgamation of the diplomatic, consular, and Foreign Office services, with suggestions as to the staff to be employed, and as to examinations, salaries, promotion, &c., 4748——Calculated saving of about 30,000 l. a year by the adoption of the foregoing scheme, 4749.

Objections to the present system of Foreign Office messengers; unduly high social position whence they are taken, 4752–4757. 4810–4812——Exceptions taken to the receiving of foreign orders by English diplomatic officers, 4757–4760——Opinion that the abolition of the Foreign Office agencies should not involve compensation, 4761–4763.

Further statement on the subject of the limited amount of work devolving on the embassy at St. Petersburg, 4764–4774. 4821——Abuse in keeping up a certain standard of representation at the small courts in Germany or elsewhere, merely because other countries do so, 4777——Unnecessarily large salary at Constantinople further adverted to, 4779——Practice as to entertainments on the part of the St. Petersburg embassy further adverted to, 4801–4807.

Conclusion that copying machines may be introduced into the chancelleries with very great advantages, 4814–4820——Slight cost of the evening entertainments given by ambassadors further adverted to, 4822–4824.

Land Tenure Reports. Valuable information supplied by the secretaries of legation relative to the land tenure in foreign countries, Hammond 35——Very useful character of the land tenure reports by the secretaries, Earl of Clarendon 3440——The cost of the reports was only 186 l. 4 s. ib.

Communication from Lord Clarendon, dated 9th March 1870, respecting the reports on the subject of land tenure, &c.; zeal and intelligence evinced by these reports, App. 171.

Languages. Exception in the case of Russia and Turkey as regards the secretaries and attachés being required to know the language of the country, Hammond 130–135——Suggested special allowance of 100 l. a year to any secretary or attaché at St. Petersburg, Constantinople, Teheran, and certain other places, who could obtain a colloquial knowledge of the country, ib. 1750——Instances of promotion in the English service on account of special knowledge of languages, Hon. T. J. H. Thurlow 3769–3775.

Law Charges. Return showing for each of the years from 1859-60 to 1867–68, the expenditure at missions abroad in respect of law charges, App. 435.

Return of the amounts paid for reports of the Foreign Office by the law officers of the Crown, for the years 1864 to 1869 respectively, App. 533.

Lawrence, The Right Hon. John Laird Mair, Baron, G.C.B. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Conclusion, based on various grounds, that the Persian mission should be under the Secretary of State for India instead of under the Foreign Office, 4968 et seq.——Several advantages of Indian-bred diplomatists for service in Persia, whereas it is very improbable that the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs would appoint such officers; nor would he have the means of selecting those who were most fit, 4977. 5028 et seq.

Belief as to there having been no good cause for the former transfer of the Persian mission from the India Office, 4997, 4998. 5022-5024——Slight importance attached to the giving of presents to Eastern potentates, 5001-5003——Small number of European questions arising at the Persian mission as compared with the number of questions affecting India, 5014-5016——Enhanced interests of India in Persia if Russia should continue her advance in Central Asia, which witness much doubts, 5017-5021. 5025——Expediency in any case of England paying a fair proportion of the expenses of the mission, 5026, 5027.

Layard, Mr. Rule of the service under which Mr. Layard, as having been Under Secretary, was appointed to Madrid, Earl of Clarendon 3474.

Opinion that the appointment of Mr. Layard was very hard upon the service, Hon. T. J. H. Thurlow 3605. 3630——Further statement as to the natural dissatisfaction caused in the service by the appointment of Mr. Layard, ib. 3757, 3758. 3794-3800.

Statement in further explanation and justification of witness's appointment of Mr. Layard, Earl of Clarendon 3860-3865.

Leave of Absence:

Allowance to be made for leave of absence in considering the amount of staff at any mission, Hammond 202. 204——Strong disapproval of the practice of deduction from the salaries of ambassadors or ministers when absent on leave, Earl of Malmesbury 722-724. 734-737. 1212-1216——Advantage of both seniors and juniors frequently coming home on leave, ib. 734-737. 1221.

Explanation of the present arrangements as to leave of absence, and of the distinction made between heads of missions and their subordinates; amendment required, Sir H. G. Elliot 820-826——Concurrence in the view as to the importance of ample facilities for coming to England occasionally, Sir H. G. Elliot 1015, 1016: Earl of Clarendon 3447, 3448; Hon. E. R. Lytton 5052-5054. 5120. 5267——Expediency of amendment as to the length of leave of ministers, Earl of Malmesbury 1236, 1237.

Dissent from the view that there is any grievance in the matter of leave of absence of heads of missions, Earl of Derby 2304-2306——Objection to any scale of leave, with reference to the distance of the mission from England, ib. 2305. 2480——Removal of some complaints as regards leave of absence by throwing two years' leave into one; doubt as to any other amendment being required, ib. 2479, 2480——Boon to consuls general if allowed the same leave as diplomatic officers, ib. 2580-2582.

Grievance in ministers not being allowed leave of absence on full salary, Christie 2647——Approval of heads of missions being allowed to run two years' leave into one, Christie 2647, 2648; Earl of Clarendon 3447, 3448.

Heavy expense of witness's journey home from Japan, on sick leave, beyond the amount allowed, Mitford 4051, 4052——Satisfaction of witness with the present leave of absence to the junior members of the service. ib. 4177——Expediency of a larger payment towards the expense of coming home on leave from the extreme East, ib. 4107-4109.

Regulation as to the deductions to be made from salaries of heads of missions on leave of absence, App. 413.

Memorandum by Lord Malmesbury relative to the claims of heads of missions to leave for two months annually without deduction of pay, App. 436——Extract of Report of Select Committee of 1861 upon the question of leave, ib. 437.

Charges which would be entailed upon the public if sixty days' leave were granted to ambassadors and ministers abroad without deduction of salary, and if the present allowances were continued to the secretaries of embassy and legation, when acting as chargés d'affaires, App. 437.

Circular, dated 12th February 1862, respecting leave of absence, App. 440——Circular, dated 8th July 1865, relative to the deduction from salaries of heads of missions when absent more than sixty days in one year, ib. 447——Circular, dated 19th April 1866, respecting leave of absence to junior members of missions, ib. 448, 449.

Legal Advice (Foreign Office). Information as to the course pursued by the Foreign Office in obtaining legal advice; inability of witness to state the amount of law charges, Alston 1923-1934——Explanation relative to the practice of the Foreign Office in taking the opinion of the law officers of the Crown, and the system by which fees are charged and regulated, Greenwood 3245-3267.

Levant, The. Room for some reduction in the consulships in the Levant, Sir H. G. Elliot 1007——Political character of the consulships in the East, efficient and well-paid men being very essential, ib. 1018-1025.——See also Turkey.

Library (Foreign Office). Improved arrangements now in operation for retaining books and papers at the Foreign Office; very valuable character of the new library, Hammond 1668–1670.

Lowther, Mr. See Outfit. Secretaries of Embassy and Legation.

Lytton, The Honourable Edward Robert. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is Secretary of Embassy at Vienna; has been twenty-one years in the service, 5029, 5030——Great discouragement among the junior diplomatic servants on account of the bad prospect of promotion, 5031–5035. 5084–5091——Difficulty in inducing men to retire who have reached the higher posts, 5032, 5033——Relief if some of the junior officers were induced to retire, 5034——Injurious effect of a strict seniority system, it being far preferable that the Secretary of State should make selections on his own responsibility, 5036–5038. 5057. 5084–5088. 5108, 5109.

Fluctuating amount of work at the larger missions; opinion that the staff cannot well be reduced, 5039. 5052——Disadvantage of the frequent removal of the junior officers from one post to another, 5039–5041——Difficulty in regard to a permanent officer at each of the larger missions, unless his position is very carefully defined; illustration of this at Lisbon, 5042–5044——Greater usefulness of the members of a mission if left a longer time at the same posts, 5044–5048. 5117–5119.

Inadequacy of the salaries of diplomatic servants generally, there being, therefore, the greater claim to more rapid promotion, 5049–5051. 5064–5069——Great increase in the cost of living abroad, 5049——Necessity of the junior officers having good private means in addition to their salaries, 5049. 5064–5069——Importance of the diplomatic servants having facilities for frequently coming to England, 5052–5054. 5120.

Inexpediency of the Secretary of State being bound by any fixed rules, either as to admissions or promotion, 5055–5057——Illustration of the disadvantageous effect of seniority, 5057——Decided objection to the secretary of legation being expected to work in the chancellerie, as a general rule; perfect willingness of the secretaries to work in any way when pressure arises, 5058–5061——Importance of increased facilities of leave in the case of heads of missions more especially, 5062, 5063——Advantage of attachés going into society, 5070–5072.

Inadequacy of examinations as a test of fitness for the diplomatic service, though they are useful as keeping out the really ignorant, 5073, 5074. 5098——Importance of Roman law as a subject of examination, 5074——Necessity of proficiency in French, 5075——Very satisfactory knowledge of French possessed by those now in the service, 5076, 5077——Doubt as to the expediency of abolishing the small German missions, 5078, 5079.

Disapproval of keeping any mission at the minimum strength required, to be supplemented by assistance from the Foreign Office when pressure arises, 5080, 5081. 5103——Convenience to attachés in being able sometimes to effect an exchange with Foreign Office clerks, 5082——Advantage of an interchange of service between the heads of missions and the heads of departments in the Foreign Office, there being however some drawbacks to be guarded against, 5083. 5099——More rapid promotion of men of merit in foreign services than in the English service, 5092–5097.

Expediency of full discretion in the Secretary of State as to the removal or transfer of officers, 5100–5102——Very useful services rendered by the chanceliers in the French service, 5104–5107——Instances of important missions where the work has been well done by a smaller staff than is generally employed, 5110–5116. 5120.

[Second Examination.]—Explanation that witness strongly objects to copying clerks being substituted for secretaries and attachés in the political and confidential work of the missions, 5241. 5265——Further objection to the system of frequent transfer of secretaries and attachés, as very injurious to the service and very costly and inconvenient to the staff, 5241. 5249——Large amount of work at the great missions which is not of a confidential character and which could be very advantageously performed by permanent officers or chanceliers, 5241.

Grounds for the conclusion that it would be very inadvisable to reduce the staff of our missions generally, though this may be done in exceptional cases, 5242, 5243. 5247–5248——Way in which the alterations consequent upon the Report of the Select Committee of 1861, tend to augment rather than to remove the dissatisfaction in respect of promotion, 5244——Important advantages of the former system whereby there were facilities to young men of good position and private means to enter the service, though they did not intend to remain in it, 5244. 5251.

Disadvantage through the heads of missions not now having any voice in the appointment of attachés, 5244. 5246——Very rare instances of persons now entering the service, save as a permanent career, 5245——Advantage of limiting the number of paid employés concurrently with an unlimited number of unpaid attachés, 5250, 5251. 5263, 5264——Opinion that the present system of examinations does not secure ability, though it may exclude gross ignorance, 5251–5254——Expediency of unlimited freedom in the executive as to appointments and promotions, 5253. 5279, 5280.

Danger of the best men retiring if a gratuity were offered for retirement after so many years' service; probable retirements, even without compensation, 5255. 5258——Evil effect of the discouragement in the service, though under any system a certain amount of disappointment is unavoidable, 5256–5259——Approval of certain modes suggested for regulating the proportion of juniors with reference to the number of upper posts to be filled, 5260–5268——Advantage of frequent opportunities for the staff to come to England, 5267.

Evidence to the effect that a complete amalgamation of the Foreign Office and diplomatic service is very desirable; concurrence in certain suggestions of Lord Cowley on this subject, 5269–5277——Propriety of due consideration being paid to the feelings and expectations of the Foreign Office clerks before amalgamation with the diplomatic service, 5276, 5277.

Unduly small pensions of ambassadors and ministers, this being one cause of the block in the service, as there is no inducement to retirement, 5278——Expediency of a concentration of responsibility in the Secretary of State in respect not only of promotions in the service, but of the appointment of outsiders to the higher posts, 5279, 5280.

Malmesbury, The Right Hon. the Earl of. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Has twice been Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, 668, 669——Disapproval of open competition for the diplomatic service, 671-674——Importance of the service being supplied from the better classes of society; advantage if also a university degree could be made a condition, 674-678. 693-698. 789-792——Conclusions favourable to an increase of the salaries of the junior members of the profession, 679–687. 720, 721.

Belief as to the system of students established by witness in China having turned out very well, 688–692——Objection to a staff of copying clerks at the missions, 699——Approval of a permanent clerk in the larger missions for keeping the archives, 700, 701. 767, 768——Suggestion that the block in the service might be relieved by appointing some of the secretaries and attachés to consular missions; doubt as to this being a just grievance to the vice-consuls, 702, 703. 760–764. 796, 797. 800–814——Relief to be given by staying the appointment of attachés for some time, 703, 704. 815–817.

Objection to compulsory retirement at a certain age, 705, 706——Expediency of treating the diplomatic service as a profession, and not importing outsiders, 707-719——Strong disapproval of the practice of deduction from the salaries of ambassadors or ministers when absent on leave, 722–724. 734–737——Doubt as to the expediency of a reduction or abolition of any of the smaller missions in Europe; instances of valuable information information obtained by witness, when Foreign Secretary, through small missions, 725–727. 738–740. 769–773. 776–778.

Very efficient working of the Foreign Office in witness's experience, 728, 729——Expediency of a revision of the consular service, 730, 731——Disadvantage in the non-payment of attachés, 732, 733——Advantage of both seniors and juniors frequently coming home on leave, 734–737——Approval of the South American missions being made more important, 741–744——Ill effect of the inadequate payment of the United States ministers in Europe, 745–747. 774.

Important reduction effected by witness in the cost of messengers, when the telegraphs came into operation, 748. 784–788——Equal necessity of tact and judgment in ministers, since the facility of telegraphic communication with England, 749–753——Great value of the diplomatic service, as tending to prevent war, 756–759——Approval of some increase of salary of the chargé d'affaires, when the minister is absent on leave, 765, 766——Very little room for economy, without prejudice to efficiency, 775.

Disadvantage in ministers remaining a long time at the same posts, 779——Non-removal of the minister at Coburg adverted to and explained, 780–783——Line of demarcation between the consular and diplomatic services, though there have been some appointments from the former to the latter, 793–795. 804, 805——Approval given by witness at the time of the transfer of the Persian mission to the India Office, 798, 799.

[Second Examination.]—Further evidence in defence of the smaller European missions, with reference more especially to certain instances of very early and valuable information furnished thence to witness, when Foreign Secretary, 1141–1165. 1217–1220. 1226–1228. 1244–1246——Opinion that Sweden, Denmark, Brussels, and the Hague cannot be classed as small missions, 1165, 1166——Dissent from the view that diplomacy can be fairly accused of having caused wars, though errors or omissions in diplomacy may have failed to prevent wars, 1167–1178. 1231. 1242, 1243.

Control of witness, when Foreign Secretary, over all the promotions and foreign appointments, 1179, 1180——Further disapproval of competition for attachéships, it being necessary to appoint men of good social standing and of private means, 1181–1183. 1222–1225——Advantage of a university degree, though it should not be a condition of appointment, 1184——Disapproval of the appointment of outsiders as heads of missions, as checking promotion in the service, in which there are at all times perfectly efficient men for these posts, 1185–1198.

Objection to the system of unpaid attachés, 1202–1204, 1229, 1230——Increased work of ministers abroad since the telegraph, though their responsibility is diminished, 1205–1209——Further disapproval of the practice of deduction from the minister's pay during leave of absence, 1212–1216——Advantage of heads of missions frequently coming to England, 1221——Opinion that England should be properly represented at Rome, and that the Pope should have a representative in England, 1232–1335.

Expediency of amendment as to the length of leave of ministers, 1236, 1237——Pressure of applications for attachéships, though unpaid, 1238, 1239——Approval of a suggestion that the entrance examination should be very light, and should be followed by a strict examination for the post of second secretary, 1240, 1241.

Marriage of Attachés. Expediency of some check upon the marriage of attachés, as being an obstruction to their removal from place to place, Hon. T. J. H. Thurlow 3836.

Mitford, Algernon Bertram. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Service of witness for some years in the Foreign Office before interchanging into the diplomatic service, in which he is now second secretary in Japan, 3975–3986——Great dissatisfaction in the junior branches of the service on account of the poor prospects of promotion, 3987–3993——Probability of witness being sixty years of age by the time he is likely to arrive at the head of a mission, 3988–3992——Unfairness of the system of promotion by seniority, as offering no encouragement to zeal and efficiency, 3994–3996.

Laborious study necessary before witness became really proficient in the Japanese and Chinese languages; considerable expense necessarily incurred by him in the matter, which the Treasury refused to reimburse him, 3997–4009. 4020–4022. 4072–4078. 4090–4098.

4138——Importance of witness's knowlege of Japanese in the transaction of diplomatic business at Yeddo, 4001-4006. 4031. 4072-4074. 4098——Particulars relative to the functions, position, and remuneration of the interpreters attached to the mission in Japan, 4010-4015. 4029-4033. 4038, 4039. 4112-4115——Advantage of a knowledge of Chinese in learning Japanese; very little communication between the two countries, 4016, 4017.

Great expense of living at Yeddo, the expense being much greater than at Pekin, and it being necessary to entertain rather largely; witness in fact spends double his salary, 4023-4028. 4044, 4045. 4211-4216——Impracticability of properly learning Japanese or Chinese in England or elsewhere in Europe, though there are several professors of those languages, 4030. 4034-4036. 4078. 4082-4089——Explanation as to a knowledge of Dutch having ceased to be of any use in Japan, 4040-4043.

Further statement that promotion by seniority should be much more frequently departed from in the diplomatic service, 4046-4050. 4139-4151.

Heavy expense of witness's journey home from Japan, on sick leave, beyond the amount allowed, 4051, 4052——Decided objection to the work in China and Japan being done entirely by interpreters under the heads of the missions, 4053——Great importance of a system of interchange between the missions in Europe and those in China and Japan, instead of fixing in the latter missions men already conversant with the language, 4053-4055. 4126-4147——Suggested addition of a third secretary to the Japan mission, 4056, 4057——Several foreign missions in Japan; employment of interpreters by these, 4058, 4059.

Importance of greater facilities for interchange of service between the diplomatic staff and the Foreign Office; suggestions as to the relative grades to which exchange should apply, 4060-4070. 4174-4176——Satisfaction of witness with the present leave of absence to the junior members of the service, 4177——Impression that the block in the service arises more from the abolition of missions than from the pressure on the Secretary of State for attachéships, 4079-4081.

Less study required for a knowledge of Russian than of Japanese, 4099, 4100——Objection to an examination being required before any allowance was made for the expense incurred in learning Japanese, 4101——Dissent from the view that university degrees or honours are any guarantee of fitness for the diplomatic service, 4102-4105. 4110, 4111——Fairness of reducing the term for pensions in respect of service in unhealthy climates, 4106, 4107——Expediency also of a larger payment towards the expense of coming home on leave from the extreme East, 4107-4109.

Particulars relative to the supervision of the consulates in China and Japan by the heads of the missions, 4116-4125——Disapproval of copying presses in the missions in China and Japan; liability thereby to confidential information being divulged, 4152-4164. 4190——Opinion adverse to the employment of clerks as a means of reducing the junior staff in the line of promotion, 4162-4173. 4182-4190——Approval of the transfer of under secretaries, but not very frequently, 4177-4181.

Doubt as to the expediency of an extensive employment of clerks in the Paris embassy, though there is much routine work they might do, 4182-4189——Difficulty in working a system of alternate seniority and selection, 4191-4194——Probability of many men being induced to retire if a liberal gratuity were given, 4195-4198.

History of the changes which have recently taken place in Japan, and are still going on, by the deposal of the Tycoon and the re-establishment of the Mikado, as a constitutional monarch, 4199-4204——Valuable support rendered by British diplomacy towards the foregoing desirable result, 4200. 4205-4210.

Very large commercial body now established at Japanese ports, 4217, 4218——Great advantage if the European merchants possessed a knowledge of Japanese, 4219-4221.

Morgan, Mr. (Bahia Consulship). Complaint made by witness when at Rio, relative to the conduct of Mr. Morgan, the consul at Bahia, in associating himself with railway enterprises; serious injury to the public service by the action of this consul, Christie 2698–2794. 2714——The fault, in the foregoing case, was in a great measure with the Foreign Office, ib. 2698. 2700.

Further details relative to the case of Mr. Morgan, with reference more especially to his connection with a certain railway, the concession for which he sold for a large sum, Christie 3103–3105. 3113, 3114. 3117–3125. 3196——Witness repeats that the case is one affecting the Foreign Office rather than the consul, ib. 3103. 3196.

Morier, Robert Burnet David, C. B. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is a secretary of legation, now stationed at Darmstadt, 4264, 4265——Inferior diplomatic position of witness as compared with the representatives of other countries at Darmstadt; his recognised position there is that of a chargé d'affaires, 4266–4269——Special circumstances which render it important that there should be a diplomatic agent of this country at Darmstadt, 4270–4272. 4275. 4288–4290——Salary of 700 l. a year allowed to witness, there being no staff whatever, 4273, 4274——Varied and onerous duties devolving upon witness, his time being fully occupied, 4276–4278.

Conclusion that the present block to promotion in the diplomatic service is caused chiefly by the changes introduced in consequence of the recommendations of the Select Committee of 1861; 4279. 4306——Suggestion that one mode of removing the block is by offering gratuities to men to leave the service; objection to which this course is open, 4280–4282. 4306—— Decided opinion that promotion by merit is the only proper course; there need be no fear of favouritism if the Secretary of State be completely and solely responsible, 4282–4287——Importance of making the Foreign Secretary wholly responsible for the working of the service, 4285. 4311.

Circumstance of there being now only a consul at Frankfort, this officer being unpaid and the fees not nearly covering his expenditure, 4290–4296——Arrangement by which witness takes the notarial work of the consul at Frankfort, when he is absent, the latter taking witness's work in his absence, 4295——Large increase in the cost of living at Darmstadt, 4296——Similar cost of provisions at nearly all the capitals of Europe, 4296–4298.

Part taken by witness in connection with the negociations for the Austrian commercial treaty; long absence from Darmstadt on this occasion, 4299–4305—— Opinion that such consular posts as are in their nature wholly political, should be amalgamated with the diplomatic service, 4307–4309——Inexpediency of frequent changes or removals from one diplomatic post to another; disapproval of any rule on this subject, 4310–4313—— The fewer rules generally the better, 4310, 4311.

Evidence in support of the view that the heads of departments in the Foreign Office should have personal experience of the diplomatic service, and should have served for a time in the countries comprised in their respective departments, 4314–4327——Greatly increased interest of the attachés in their work if they knew it would come before men personally acquainted with the circumstances of the country in which they are employed, 4314. 4316——Forcible illustration, in the case of Lord Clarendon, of the great value of diplomatic experience in the head of the Foreign Office, 4316. 4325.

Great difficulty of the question of promotion in the diplomatic service, the service not being sufficiently numerous to be treated as a profession, 4328——Proposed return to the old system of unpaid attachés, of whom there should be an unlimited number, 4328. 4390–4392——Objection to the present system of examination of attachés, witness proposing that there should be no examination for unpaid attachéships, but that there be a maximum test examination before advancement, 4328–4334. 4391, 4392. 4402–4404—— Removal of the obstacle to bringing outsiders into the service, if the seniority system is got rid of, 4328. 4391, 4392——Insufficient knowledge of writing French in the case of many who have passed the examinations, 4332–4334. 4368.

Grounds for strongly objecting to a system of chanceliers or copying clerks as tending to destroy that confidence which is the vital principle of international intercourse, 4335–4342——Statement as to much incidental expense being necessarily incurred by the diplomatic servants in connection with the reports drawn up for the Foreign Office, such as the Land Tenure Report, 4343–4345——Decided approval of the system of reports, 4346——Expediency of a special diplomatic education, very different from the present education of attachés, 4347–4349.

Conclusions strongly opposed to competitive examinations for the diplomatic service, 4350–4355—— Opinion that the various classes of society are very fairly represented in the diplomatic service, 4356——Moderate cost of the service considering the work done, 4357——Expediency of England being represented by agents of the same rank as other powers, 4358–4360——Great diminution of the efficiency of the diplomatic servants if they did not entertain and did not mix freely in society, 4360–4363.

Superior body of junior servants since the introduction of the examination test, 4364-4367——Exception taken to the examinations as not requiring any proper knowledge of international law, 4368-4370——Effect of the telegraph to increase rather than to diminish the responsibility of the diplomatic servants abroad, 4371-4373——Belief that in the Russian service three examinations are passed, 4374.

Entire fallacy of the view that the public press is any substitute for the work of the Foreign Office abroad; frequent instances of "canards" being spread both by the home and foreign press, 4375-4384——Grounds for the statement that the diplomatic servants are decidedly underpaid, 4385-4389——Suggested payment of attachés who have passed the proposed examination, until they are appointed to vacancies, 4391, 4392.

Groundlessness of the apprehension that diplomatic servants in certain consular posts would be prone to meddling and intervention, 4393-4395——Absence of intervention tendencies in the diplomatic servants abroad; frequency on the other hand of a popular cry in England for intervention, 4395 —— Expediency of the diplomatic agents keeping clear of the foreign press, save that they should correct positively false information, 4396-4401.

Value of a maximum test examination as securing the best talent for the service, 4402-4404——Absence of claim in the unpaid attachés who could not pass the proposed test examination, 4405——Distinct separation desirable to be maintained between the mere shipping or commercial consular service and the diplomatic service, 4406.

[Second Examination.]—Evidence in further support of the conclusion that the appointments in the foreign service should be in the hands of the Foreign Secretary instead of being thrown open to competitive examination, 4466-4473—— Strong objection to the rule limiting the age of admission to the service, 4472 ——Importance of a mission at Darmstadt further adverted to, 4474-4478. 4574. 4599-4613——Greatly increased labour of the diplomatic servants by reason of the reports now required of them, 4479 —— Advantage if these reports were taken into consideration so as to affect promotion, 4480-4482.

Importance of the experience gained by long residence, frequent transfer being undesirable, 4483-4487——Improvement if, under a system of promotion by merit, the less efficient men were induced to leave the service, 4488-4491——Fair right of those who have entered the service since 1861 to look forward to the system of seniority up to the grade of first secretary of legation, 4492. 4586, 4587.

Expectation that ths better men will leave the service unless something be done to expedite promotion, 4493-4495. 4510——Suggestion for the establishment of a high test examination, for which all unpaid attachés and second and third secretaries might voluntarily offer themselves for the next two years, those who passed being placed at the head of the list of second secretaries and receiving an additional salary, 4495-4520——Proposed option to those not passing the examination either to remain in their present position or to leave the service with a fair compensation, 4495-4512.

Proposal that, the block being once removed, promotion should be in future by merit, 4513, 4514. 4520——Suggested grant of larger pensions to some of the older servants, 4514——Advantage if any missions are abolished of establishing chargés d'affaireships in their place; relief thereby to the promotion block, ib.——Respects in which mutual advantage would arise to the diplomatic servants and the Foreign Office clerks if the two branches were amalgamated for an interchange of services, 4521-4529.

Further reference to the notarial work done by witness for the consul at Frankfort when he is absent; this is done gratis, 4530-4532. 4537, 4538 —— Doubt whether in all cases consular work could be done by members of missions, though merely notarial work might be so done, 4533-4536. 4591——Disapproval of any fees being taken by diplomatic servants for notarial or other work, 4537-4547——Further statement in favour of amalgamating with the diplomatic service consulship which have a political character, such as that of Alexandria, 4548-4553.

Sufficiency of chargés d'affaires instead of ambassadors at many courts, though as a general rule the English representative should not be of lower grade than those of other countries, 4554-4561——Importance of hospitality and social intercourse as greatly facilitating the acquisition of useful information by diplomatic servants, 4562-4569—— Gratuities granted to foreign diplomatic servants in respect of hospitalities, there being nothing of the kind in the English service, 4570-4573——Further reference to the nominal position of chargé d'affaires filled by witness at Darmstadt, his salary of 700 l. a year being very inadequate, 4574-4584.

Expediency of full discretion in the Secretary of State to appoint "outsiders" as ministers at foreign courts, 4585 —— Necessity of secretaries of legation travelling when they have reports to make, 4588, 4589——Further reference to the effect of telegraphy in increasing work, 4590——Exceptions taken to a combination of Stuttgardt with with Darmstadt and Carlsruhe as one mission, though it would lead to a diminution of expenditure, 4593-4613.

Instance of a "canard," published in the "Times," for the correction of which an official representation was required, 4614——Further conclusion as to the expediency of diplomatic servants abroad keeping clear of the foreign press, ib.

Morier, Mr. Memorandum submitted by Mr. Morier relative to the block in the service, together with suggestions for its removal, App. 534, 535——Suggestions relative to the education and examination desirable for attachés, ib. 536, 537.

Moscow. Discontinuance of an allowance made to the consul at Moscow for office expenses, Alston 1914.

Munich. Larger salary at Munich than at Stuttgardt, the former being the more important place, Hammond 1889-1891——Objections to an abolition of the mission at Munich, Earl of Clarendon 3866-3869.

Sundry particulars in connection with the mission at Munich; little, if any, business of political importance whilst witness was there, the minister residing for eight months in the year at his country house, some sixty or seventy miles off, Labouchere 4707-4720. 4775. 4780-4782. 4786-4800. 4808, 4807.

Witness, who is third secretary at Munich, denies the accuracy of certain statements by Mr. Labouchere, and submits that the mission is a very important one, and involves much work, Heneage 4947-4953. 4958-4963——The minister resides about fourteen miles from Munich in the summer, but is kept duly informed of everything going on at the mission, ib. 4954-4957. 4964.

Return showing the staff, and the salaries and allowances, for the year ended 31st March 1869, App. 473.

Estimate of the salaries, &c. required for 1870-71, as compared with the amount for 1869-70, App. 405.

Munro, Major J. St. John. Letter from Major Munro to the Earl of Clarendon, dated Buenos Ayres, 19th October 1868, relative to his appointment as consul at Uruguay, and submitting that the salary proposed to be given him is altogether inadequate, App. 508.

Nominations (Diplomatic Service):

1. Nomination for the Service by the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs; expediency of his Responsibility in the Matter.
2. Practice of Nominating Young Men of Good Social Position and of Private Means; Defence of this Practice.
3. Extent to which the Aristocracy are Represented.
4. Limited Pressure for Nominations.
5. Question of Nomination by the Universities or Colleges.

1. Nomination for the Service by the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs; Expediency of his Responsibility in the Matter:

System of nominations and test examination for the diplomatic service, Hammond 7-10. 94-99——Entry to the diplomatic service through nominations made exclusively by the Foreign Secretary, ib. 276-283——Careful inquiry by witness before he made any nomination, Earl of Derby 2563, 2564——Necessity of a right of selection in the Secretary of State, so as to secure the qualification of tact, Walrond 2935. 2940, 2941.

Approval of the present system of nomination and examination for the diplomatic service; grounds for the conclusion that it is better than a system of open competition, Earl of Clarendon 3413-3417. 3449-3455——Advantage of complete responsibility in the Secretary of State for every nomination, ib. 3455.

Evidence in support of the conclusion that the appointments in the foreign service should be in the hands of the Foreign Secretary, instead of being thrown open to competitive examination, Morier 4350-4355. 4466-4473.

2. Practice of Nominating Young Men of Good Social Position and of Private Means; Defence of this Practice:

Defence of the system of appointing young men of good family position, and of private means, rather than sons of tradesmen or of gentlemen of small means, Hammond 302-306. 319——Importance of the service being supplied from the better classes of society; advantage if also a university degree could be made a condition, Earl of Malmesbury 674-678. 693-698. 789-792——Similar class of society from which attachés continue to be taken as in former years, Sir H. G. Elliot 843, 844.

Evidence in further justification of the system of appointing persons from the upper classes of society to the diplomatic service and to the Foreign Office; confidential character of the work adverted to hereon, Hammond 1587-1596. 1632-1645——Satisfactory working of the present system of nomination of attachés, it being very essential that the service should consist of gentlemen, Earl of Derby 2272. 2275. 2323, 2324——Further evidence in favour of diplomatic servants being persons of the higher ranks of social life; aristocratic connection is not material, ib. 2565-2568.

Injury to the service if others than gentlemen were employed, in whom confidence could not be reposed, Earl of Clarendon 3460-3464——Opinion that the various classes of society are very fairly represented in the diplomatic service, Morier 4356.

3. Extent to which the Aristocracy are Represented:

Dissent from the view that the aristocracy are unduly represented as regards nominations to the service, Hammond 292-294——Total of fifty diplomatic servants connected directly or remotely with noble families, whilst there are seventy not so connected, ib. 295. 299-301.

Distribution of members of the diplomatic body between those directly or indirectly, and in different degrees, connected with noble families, and those who are not so connected, App. 423.

4. Limited Pressure for Nominations:

Several applications for attachéships, notwithstanding the bad prospects, Hammond 93—— Pressure of applications for attachéships, though unpaid, Earl of Malmesbury 1238, 1239.

Less eagerness evinced to enter the diplomatic service than the Foreign Office or other branches of the public service; witness, however, found no difficulty in nominating a sufficient supply of competent men, Earl of Derby 2263-2267. 2271——Further reference to the comparative absence of pressure to enter the diplomatic service, and the probable causes thereof, ib. 2499-2508.

Limited pressure for nominations for the service, on account chiefly of the service being at first unpaid, and of the necessity of attachés having large private means, Earl of Clarendon 3419-3422. 3449-3453.

5. Question of Nemination by the Universities or Colleges:

Consideration of suggestions for empowering the heads of universities or colleges to nominate for the diplomatic service; approval of this proposal, though there are some obstacles to its adoption, Walrond 3339-3345. 3353-3382——Exception taken to a proposal for giving some nominations to the universities, Earl of Clarendon 3455.

Open Competition. See Competition.

Orthography. Statement as to there having been several failures in orthography at the diplomatic examinations, Walrond and Headlam 2910-2913.

Outfit. Rule as to the outfit being one-third of the salary; this rule is not always adhered to, Hammond 1395, 1396, 1599——Disapproval of any alterations generally in the scale of outfit with reference to the amount of travelling expenses, ib. 1401-1412——Return of the outfit if the minister to whom it is issued does not go to his post; instances in the cases of Mr. W. Lowther and Mr. Forbes, ib. 1415-1417——Objection to a deduc tion from the outfit allowance where plate is already provided, ib. 1417.

Further statement as to the return of outfits by Mr. Lowther and Mr. Forbes, Hammond 1479-1483——Further statement as to its not being necessary to alter the outfit money, with reference to the length or cost of the journey, ib. 1597, 1598——Amount of outfit allowed on removal from one post to another, ib. 1599, 1600——Conclusion as to the insufficiency generally of the outfit, the salaries also being very inadequate, ib. 1602-1609.

Cause of the larger outfit allowed to Mr. Lowther than Mr. Forbes, Alston 1963.

Conclusion that there was an error at the Foreign Office in allowing Mr. Forbes only 800 l. instead of 1,100 l. for outfit, Christie 2712.

Doubt as to the necessity of more liberal allowance for outfit than is now given when a man is suddenly promoted from one mission to another, Earl of Clarendon 3933-3936.

Statement showing the present scale of outfit of diplomatic servants abroad, distinguishing between missions of different classes, App. 399, 400——Amount charged on account of outfits during the year 1869, App. 408——Regulations as to outfits, ib. 410——Statement showing the scale of outfit for each mission, ib. 415, 416.

Paraguay. Grounds for the conclusion that our relations with Paraguay are a proof of bad management on the part of the Foreign Office, Christie 3095–3097——Comment upon the little notice taken in this country of the imprisonment, torture, and murder of British subjects in Paraguay, ib. 3096, 3097.

Paris. Explanation relative to the increase of the salary of the ambassador at Paris from 8,000 l. to 10,000 l. a year in 1856, there having been a previous reduction to 8,000 l., Hammond 491–496——Allowance of 1,000 l. a year for warming and lighting the embassy house in Paris; necessity otherwise of increasing the salary of the ambassador, ib. 620–622——Provision of some public furniture in the embassy house, ib. 1397–1400——Reasons for an unusually large outfit allowance to the ambassador at Paris, though, as as compared with other ambassadors or ministers, his travelling expenses are very small, ib. 1395–1412.

Quantity and character of the public furniture in the embassy house at Paris further adverted to, Hammond 1524–1527——Considerable number of commercial despatches received at the Foreign Office from Paris, ib. 1546——Large rent necessary if an embassy house had to be hired, ib. 1552, 1553. 1555——Further statement as to the very large sum required to provide a new embassy house in Paris and to furnish it, ib. 1719——Greatly enhanced value of the British embassy house and grounds, as compared with their original cost, ib.

Change of arrangements in regard to the consular salary at Paris, the fees being now surrendered to the Exchequer, Alston 1913–1915.

Particulars relative to the services and remuneration of Mr. Atlee as chancelier at the Paris embassy; excellent results of this appointment, Hon. T. J. H. Thurlow 3522–3540. 3827–3830——Hard work of the junior staff, so that they do not much go into society, ib. 3686–3689. 3766–3768——Approval of the performance of consular duties by Mr. Atlee; similar work might be performed at any mission where there is a permanent official, ib. 3720–3722——Necessity of a private secretary at Paris, ih. 3815.

Doubt as to the expediency of an extensive employment of clerks in the Paris embassy, though there is much routine work they might do, Mitford 4182–4189.

Opinion that the ambassador at Paris should always change with the Government, and that other ambassadors should not be more than six years in any place, Sir H. D. Wolff 4253. 4259–4261——Further evidence in favour of the ambassador at Paris changing with each change of Government; little, if any objection on the score of expense. ib. 4448–4457. 4463–4465——Respects in which a change of the ambassador with a change of Government is desirable, Sir H. L. Bulwer 4891–4895.

Return showing the staff, and the salaries and allowances, for the year ended 31st March 1869; App. 472.

Estimate of the salaries, &c. required for 1870–71, as compared with the amount for 1869–70, App. 405.

Passages in Ships of War. Circular, dated 28th May 1867, as to payment of expenses on passages on board ships of war, App. 453——Instruction issued by the Admiralty, dated 14th January 1868, respecting the re-payment of the expenses of passages, ib.

Patronage. Strong objection to widening the scope for political patronage in the administration of the diplomatic service, Earl of Derby 2594–2596——Very little reference in recent years to party politics in the distribution of diplomatic patronage, ib. 2597–2600.

Payment of Salaries. See Agencies (Foreign Office).

Pecuniary Rewards (Special Services). Explanation as to a pecuniary reward or bonus being sometimes conferred, after application to the Treasury, for specially valuable services rendered by any attaché, Earl of Clarendon 3982, 3983.

PENSIONS:

Hardship removed since the Report of the Select Committee of 1861 as regards pensions, these now dating after four years' service, Hammond 5——Importance of the change made as regards pensions, by giving commissions to second and third secretaries, Sir H. G. Elliot 828–830——Amended regulations on the score of pensions further adverted to, ib. 932–935. 1067, 1068.

Information as to the several regulations on the score of pensions, with reference to age, length of service, &c., Hammond 1498–1519. 1528. 1628–1631——Explanation as to the liability of persons to forfeit their pensions if they refuse to serve again, ib. 1499–1501. 1628–1631——Functions performed by the Foreign Office and the Treasury respectively in the consideration of applications for pensions. ib. 1729. 1734, 1735.

Information as to the practice generally at the Foreign Office in reference to consular and diplomatic pensions respectively, Alston 1945–1962.

Mode of calculation of witness's pension, which is 900 l. a-year; necessity of his having served fifteen years, Christie 2624–2626——Several important alterations made by the Act of last Session as to pensions, ib. 2955–2957——Valuable provision in the Act of last year as regards pensions in the case of persons transferred from the consular service or the Foreign Office to the diplomatic service, ib. 2957.

Hardship of the distinction between first class and second class missions in the matter of the pensions of envoys extraordinary and ministers plenipotentiary, Christie 2957. 3088——Belief that ten years' service, including leave of absence, is sufficient for a pension, ib. 3089——Different position of witness and Sir Charles Wyke as regards pensions; further statement on this point that witness's pension was forced upon him, ib. 3090, 3091. 3136, 3137.

Suggested grant of larger pensions to some of the older servants, Morier 4514——Unduly small pensions of ambassadors and ministers, this being one cause of the block in the service, as there is no inducement to retirement, Hon. E. R. Lytton 5278.

Return of the amount of pensions in each of the years 1833–69, App. 402——Regulations as to the service and pensions of second and third secretaries, ib. 412, 413.

Persian Consulates. Doubt as to the expediency of placing the consulates in Persia under the India Office, Sir H. C. Rawlinson 2205–2211.

PERSIAN MISSION:

1. Concurrence of Evidence in favour of the Mission at Teheran being placed under the India Office instead of the Foreign Office; sundry Details relative to the Mission.
2. Evidence opposed to the foregoing View, and in favour of the present Arrangement.
3. Proportion of the Correspondence with the Mission which relates to India.
4. Expense of the Mission; large Proportion borne by India, though the Administration rests with the Foreign Office.
5. Other Details generally.

1. Concurrence of Evidence in favour of the Mission at Teheran being placed under the India Office instead of the Foreign Office; sundry Details relative to the Mission:

Approval given by witness at the time of the transfer of the Persian mission to the India Office in 1858, Earl of Malmesbury 798, 799.

Information relative to the Persian mission as regards its superintendence and control by the Foreign Office or by the India Office at different periods, Kaye 2035 et seq.——Circumstances attending the transfer of the mission to the India Office in 1858; letters on the subject handed in, ib. 2035–2038. 2051–2053——Practice as to the conduct of the business and the appointment of officers where the mission was under the Secretary of State for India, ib. 2054–2059.

Statement of the present course of business with respect to Persian affairs; inconvenience and delay by reason of the dual government of the Foreign Office and the India Office, Kaye 2063–2067. 2104–2124. 2136–2142. 2149–2151. 2159–2168——Several officers of the Indian Government in Persia, ib. 2066–2074——Conclusion that the superintendence of Persian affairs should be placed under the Secretary of State for India, and that the chief appointments in Persia should be given to officers of Indian experience, ib. 2075 et seq.——Expediency of the control being with the Secretary of State for India instead of with the Viceroy, ib. 2075–2079. 2132–2134. 2155.

Views of Lord Lawrence and Lord Mayo in favour of transfer to the Secretary of State for India, Kaye 2077–2079——Less complication if the Persian mission were under the India Office; contemplated control by the Foreign Office whenever Imperial interests are directly concerned, ib. 2125–2131. 2136–2142——Opinion that the war in 1856 would not have occurred if Sir Henry Rawlinson had been in the country as diplomatic representative, ib. 2129——Explanation that the Viceroy cannot now give instructions to the ministers at Teheran, ib. 2145–2148.

Statement as to Sir Henry Rawlinson having been entrusted with presents to the Shah when he went as minister at Teheran, Kaye 2152, 2153——Antagonism likely to arise between the Imperial Government and the India Office through there being two sets of officers in Persia, ib. 2149–2151.

1. Concurrence of Evidence, &c.—continued.

Opinion that the appointments in Persia should be filled by officers of the Indian service, Sir H. C. Rawlinson 2182. 2184. 2200. 2203, 2204——Essentially oriental and despotic character of the court of Teheran; great importance of the personal influence of the diplomatic representative, and of his being well conversant with the language and manners of the country, ib. 2185–2187. 2232–2241——Explanation in detail as to the reasons for witness's objection to be placed under the Foreign Office; reasons submitted also for a re-transfer of the mission to the Secretary of State for India, ib. 2188 et seq.

Resignation by witness of his appointment as minister at Teheran in 1860 upon the transfer of the mission from the India Office to the Foreign Office, Sir H. C. Rawlinson 2188——Objection, amongst other things, to the abolition by the Foreign Office of the practice of making presents to the Shah, ib. 2190–2195. 2251–2254——Absence of distinction in Persia between an envoy from the India Office and from the Foreign Office, ib. 2198, 2199——Conduct by the Indian Government of all the military operations against Persia, ib. 2212, 2213.

Explanation relative to the conduct and termination of the last Persian war; services rendered by an Indian officer when peace was being negotiated, Sir H. C. Rawlinson 2214–2217——Special importance as regards India, of the progress of Russia in Central Asia, ib. 2223–2228——Further explanation relative to witness's objection to serve under the Foreign Office; letter read in which he resigned his appointment, dated Teheran, 20th January 1860, ib. 2241–2246——Excellent relations which existed between witness and the Shah; advantage of witness's knowledge of the language and customs of the country, ib. 2232–2241. 2247–2250.

Full concurrence of witness in the transfer of the Persian mission to the India Office by Lord Malmesbury in 1858, Earl of Derby 2307–2309——Balance of advantages in favour of the Persian mission being under the India Office rather than the Foreign Office; witness, however, has no very strong opinion on the subject, ib. 2310–2318. 2446, 2447——Advantage of Indian officers as better conversant than European officers with the languages and customs of the east, ib. 2313. 2447——Important authorities in favour of the Persian mission being under the India Office; high authorities also on the other side, ib. 2525–2532.

Conclusion as to the tendency of Russian conquest in Central Asia, being an argument in favour of our diplomatic relations with Persia being carried on through India, Sir H. C. R. Rawlinson 4682——Groundlessness of the apprehension that a transfer of the Persian mission to the India Office would give umbrage to the Shah, ib. 4684.

Conclusion, based on various grounds, that the Persian mission should be under the Secretary of State for India instead of under the Foreign Office, Lord Lawrence 4968 et seq.——Several advantages of Indian-bred diplomatists for service in Persia, whereas it is very improbable that the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs would appoint such officers, nor would he have the means of selecting those who were most fit, ib. 4977 et seq. 5028.

Belief as to there having been no good cause for the former transfer of the Persian mission from the India Office, Lord Lawrence 4997, 4998. 5022–5024——Slight importance attached to the giving of presents to Eastern potentates, ib. 5001–5003——Enhanced interests of India in Persia, if Russia should continue her advance in Central Asia, which witness much doubts, ib. 5017–5021. 5025.

Letter from Lord Malmesbury to Lord Stanley, dated 12th November 1858, submitting reasons for the proposed transfer of the Persian mission from the Foreign Office to the India Office, App. 519, 520.

Letter from Lord Stanley to Lord Malmesbury, dated 17th November 1858, concurring in the proposal for the transfer of the mission, App. 522.

2. Evidence opposed to the foregoing View, and in favour of the present Arrangement:

Particulars in connection with the Russian mission, and its transfer and re-transfer between the India Office and Foreign Office, Hammond 233–240——Grounds for objecting to the Persian mission being again placed under the India Office, ib. 240. 247.

Sundry particulars in connection with the Persian mission, and in explanation of its transfer from the India Office to the Foreign Office in 1859; justification of such transfer on various grounds, Viscount Halifax 275 et seq.——The mission had worked well under the Foreign Office from 1835 till 1858, ib. 2725 2727——The transfer was approved of by Lord Russell and Lord Palmerston, ib. 2725. 2730. 2742——Importance of the whole of the direction of the whole diplomatic service being in one hand rather than in two, ib. 2730. 2741. 2764–2773. 2782–2785.

Consideration of the question of presents; conclusion that if necessary they would be given by direction of the Foreign Office, Viscount Halifax 2746–2750. 2786–2792——Opinion that it is not indispensable that persons of Indian experience should be employed,

2. Evidence opposed to the foregoing View, &c.—continued.

Viscount Halifax 2756–2758——Grounds for the opinion that the less the Government of India has to do beyond its own frontiers the better, ib. 2828. 2837–2854.

Tendency of Persia to come more and more within the pale of European influence, thus rendering it important that the Persian mission should be under the Foreign Office instead of the India Office, Earl of Clarendon 3956, 3957——Witness would gladly relieve the Foreign Office of the charge, but is clearly of opinion it would not be for the public good, ib. 3954. 3958——Conclusion that except as regards the Persian Gulf, India has little if anything to do with Persia, ib. 3960, 3961.

Approval of the Persian mission being under the Foreign Office, the India Office being duly consulted by the latter, Sir H. L. Bulwer 5137, 5138.

3. Proportion of the Correspondence with the Mission which relates to India :

Large proportion of the correspondence with the Persian mission which relates to India, Kaye 2060–2062. 2125. 2156–2158——Much larger proportion of the business at Teheran which relates to India than to Europe, Sir H. C. Rawlinson 2196, 2197. 2201, 2202——Explanation relative to the amount of India Office correspondence with reference to Persian affairs, ib. 4690–4691.

Small number of European questions arising at the Persian mission as compared with the number of questions affecting India, Lord Lawrence 5014–5016.

Doubt as to the great majority of the questions which arise having relation directly or indirectly to India, Viscount Halifax 2767, 2768. 2808–2812——Very small number of letters received at the Foreign Office relating to Persia, Earl of Clarendon 3958, 3959.

Return of the number of Letter received in each year from 1860 to 1869 inclusive, by the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs from the Secretary of State for India, on the subject of any communication from the British Minister in Persia, with a statement of the number of such letters in each year as related to the political interests of India and its relations to foreign states, App. 526–532.

4. Expense of the Mission; large Proportion borne by India, though the Administration rests with the Foreign Office :

Expenses of the mission, payment of 12,000 l. a year by India, Hammond 245–250——Large payment paid by the India Office towards the Persian mission as compared with the Imperial payment; complaint on this score, Kaye 2383–2091. 2128, 2129. 2135——Approval of payment by India of all the expenses in Persia, if the whole control be vested in the India Office, ib. 2129. 2135. 2169.

Information relative to the several diplomatic and consular officers now in Persia, and their superintendence and payment by the Imperial Government and the India Office respectively Sir H. C. Rawlinson 2181——Unfairness of the Indian Government paying nearly all the expenses in Persia whilst the Imperial Government has the control, ib. 2218.

Admission that it would be fairer if India did not pay more than half the expense of the mission, Viscount Halifax 2832–2836——Expediency in any case of England paying a fair proportion of the expenses of the mission, Lord Lawrence 5026, 5027.

Return of the expenditure for the Persian mission in each year from 1835 to 1869; total of 447,264 l., App. 421——Statement of the aggregate sums received and expended in each year since 1845 up to the present time, ib. 522——Estimate of the salaries, &c. required for 1870–71, as compared with the amount for 1869–70, ib. 406.

Statement specifying the names of the different officers employed under the directions of the Foreign Office in Persia, with the rates of salary assigned to each of them, and the allowances for office expenses in the case of consuls; also statement of the items of extraordinary expenditure which are allowed to be charged to the mission accounts, App. 521.

5. Other Details generally :

Explanation as to the time for which attachés or secretaries stay at the Persian mission; promotion whilst there, Hammond 105–109——Facility of learning the Persian language, ib. 108——Comparatively easy character of the Persian language further adverted to, ib. 229–232——Doubt as to there having been any formal complaint relative to the effect of the rate of exchange upon the salaries at Teheran, ib. 1721, 1722.

Recent depreciation in the currency in Persia, Sir H. C. Rawlinson 2219——Able men employed by Russia in Persia, ib. 2221, 2222——Payment of the Russian salaries at Teheran in gold, ib. 2220——Intrigues of Persia in India at the time of the last Persian war, ib. 2229–2231——Efficiency of an Affghan assistant, who was a refugee nobleman, attached at one time to the Teheran mission; pension awarded him, ib. 4684–4689.

Peru. See South America.

Pesth. Question considered whether a consulate should not be established at Pesth; the ambassador at Vienna can best give an opinion on this matter, Earl of Derby 2571–2579.

Plate (Embassies and Missions). Explanation relative to the provision of plate for certain embassies and missions; its cost in each case, Hammond 1413–1416.

Paper explanatory of the regulations as to the provision of plate, App. 438——Return, dated 28th June 1833, of services of plate provided at the public expense, which are transferred with the office on new appointments; showing the expense of each service at each place, ib.——Provision of services since the foregoing return at Constantinople and Berlin, ib.

Political Questions. Great care taken by the diplomatic servants not to put forward their own political opinions, Earl of Derby 2460, 2461.

Postage. Return showing for each of the years, from 1859–60 to 1867–68, the expenditure abroad in respect of postage, App. 435.

Press, The. Inexpediency of reliance upon the press as regards foreign political information, Hammond 538–547——Entire fallacy of the view that the public press is any substitute for the work of the Foreign Office abroad; frequent instances of "canards" being spread both by the home and foreign press, Morier 4375–4384——Expediency of the diplomatic agents keeping clear of the foreign press, save that they should correct positively false information, ib. 4396–4401.

Instance of a "canard" published in the "Times," for the correction of which an official representation was required, Morier 4614——Further statement as to the expediency of diplomatic servants abroad keeping clear of the foreign press ib.

Private Secretaries (Heads of Missions). Suggestions on the subject of the heads of large missions being provided with a private secretary; opportunity thereby of reducing the permanent staff, Sir H. G. Elliot 911–915. 950–953. 983–988. 1017. 1034–1038—— Exception taken to the suggestion by Sir Henry Elliot, relative to the employment of private secretaries by ambassadors and ministers, Earl of Derby 2586, 2587.

Proposal that every ambassador or minister be allowed to appoint a private secretary, to be paid by the public; important duties to be fulfilled by this officer, Christie 2649–2653——Value of a private secretary further adverted to, ib. 2990. 3003–3006——Suggestion that private secretaries be very much in the position of attachés, and be eligible for appointment as secretaries of embassy or legation, ib. 3005–3011.

Convenience of a private secretary who should take charge of the mission during the absence of the chief, instead of bringing consuls from out-ports to take temporary charge, Christie 3029–3042——Relief as regards the block in the service if junior secretaries were selected by ambassadors and ministers for private secretaries, ib. 2083–2085 ——Public work intended to be done by a private secretary, ib. 3187.

Advantage of the heads of missions being able to avail themselves of the services of any of their staff in the capacity of private secretary, Earl of Clarendon 3439——Exception taken to a proposition for giving ministers in South America a private secretary who might be sent to any consulate in the event of the death or absence of the consul, ib. 3952.

Proposal that a minister be allowed to have a private secretary, who should be paid by the minister, and should be eligible for admission to the service, Sir H. L. Bulwer 4865–4872——Further statement as to the advantage of ambassadors having a private secretary; practice in witness's case at Constantinople, ib. 5145–5147. 5222–5225—— Nature of the work performed by witness's private secretary at Constantinople, ib. 5221–5225.

Promotions and Appointments (Diplomatic Service):

I. As to the Block in the Service:

1. Causes and Character of the Stagnation or Block as regards Promotion; consequent Dissatisfaction in the Service.
2. Relief by restricting the Appointments in the Junior Grades.
3. Relief by appointing Secretaries and Attachés to Consular Posts.
4. Relief by appointment to other Branches of the Public Service.
5. Relief by facilitating Retirement.
6. Paper submitted by Mr. Morier containing Suggestions in Detail.

II. As to the System of Promotion and Appointment:

1. Responsibility of the Foreign Secretary; Importance of his complete Responsibility in the Matter.
2. Explanation and Approval of the System of Promotion by Seniority, subject to Exceptions.
3. Suggestions for a strict Adherence to Seniority up to the Grade of First Secretary.

II. As to the System of Promotion and Appointment—continued.

4. Objections to the Seniority System; Suggestions for much more frequent Selection by Merit.
5. Suggested Extension of Selection for the higher Posts.
6. Question of alternate Seniority and Selection.
7. Question of the Appointment of Outsiders.
8. Question of Reports by Heads of Missions before Promotion of their Subordinates.

I. As to the Block in the Service:

1. Causes and Character of the Stagnation or Block as regards Promotion; consequent Dissatisfaction in the Service:

Improved position of the unpaid attachés since 1861, they being now promoted to third secretaries after four years' service, Hammond 5. 13–16——Slowness of promotion, ib. 19——Good grounds for the complaint of the diplomatic servants as to the slowness of promotion, ib. 137–144—— Increased block in the service through there being five fewer missions than formerly, ib. 141. 160——Numerous body of juniors whilst there is but a small body of seniors, ib. 160.

Further reference to the more limited field of promotion since the abolition of five missions and secretaryships, Hammond 295 ——Difficulty of calculating the progress of promotion of secretaries in the present state of the service, ib. 358–361.

More close character of the service than in former years, the effect being that promotion is much slower, Sir H. G. Elliot 831–835——Very decided block in the service, the discontent in consequence being very undesirable, ib. 867–871. 1080–1083.

Impression that the diplomatic service is looked upon as a profession more than it used to be, Hammond 1583, 1584——Conclusion that the present state of the service does not constitute any new grievance as regards promotion, so far as concerns the junior members, ib. 1751——Denial that there is stagnation in the service, ib. 1897.

Dissent from the view that there is any peculiar stagnation in the service requiring urgent remedy, Earl of Derby 2276–2278. 2283. 2335–2339——Decided stagnation in the service, Earl of Clarendon 3436, 3437. 3456–3459.

Witness has decided upon leaving the service on account of the slowness of promotion, Hon. T. J. H. Thurlow 3483–3491. 3778——There is universal dissatisfaction in the service on account of the present block, and the absence of opportunities of distinction, ib. 3492–3497——Stagnancy of the service adverted to as attributable chiefly to the reduction in the number of missions, whilst there has been no corresponding reduction in the number of subordinates, ib. 3498–3500. 3851–3853.

Dissent from the view that the prospects of promotion are no worse than in former years, Hon. T. J. H. Thurlow 3593–3597. 3851–3853——Evil effect of the present discontent in the service, this being on the increase, ib. 3801——Less willingness of the attachés to work owing to the badness of their prospects, ib. 3801. 3805–3807——Contemplated attainment of the rank of first secretary after fifteen years' service, and of the rank of minister in about twenty years, ib. 3854, 3855.

Entire dissent from the view that able and hard-working men are discouraged from serving the public under the present system, Earl of Clarendon 3932——Dissent from the opinion of Mr. Hammond that the block in the service is not greater than in former years, ib. 3962——The stagnancy, however, is hardly so great as when an unlimited number of attachés used to be appointed, ib.——Attainment of the rank of first secretary in an average period of less than fifteen or twenty years, ib. 3972.

Great dissatisfaction in the junior branches of the service on account of the poor prospects of promotion, Mitford 3987. 3993——Probability of witness being sixty years of age by the time he is likely to arrive at the head of a mission, ib. 3988–3992——Impression that the block in the service arises more from the abolition of missions than from the pressure on the Secretary of State for attachéships, ib. 4079–4081.

Expectation that the better men will leave the service unless something be done to expedite promotions, Morier 4493–4495. 4510.

Doubt as to there being now any greater slowness of promotion than in former years, save that the cleverer men do not now get on so quickly, Sir H. L. Bulwer 4835. 4920–4926——Tendency to a block in the service through young men making it more of a profession than in former years; inexpediency of this change, ib. 4838–4841. 4927–4929.

Great discouragement among the junior diplomatic servants on account of the bad prospect of promotion, Hon. E. R. Lytton 5031–5035. 5084–5091——Danger of some very efficient men leaving the service, ib. 5090, 5091.

Respects in which the block in the service has caused more dissatisfaction in recent years; removal of much of the evil if seniority were not adhered to, Sir H. L. Bulwer

I. As to the Block in the Service—continued.

1. Causes and Character of the Stagnation, &c.—continued.

5229–5234——Very rare instances of persons now entering the service, save as a permanent career, Hon. E. R. Lytton 5245——Evil effect of the discouragement in the service, though under any system a certain amount of disappointment is unavoidable, ib. 5256–5259.

Statement explanatory of the proportion between heads of embassies and missions, and second and third secretaries and attachés, in the years 1861 and 1870, App. 423.

2. Relief by restricting the Appointments in the Junior Grades:

Relief to be given by staying the appointment of attachés for some time, Earl of Malmesbury 703, 704. 815–817——Prevention of blocks in the service by keeping the junior staff as low as possible, Sir H. G. Elliot 857. 1063–1066——Importance, as regards promotion, of the number of junior diplomatic servants being kept as limited as possible, ib. 1295–1297.

Necessity of retaining the present number of juniors in the service, Hammond 1897.

Means of remedying any block in the service by keeping down the number of new appointments, Earl of Derby 2283, 2284—— Small number of attachés appointed by witness as compared with the vacancies during his tenure of office, ib. 2535.

Advantage of keeping as low as possible the number of those who enter the service with the view of making it a profession, Sir H. L. Bulwer 5158——Approval of certain modes suggested for regulating the proportion of juniors with reference to the number of upper posts to be filled, Hon. E. R. Lytton 5260–5268.

3. Relief by appointing Secretaries and Attachés to Consular Posts:

Obstacle to the employment of junior diplomatic servants at Warsaw, and other consular posts, Hammond 225, 226——Natural dissatisfaction in the consular body if diplomatic servants were appointed to the large consulates, ib. 258–264——Objection to junior diplomatic officers being drafted into the consular service, Earl of Clarendon 3963, 3694.

Suggestion that the block in the service might be relieved by appointing some of the secretaries and attachés to consular mission; doubt as to this being a just grievance to the vice-consuls, Earl of Malmesbury 702, 703. 760–764. 796, 797. 800–814——Relief to the service by appointing some men to consular posts, or by retiring them altogether, Sir H. G. Elliot 1063–1072—— Examination in further explanation and defence of the proposition for an increased appointment of diplomatic servants to consular posts; statement hereon as to outsiders being already appointed to consulships, ib. 1293, 1294. 1299–1326 —— Groundlessness of the apprehension that diplomatic servants in certain consular posts would be prone to meddling and intervention, Morier 4393–4395.

4. Relief by Appointment to other Branches of the Public Service:

Relief as regards the present block by drafting first and second secretaries to appointments in other branches of the public service; reference hereon to the course pursued in India on the abolition of the Indian navy and police, Hon. T. J. H. Thurlow 3516–3519.

5. Relief by facilitating Retirement:

There might be a bonus for retirement, Hon. T. J. H. Thurlow 3519——Probability of many men being induced to retire if a liberal gratuity were given, Mitford 4195–4198 ——Suggestion that one made of moving the block is by offering gratuities to men to leave the service; objection to which this course is open, Morier 4280–4282. 4806—— Apprehension lest the offer of gratuities would induce the good men to leave the service, whilst the inefficient would remain, ib. 4281, 4282. 4306——Improvement if under a system of promotion by merit the less efficient men were induced to leave the service, ib. 4488–4491.

Proposed option to those not passing the examination either to remain in their present position, or to leave the service with a fair compensation, Morier 4495–4512—— Failing promotion after a certain length of service there might be the option of retiring on a suitable pension, Sir H. L. Bulwer 4888.

Difficulty in inducing men to retire who have reached the higher posts, Hon. E. R. Lytton 5032, 5033——Relief if some of the junior officers were induced to retire, ib. 5034.

Suggestions relative to the granting of retiring allowances to men not promoted beyond a certain grade after a certain length of service, Sir H. L. Bulwer 5123-5127. 5161—— Danger of the best men retiring if a gratuity were offered for retirement after so many years service; probable retirement even without compensation, Hon. E. R. Lytton 5255. 5258.

I. As to the Block in the Service—continued.

6. Paper submitted by Mr. Morier containing Suggestions in Detail:

Memorandum submitted by Mr. Morier as to the means of removing the present block in the service, and as to the prevention of a similar block in future, App. 535, 536.

II. As to the System of Promotion and Appointment:

1. Responsibility of the Foreign Secretary; Importance of his complete Responsibility in the Matter:

Necessity of full power in the Secretary of State to depart from the practice of seniority; several instances of ministers and others being imported from the consular service, Hammond 44-47. 80-92. 112-116——Explanation that witness has nothing to do with any diplomatic appointments, these all resting with the Secretary of State, ib. 74. 91, 92——Control of witness, when Foreign Secretary, over all the promotions and foreign appointments, Earl of Malmesbury 1179, 1180.

Importance of making the Foreign Secretary wholly responsible for the working of the service, Morier 4285-4281——Expediency of full discretion in the Secretary of State to appoint "outsiders" as ministers at foreign courts, ib. 4585.

Importance of full discretion in the Secretary of State to depart from the system of promotion by seniority, Sir H. L. Bulwer 4858-4862——Expediency of a concentration of responsibility in the Foreign Secretary and ambassadors for all appointments and promotions, ib. 4887-4890. 4930, 4931.

Expediency of a concentration of responsbility in the Secretary of State in respect not only of promotions in the service, but of the appointment of outsiders to the higher posts, Hon. E. R. Lytton 5036-5038. 5057. 5084-5088. 5108, 5109. 5279, 5280——Importance of unlimited freedom in the executive as to appointments and promotions, ib. 5253. 5279, 5280.

2. Explanation and Approval of the System of Promotion by Seniority, subject to Exceptions:

Promotion of the attachés and secretaries by seniority, as a rule, but not compulsorily, Hammond 17, 18——Fair expectation of the secretaries that they may ultimately become ministers according to seniority, ib. 44, 45——Very bad prospects of young men entering the diplomatic service; discouragement if consular servants or others were largely brought in to fill vacancies in the higher posts, ib. 86-90. 103. 112-116.

Absence of complaints of efficiency under the system of promotion of attachés and secretaries by seniority; departure from this system if efficiency were not secured, Hammond 322-328. 375-385——Due consideration of all cases of promotion in the Foreign Office by the Under Secretaries of State before any recommendation is made; great difficulty in departing from the seniority rule, though this is sometimes done, ib. 1646-1650.

Approval of the practice of promotion by seniority, concurrently with a severe examination so as to secure efficiency, Earl of Clarendon 3456——Explanation that there is no absolute rule as to the appointment of the senior secretary of embassy to a vacant mission, ib. 3472——When necessary, witness hesitates not to select, ib.——Necessity of exceptions to the rule of seniority, ib. 3864.

3. Suggestions for a strict Adherence to Seniority up to the Grade of First Secretary:

Evidence in favour of routine promotion up to the rank of first secretary, after which it should be by merit, Hon. T. J. H. Thurlow 3598-3612. 3755, 3756——Inexpediency of too much zeal in the junior staff, as a means of hastening promotion, ib. 3600. 3604. 3610——Efficiency of the service under a close system, ib. 3621.

4. Objections to the Seniority System; Suggestions for much more frequent Selection by Merit:

Undue extent to which the seniority system has been carried, Sir H. G. Elliot 869. 1026-1029——Unfairness of the system of promotion by seniority as offering no encouragement to zeal and efficiency, Mitford 3994-3996——Further statement that promotion by seniority should be much more frequently departed from in the diplomatic service, ib. 4046-4050. 4139-4151——Dissent from the view that if there were promotion by selection, each junior would be always trying to distinguish himself unduly, ib. 4150.

Opinion that promotion in the diplomatic service should depend entirely upon merit, Sir H. D. Wolff 4223-4225——Objection to any certainty of promotion beyond the rank of envoy extraordinary, ib. 4225. 4258.

Decided opinion that promotion by merit is the only proper course; there need be no fears of favouritism if the Secretary of State be completely and solely responsible, Morier 4279. 4282-4287——Inexpediency of the system of seniority; difficulty on account of the

the claim to promotion involved therein, Morier 4279. 4286. 4306——Great difficulty of the question of promotion in the diplomatic service, the service not being sufficiently numerous to be treated as a profession, ib. 4328——Fair right of those who have entered the service since 1861 to look forward to the system of seniority up to the grade of first secretary of legation, ib. 4492. 4586, 4587——Proposal that, the block being once removed, promotion should be in future by merit, ib. 4513, 4514. 4520.

Suggestions on the score of promotion if there be an amalgamation of services; contemplated departure from the seniority system, Labouchere 4748.

Fair estimate generally taken in the service of the capabilities of each man, Sir H. L. Bulwer 4836, 4837. 4924–4926——Inexpediency of treating diplomacy as an exclusive profession, ib. 4857–4860——Importance of the right of selection being much more largely exercised, ib. 5122, 5123——Difficulty of ascertaining whether any man is fully competent until he has arrived at the post of secretary of legation, ib. 5162–5167 —— Very exceptional departures from the rule of promotion by seniority, so that men become heads of missions without having shown any special fitness or superior ability, ib. 5175, 5176.

Injurious effect of a strict seniority system, it being far preferable that the Secretary of State should make selections on his own responsibility, Hon E. R. Lytton 5036–5038. 5057. 5084–5088. 5108, 5109. 5279, 5280——Illustration of the disadvantageous effect of seniority, ib. 5057.

5. Suggested Extension of Selection for the Higher Posts:

Opinion that promotion should be by selection, with due regard to seniority; expediency of selection for the higher posts more especially, Earl of Derby 2279–2281. 2340–2346—— Decided objection to a fixed rule of seniority beyond a certain rank, Sir H. L. Bulwer 4888, 4889.

6. Question of alternate Seniority and Selection:

Difficulty in working a system of alternate seniority and selection, Mitford 4191–4194.

7. Question of the Appointment of Outsiders:

Approval of the occasional appointment of outsiders to heads of missions, Hammond 322–328. 375–385. 1532–1534.

Expediency of treating the diplomatic service as a profession, and not importing outsiders, Earl of Malmesbury 707–719——Further disapproval of the appointment of outsiders as heads of missions, as checking promotion in the service, in which there are at all times perfectly efficient men for those posts, ib. 1185–1198.

Witness entered the diplomatic service as secretary of legation, having previously been consul in the Mosquito country, Christie 2610. 2616, 2617——Several precedents for the direct appointment of witness to the office of secretary of legation, ib. 2616–2623 ——Introduction of witness into the service by Lord Palmerston, to whom he had been well known in the House of Commons, ib. 3188.

Proposed that no outsider be brought in, Hon. T. J. H. Thurlow 3504, 3505. 3583, 3584—— Argument that as a general rule ambassadors and ministers should be selected from the secretaries of embassy and legation, and that outsiders should not be brought in, ib. 3602–3634. 3786–3803——Removal of the obstacle to bringing outsiders into the service, if the seniority system is got rid of, Morier 4328. 4391, 4392.

Approval of the occasional appointment of outsiders to the higher posts, Earl of Derby 2282. 2359, 2360——Expediency of the appointment of outsiders being the exception to the rule, ib. 2490——Advantage of outsiders being sometimes brought in as secretaries of legation or embassy, Christie 3011.

8. Question of Reports by Heads of Mission before Promotion of their Subordinates:

Disapproval of confidential reports from the heads of the missions as to the conduct of their subordinates, with reference to the question of promotion; facilities for information otherwise, Hammond 31–43. 386–394——Opinion adverse to a system of reports by heads of missions relative to the conduct of the staff, and the special fitness of any number for promotion, Earl of Clarendon 3465, 3466.

Concurrence in the view that upon the question of removing or promoting any junior it is desirable that the opinion of the head of the mission should be taken, Earl of Derby 2345–2349——Impression that heads of missions sometimes testify to the Foreign Office, relative to zeal and industry in the juniors at the missions, ib. 2457–2459——Question whether heads of missions should not have a voice in the selection of attachés under them, and should not be referred to as to their promotion, Earl of Derby 2536-2542. 2544. 2559.

Suggestion that the head of the mission should report upon the capacity evinced by the secretary, Sir H. L. Bulwer 4884, 4885——Advantage of the heads of missions assisting the Secretary of State with their opinion previously to the promotion of any secretary to be secretary of legation, ib. 5161-5171. 5175, 5176. 5231-5234.

Property Qualification. Conclusion as to the necessity of a property qualification in young men entering the diplomatic service, Hammond 184-187——Requirement of a property or social qualification in most of the foreign services, ib. 295.

Every one entering the service should have about 500 l. a year of his own, Sir H. G. Elliot 1004——Fewer men of good expectations in the service than in former years, ib. 1249-1253.

Advantage if there were a money qualification of the attachés in the English as in the French service, Hon. T. J. H. Thurlow 3556-3559, 3656-3661. 3676-3690——Importance of a property qualification for the service, though witness disapproves of an absolute rule on the subject, Earl of Clarendon 3942, 3943.

Statement of the property qualifications for appointments in the diplomatic service of certain foreign countries, App. 422, 423.

Qualifications (Diplomatic Service). See Examinations. Nominations. Property Qualification. University Degrees.

Queen's Messengers:

Important reduction effected by witness in the cost of messengers when the telegraph came into operation, Earl of Malmesbury 748. 784-788.

Recent reduction of the number of Queen's messengers from seventeen to fifteen; intention to reduce the number to twelve, as opportunity offers, Hammond 1437-1440. 1470——Information relative to the messengers' journeys and the reduction therein; inexpediency of further reductions, ib. 1440-1454. 1471-1478——Explanation as to there being a weekly messenger to Berlin; necessity of this arrangement, ib. 1445-1453. 1476——Restriction upon the amount of luggage taken by messengers, with reference more especially to the parcels conveyed for the diplomatic servents, ib. 1454-1463——Statement to the effect that the remuneration of the foreign service messengers is none too large, ib. 1464-1469. 1473, 1474.

Particulars relative to the character of the despatches carried by the Queen's messengers, Hammond 1753-1758——Exceptions taken to the employment of a lower class of persons as messengers, though this may be the practice of foreign governments, ib. 1765, 1766——Further details relative to the journeys of the foreign messengers; obstacles to any curtailment in order to curtail the staff, ib. 1808-1812. 1822-1837——Doubt as to the expediency of the further reduction proposed in the staff of Queen's messengers; difficulty in supplying their place in time of emergency. ib. 1832-1837. 1848-1857.

Advantage if there were a periodical messenger to Madrid, the post being very insecure, Hammond 1826-1828. 1892, 1893——Retirement of the foreign messengers on the basis of 525 l. a year, ib. 1838. 1847——Grounds for objecting to the employment of home service messengers on foreign service, ib. 1839-1846. 1864-1867——Examination of the foreign messengers in French, German, or Italian, ib. 1868-1870.

Objections to the presentsystem of Foreign Office messengers; unduly high social position whence they are taken, Labouchere 4752-4757. 4810-4812——Equal efficiency of Foreign Office messengers if taken from a somewhat lower class, Sir H. L. Bulwer 4916, 4917.

Convenience

Convenience in retaining a full supply of Queen's messengers, though there may not be full work for them in time of peace, Earl of Derby 2583——Advantage of the present trained staff of messengers as compared with Foreign Office clerks employed as messengers on special occasions, ib. 2584, 2585, 2605–2608.

Importance of the Queen's messengers being persons of good social position, and of their pay being liberal, Hon. T. J. H. Thurlow 3580–3582. 3725–3743——Reference to the practice as to the conveyance of despatches, Blue Books, &c. by the Foreign Office messengers, ib. 3729–3738. 3776, 3777.

Letter from Earl Russell to the Treasury, dated 25th June 1863, requesting authority for an increase in the number of foreign service messengers from fifteen to seventeen, App. 515.

Circular, dated 31st December 1869, together with regulations relative to the transmission of correspondence, &c. by Queen's messengers, App. 466–471.

R.

Rank of Missions. Importance of English diplomatists being in the same general position, and upon the same footing as those of other great European powers, Earl of Derby 2296——Importance in Europe of the rank of English diplomatists being equal to that of foreign diplomatists; instance of this in witness's experience at Berne, Christie 2629. 3001——Expediency of England being represented by agents of the same rank as other powers, Morier 4358–4360——Sufficiency of chargés d'affaires instead of ambassadors at many courts, though, as a general rule, the English representative should not be of lower grade than those of other countries, ib. 4454–4561.——See also Ambassadors.

Rawlinson, Major General Sir Henry Creswicke, K.C.B. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Experience of witness in the diplomatic and consular services in Turkey, Arabia, Persia, and Affghanistan, 2179, 2180 —— Information relative to the several diplomatic and consular officers now in Persia, and their superintendence and payment by the Imperial Government and the India Office respectively, 2181——Opinion that the appointments in Persia should be filled by officers of the Indian service, 2182. 2184. 2200. 2203, 2204——Essentially oriental and despotic character of the Court of Teheran; great importance of the personal influence of the diplomatic representative, and of his being well conversant with the language and manners of the country, 2185–2187. 2232–2241.

Resignation by witness of his appointment as minister at Teheran in 1860, upon the transfer of the mission from the India Office to the Foreign Office, 2188——Explanation in detail as to the reasons for witness's objection to be placed under the Foreign Office; reasons submitted also for a re-transfer of the mission to the Secretary of State for India, 2188 et seq.——Objection amongst other things to the abolition by the Foreign Office of the practice of making presents to the Shah, 2190–2195. 2251–2254.

Much larger portion of the business at Teheran which relates to India than to Europe, 2196, 2197. 2201, 2202——Absence of distinction in Persia between an envoy from the India Office and from the Foreign Office, 2198, 2199——Doubt as to the expediency of placing the consulates in Persia under the India Office, 2205–2211——Conduct by the Indian Government of all the military operations against Persia, 2212, 2213——Explanation relative to the conduct and termination of the last Persian war; services rendered by an Indian officer when peace was being negotiated, 2214–2217.

Unfairness of the Indian Government paying nearly all the expenses in Persia whilst the Imperial Government has the control, 2218——Recent depreciation in the currency in Persia, 2219——Payment of the Russian salaries at Teheran in gold, 2220——Able men employed by Russia in Persia, 2221, 2222——Special importance, as regards India, of the progress of Russia in Central India, 2223–2228——Intrigues of Persia in India at the time of the last Persian war, 2229–2231.

Excellent relations which existed between witness and the Shah; advantage of witness's knowledge of the language and customs of the country, 2232–2241. 2247–2250——Further explanation relative to witness's objection to serve under the Foreign Office; letter read, in which he resigned his appointment, dated Teheran, 20th February 1860; 2241–2246.

[Second Examination.]—Further conclusion as to the tendency of Russian conquest in Central Asia being an argument in favour of our diplomatic relations with Persia being carried on through India, 4682——Groundlessness of the apprehension that a transfer of the Persian mission to the India Office would give umbrage to the Shah, 4684——Efficiency of an Affghan assistant, who was a refugee nobleman, attached at one time to the Teheran mission; pension awarded him, 4684–4689——Explanation relative to the amount of India Office correspondence with reference to Persian affairs, 4690, 4691.

Re-appointment of Committee. Recommended re-appointment of the Committee in the next Session of Parliament, Rep. iii.

Reduction of Staff. See Staff.

Re-employment. Expediency of full discretion in the Secretary of State as to not re-employing any officer who for a time has been unemployed, Earl of Derby 2511–2513.

Retirement of witness on a pension, he being liable to re-employment, Christie 2613–2615——Personal explanation, to the effect that witness has been retired and pensioned against his will, and has never been offered re-employment, though his services have been entirely approved of by the Government, ib. 2680–2688.

Further statement as to witness not having been re-employed, though he has made application on the subject to the successors of Lord Russell at the Foreign Office, Christie 2966——Non-complaint by witness in regard to Lord Clarendon or Lord Derby not having employed him, ib.

Full sense of personal responsibility upon which witness has declined to re-employ ministers on the pension list, Earl of Clarendon 3473.

Removal or Transfer of Staff:

1. Explanation and Approval generally of the practice of frequent Removal from Post to Post.
2. Exceptions taken to the practice of Removal, as being too frequent.
3. Expense of Removal.

1. Explanation and Approval generally of the practice of frequent Removal from Post to Post:

Statement in approval of the rule by which the junior diplomatic servants do not remain more than two years in the same place, Hammond 69–74——Opinion that the junior diplomatic servants should begin their career at small missions, and should work upwards, ib. 74——Further statement in defence of the system of frequent transfers of attachés and secretaries from one post to another, ib. 403–414——Disapproval generally of permanent officers at the head of foreign missions. ib. 502, 503.

Disadvantage in ministers remaining a long time at the same posts, Earl of Malmesbury 779——Advantage of the secretaries of legation being frequently changed from one mission to another, Sir H. G. Elliot 920, 921——Explanation as to a period of two years being the time fixed for juniors to remain at any post, Hammond 1772–1774.

Evidence opposed to the local permanence of secretaries of legation, in lieu of the system of transfer every two years or so, Earl of Derby 2350–2367——Explanation that second and third secretaries are not necessarily removed at the end of two years, ib. 2479——Explanation as to some officers having served for many years in America, Persia, and other distant places; claim in such case to removal to more eligible posts nearer home, ib. 2507–2510——Exceptional instances in which it might be well to promote an attaché or secretary at any post, and to keep him there, instead of removing him, ib. 2533. 2544, 2545.

Further consideration of the rule and practice as to the removal of attachés and secretaries, Earl of Derby 2555–2558. 2570——Disadvantage as well as advantage if removal did not take place till after three years, ib. 2557, 2558.

Absence of any serious grievance to attachés by reason of their frequent removal, this practice being beneficial to the service, Hon. T. J. H. Thurlow 3744–3747. 3822, 3823——Approval of transfer from one post to another every two or three years, Earl of Clarendon 3931——Satisfaction expressed with the transfer of under secretaries, but not very frequently, Mitford 4177–4181——Approval of frequent changes of juniors from one post to another, Sir H. D. Wolff 4250–4252.

Provision for the transfer of the junior members from one post to another, and for payment of their expenses of removal, App. 413.

2. Exceptions taken to the practice of Removal, as being too frequent:

Inexpediency of frequent changes or removals from one diplomatic post to another; disapproval of any rule on this subject, Morier 4310–4313——Importance of the experience gained by long residence, frequent transfer being undesirable, ib. 4483–4487.

Decided objection to a frequent transference of attachés and secretaries from one mission to another, Sir H. L. Bulwer 4896–4900. 4907——A man is thus made useful nowhere under the pretext of being made useful everywhere, ib. 4896–4899. 4907.

Disadvantage of the frequent removal of the junior officers from one post to another, Hon. E. R. Lytton 5039–5041——Greater usefulness of the members of a mission if left a longer time at the same posts, ib. 5044–5048. 5117–5119——Expediency of full discretion in the Secretary of State as to the removal or transfer of officers, ib. 5100–5102.

Badness of the rule of frequent transfer from post to post, it being desirable that the Secretary Removal or Transfer of Staff—continued.

2. Exceptions taken to the practice of Removal, as being too frequent—continued.

Secretary of State should exercise full discretion in the matter, Sir H. L. Bulwer 5129, 5130——Further objection to the system of frequent transfer of secretaries and attachés, as very injurious to the service, and very costly and inconvenient to the staff, Hon. E. R. Lytton 5241. 5249.

3. Expense of Removal:

The expenses of removal are often very heavy, Earl of Derby 2351. 2363——Heavy expense of frequent removal in the case of married men, Hon. T. J. H. Thurlow 3744. 3836; Mitford 4177——Disadvantage of the expense entailed by frequent removal, Sir H. L. Bulwer 4896.

Circular, dated 31st July 1867, respecting the allowance of expense of journeys on removal of junior members to a new post, App. 452.

Reports:

1. Regulations as to Reports by Secretaries of Legation; great Value attached to these Reports.
2. How far Supervision is or should be exercised by Heads of Missions.
3. Little if any part taken by the Second Secretaries as regards the Secretaries' Reports.
4. Practice as to Reports by the Second Secretaries for the Heads of Missions.

1. Regulations as to Reports by Secretaries of Legation; great Value attached to these Reports:

Important and onerous work performed by the secretaries of legation in the preparation of reports to the Foreign Secretary on the commerce, &c. of the countries in which they are placed; valuable information thus acquired by the Foreign Office, Hammond 35-37——Rule laid down by Lord Clarendon that each secretary of legation shall make two reports in the year, ib. 37——Origin of the system of reports by the secretaries of legation further adverted to; increased utilisation thereby of the services of these officers, ib. 364-368——Valuable character of the secretaries' reports, Earl of Derby 2330. 2394-2405.

Great satisfaction expressed with the industrial and commercial reports made by the secretaries of legation, Earl of Clarendon 3439-3442——Two-fold object of the secretaries' reports upon trade and commerce, namely, the improvement of the secretaries, and the acquisition of useful information, ib. 3873——Very valuable information in some of these reports, ib. 3873. 3875.

Statement as to much incidental expense being necessarily incurred by the diplomatic servants in connection with the reports drawn up for the Foreign Office, such as the Land Tenure Report, Morier 4343-4345——Decided approval of the system of reports, ib. 4346——Greatly increased labour of the diplomatic servants by reason of the reports now required of them, ib. 4479——Advantage if these reports were taken into consideration so as to effect promotion, ib. 4480-4482——Necessity of secretaries of legation travelling when they have reports to make, ib. 4588, 4589.

Circular, dated 10th September 1864, enjoining regularity in preparation of commercial reports by secretaries of embassy and legation, App. 446.

2. How far Supervision is or should be exercised by Heads of Missions:

Belief that the reports always come through the heads of missions, Hammond 369-371——Further explanations relative to the system of reports by the secretaries of legation, more especially as regards the question of supervision of such reports by the heads of the missions, ib. 548-566.

Mistake involved in the system of reports by secretaries of legation as tending to render them independent of the ministers, Christie 2717. 2722——Statement as to witness, when at Rio, having deemed it his duty to make suggestions on the subject of reports by the secretary of legation, ib. 2942, 2943. 2945——Argument in further support of the conclusion that the reports by secretaries should be made under the supervision and with the active assistance of the heads of missions, ib. 2944-2950.

Conclusion that the heads of missions exercise some supervision over the reports, Earl of Clarendon 3874, 3875.

3. Little if any part taken by the Second Secretaries as regards the Secretaries' Reports:

It is no part of the official duty of the second secretary to collect information for the secretaries' reports, Hammond 72, 73——The juniors have no official duty in respect of reports, ib. 72-74——Expediency of the reports being the work of the first secretaries, rather than the joint productions of the first and second secretaries, ib. 372-377——

Reports—continued.

3. Little if any part taken by the Second Secretaries, &c.—continued.

Further statement as to the second secretary not being required to assist in the preparation of reports, Hammond 1529–1531.

Assistance doubtless given by the second or third secretaries in the preparation of the reports, if asked to do so by the head of the mission, Earl of Clarendon 3876, 3877.

4. Practice as to Reports by the Second Secretaries for the Heads of Missions:

Valuable reports prepared by the second secretaries for the use of the ministers under whom they are employed, Hammond 37, 38——Practice as to secretaries' reports further adverted to; instances of reports by second secretaries, ib. 1580–1582.

Circular of Earl Russell, dated 23rd May 1864, instructing junior members of missions to draw up reports on commerce, &c., for information of heads of missions, App. 445, 446——Further circular, dated 21st June 1864, correcting misapprehension as to reports of junior members being sent home, ib. 446.

Residences (Heads of Missions). Great advantage if an official residence, furnished, were provided at every mission, Christie 2644-2646.——See also Embassy Houses.

Responsibility. Advantage of complete responsibility in the Secretary of State for every nomination and appointment in the diplomatic service, Earl of Clarendon 3455——Importance of making the Foreign Secretary wholly responsible for the working of the service, Morier 4285–4311.

Advantage of a concentration of responsibility in the Foreign Secretary and ambassadors for all appointments and promotions, Sir H. L. Bulwer 4887-4890. 4930, 4931——Expediency of a concentration of responsibility in the Secretary of State in respect not only of promotions in the service, but of the appointment of outsiders to the higher posts, Hon. E. R. Lytton 5036–5038. 5057. 5084-5088. 5108, 5109. 5279, 5280——Evil effect of the system of not making our ministers sufficiently responsible, Sir H. L. Bulwer 5172.

Retirement. Objection to a limit of age for leaving the diplomatic service; large expense for pensions if there were compulsory retirement at the age of sixty-five, Hammond 214–217——Concurrence in the objection to any fixed limit of age for the retirement of ministers, Earl of Malmesbury 705, 706; Christie 3101, 3102; Sir H. L. Bulwer 4856.

Contemplated power in the Secretary of State to require retirement at an earlier age, Hon. T. J. H. Thurlow 3506-3515. 3635-3642——There might be a bonus for retirement, ib. 3519——Probability of many men being induced to retire if a liberal gratuity were given, Mitford 4195–4198.

Suggestion that one mode of moving the block is by offering gratuities to men to leave the service; objection to which this course is open, Morier 4280-4282. 4286——Apprehension lest the offer of gratuities would induce the good men to leave the service, whilst the inefficient would remain, ib. 4281, 4282. 4306——Improvement if under a system of promotion by merit, the less efficient men were induced to leave the service, ib. 4488–4491——Proposed option to those not passing the examination, either to remain in their present position or to leave the service with a fair compensation, ib. 4495–4512.

Suggestions relative to the granting of retiring allowances to men not promoted beyond a certain grade, after a certain length of service, Sir H. L. Bulwer 4888. 5123–5127. 5161——Difficulty as to facilitating retirement on the ground of health, ib. 5124——Doubt as to there being incompetent men at any posts whom the Foreign Secretary should remove altogether from the service, ib. 5148–5151.

Difficulty in inducing men to retire who have reached the higher posts, Hon. E. R. Lytton 5032, 5033——Relief if some of the junior officers were induced to retire, ib. 5034——Danger of the best men retiring if a gratuity were offered for retirement after so many years' service; probable retirements even without compensation, ib. 5255–5258.

without any assistant, Hammond 1787–1789——Circumstance of Mr. Russell having, strictly, no official character at Rome, ib. 1791, 1792.

Doubt as to the expediency of direct official communication with the Court at Rome, Earl of Derby 2437–2440——Efficiency of Mr. Odo Russell, ib. 2437.

Grounds for the conclusion that it is very desirable that we should have a regularly accredited representative at the Court of Rome, Earl of Clarendon 3902, 3903——Inexpediency of the Eglinton clause, prohibiting the Pope from sending an ecclesiastic to this country as his representative, ib. 3903–3905.

Estimate of the salary, &c. required for 1870–71, as compared with the amount for 1869–70, App. 406.

Rules and Regulations. The fewer rules generally the better, Morier 4310, 4311——Inexpediency of the Secretary of State being bound by any fixed rules, either as to admissions or promotion, Hon. E. R. Lytton 5055–5057.

Regulations for the diplomatic service, as revised and confirmed 16th June 1866, App. 449–452——Regulations for the service, as revised and confirmed by the Earl of Clarendon, dated 23rd April 1869, ib. 411–414.

Russell, Odo. See Rome.

Russia. Conduct of almost all the diplomacy of Russia in the French language, Hammond 134——Importance attached to the very liberal expenditure by the Russian diplomatists, Hon. T. J. H. Thurlow 3677–3679. 3690–3697.

Statement of the salaries of the heads of missions in the Russian service, App. 418.

Rustchuk. Importance of the consular establishment at Rustchuk on political grounds, Sir H. G. Elliot 1347.

St. Petersburg. Doubt as to there being now too many hands at the embassy at St. Petersburg, Sir H. G. Elliot 858–862.

Grounds for the conclusion that the staff of St. Petersburg embassy may well be reduced, Labouchere 4626–4631. 4635–4643——Statement as to there being no necessity for the staff to live in an expensive way, or to go much into society, ib. 4632–4634.

Further statement on the subject of the limited amount of work devolving on the embassy, Labouchere 4764–4774. 4821——Practice as to entertainments on the part of the embassy further adverted to, ib. 4801–4807.

Return showing the staff, and the salaries and allowances, for the year ended 31st March 1869, App. 472——Estimate of the salaries, &c., required for 1870–71, as compared with the amount for 1869–70, ib. 406.

Salaries:

2. Comparative Salaries in the English and in Foreign Diplomatic Services.
3. Great Increase in the Cost of Living, the Salaries being thus rendered Less Sufficient.
4. Cost of Representation or Entertainments, as affecting the Question of Salary; Importance of such Entertainments.
5. Various Suggestions for an Increase or Revision of Salaries.

1. Information Relative to the Present Salaries; their Inadequacy:

Arrangement as to the attachés entering on salaries after four years' service, Hammond 5. 13–16. 355–358——Varying salaries of the second secretaries, the third secretaries having a fixed salary of 150 l. a year, ib. 29–33——Reference to certain returns relative to salaries in the diplomatic service, and explanations thereon, ib. 62–68——Hardship in the third secretaries necessarily spending a much larger sum than their salaries, ib. 145——Belief that none of our ministers can live upon what they receive from the public, ib. 454.

Non-complaint as to the salaries of heads of missions, Sir H. G. Elliot 872. 875——Witness looks upon the service as a ruinous one in point of money, Hammond 1609——Heavy work of some of the foreign ministers, the pay not having increased in proportion to the work, ib. 1574–1579.

Conclusion that the salaries of the diplomatic servants, whether in the higher or lower grades, do not admit of reduction, but rather in some cases call for increase, Christie 3012–3018——Good ground for the dissatisfaction as regards pay, ib. 3194.

1. Information relative to the Present Salaries; their Inadequacy—continued.

Well-grounded dissatisfaction in the junior grades as to the inadequacy of the salaries, Earl of Clarendon 3423, 3424——The salaries of the heads of missions have mostly remained stationary, whilst the cost of living has greatly increased, ib. 3444. 3446——Circumstance of there being no difficulty in obtaining attachés, who know beforehand the badness of the pay, Hon. T. J. H. Thurlow 3849, 3850.

Hardship in a man being required to spend his private means in order to enable him to perform his public duties properly, Earl of Clarendon 3906——Sufficient applications for attachéships, though the inadequacy of pay is well known, ib. 3965. 3968–3970——Grounds for the statement that the diplomatic servants are decidedly underpaid, Morier 4385–4389——Probable expenditure of their salaries by the ambassadors at Paris, St. Petersburg, Vienna, and Berlin, Labouchere 4644.

Fairness on the whole of the present remuneration of ambassadors and ministers, Sir H. L. Bulwer 4833, 4834——Inadequacy of the salaries of diplomatic servants generally, there being therefore the greater claim to more rapid promotion, Hon. E. R. Lytton 5049–5051. 5064–5069——Necessity of the junior officers having good private means in addition to their salaries, ib. 5049. 5064–5069.

Statement of the charge for salaries and allowances of the diplomatic service, and for the incidental expenditure thereof, from 1815 to 1832, both years included, App. 401——Statement of the charges for salaries and house rent in each of the years 1833-69, ib. 402.

Estimate of the amount required for salaries at each mission for the year 1870–71 as compared with 186970, App. 405–407.

Account of the salaries and house rent paid out of the Consolidated Fund for the diplomatic service in the year ended 31st March 1869, App. 472–474.

2. Comparative Salaries in the English and in Foreign Diplomatic Services:

More expensive salaries in the French then the English service, Hammond 68——Explanation that a certain Return relative to the salaries paid by foreign governments to heads of missions does not include any extra allowances; data for this Return adverted to, ib. 1743–1747. 1779–1781——Further reference to a certain comparative Return of English and Foreign diplomatic salaries, more especially as regards house rent not being included in the English salaries, ib. 1779–1782.

Careful investigation necessary in comparing the salaries of English heads of missions with those of foreign countries, Earl of Derby 2386–2393.

Statement of the salaries of the heads of missions of different countries in Europe and the United States; nearly similar sum paid by England and France, App. 418.

3. Great Increase in the Cost of Living, the Salaries being thus rendered Less Sufficient:

High prices exacted from the English diplomatic body in foreign cities, Hammond 26. 77–79. 122–126——Great increase in the cost of living abroad, so that the salaries attached to the principal missions are altogether inadequate, ib. 421. 453, 454——Further statement showing the higher prices exacted from ambassadors than from ordinary persons, ib. 449–452.

Large increase in recent years in the cost of living abroad; opinion that on this and other grounds diplomatic salaries do not admit of reduction, Earl of Derby 2290–2296. 2382–2393. 2462, 2463——Great increase in the cost of living abroad, so that the generality of the staff cannot live upon their pay. Earl of Clarendon 3444. 3446——Decreased emoluments of the diplomatic servants by reason of the great increase in the cost of living whilst the salaries have been stationary, ib. 3906, 3907. 3922–3924.

Similar cost of provisions at nearly all the capitals of Europe, Morier 4296–4298——The cost of living has very much increased abroad, ib. 4387——Necessity of very careful management by ministers abroad, in order to avoid being plundered, Sir H. L. Bulwer 4831, 4832——Great increase in the cost in living abroad, Hon. E. R. Lytton 5049.

4. Cost of Representation or Entertainments, as affecting the Question of Salary; Importance of such Entertainments:

Examination in support of the "cost of representation" being duly considered in reference to the amount of salary of the ambassadors at Paris and elsewhere, Hammond 463–501——Advantage in the ambassador being in a position to entertain, not only his own countrymen abroad, but influential people of the country in which he is located; facility thereby for the acquisition of valuable information, ib. 466–484——Grounds for larger larger salaries to ambassadors than to the chief officers of State at home, Hammond 497–501 —— Objection to any rule or restriction in regard to the practice of entertaining, Earl of Derby 2443.

Examination in support of the conclusion that a lavish expenditure by ambassadors and ministers, as well as a liberal expenditure by the subordinate staff, tends greatly to the efficiency and success of diplomacy, Hon. T. J. H. Thurlow 3656-3716. 3743. 3749–3751 —— Importance of diplomatic servants having every facility for mixing in society abroad, Earl of Clarendon 3913-3916.

Great diminution of the efficiency of the diplomatic servants if they did not entertain and did not mix freely in society, Morier 4360-4363 —— Importance of hospitality and social intercourse as greatly facilitating the acquisition of useful information by diplomatic servants, ib. 4562–4569.

Social rather than political character of the entertainments given by our ambassadors; very moderate expense of these entertainments or receptions, Labouchere 4651–4662 —— Slight cost of the evening entertainments given by ambassadors further adverted to, ib. 4822–4824.

5. Various Suggestions for an Increase or Revision of Salaries:

Suggestion that after a certain number of years' service the salaries might be increased, in the absence of promotion, Hammond 144, 145 —— Witness further advocates increased salaries, failing promotion after a certain time, ib. 358.

Conclusions favourable to an increase of the salaries of the junior members of the profession, Earl of Malmesbury 679-687. 720, 721 —— Expediency of raising the salaries of the second secretaries and of the secretaries of legation, Sir H. G. Elliot 873–876. 1010. 1086, 1087 —— Approval of the system of unpaid attachés, provided the secretaries and second secretaries are much better paid, after passing a severe examination, ib. 1120–1124.

Outline of witness's plan for improving the position or salaries of the attachés and secretaries, in the absence of increased promotion, Hammond 1750 —— The salaries at Berlin, Vienna, and Constantinople should be placed on the same footing as at Paris, Christie 3015 —— Statement of the salaries proposed by witness, Hon. T. J. H. Thurlow 3562. 3571 —— Each ambassador should have 10,000 l. a year and a house, ib. 3562.

Want of a revision of salaries, Earl of Clarendon 3908, 3909. 3922 —— Expediency of the salaries of the junior members being included in any inquiry or revision; readiness expressed by witness to undertake an inquiry in the matter, ib. 3973, 3974.

Suggestions on the score of salaries, if there be an amalgamation of services, Laboucher, 4748.

Paper explanatory of Mr. Hammond's suggestions for improving the position, as regards salaries, of the junior members of the diplomatic service, App. 514.

Secret Service. Explanatory statement in reference to the expenditure of the Foreign Office for secret service; circumstances under which the expenditure is controlled by witness as Permanent Under Secretary, instead of by the Parliamentary Under Secretary, Hammond 639–667.

Expenditure by witness of secret service money, Christie 2954.

Entire responsibility of witness in respect of the expenditure of secret service money at the Foreign Office; he declines to give any detailed information on the subject, Earl of Clarendon 3894–3899 —— Separate permission to each minister abroad to expend a certain sum in secret service, ib. 3898 —— Inexpediency of a discontinuance of the secret service fund, ib. 3925.

Secretaries of Embassy and Legation:

Statement that the secretary of legation cannot be expected to work in the chancellerie, Hammond 202. 205——Dissent from the view that jealousy naturally arises by reason of the relative positions of the secretary of legation and the heads of missions, ib. 347–350——Employment of the third secretaries in various other ways besides copying, ib. 362, 363.

Practice as to the promotions of secretaries of legations to secretaries of embassy, Hammond 1535–1537——Explanation as to Mr. Lowther having lost 50 l. a year by promotion to the rank of secretary of embassy, ib. 1538–1541.

Room for reduction of staff if the secretaries of legation had more distinct and regular work imposed upon them, Sir H. G. Elliot 1084, 1085——Expediency of the secretary of legation being required to do more regular work, and a greater amount of work than at present, Christie 2668, 2669. 2716–2722——Belief that the position of secretary of legation, in relation to that of the minister, is unduly independent; expediency of the latter having full power to utilise the services of the former as he pleases, ib. 2716–2722——Further statement that the secretary of embassy or legation should be made an efficient working man, ib. 2991, 2992. 2994. 3003, 3004.

Grounds for the statement that secretaries of embassy or legation do not as a rule make themselves useful when the chief is present, Christie 3176–3183——Advanced age of the first secretaries, so that regular clerical work is not to be expected of them, ib. 3176. 3178——Anomaly in there being a loss of pay on promotion from the rank of secretary of legation to that of secretary of embassy, ib. 3189–3192——Instances of idle and of inefficient secretaries, in witness's experience, ib. 3193.

Statement that witness has complained to the Foreign Office respecting the inattention of secretaries or attaches under him, and that the Foreign Office has generally taken action on such occasions, Christie 3195–3200.

Willingness evinced by the secretaries of legation to do whatever work is required of them, Earl of Clarendon 3439, 3440——A secretary cannot be expected to do the mere drudgery of the chancellerie work, ib. 3439.

Exception taken to the system whereby a secretary of embassy is not expected to do any work in the chancellerie, Labouchere 4635–4643.

Undue multiplication of secretaryships, Sir H. L. Bulwer 4884——Disapproval of the secretary of legation being made the executive officer over all the chancellerie, ib. 5216–5219——Decided objection to the secretary of legation being expected to work in the chancellerie, as a general rule; perfect willingness of the secretaries to work in any way, when pressure arises, Hon. E. R. Lytton 5062, 5063.

Nominal list of secretaries of embassy and secretaries of legation, App. 409.

Select Committee of 1861. Reference to the Report of the Select Committee of 1861, and the principal changes made in the diplomatic service in consequence of such report, Hammond 3–6——Conclusion that the present block to promotion in the service is caused chiefly by the changes introduced in consequence of the recommendations of the Select Committee of 1861, Morier 4279. 4306——Way in which the alterations consequent upon the Report of the Select Committee of 1861, tend to augment rather than to remove the dissatisfaction in respect of promotion, Hon. E. R. Lytton 5244.

Circular, dated 15th September 1862, transmitting regulations framed in pursuance of the recommendations of the Committee of 1861, App. 440–443.

Select Committees (Generally). Considerations by which the Secretary of State would be guided upon the question of adopting the recommendations of any Select Committee of the House; expediency of discretionary action in the matter, Hammond 1767–1769.

Seniority. See Promotions and Appointments.

Siam. Audit of the Siam accounts at the Foreign Office, they having never been audited in China, Alston 2027–2029——Statement as to the Indian Government not having any diplomatic relations with Siam, Kaye 2096–2101.

Estimate of the amount required for the establishment in Siam in 1870–71, App. 501–506.

Slavery Department (Foreign Office). Contemplated transfer of one of the clerks in the slavery department; impracticability of doing with less than a senior clerk and two juniors, Hammond 1858–1863.

Small Missions. Doubt as to the expediency of a reduction or abolition of any of the smaller missions in Europe; instances of valuable information obtained by witness, when Foreign Secretary, through small missions, Earl of Malmesbury 725–727. 738–740. 769–773. 776–778.

Further evidence in defence of the smaller European missions, with reference more especially to certain instances of very early and valuable information furnished thence to witness, when Foreign Secretary, Earl of Malmesbury 1141–1165. 1217–1220. 1226–1228. 1244–1246——Opinion that Sweden, Denmark, Brussels, and the Hague cannot be classed as small missions, ib. 1165, 1166.

Impolicy of going very far in the way of reduction of small missions, Sir H. G. Elliot 1389——Grounds for objecting to a withdrawal of the missions in Switzerland, Sweden, and Denmark, Earl of Derby 2432–2435——Advantage of small missions for the employment of the less able men, Hon. T. J. H. Thurlow 3612. 3844——Witness would not re-establish any that have been discontinued, ib. 3844——Advantage of small missions as nurseries for young diplomatists, Earl of Clarendon 3931.

SOUTH AMERICA:

1. Salaries and Staff at the several Missions.
2. Evidence in favour of Increasing the Importance of the Missions.
3. Suggestions on the other Hand for combining the Diplomatic and Consular Establishments at a Reduced Expense.
4. Recommended Employment of Special Representatives occasionally.
5. Interests of the United Kingdom in South America.
6. Objectionable Employment of British Consuls.
7. Suggested Amendment in regard to Marriages.

1. Salaries and Staff at the several Missions:

High salaries of the United States as compared with England in respect of missions in South America; larger aggregate expenditure of the former country, Hammond 68. 100. 601–604——Obstacles to any reduction of the present missions in South America, ib. 600.

Estimate of the salaries, &c. required for 1870–71, as compared with the amount for 1869–70, App. 405–407——Statement of the salaries of the diplomatic agents of different foreign countries in South America, ib. 418——Return showing the staff and salaries at each mission for the year 1868–69, ib. 474.

2. Evidence in favour of Increasing the Importance of the Missions:

Approval of paid attachés being sent to the South American missions, and of these missions being raised in character, Hammond 218–224——Disadvantage in the case of the South American republics by reason of our having only chargé d'affaires there, ib. 505, 506——Further reference to the South American missions, and the importance of giving them higher rank, ib. 568. 585–588. 596–598.

Approval of the South American missions being made more important, Earl of Malmesbury 741–744——Advantage if the British ministers had the title of minister resident or minister plenpotentiary; this might be tried without increase of salaries, Hammond 1617, 1618——Advantage if our diplomatic representatives in South America were raised to the rank of ministers resident, Earl of Clarendon 3949.

3. Suggestions on the other Hand for combining the Diplomatic and Consular Establishments at a reduced Expense:

Evidence opposed to the view that the missions in South America should be raised in rank; room rather for a reduction of rank and of expense, Christie 2626–2636——Result of witness's experience of South American governments, that their sense of right and justice cannot be relied on, ib. 2632–2634——Necessity of a larger salary to ministers in South America than to chargés d'affaires, ib. 2636——Circumstance of witness having never been consulted by the Foreign Office, since his retirement, relative to South American affairs, ib. 2705–2707.

Further statement in favour of combining the diplomatic and consular establishments in South America under a chargé d'affaires and consul general; small political interests as compared with the large commercial interests of England in these countries, Christie

3. Suggestions on the other Hand for combining the Diplomatic, &c.—continued.

3015. 3021–3024 ——Opinion recorded by Sir Richard Pakenham in favour of the arrangement for placing the consuls in South America under the resident minister, Christie 3026——Commercial character of the work in the missions further adverted to, ib. 3027, 3028. 3035.

Considerations as to the class of persons desirable for the post of chargé d'affaires and consul general; advantage in their being well acquainted with commerce, though there are also some political questions to be dealt with, Christie 3033–3037——Repetition of the opinion that the rank of our representatives may be advantageously reduced, ib. 3138–3140.

4. Recommended Employment of Special Representatives occasionally:

Advantage on special occasions in Brazil or the River Plate of sending out a special representative of high rank, Christie 2635, 2636——Further approval of the sending of special representatives on special occasions, ib. 3141, 3142.

5. Interests of the United Kingdom in South America:

Want of more continuous attention by the Foreign Office to South American subjects, our interests in the country being large, Christie 3098–3100——Increasing interests of this country in the River Plate and the Argentine Republic, ib. 3099, 3100——Difficulty of obtaining a satisfactory return of the number of British subjects in South America, Earl of Clarendon 3950, 3951.

Total value of imports and exports into and from the United Kingdom and various states of South America, in the year 1868, App. 420——Total value of the imports and exports of various states in South America, according to the latest available returns, ib.

6. Objectionable Employment of British Consuls:

Several instances of consuls in South America placing themselves in false positions, as regards private employment, Christie 3106-3107. 3110-3116——Comment upon a certain return from the Foreign Office, and upon its inaccuracy, as regards the employment of consuls otherwise than in the public service, ib. 3107-3113.

7. Suggested Amendment in regard to Marriages:

Information on the subject of marriages of British subjects, and of mixed marriages at the missions and consulates in South America; suggested adoption of certain precautions not now taken, Christie 3053-3078. 3206, 3207.

Special Missions. Admission as to special embassies and missions being of a costly kind, Earl of Derby 2481, 2482——Grounds for objecting to special missions, Hon. T. J. H. Thurlow 3585-3591.

STAFF (DIPLOMATIC SERVICE):

1. Evidence to the effect that there is no room for Reduction of Staff.
2. Evidence to a contrary purport.
3. Suggestions for a re-constitution of the Staff:
4. Question of Reduction at the Missions by utilising Clerks from the Foreign Office.
5. Statistics relative to the Staff employed.

1. Evidence to the effect that there is no room for reduction of Staff.

Immense increase of work performed by the diplomatic servants; enormous amount of diplomatic correspondence as shown by a paper submitted by witness, Hammond 145–147——Relative amount of the French and English diplomatic staff adverted to; the English service is none too numerous. ib. 195–198——Obstacles to any reduction of the staff at small missions where there are three members employed, ib. 199-205——Diminution in the junior staff since 1861, there being now no supernumeraries to dispose of, although five missions have been abolished, ib. 208–213.

Reasons for a larger staff, than in the case of France or Russia, Hammond 1454——Impracticability of conducting the service with any smaller staff than at present, ib. 1752——Dissent from the views of our representatives at Washington, Constantinople, and Stockholm that there might be a reduction of staff at those places, ib. 1794, 1795.

Approval generally of the present system of remuneration of the junior officers, the work being efficiently done, and the staff being adequate to meet any sudden crisis; advantage as compared with a smaller staff of better paid men, appointed by competition, Earl of Derby 2325–2329——Impracticability of any reduction in the number of attachés, Earl of Clarendon 3437, 3438. 3450. 3457——Anxiety of witness to effect economy by a reduction reduction of staff, if it were possible, Earl of Clarendon 3438. 3443. 3450——Opinion that there is no room for reduction in the staff of the legations in Europe, Sir H. D. Wolff 4410–4412.

Grounds for the conclusion that it would be very inadvisable to reduce the staff of our missions generally, though this may be done in exceptional cases, Hon. E. R. Lytton 5035. 5110–5116, 5120. 5242, 5243. 5247. 5248——Fluctuating amount of work at the larger missions; opinion that the staff cannot well be reduced, ib. 5039. 5052.

2. Evidence to a contrary purport:

Belief that at many missions the staff is larger than is required for the work, Sir H. G. Elliot 857. 1011–1014——Sufficiency at small missions of a private secretary and a good clerk, Christie 2657–2661. 2669——Views of Sir Henry Elliot, Mr. French and Sir Henry Bulwer adverted to as showing that a reduction of staff may well be effected, ib. 2669——Suggestions for a reduction of staff, under an amalgation scheme; large economy contemplated, Labouchere 4748.

Advantage of circumscribing as much as possible the staff at the large missions; suggestions whereby reduction may be effected, Sir H. L. Bulwer 4863–4865. 4875–4883. 4932, 4933——Further expression of the opinion that a smaller paid staff at the missions would be better for the service, ib. 5121. 5127.

3. Suggestions for a re-constitution of the Staff:

Proposal for a complete change in the constitution of the staff of missions, Christie 2649——Proposition that in addition to a private secretary, there be a secretary of legation with a staff of clerks under him; efficiency and economy to be thus secured, ib. 2656 et seq.

Suggestion that there be the same number of first, second, and third secretaries, and that there be sixteen attachés, Hon. T. J. H. Thurlow 3501–3505——Proposal that some attachés be kept available for any sudden pressure of work at any post, ib. 3549–3551. 3560, 3561——List of embassies, missions, &c., and of the staff in each case, under witness's scheme, ib. 3571——Doubt as to there being an unduly large number of prizes in the profession under the scheme proposed by witness, ib. 3779–3786.

Explanation of the scheme proposed by witness for a reorganisation of the staff, Labouchere 4748——Advantage of limiting the number of paid employés concurrently with an unlimited number of unpaid attachés, Hon. E. R. Lytton 5250, 5251. 5263, 5264.

4. Question of Reduction at the Missions by utilising Clerks from the Foreign Office:

Suggestion that some one might be sent from the Foreign Office to any mission when leave was being granted, and where one man would suffice to do the work, Sir H. G. Elliot 865, 866. 1005, 1006. 1008. 1044–1047.

Grounds for objecting to the proposal of Sir Henry Elliot for reducing the staff at foreign missions, and for sending out Foreign Office clerks to the place of men on leave, Hammond 1545. 1623, 1624——Inability of the Foreign Office to supply extra hands to missions, when pressed with work, ib. 1545.

Obstacles to the occasional employment of Foreign Office clerks at foreign missions, Earl of Derby 2333. 2441, 2442——Probability of increased pressure of work at the Foreign Office when there is increased pressure at the Foreign Missions, ib. 2546, 2547——Disapproval of keeping any mission at the minimum strength required, to be supplemented by assistance from the Foreign Office when pressure arises, Hon. E. R. Lytton 5080, 5081. 5103.

5. Statistics relative to the Staff employed:

Estimate of salaries for 1870–71, showing for each mission the staff to be employed, App. 405–407——Nominal list of present heads of embassies and missions, ib. 409——Total junior staff of sixty-four members in 1869, as compared with eighty-one in 1861, ib. 414.

Return of the staff, and of the number of new appointments in the diplomatic Service on the 1st January since 1850, arranged in classes, App. 525.

Stationery. Expediency of the stationery used at missions being in all cases paid for by the public; this being now the exception to the rule, Christie 3019, 3020.

Return showing for each of the years from 1859–60 to 1867–68, the allowance abroad in respect of stationery, App. 435.

Staveley, Mr. Communication from Lord Clarendon to the heads of missions abroad, dated 16th September 1869, submitting a proposition whereby Mr. Staveley would resign his position in the Foreign Office, and act as private agent on the abolition of the agency system in the office, App. 465——Testimony borne by Lord Clarendon to the efficiency of Mr. Staveley, ib.

Stockholm. Objection to an abolition of the missions in Sweden and Denmark, Earl of Malmesbury 1165, 1166, 1244–1246——All the consular work might well be done in the mission, Christie 2696.

Information relative to the mission at Stockholm, and the almost total absence of work when witness was there; conclusion that there is no object in keeping up a legation there, Labouchere 4721–4727. 4783–4785——Opinion that a higher salary should be given to the minister at Stockholm than at Copenhagen, ib. 4742.

Return showing the staff, and the salaries and allowances, for the year ended 31st March 1869, App. 473——Estimate of the salaries, &c. required for 1870–71, as compared with 1869–70, ib. 406.

Stuttgardt. Evidence in defence of the Stuttgardt mission, as beneficial for the political interests of this country, Hammond 167–169——Suggestion whether some reduction might not be made in the mission, Earl of Malmesbury 725. 738. 769. 776–778——Comparative expense of the French and English missions at Stuttgardt and Baden, Hammond 1651.

Suggestion that the minister at Munich might do the little work which is done at Stuttgardt, Earl of Derby 2422, 2423——Opinion that the salary at Stuttgardt should be equal to that at Berne, Christie 2999.

Grounds for objecting to the abolition of the Stuttgardt mission, Earl of Clarendon 3866–3869——Suggestion that the mission at Stuttgardt might be reduced, Sir H. D. Wolff 4410. 4444–4447——Exceptions taken to a combination of Stuttgardt with Darmstadt and Carlsruhe as one mission, though it would lead to a diminution of expenditure, Morier 4593–4613.

Return showing the staff, and the salaries and allowances, for the year ended 31st March 1869, App. 473——Estimate of the salaries, &c., required for 1870–71, as compared with the amount for 1869–70, ib. 407.

Supernumeraries. Statement as to there never having been supernumeraries in the English diplomatic service, Hammond 1748, 1749.

Switzerland. Strong objection to a suppression of the mission at Berne, Hammond 513——Importance of retaining the Berne mission, Earl of Malmesbury 725, 726——Importance of a British mission in Switzerland, Christie 2629. 3001——Small working staff sufficient at Berne, ib. 2657–2661——Circumstance of France having an ambassador at Berne, ib. 3001.

Return showing the staff, and the salaries and allowances, for the year ended 31st March 1869, App. 474——Estimate of the salaries, &c., required for 1870–71, as compared with 1869–70, ib. 406.

Teheran. See Persian Mission.

Telegraph. Equal necessity of tact and discretion in diplomatic officers abroad since the use of the telegraph, and the greater facilities for communication with the authorities at home, Hammond 519–533——Large reduction since 1860 in the cost of telegrams, ib. 616——Equal necessity of tact and judgment in ministers, since the facility of telegraphic communication with England, Earl of Malmesbury 749–753——Increased work of ministers abroad since the telegraph, though their responsibility is diminished, ib. 1205–1209.

Respects in which the telegraph tends to increase the difficulty of carrying on diplomatic business, Sir H. G. Elliot 908–910. 945–949. 981, 982. 1039–1043——Effect of the telegraph in increasing diplomatic work, without always lessening responsibility, Hon. T. J. H. Thurlow 3819–3821.

Opinion that equal responsibility rests with ministers since the use of the telegraph, whilst there is no diminution in the work, Earl of Clarendon 3917, 3918——Effect of the telegraph to increase rather than to diminish the responsibility of the diplomatic servants abroad, Morier 4371–4373. 4590.

Return showing for each of the years from 1859–60 to 1867–68, the expenditure abroad in respect of telegrams, App. 435.

Thurlow, The Hon. Thomas John Hovell. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Has been twelve years in the diplomatic service, being now a second secretary; has served nearly all round the world, 3475-3482——Has decided upon leaving the service on account of the slowness of promotion, 3483-3491. 3778——There is universal dissatisfaction in the service on account of the present block, and the absence of opportunities of distinction, 3492-3497——The pay also, is utterly insufficient to maintain a second secretary, 3494-3496.

Stagnancy of the service adverted to as attributable chiefly to the reduction in the number of missions whilst there has been no corresponding reduction in the number of subordinates, 3498-3500. 3851-3853——Suggestion that there be the same number of first, second, and third secretaries, and that there be sixteen attachés, 3501-3505——Proposed that no outsiders be brought in, 3504, 3505. 3583, 3584——Contemplated power in the Secretary of State to require retirement at an earlier age, 3506-3515. 3635-3642——Very early age of retirement in the French service, 3509. 3635-3637. 3642-3644.

Relief as regards the present block by drafting first and second secretaries to appointments in other branches of the public service, 3516-3519——Evidence in favour of the appointment at the embassies and at large missions of a permanent clerk or chancelier; facility thereby for a large reduction in the number of second secretaries, 3520-3543. 3548. 3717-3719. 3824-3830. 3835.

Particulars relative to the services and remuneration of Mr. Atlee as chancelier at the Paris embassy; excellent results of this appointment, 3522-3540. 3827-3830——Important economy of labour by the use of copying presses; satisfactory use of these by the United States, 3544-3547. 3748. 3808-3812——Suggestion that some attachés be kept available for any sudden pressure of work at any post, 3549-3551. 3560, 3561.

Expediency of the attachés receiving a small salary, 3552-3554——Better pay in the lower grades of the French service than of the English service, 3555——Advantage if there were a money qualification in the English as in the French service, 3556-3559. 3656-3661. 3676-3690——Proposed distribution of the attachés and of the staff generally suggested by witness, 3560-3562. 3571-3573——Number of embassies contemplated, 3562——Great importance attached to the provision of embassy houses, 3562-3570. 3749-3751.

Statement of the salaries proposed by witness, 3562. 3571——List of embassies, missions, &c., and of the staff in each case, under witness's scheme, 3571——Decided approval of more frequent transfers between the diplomatic service and Foreign Office, whereas the Foreign Office systematically opposes interchange of service, 3574-3579. 3645-3653. 3752-3754——Importance of the Queen's messengers being persons of good social position, and of their pay being liberal, 3580-3582. 3725-3743——Grounds for objecting to special missions, 3585-3591.

Dissent from the view that the prospects of promotion are no worse than in former years, 3593-3597. 3851-3853——Evidence in favour of routine promotion up to the rank of first secretary, after which it should be by merit, 3598-3612. 3755, 3756——Inexpediency of too much zeal in the junior staff, as a means of hastening promotion, 3600. 3604. 3610.

Argument that as a general rule ambassadors and ministers should be selected from the secretaries of embassy and legation, and that outsiders should not be brought in, 3602-3634. 3786-3803——Opinion that the appointment of Mr. Layard was very hard upon the service, 3605. 3630——Advantage of small missions for the employment of the less able men, 3612. 3844——Efficiency of the service under a close system, 3621.

Statement as to the United States having no fixed diplomatic service, and no regular staff, 3622-3627——Occasional appointment of outsiders in the French service, there being, however, much greater scope for promotion than in the English service, 3629, 3630. 3762, 3763. 3788-3790——Approval of three nominations by the Secretary of State for each vacancy, in the same way as in the Foreign Office, 3654, 3655. 3813.

Examination in support of the conclusion that a lavish expenditure by ambassadors and ministers, as well as a liberal expenditure by the subordinate staff tends greatly to the efficiency and success of diplomacy, 3656-3716. 3743. 3749-3751——Importance attached to the very liberal expenditure by diplomatists, 3677-3679. 3690-3697——Hard work of the junior staff at Paris, so that they do not go much into society, 3686-3689. 3766-3768.

Opinion that the restricted expenditure by the United States in diplomacy is not a wise economy, 3693-3702. 3759-3761. 3845, 3846——Statement as to its having been under consideration in America to adopt a close service, 3699——Expediency of a more liberal salary being given to the British minister as Washington, and of his keeping up a handsome establishment, 3711-3716.

Approval of the performance of consular duties by Mr. Atlee, at Paris; similar work might be performed at any mission where there is a permanent official, 3720-3724——

Thurlow, The Hon. Thomas John Howell. (Analysis of his Evidence)—continued.

Reference to the practice as to the conveyance of despatches, blue books, &c., by the foreign messengers, 3729–3738. 3776, 3777——Absence of any serious grievance to attachés by reason of their frequent removal, this practice being beneficial to the service, 3744–3747. 3822, 3823——Further statement as to the natural dissatisfaction caused in the service by the appointment of Mr. Layard, 3757, 3758. 3794–3800.

Exception further taken to the United States diplomatic system, the success of American diplomacy not being due to the service itself, but to the vigorous action of the Home Government, 3759–3761. 3842. 3845–3847——Instances of promotion in the English service, on account of special knowledge of languages, 3769–3775——Doubt as to there being an unduly large number of prizes in the profession under the scheme proposed by witness, 3779–3786.

Evil effect of the present discontent in the service, this being on the increase, 3801——Less willingness of the attachés to work, owing to the badness of their prospects, 3801. 3835–3807——Approval of a strict second examination for those intending to continue in the profession, 3813, 3814——Necessity of a private secretary at Paris, 3815——Advantage of an examination in French conversation, 3816–3818.

Effect of the telegraph in increasing diplomatic work, without always lessening responsibility, 3819–3821——Approval of a trial being given to the employment of clerks at large missions, 3831–3834——Expediency of some check upon the marriage of attachés, as an obstruction to their removal from place to place, 3836——Advantage if ambassadors might appoint attachés not having any claim to promotion, 3837, 3838——Reason for a higher class of minister at Copenhagen than at Stockholm, 3839–3841.

Satisfaction of witness with the present inquiry, the diplomatic service being very imperfectly understood, 3843——Opinion that the cost of witness's scheme would not be very great, 3848—— Circumstance of there being no difficulty in obtaining attachés who know beforehand the badness of the pay, 3849, 3850——Contemplated attainment of the rank of first secretary after fifteen years' service, and of the rank of minister in about twenty years, 3854, 3855——Doubt whether the promotion and pay are worse than in the army or navy, 3856–3859.

Trade and Commerce. Great importance of efficient diplomatic representation with reference to the enormous foreign trade and commerce of this country, Hammond 421——Importance of efficient diplomatic representation with reference to the industrial interests of this country, ib. 515, 516——Statement that the importance of foreign missions cannot be measured in all cases by the amount of trade, ib. 567.

Great increase of commercial business at the embassies and missions, Christie 2994.

Doubt as to their having been much ground for complaints by chambers of commerce previously to 1864, that the commercial interests of this country abroad were neglected, Earl of Clarendon 3878–3880——Exceedingly harmonious working of the Foreign Office and Board of Trade as regards all questions of foreign trade and commerce; decided objection to the commercial correspondence going to the Board of Trade, ib. 3879–3885. 3929, 3930.

Great advantage if the diplomatic officers had commercial knowledge, as by service in the consular branch, Sir H. D. Wolff 4228. 4233–4240.

Transfer of Staff. See Removal or Transfer of Staff.

Translations. Occasional employment of junior secretaries in making translations, Hammond 1585, 1586.

Travelling Expenses. Circular, dated 23rd December 1862, respecting the allowance of travelling expenses to heads of missions when absent from their posts on public service, App. 445.

Treasury Inquiry. Opinion that no practical utility would result from an inquiry by the Treasury, in conjunction with the Foreign Office, into diplomatic establishments and salaries, Earl of Clarendon 3889–3891.

Treaties. Admission as to some treaties having been made by secret negotiations, the operation of which treaties has not been satisfactory to this country, Earl of Derby 2408–2413.

Turkey. Large number of consuls and vice-consuls in the East under witness; heavy commercial business in consequence at Constantinople, Sir H. G. Elliot 845–851—— Further statement as to the control of witness over the consuls at Turkey, and as to the efficiency generally of the service; advantage of the consuls being English but for the difficulty as to the languages, ib. 1125–1140——Communication made by witness to the Foreign Office upon the question of reduction in the consular staff in Turkey and the Levant;

Turkey—continued.

Levant; very little reduction feasible, Sir H. G. Elliot 1247, 1248. 1327–1352——Absence of alterations since 1861 in consular jurisdiction in Turkey, ib. 1276.

Difficulty in drawing a line between commercial and political matters as regards the reports of the consuls to the Embassy at Constantinople, Sir H. G. Elliot 1280–1283——Importance of the consular establishments in Turkey on political grounds, ib. 1333–1350.

Explanations relative to the consular jurisdiction in Turkey and in Egypt; grounds for objecting to any surrender of the capitulations or treaties obtained from the Porte on the subject, Sir H. G. Elliot 1352–1384——Inconvenience still to be removed on the score of quarantine in Turkey, ib. 1385——Further statement as to the advantage of Englishmen as consuls in the East: efficiency, however, of the present consuls generally, ib. 1386–1388.

Turkish Language. Peculiar difficulty of the Turkish language, Hammond 108.

U.

Union of Missions. Suggestion whether economy and increased efficiency may not be secured by uniting some neighbouring missions, as in Holland and Belgium, under one head, Sir H. L. Bulwer 5187, 5188.

United States:

Much smaller amount of the salaries in the United States service than in the English service; much larger interests of England in European diplomacy, Hammond 68. 100——In 1855, the United States nearly doubled their diplomatic allowances, ib. 100——Reasons for the United States not having ambassadors in Europe, whilst it is very expedient that England should have them, ib. 426–431——Dissatisfaction in the United States service on account of the inadequacy of the salaries, ib. 454. 457——Large salaries of the United States diplomatic officers as compared with the salary of the Secretary of State, ib. 455, 456——Painful position in which American ministers are placed through their inability to return hospitalities, ib. 457. 489, 490.

Inadequate payment of United States ministers further adverted to, Hammond 575——Onerous duties discharged by some diplomatic servants of the United States, ib. 604——Immense trade of Great Britain, as compared with that of the United States, with China and India, ib. 1652——Comparisons between the cost of the Diplomatic and Consular Services of the United States and of England; larger cost of the former service with reference to the amount of trade and shipping represented, ib. 1652–1655——Several small missions maintained in Europe by the United States, ib. 1652.

Ill effect of the inadequate payment of the United States ministers in Europe, Earl of Malmesbury 745–747. 774——Exception taken to the American system of diplomacy, there being no regular service or profession, Earl of Derby 2297–2299.

Statement as to the United States having no fixed Diplomatic Service, and no regular staff, Hon. T. J. H. Thurlow 3622–3627——Opinion that the restricted expenditure by the United States in diplomacy is not a wise economy, ib. 3693–3702. 3759–3761. 3845, 3846——Statement as to its having been under consideration in America to adopt a close service, ib. 3699——Exception further taken to the United States diplomatic system, the success of American diplomacy not being due to the service itself, but to the vigorous action of the home government, ib. 3759–3761. 3842. 3845–3847.

Relative capacities and influence of American and English diplomatists, Sir H. L. Bulwer 4910–4914——More effectual action of English diplomatists if, like American diplomatists, they were to use a firmer tone in their representatives, ib. 5135, 5136. 5189–5196.

Illustration in the case of our differences with America, of the ill result of the Foreign Office assuming the part which should belong to the minister at Washington, Sir H. L. Bulwer 5172. 5208–5210.

Act for the regulation of the diplomatic and consular systems of the United States; sundry schedules attached thereto, App. 475–484.

Statement of the salaries of the heads of missions in the American service, App. 418——Return containing particulars relative to the diplomatic staff, and the salary in each case, ib. 485——Return containing details relative to the consular staff, the salaries, fees, &c., ib. 486–497——Statement of fees collected by consular officers, ib. 498–500.

Statement of trade, and of diplomatic and consular expenditure in this country, as compared with that in the United States, App. 507——Cost of the paid American consular service, according to the Act of Congress of 6th March 1868, ib.——Statement obtained from the Statistical Department of the Board of Trade, of British and American trade and shipping in the year ending 30th June 1867, App. 510.

University Degrees. Advantage of a university education in diplomatic servants, Hammond 180, 181. 192–194——Grounds for objecting to the appointments being thrown open to the universities for competition, ib. 188–194——Improbability of men who take good degrees at the universities caring to enter the Diplomatic Service, unless they have ample private means, ib. 1625–1627.

Advantage of a university degree, though it should not be a condition of appointment, Earl of Malmesbury 1184—— Exception taken to a university degree as sufficient test of fitness for the service, Sir H. G. Elliot 1254–1268——Very little value of a university degree as a qualification for nomination, Earl of Derby 2273, 2274——Inexpediency of any test or condition which should exclude from the service those who have received a good general education, though they may not have passed through the universities, nor obtained honours, ib. 2514–2522.

Advantage of candidates who had taken university honours, though this would be no guarantee for some of the qualifications required, Walrond 2906–2909. 2914, 2915. 2924–2927——Dissent from the view that university degrees or honours are any guarantee of fitness for the diplomatic service Mitford 4102–4105. 4110, 4111——Fallacy of relying upon university degrees as any sure test of fitness for the profession, Sir H. L. Bulwer 4852–4855.

Unpaid Service. See Attachés.

Uruguay. See Monte Video.

V.

Vacancies (Diplomatic Service.) Average number of vacancies annually in the higher posts as compared with the number of unpaid attachés who enter the service, Hammond 284–291——Statement of the vacancies, and of the appointment of attachés in the last five years, ib. 295–298——Doubt as to any difficulty having arisen in filling up vacant diplomatic posts, ib. 1886–1888.

Average number of vacancies in the Diplomatic Service for the last five years, ending December 1869, App. 424——Number of vacancies leading to promotion from the 1st January 1869, ib.

Return of the number of diplomatic servants in each grade for each year since 1850, pensioned or retired from service, or ceasing to be employed, App. 525.

Venezuela. Exception taken to the proposal to give Venezuela a minister resident, Christie 2980, 2981.

Vienna. Irregular way in which the staff used to attend at Vienna, Sir H. G. Elliot 863, 864——Necessity of the diplomatic officers keeping a carriage if they go much into society, Hon. E. R. Lytton 5067–5069.

Return showing the staff, and the salaries and allowances, for the year ended 31st March 1869, App. 472——Estimate of the salaries, &c., required for 1870–71, as compared with the amount for 1869–70, ib. 405.

W.

Walrond, Theodore, and Edward Headlam. (Analysis of their Evidence.)—(Mr. Walrond.) Is Secretary to the Civil Service Commissioners, 2874——(Mr. Headlam.) Is Senior Permanent Examiner, 2875——(Mr. Walrond.) Increased proportion of rejections in the examinations for the Diplomatic Service in recent years, owing to the tendency of pass examinations to reduce the standard of efficiency, 2876–2879——Total of six failures in French out of thirty-six failures since 1855; 2880–2882——Information relative to the examination in French, with suggestions for its amendment, 2883–2887. 2901–2905. 2928–2934——(Mr. Headlam.) Increase of failures in French though the standard has been lowered, 2888, 2889——Cessation of examinations in international law during the last few years, 2891, 2892.

(Mr. Walrond.) Approval, to some extent, of a scheme of competitive examination proposed by Mr. Grant Duff in 1861, by which the twelve best men were to be eligible for selection for vacancies within twelve months, 2894, 2895. 2899, 2900. 2909. 2922, 2923. 2940, 2941——Outline of the examination desirable, 2896–2898——Improbability of many persons coming forward for the Diplomatic Service if there were open competition; obstacle on account of the peculiar qualifications required for the service, 2906–2908. 2916–2921. 2936——Advantage of candidates who had taken university honours, though this this would be no guarantee for some of the qualifications required, 2906–2909. 2914, 2915. 2924–2927.

(Mr. Walrond and Mr. Headlam.) Statement as to there having been several failures in orthography, 2910–2913——(Mr. Walrond.) Nature of the inquiry by the Civil Service Commissioners as to the moral character of candidates, 2935. 2937–2939——Necessity of a right of selection in the Secretary of State, so as to secure the qualification of tact, 2935. 2940, 2941.

[Second Examination.] (Mr. Walrond.) Opinion that it is hardly yet time to apply to the Diplomatic Service the system of competition proposed by Mr. Grant Duff, 3297, 3298. 3333——Special reasons which render open competition less desirable in the case of the Diplomatic Service than of the Civil Service generally; opinion that ultimately it may be applied to the Diplomatic Service, 3298. 3326, 3327. 3396–3403.

Suggestions for a limited competition for the Diplomatic Service, by an annual examination of competitors nominated by the existing Secretary of State, or by any of his predecessors, 3298–3301. 3328, 3329. 3334–3338. 3346–3354. 3383–3385——Information relative to the open competition for clerkships in the Civil Service Commission, and the extremely satisfactory operation thereof, 3303–3325——Consideration of suggestions for empowering the heads of universities or colleges to nominate for the Diplomatic Service; approval of this proposal, though there are some obstacles to its adoption, 3339–3345. 3355–3382.

Inadequate knowledge of German required in the present examination for attaché-ships, 3386–3388——Amendment suggested as regards the second examination for the service, there being now too great an interval after the first examination, 3389–3395.

War. Great value of the Diplomatic Service as tending to prevent war, Earl of Malmesbury 756–759—— Dissent from the view that diplomacy can be fairly accused of having caused wars, though errors or omissions in diplomacy may have failed to prevent wars, ib. 1167–1178. 1231. 1242, 1243——Argument that as regards peace or war the diplomatic officers are responsible only for the efficient carrying out of the instructions of the Government, received through the Foreign Office, Earl of Derby 2414–2421.

Concurrence in the view that the value of the successes of diplomacy are chiefly of a preventive character, and are for the most part unseen, Earl of Clarendon 3919, 3920.

Ward. Mr. Dissent from the views of Mr. Ward on the question of open competition, Hammond 333–336——Explanation relative to the pension to Mr. Ward, ib. 1513–1514.

Warsaw. Necessity of a consul general at Warsaw, Hammond 128, 129——Explanatory statement as to the despatches of our consul general at Warsaw being usually sent as far as Berlin by the French messenger, ib. 1876–1885.

Washington. Enormous expense of living at Washington, Hammond 125——Argument that on the score of policy and harmonious relations it is very important that the British minister at Washington should be in a position to entertain liberally, ib. 1712——Very serious effect of the depreciation in the value of gold in the United States upon the salary of our minister at Washington, and upon the consuls' salaries, ib. 1712–1718.

Circumstance of the salary of our minister being equal to that of the President, Earl of Derby 2383–2385. 2462, 2463——Great expense of living at Washington; belief that it is the dearest capital in the world, ib. 2295. 2382——Expediency of a more liberal salary being given to the British minister at Washington, and of his keeping up a handsome establishment, Hon. T. J. H. Thurlow 3711–3716.

Approval under certain conditions of an ambassador in lieu of a minister at Washington, Earl of Clarendon 3921——Decided ineffciency of the salary of our minister at Washington, ib. 3926, 3927.

Usefulness of the minister's entertainment at Washington, Labouchere 4663——Little if any room for reduction in the staff at Washington; nor is the salary of the minister too large, ib. 4664–4669.

Return showing the staff, and the salaries and allowances for the year ended 31st March 1869, App. 472——Estimate of the salaries, &c., required for 1870–71, as compared with 1869–70, ib. 407.

Watson, Mr. Explanation as to Mr. Watson, after only ten years' service, being now secretary of legation at Athens, Hammond 161.

Wolff, Sir Henry Drummond, K.C.M.G. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Was for twelve years in the Foreign Office, 4222——Considers that promotion in the Diplomatic Service should depend entirely upon merit, 4223–4225——Objection to any certainty of promotion beyond the rank of Envoy Extraordinary, 4225. 4258——Expediency of full discretion in the Secretary of State as to the appointment of ambassadors, 4225. 4256, 4257. 4261–4263——Proposition for an amalgamation of the Diplomatic Service, Consular Service, and Foreign Office, by establishing equivalent ranks, and by a system of promotion or exchange from one service into the other, 4226–4249.

Superiority of the English diplomatic servants to those of any other country, 4226——Great advantage if the diplomatic officers had commercial knowledge, as by service in the consular branch, 4228. 4233–4240——Approval of frequent changes of juniors from one post to another, 4250–4252——Opinion that the ambassador at Paris should always change with the Government, and that other ambassadors should not be more than six years in any place, 4253. 4259–4261——Approval of the ambassador at Constantinople remaining there for a long time, 4253–4255.

[Second Examination.]—Opportunities of witness for observing the working of the legations in various parts of Europe, 4407–4409——Opinion that there is no room for reduction in the staff of the legations, 4410–4412——Suggestion that the mission at Stuttgardt might be reduced, 4410. 4444–4447——Grounds for the conclusion that neither economy nor efficiency would result from the employment of clerks in lieu of second secretaries, 4413–4416——Non-objection to the employment of a clerk at large embassies like Paris, 4413. 4416.

Consideration of the practice as to distribution of work in the Foreign Office; expediency of amendment with a view to the Political Under Secretary having the means of expressing an opinion upon every paper of importance before the final decision is taken, 4417–4443. 4458–4462.

Further evidence in favour of the ambassador at Paris, changing with each change of Government; little if any objection on the score of expense, 4448–4457. 4463–4465.

Work at Missions. Immense increase of work performed by the diplomatic servants; enormous amount of diplomatic correspondence, as shown by a paper submitted by witness, Hammond 145–147——Statement of the various kind of work imposed on attachés; its fluctuating character, ib. 315–317——Heavy work of some of the foreign ministers, the pay not having increased in proportion to the work, ib. 1574–1579——Reference to the number of volumes of correspondence as some criterion of the work at missions, ib. 1783–1786——Explanation as regards the correspondence of certain missions, that there is in many cases a large amount of business transacted personally, ib. 1793

Conclusion that at many missions the work is not sufficient to occupy the staff——Sir H. G. Elliot, 857. 1011–1014; Christie 2657–2661. 2669; Labouchere 4626–4631. 4635–4643. 4670. 4692–4694. 4707 et seq.

Fair amount of work done at foreign missions, Earl of Derby 2330. 2394–2405——Doubt whether any curtailment could be advantageously made in the amount and classes of work performed at the foreign missions; valuable information frequently supplied, ib. 2394–2407——Fluctuating amount of work at the larger missions; opinion that the staff cannot well be reduced, Hon. E. R. Lytton 5039. 5052.
